There is a less marked distinction between the 'European' and 'Italian' groups than between the former and the 'African.' For, admittedly, the 'Italian' is a revision of the 'European.' We have already referred to the derivation of the name from Aug.'s celebrated dictum, de Doct. Chris. ii. 15: in ipsis autem interpretationibus Itala ceteris præferatur, nam est verborum tenacior cum perspicuitate sententiæ. A keen discussion has centred round the expression 'Itala.' Bentley went the length of proposing to read 'illa . . . quæ' for 'Itala . . . nam.' This proposal has been revived by Corssen,[§] who seeks to show that it fits in with the context. But this is merely to cut the knot. We cannot help believing that the true solution is that suggested by an admirable article in the Theolog. Review for 1874 by Kenrick, who proves beyond doubt that Northern Italy by the end of the 3rd cent. was regularly known under the name 'Italia.'[‖] But this was the very region in which Aug. had first become acquainted with the Scriptures. And the quotations of Ambrose, his teacher and guide, agree with this 'Italian' type of text. Is it not, at least, probable that this revision was made in N. Italy, and so naturally became known to Augustine?[¶]

Burkitt has recently essayed to prove that Aug. here means nothing else than the Vulg. of Jerome.[] His main argument is the Gospel quotations in the De Consensu Evangelistarum and a passage in the Contra Felicem. It cannot be doubted that the text of the Gospp. in the former stands in closest agreement with the Vulg.; while the latter also appears to be Jerome's revision, though it stands side by side with an 'African' text of Acts. Yet it must be remembered that, in the Gospels, texts like f and ff_2 are in close agreement with the Vulg., and there would always be the tendency to correct Aug.'s text according to Vulg. readings. This latter hypothesis would quite account for the phenomena in Contra Felicem. But, even supposing Aug. did (as he quite well may have done) use the Vulg. in this treatise, how can this be used to prove that he designates it by the name 'Itala' in the celebrated passage quoted? Surely the data are insufficient to justify so wide a generalization.[††]

This 'Italian' revision has regard both to readings and renderings. It is an attempt to soften the harsher Lat. tr^{ns}, while, at the same time, the Lat. text is corrected according to a non-Western and late group of Gr. MSS.[*]

The leading representative is f. q is also usually assigned to this family; but, as Mr. White[†] has shown, 'if it be Italian in its readings, it is European in its renderings.' Indeed q shows a mixture of various elements,[‡] having close relations to k, b, f, g_1, and a. The other most important representative of this group is to be found in the Freisingen Fragg. of the Epistles.[§] These exhibit a remarkable resemblance to the quotations of Aug. and Capreolus, Bp. of Carthage. Perhaps we ought to mention here an interesting type of text found chiefly in the Catholic Epp. It is the Late-African of the epoch of the Vandal supremacy.[‖] It is found in h of Cath. Epp.; apparently in 1 J[¶] of the Freisingen Fragg., and in Fulgentius, Bp. of Ruspe. It was probably derived from the 'Italian' type, but greatly modified by its transference to Africa. The important text of the 'Speculum' (m) probably belongs to this group,[] and, though not entirely of the same type, we may assign to it the Fleury Apocalypse (h). Berger would place the text of Priscillian as the transition between the 'Italian' family and this 'Late-African' group.

There still remains a large number of texts which have not been classified. These are the Gr.-Lat. MSS, in which the Gr. text must, of course, have had a powerful influence upon the Latin.[††] There is Cod. Colbertinus (e), a MS of Languedoc, which has 'African,' 'European,' and Vulg. elements. g_1[‡‡] seems to be distinctly 'European' in St. Matthew, although 'Italian' and, at times, Vulg. readings appear. l has apparently a Vulg. base with numerous OL readings intermixed.[§§] The Lat. interlinear version of Cod. Sangallensis (δ) is shown to contain, at least, a very important OL element, which sometimes goes back to the earlier stages of the 'European' text.[‖‖] The latest OL text of Acts discovered by Berger in a MS of Perpignan occupies 'a central position in the midst of the various recensions.'[¶¶] It seems to have a Spanish colouring, but yet to belong to the same general family as the Gigas (g), s (Bobb. Frag.), the Frag. in the Rosas [*] See Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. pp. 8 ff. (esp. pp. 27–28). The Frag. of Sir, lately published by Douais, belongs to the Spanish family, and Berger's Perpignan Frag. of Acts has apparently a connexion with the Spanish text. It is of some importance to find that the poet Juvencus, prob. a Spaniard by birth, is nearest, in his biblical text, to a and h.

[†] When Lucifer has an 'African' text, he is usually quoting directly the works of Cyprian.

[‡] In this Ep. the remarkable resemblance between the 'Speculum' (m) and Priscillian is very clear.

Breyther, Diss. de vi, quam antiq. Verss. . . . lat. in crisin evang. iv. habeant, Merseb. 1824.

[††] Would not the fact, which Burkitt adduces, that the Vulg. Gospels were published under the auspices of Pope Damasus, have suggested, almost inevitably, the epithet 'Romana'? But so weighty an authority as Berger is inclined to believe that the solution of the question may be found in the direction indicated by Burkitt. See Bulletin Critique, Sept. 5, 1896. So also Zahn in Theolog. Lit.-Bl. xvii. No. 31, and Corssen, Bericht über die latein. Bibelübersetzungen, p. 5.

[¶] This text seems almost identical with the 'Speculum.'

[] But see an import. article in Classical Review, iv. pp. 414–417, by Sanday, in which he suggests that 'the Speculum was put together somewhere in the circle in which Priscillian moved, and from a copy of the Bible which, if not exactly his, was yet closely related to it' (p. 416). This is certainly borne out by a comparison of OT passages in Priscill. and the 'Speculum.'

[††] But is not Hort's estimate of the value of the Lat. texts too low? (Introduction, p. 82). There is a very close agreement in the Epp. between the Lat. of Cod. Clarom. and Cod. Bœrner. and the quotations in Victorinus and Ambrosiaster. On the basis of this, Zimmer has made out, at least, a strong case for three types of text in the Epp. (1) 'Princeps' = text found in Tert. and Cyp. (2) 'Communis' = text of Clarom.—Bœrn.—Victorin.—Ambros^{ter}, being a revision of (1), with closer adherence to Gr. original. (3) Bible of Aug., Freis., and Göttweig Fragg. A typical example of the 'Italian' revision. See SK, 1889, ii. p. 331 f. Also, Der Galater-Brief im alt. latein. Text, Königsberg, 1887.

[‡‡] Thus, e.g., in Mt 2, a minute collation of authorities shows that a b q respectively are closer to g_1 than to each other or any of the remaining Lat. authorities.

Bible,[*] and Cod. e (Laudianus) of 'Acts,' i.e. to the 'European' group.

For NT authorities, Hort's learning and judgment have laid a sound basis of classification. In the case of OT MSS such a grouping does not yet exist. And any attempt at furnishing principles of genealogical relationship seems beset on every side with no ordinary difficulties. The reasons are plain. Only in rare instances have we a variety of documents covering the same ground. Even when this is the case, their fragmentary nature renders it unsafe or impossible to generalize. In OT the quotations of the Fathers are, as a rule, specially perplexing, because, by this time, the text of the LXX had reached an almost hopeless state of confusion. It is only when a thorough examination of the principal cursives of the LXX has been made that order can be brought into the chaos. We do not propose, therefore, to attempt a classification. All we can do is to give the results of a more or less minute comparison of the leading witnesses for OT. Let us follow the order in the list of MSS above.

Hexateuch.—We have here our best opportunity for comparing various texts, as there are four authorities which cover, to a great extent, the same ground. These are Cod. Lugdunensis, Cod. Wirceburg., Cod. Monacens., and the Fragg. of Cod. Ottobon. A comparison of the four texts reveals, at first sight, some strange phenomena. In Gn there is a close agreement between Cod. Ottob. and Cod. Lugd. In Ex, Cod. Lugd. and Cod. Wirceb. apparently belong to the same tr., while the Munich MS seems to stand by itself. Cod. Ottob., which appears to have suffered grievously by corruption, has a possible resemblance to the two first-named MSS. In Lv there is a good deal of variation between the three chief texts (Ottob. not extant). In Nu and Dt we find that Cod. Lugd. and Cod. Monac. have, without question, the same source, while the relation to them of Cod. Wirceb. is difficult to determine. When we compare patristic quotations with the texts, it is striking to discover that those of Lucifer have a remarkable resemblance both to Cod. Lugd. and to Cod. Wirceb. What can be said of such complex results? We believe the solution lies in taking into account the underlying Gr. text. Accepting the classifications made by Ceriani[†] and Lagarde[‡] in reference to the Lucianic, Hesychian, and Palestinian recensions of the LXX, we find phenomena such as the following. In a section of Gn in which we have compared Cod. Wirceb. with the chief Gr. authorities, the result shows the most extraordinary mixture. On the whole, Cod. Wirceb. comes closest to the 'Cotton' Genesis (D), but the Bodleian E also finds a place. There are distinct traces, in addition, of 'Lucianic' readings, and the Pal. recension is not wanting. A similar collocation in Ex confirms the mingling of elements in the text. Here, Cod. Wirceb. shows an intimate relation with AF and Hesychius, but there is also a Lucianic strain throughout. Following the same method with Cod. Lugd. in Lv, we reach a like result. From the definite facts already stated, and the total impression left by repeated comparison of texts, we are led to believe that in this group of writings the extant documents probably go back to an original tr^{n} of which they are recensions. Only, the extraordinary variety of LXX texts prevalent in the age when the MSS were transcribed caused an unusual amount of correction and mixture of readings in the various documents.[§] This is quite sufficient to account for the manifold differences. And it is to be observed that some portions suffered from this process far more severely than others. Probably, we might not be wrong in placing the above-mentioned MSS parallel to the later 'European' texts[*] of NT, if not to the 'Italian.' They have something in common both with the quotations in Ambrose and those of the 'Speculum' (m). The Fragg. of Gn pub. by Conybeare come closest to Cod. Lugd. and S. Ambrose.

Historical Books.—According to our list, these consist of Ruth, Fragg. of Samuel and Kings, and Esther. Apparently, the text of Ru, which is 'Spanish,' agrees almost exactly with the quotations of Ambrose, and so may be designated 'Italian.'[†] The Fragg. of Samuel and Kings, while having their origin in different countries, are linked together in various ways. They all seem to have an intimate connexion with the recension of Lucian,[‡] while they have the closest resemblance to the quotations of Lucifer, Ambrose, and Claudius of Turin. Accordingly, they may be classed, perhaps, as early 'Italian.'[§] In Est much confusion is found among the extant texts, perhaps arising from the fact that only a 'résumé,' as Berger calls it, and not a complete version, existed in the OL Bible. We have compared Sabatier's text, which is from a Corbey MS No. 7 (at Paris), with that of the Munich MS pub. by Belsheim, the Vallicellian text (in Sabatier), and the extracts given by Berger from a Lyons MS. Probably, this last is the best. It resembles closely the Vallicellian text and that of Belsh. (which appear to us to be almost identical), while the Corb. text in Sabat., owing to mutilations and corruptions,[‖] seems a long way inferior to all the others. Here, again, we may perhaps go the length of saying that one tr^{n} seems to lie at the foundation, but it has undergone much revision and corruption from a comparison with Gr. texts which had been subject to an exceptional amount of mixture. From an almost entire lack of quotations in the Fathers it is impossible to attempt to localize the text. There are frequent traces of the 'Lucianic' recension.

Poetical Books.—The extant remains of Job are so scanty that it is difficult to come to any conclusion regarding the text. Apparently, the Frag. of Fleury, which is found both in the 'Speculum' and Priscillian, belongs to the earliest form of the Lat. VS, following the same type of Gr. text as Cyp. and Lucif., and therefore, perhaps, being entitled to the designation 'African.'

According to Burkitt,[¶] a second type of OL is found in the quotations of Ambrose, based on the leading uncials of the LXX and in intimate connexion with the Greek. The Fragg. which Berger has pub. from the margin of the Leon Cod. also reveal a close attachment to the Greek (esp. Cod. A), and coincide most frequently with the quotations of Ambr. and Aug. Perhaps the two last types of text ought to be called 'Italian.'

For a genuinely 'African' text of Ps our most trustworthy authority is MS L. of Cyprian's Testimonia. The Verona and St. Germain Psalters both exhibit a later type of text, although the former has suffered less revision. It would be rash to specify either text definitely as 'European' or 'Italian.' A noteworthy feature is that the Verona MS shows a striking agreement with Aug.'s text of Ps, while decidedly marked is the affinity between the St. Germ. Psalter and the quotations of Cassiodorus the Calabrian. The portions of the OL Psalter found in the Mozarabic Liturgy belong to this latter type of text.[*]

Proverbs.—Here we can distinguish two recensions. The one is represented by Vogel's Fragg., which agree with the quotations of Cyp. and Vigilius of Thapsus, having also a close resemblance to the 'Speculum.' It may be designated 'African.' The other is seen in the Fragg. of the St. Gall MS, No. 11. These have their chief parallels in Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine. They therefore belong to the 'Italian' family.

The Fragg. of Ecclesiastes and Canticles named in our list are of precisely the same character as the second recension in Proverbs. We may here note that for OT it seems even more difficult than in the NT to draw a line between 'European' and 'Italian' texts. Often, indeed, there appears to be none.

Prophetical Books.—In attempting to classify the extant OL texts of the Prophets, we are met, as in the Hexateuch, by the difficulty of conflicting evidence. Fortunately, part of the ground has been cleared by Burkitt in his Rules of Tyconius. Much of what follows depends on his important investigations. The extant Fragg. of the Prophets plainly do not belong to the oldest stratum of the OL tr^{n}. It is needful, therefore, to begin as usual with Cyprian; as we have seen, Tertullian's quotations are of doubtful value. Now, Burkitt has clearly proved[†] that Tyconius the Donatist (c. A.D. 400) used an OL version of the Prophets (in Isaiah at least[‡]) almost identical with that of Cyp., the only difference being a slight revision of the Latin. How does this writer stand towards our two chief MS authorities, the Weingarten (w) and Würzburg (h) Fragg.? At many points he is in close agreement with both, but especially, perhaps (e.g. in Ezk), with w. Now, a comparison of w and h shows so many agreements in proportion to differences that we cannot help believing that they are copies of the same tr^{n} of the Prophets, whose variation is accounted for by varying elements in the Gr. texts by which they were revised.[§] In h, e.g. in the midst of a great mixture of types, the Luc. strain is considerably more prominent than in w.[‖] Accordingly, we may perhaps call h an 'Italian' text;[¶] its coincidences with Ambrose, and to a less extent with Augustine, are noteworthy. w is possibly an earlier revision of the same tr^{n}.[] It is interesting to note that Tyc. has a text essentially the same in the Prophets as another Donatist, Habetdeus, whose quotations can be assigned to the year A.D. 411. And to make the coincidence still more important, it is found that the St. Gall Frag. of Jeremiah has remarkable points of connexion with the biblical text used by a Donatist in the pseudo-Augustinian Contra Fulgentium Donatistam. This goes some way to establish a Donatist tradition of the OL version.[*]

A comparison of Tyc. with the 'Speculum' reveals a far greater amount of difference than between the former and Cyprian. But there is so much important resemblance that the variation is probably due to a gradual revision of the language in m. This, as Burkitt points out, greatly enhances the value of the 'Speculum,' though a late text, for the criticism of the LXX.[†]

In some passages the 'Spec.' has a very close connexion with h, while in others it is entirely different. In comparing the quotations of Tertull. and Cyp., with reference to the Gr., for another purpose, the writer was surprised to find that in the Book of Daniel, while Cyp. sometimes used Theodotion's version and at others the LXX, Tert. seemed invariably to follow the latter. The whole subject has been thoroughly investigated by Burkitt,[‡] who proves beyond question, that while Theodotion was followed as early as the 3rd cent. by Auctor de Pascha Computus, and thenceforward throughout the Lat. Church (also in h and w of Prophets), Tertull. adhered to the LXX, as also, to some extent, did Cyp., whose text is mixed.[§] This shows the varying histories of the several books of Scripture, a fact which has been already noticed in regard to NT.

APOCRYPHA. Fourth [Second] Esdras.—The texts of this book have been accurately studied, with the result that the leading authorities fall into two groups. Two MSS, Cod. Sangermanensis (pub. by Sab.) at Paris (Bibl. nat. lat. 11504–5) and Cod. Ambianensis (Amiens, Bibl. Communale 10) have a 'French' text; the other two, Cod. Complut. (Madrid Univ. 31) and Cod. Mazarinæus (Paris), present a 'Spanish' type of text. The other extant texts are related to these two families.[‖]

Third (First) Esdras.—Here, again, we possess two types of text, both of which are represented in Sab., and one of which is the Vulg. Both texts are evidently of great antiquity, presenting many of the most typical characteristics of the 'African' group. Probably, Vulg. is an emended form of the other version.

Tobit.—As appears from our list, there are many MSS extant of the OL version of Tobit. So far as we can judge, they all go back to one tr^{n}, though considerable differences exist. A rough comparison leads us to believe that the leading texts are related somewhat as follows: Sabatier's text (derived from MSS lat. 93 and 11505 at Paris) seems closest to the quotations of Lucifer. Slightly different from it are Paris MS lat. 11553 and Munich 6239, which agree closely. Cod. Regio-Vat. No. 7 is more independent of the other texts, and may be, perhaps, a separate translation.[¶] It contains only chs. i.–vi. The rest is Vulgate. The quotations in Speculum seem to show a third recension.

[*] There seems to be a close resemblance in Ps between Priscillian and the 'Speculum.' The Latin Psalter with Anglo-Saxon paraphr. pub. by Thorpe, Oxf. 1835, is almost identical with the so-called 'Roman' Psalter of Jerome, although occasionally it diverges. The text of Cassiod. has also a most intimate connexion with Roman Psalter.

[†] Rules of Tyconius, pp. lii–cvii.

[‡] It must be noted that there is a considerable difference between Tyconius' text of Is and of Ezk. See important table on p. cvi of op. cit. Burkitt suggests that perhaps there was 'a partial revision of the African Bible anterior to Cyprian,' the result of which is seen in the text of Ezk in Tyc. This point has been already brought forward in connexion with the quotations of Cyprian.

[§] See also Cornill, Das Buch d. Proph. Ezech. p. 31 ff. But see Corssen's most important discussion of the two MSS in Zwei neue Fragmente d. Weing. Propheten-MS, Berlin, 1899, in which he shows that the variation is largely due to the insertion of glosses in the texts.

[‖] May it be that the infusion of this element into OT texts corresponds to the 'Antiochene' revision of NT? Since this was written, we are interested to see that Sanday is inclined to assign the above-named revision to Lucian (Oxf. Debate, p. 29).

[¶] Streane, Double Text of Jeremiah, p. 370, shows that for Jer h is non-African and prob. Italian. His searching investigation goes to confirm our hypothesis.

[] Ranke shows that w has points of contact with Arnobius, Lucifer, Ambrose, and Hesychius (a Dalmatian bishop). See Fragmenta . . . Antehieron. fasc. 2, pp. 122, 123. This would suggest a very wide diffusion. An attempt to trace points of agreement and differences between the two texts (w and h) and the Fathers has led, on the whole, only to confusing results. Clearly, we have much yet to learn regarding the OL version (or versions) of the Prophets.

Judith.—As in To, the OL of Jth appears in a variety of MSS. While one original lies, apparently, behind all the texts, it appears to us that Mun. MS 6239 has the oldest type of text. A somewhat longer and perhaps later form is found in the text of Sabatier (Paris MSS lat. 93, 11505). The Paris MS 11553 seems to have a mixed text, now agreeing with Mun. MS, now with Sabat. MS lat. 11549 (at Paris), while somewhat mixed, agrees perhaps more often with Mun. MS.[*]

Wisdom of Solomon.—As already pointed out, this is proved to be an 'African' text. It seems to be fully as old as Cyp.[†]

Sirach.—The Vulg. text of this book is also 'African' Latin. Curiously enough, however, chs. 44–50 are shown by Thielmann[‡] to have been tr^{d}. later than chs. 1–43, 51, and they belong to the 'European' type of text. The Prologue is also 'European.' The Frag. ed. by Douais is apparently a 'Spanish' text, being a revision of the primitive 'African' version.

Baruch.—Two main types of text, so far as we can judge from the published MSS, are extant in this book. The one is the Vulg., which agrees with the quotations of Cyp., Vigilius, and, as a rule, Fulgentius. The other, which is not far removed, is represented by Paris MS 11951, Rheims MS No. 1, and Vallicell. B. 7 (all in Sab.). We cannot say much as to patristic evidence, but at times, at least, it is corroborated by the quotations of Hilary and Augustine.[§]

Maccabees.—In 1 Mac two forms of text can be traced. The one is the Vulg. The other, which in many passages is identical with the Vulg. and then disagrees to a great extent, is found in Paris MS lat. 11553, pub. by Sabat. It agrees uniformly with the quotations of Lucifer, which are very numerous in this book. Berger points out that this latter rests on the same tradition as that of Cod. Complut., while there are readings in the Leon Palimpsest (Chapter Lib. No. 15) which seem to lie behind the St. Germain text in Sab.[‖] A mixed text, according to Berger, is found in the Lyons MS No. 356.

In 2 Mac we find several versions more or less distinct. The Vulg. stands by itself. A mixed text is that of Lyons MS 356.[¶] The text of Cod. Complut. is of a different type from the Vulg. We have not been able to see the text from Ambrosian MS E. 26 infer., pub. by A. Peyron.[] Berger (Hist. de la Vulg. p. 138) says of it: 'The version . . . preserved by our MS is not found elsewhere, and is of extreme importance.'[††]

A few words ought to be said, before we conclude this article, upon the Gr. text which underlies the OL version. For, after all, its primary importance consists in the evidence it furnishes for the original Gr. text of both OT and NT. Obviously, the inquiry is very wide in its range. We can only give the barest outline; and even this, in the present condition of the investigation, is incomplete and provisional. Two most important and suggestive statements are made by Hort as to the type of Gr. text circulating at the period with which we are here concerned. 'The text of D presents a truer image of the form in which the Gospels and Acts were most widely read in the 3rd and probably a great part of the 2nd cent. than any other extant Gr. MS.' And again: 'A, both in the Gospels and elsewhere, may serve as a fair example of the MSS that, to judge by patristic quotations, were commonest in the 4th cent.' (Introd. pp. 149, 152). These words, in our view, have a very significant bearing on the question before us. For it has become sufficiently clear that the period from the middle of the 2nd cent. to the end of the 4th is the most important for the OL version. Keeping them in mind, let us come to the actual facts, in so far as we are able to present them.

The NT must be our starting-point. What can be said as to the earliest group of texts, presumably the 'African' family? Cod. k, which, as we have seen, agrees with Cyp., is the most important witness. Fortunately, Sanday, in the work so often quoted, has a valuable Appendix on 'the Gr. text implied by k.'[*] Elaborate lists showing the relation of k to the leading Gr. authorities plainly declare that the main elements in its text are the 'Western' (as represented by D) and the 'Neutral' (א B in particular). The 'Western' strain slightly predominates. As regards the kindred Cod. e, a collation we have attempted of several long sections from the Gospp. reveals a close relation with B and one almost as intimate with D, א, and A. The one fact which strikes us in comparing the two sets of results is that A has become an important factor in Cod. e. When the 'European' group is investigated, it is interesting to note the changing of places by the MSS. We have taken a and b as typical texts, and the results for both are, on the whole, congruous, except that א seems to have a much more important place in b than in a. In both, B loses the prominent position which it occupied in the 'African' group. D has, of course, a predominating influence, but it is closely followed by A. Indeed it looks as if, in the Gospp. at least, the influence of A were among the chief forces in differentiating the 'European' from the 'African' group. And this seems to coincide remarkably with Hort's hypothesis of a Syrian recension, perhaps made at Antioch, about the beginning or a little before the beginning of the 4th cent., whose influence spread in all directions. For, in the Gospp., 'A has a fundamentally Syrian text.' In any case, the great increase in the A element is plainly no accidental circumstance, but, as we shall find in the OT, a fact intimately bound up with a certain stage of the OL version.

We have taken f as representative of the 'Italian' texts. The facts which a minute examination of long sections in Mt, Mk, and Lk brings out are of the kind we might expect. There is, apparently, a great mixture of elements in the underlying Greek. One of the most noteworthy of these is represented by Cod. L, itself a very mixed text, containing early readings mingled with 'Alexandrian,' 'Western,' and 'Syrian' elements. Cod. C is also prominent, which again is composed of most various forms of text. As invariably, D is still an important factor, while A also appears to have lost little ground. א and B have not regained the place they occupied in the 'African' group. In Ac, as we have seen, we can at least distinguish between the 'African' and [*] Scholz in Comm. über das Buch Judith (Würzburg, 1896), p. xxiii f., considers that Paris MS 11549 (Cod. Corb. in Sab.) is a private tr^{n}, though closely related to the other. He would also assign importance to Cod. Pechianus (in Sab.), which he believes to be directly transl. from a Greek text with the help of the OL. It stands closest to Paris MS 11553 and agrees with the quotations of Lucifer. The quotations of Fulgentius most resemble the text of Sabat. which is a 'Gallic' text. Perhaps the Munich MS may be 'African.' See also Fritzsche, Hdbuch. ii. p. 119, and Thielmann, Beitr. z. Text-Krit. d. Vulgata, Speier, 1883. Thielm. is to pub. OL of Tob, Jud, Sap, and Sir.

'European' texts, represented most typically by the Fleury Palimpsest (the text of Cyp.) and the Gigas (the text of Lucif.) respectively. From Corssen's investigation[*] it is plain that the former depends on a 'Western' text even more uniform than D. The latter, so far as a rough survey of its readings can reveal, has a very mixed character. D is a prominent factor in it, perhaps the most prominent. Of the other more important uncials, E, and at some distance A and C, seems the best represented.[†] One has the impression of a text belonging to a time of revision. And the phenomena found here appear to justify Berger's query as to whether, in Ac, there is any distinction between 'European' and 'Italian' readings.[‡] Space forbids any further examination of the NT books except that we may point out that the chief of OL versions of the Epistles[§] (except Freis. Fragg.) seem to depend for their text mainly on D and G, whether separate or combined, and often on the group D G K L.[‖] The Freis. Fragg. have a far greater mixture of elements, being apparently revised from MSS such as C A ℵ L (while their basis is D G). In the Apoc. the text of Primasius seems[¶] to approach closest to that of Andreas of Cæsarea, and Cod. P; but there remains an important element peculiar to himself.[]

As regards the Gr. text underlying the OL of the OT, our statements must be even more general and provisional. For the leading uncial MSS of the LXX have never been grouped, and we cannot, with any definiteness, state their mutual relations. And the cursives, which in the LXX are of unique importance, have received little investigation. Hence there are few ascertained data on which to base any reasonable hypothesis. Certainly, the classification into families of texts, and the marking off of stages in their history, would be a difficult task. For this tr^{n} must have undergone from first to last the most varied treatment. The original Gr. VS, the rival tr^{us} of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus, the attempt of Origen to purify the text, the subsequent recensions of Eusebius, Lucian, and Hesychius, all have conspired to produce a chaos in the MSS of the LXX. This has a bewildering effect on the comparison of the OL with the underlying Gr. No doubt we may say that the earliest Lat. VS of the OT must have been made from the pre-hexaplar Gr. text which was in common use.[††] But we know little of its history. It must also have been subjected to various forms of corruption. We cannot identify it with the genuine LXX. We are also unable to state definitely the relation borne to it by the great extant uncials and those groups of cursives which are assumed (with more or less reason) to be particular recensions. Accordingly, the following notes must be somewhat vague and hypothetical.

In the books which apparently preserve a fundamentally 'African' text, such as Sirach, we might expect to find a relatively pure Gr. text at their base. Nor are we, on the whole, disappointed. This OL text shows a close relation to Cod. 248, which is here, perhaps, the best representation of the original Gr. text.[‡‡] But, in the words of Lagarde,[*] 'all the MSS of the Gr. tr^{n} of the OT are either directly or indirectly the result of an eclectic procedure.' This is the key to the phenomena of the OL version of the OT.[†] When we come to examine the large group of OT texts which we have designated either 'European' or 'Italian' (and the boundary between them is, at least, a fluctuating one), the result is most confusing. In the Hexateuch, as already observed, there appears an almost indefinite amount of mixture. It is, perhaps, useless to ask to which of the great uncials the leading MSS are most nearly related. For other elements intrude continually. Here and there, indeed, a definite relationship reveals itself, as, e.g., in Exodus where Cod. Wirceb. has a distinct connexion with the group A F. But, as a rule, both in it, in Cod. Lugd., and in Cod. Monac. there are constant traces of Hesychian[‡] and Lucianic readings, as well as relations of an undefinable kind to the leading uncials.

In the Historical books it can, at least, be affirmed that the recension of Lucian is one of the prominent elements lying at the basis of the text.[§] This is specially noticeable in the Vienna Fragg. of Samuel and the Leon Fragg. of Kings. Ceriani had observed the agreement of 'Lucianic' MSS with the text of Ambrose and the 'Speculum.' And thus he is led to believe that the 'Italian' revision of OT (which perhaps includes the 'European') had, partly at least, for its standard, some MSS of the same type as those used by Lucian in his recension. At the same time, A and B cannot be ignored. Indeed, as Lagarde has pointed out,[‖] Cod. A has a specially close connexion with the OL text of OT which asserts itself here and there.[¶] When the Prophetic books are examined, this becomes more evident. In Ezk, e.g., Cornill has shown that the text both of h and w has close relations with A, although these are sometimes obscured by Hexaplaric omissions and insertions, or confused by later corrections and corruptions.[] The same holds of other books, e.g. the OL of Job.[††] It is a noteworthy fact, and suggests a real connexion between the OL of OT and NT at a certain stage, as we have already seen the prominent place A occupies in all but the oldest NT texts. Considerations of space prevent us from lingering on this most important but complicated department of our subject. We cannot do better than close with a quotation from Burkitt's summary of conclusions as to the relation of the OL to the Gr. text in the Prophets.* For, in all probability, similar processes and results would appear in the other groups of writings. 'The OL brings us the best independent proof we have that the Hexaplar signs introduced by Origen can be relied on for the reconstruction of the LXX. . . . Together with the Hexaplar text,' it 'often agrees as to omissions with the text of B. . . . Yet the same authorities convict B here and there of interpolations. . . . When we turn from questions of insertion and omission to questions of rendering of the Heb. and the substitution of one Gr. word for another, we find that the OL in the Prophets sometimes supports "Lucianic" readings.' And finally, 'there are renderings found in the OL representing Gr. readings which have disappeared from every known Greek MS, but which, by comparison with the Hebrew, are shown to preserve the genuine text of the LXX from which the readings of our present Greek MSS are corruptions. In these passages the OL is sometimes, but not always, supported by one or both Egyptian versions.'

[†] Thus, e.g., Vogel's Fragg. of Proverbs, which are plainly 'African,' agree 18 times with A rather than B, 17 times with B rather than A; they have 18 readings only found in cursives, while 110 are peculiar to themselves.

[‡] Cornill connects Cod. A closely with the Hesychian recension (see Ezechiel, p. 67). Silberstein (ZAW xiv. p. 26), after an elaborate investigation, comes to the conclusion that the origin of the form of text in A must be referred to the recension of Origen. He agrees, on the whole, with Cornill as to B.

[§] See Vercellone, Variæ Lectiones, ii. p. 436. Driver, Notes on Samuel, pp. lxxvii–lxxxii. Ceriani, Recensioni dei LXX, etc., p. 4. It is now generally admitted that MSS 19, 82, 93, and 108 (in Holmes and Parson's ed. of LXX), agreeing, as they do, with the quotations of Theodoret and Chrysostom, represent the recension of Lucian. See also Lagarde, Vet. Test. Græce, Pars Prior, Gött. 1883, Preface.

[‖] Septuaginta-Studien, i. pp. 71, 72.

[¶] A question which still awaits investigation is the relation of A to Lucian. This would shed much light on the OL. It is of interest to find that the prevailing type of text in quotations from the LXX in the Gospels is that of A and Lucian. B is scarcely observable. See Staerk, ZwTh. 1893, i. p. 97 ff.

[] Cornill would connect A with the recension of Hesychius (Ezechiel, pp. 67, 71). Unquestionably, those cursives which contain in all likelihood this latter text are an important element for the criticism of the OL of the Prophets along with the kindred Cod. Marchalianus (Q), which has copious marginal notes from a Hexaplar copy. See Ceriani's most important dissertation, De Codice Marchaliano Commentatio, Rome, 1890. He compares the various texts of the LXX from sections of the Prophets, both mutually and in relation to the OL.

One subordinate department of our subject has not been touched, as, to a great extent, lying outside the scope of the present article, and also as requiring far more space than could be afforded. We refer to the Latinity of the OL versions. It seems advisable, however, to give references to some of the leading authorities.

A large collection of material is to be found in Itala und Vulgata, by H. Rönsch, ed. 2, Marburg, 1875. This work deals with peculiarities of formation, inflexion, grammatical structure, and meaning. See a penetrating criticism of it by J. N. Ott (Fleckeisen's Jahrb. f. Philologie, etc. 1874, p. 778 ff., 833 ff.). Rönsch also contributed a great number of articles to various journals. See especially his 'Sprachliche Parallelen' and 'Itala-Studien' in ZwTh. 1868, 1881–82: 'Zur vulgären und biblischen Latinität,' in Zeitsch. f. die österreich. Gymnasien, 1879, No. 11. There are further studies on this subject in his Semasiologische Beiträge, 1887–89, and Collectanea philologa, 1890. Of great importance is the unfinished work of G. Koffmane, Geschichte des Kirchenlateins, Breslau, 1879–81 (only 2 parts of vol. i. have appeared). It devotes special attention to the Christianizing of Late-Latin, and the moulding of it to biblical use. H. Schuchardt's elaborate Vokalismus des Vulgär-Lateins, Leipz. 1866–67, contains much that is suggestive for the language of the version. More directly bearing on our subject is K. Sittl's Die lokalen Verschiedenheiten der latein. Sprache, Erlangen, 1882. It deals largely with 'African' Latin, with special reference to the Bible. The Handbuch zur Vulgata, by F. Kaulen, Mainz, 1870, also provides material for study. Valuable collections of linguistic facts are to be found in some of the edd. of the MSS. See, especially, that of the Lyons Pentateuch, by U. Robert, pp. xli–lxxxv, cxxiii–cxxviii, which contain an examination of the grammar and orthography of the text, as well as giving tables of Hellenisms and new words; E. Ranke's Par Palimpsestorum Wirceburgensium, pp. 412–427, with copious grammatical notes; and Sanday's dissertation on Cod. k, OL Bibl. Texts, ii. § 14. Perhaps we ought to mention also Rendel Harris's Study of Cod. Bezæ, ch. iv. v. xii. xxvi., and Burkitt's Rules of Tyconius, pp. lxviii–cv. Sanday has an important appendix in Studia Biblica, ii. p. 309 ff., and in vol. iv. of the same series there is a valuable essay on the Style and Language of S. Cyprian, by E. W. Watson. See also Ehrlich, Beiträge z. Lat. der Itala, 1895. By far the richest storehouse of matter bearing on the Latinity of the OL is the Archiv für latein. Lexikographie, ed. by Wölfflin (pub. at Leipzig). The following articles are of special importance: 'Die ersten Spuren des African. Lateins,' by Wölfflin (Jahrg. VI. Heft i. p. 1 ff.); 'Die Heimath der Appendix Probi,' Sittl (vi. 3, p. 557 ff.); 'Die Sprache Priscillian's,' Schepss (iii. 3, p. 307 ff.); 'Lucifer von Cagliari und sein Latein,' Hartel (iii. 1, p. 1 ff.); 'Lexikographisches aus dem Bibellatein,' Thielmann (i. 1, p. 68 ff.); 'Minucius Felix,' Wölfflin (vii. 4, p. 467 ff.); 'Die latein. Sprache auf. african. Inschriften,' Kübler (viii. 2, p. 161 ff.); 'Spuren gallischen Lateins bei Marcellus Empiricus,' Geyer (viii. 4, p. 469); articles on 'Wisdom of Solomon' and 'Sirach,' by Thielmann, already referred to; 'Die europäischen Bestandtheile des latein. Sirach,' Thielmann (ix. 2, p. 247 ff.). See also the 'Jahresbericht über Vulgär-und Spätlatein,' by K. Sittl in Bursian-Iwan Müller's Jahresbericht, lxviii. pp. 226–286, and that on 'Die christlich lateinische Litteratur von 1886–87 bis Ende 1894' in the same series, by C. Weyman, 1896.* For further references to the language of particular authors see the list of Fathers. We have omitted mention of the numerous works which deal with the Latin language in general.

This article has dealt only with the early history of the Latin translations of the Bible. Their later developments from the time of Jerome onward are treated under VULGATE.

For the general literature of the subject, see the authorities referred to throughout the article, Nestle's art. in Herzog^{3} (iii. 24 ff.) which appeared while this was in the press, and Corssen's admirable Bericht über die latein. Bibelübersetzungen (Bursian's Jahresb. Bd. ci.), published only in time to admit of a few footnotes being added from it during final revision. H. A. A. KENNEDY.

LATTER.—The adj. 'late' is now regarded as having two forms for the compar. and superl., later, latest, and latter, last, and a difference in meaning is usually observed. But the distinction is quite recent. In modern editions of AV the only spelling is 'latter,' but the ed. of 1611 had 'later' in four places, Is 47^{7}, Jer 5^{24} 48^{47} 49^{39}, and there is no difference in meaning. Shakespeare has 'later' twice (acc. to Bartlett's Concordance), once in ref. to time, 'And she goes down at twelve —I take 't, 'tis later, Sir' (Macbeth II. i. 3), once as equivalent to 'latter' as it was then used, K. John III. i. 288—

> 'Therefore thy later vows against thy first
> Is in thyself rebellion to thyself.'

He also uses 'latest' for 'last,' as Love's Labour's Lost, V. ii. 797,—'At the latest minute of the hour.'

In AV as in Shakespeare 'latter' is always (except when distinctly opposed to 'former') equivalent to 'last.' Thus in AV, Job 19^{25} 'For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth' (RV 'at the last upon the earth'); 2 P 2^{20} 'the latter end is worse with them than the beginning' (RV 'the last state is become worse with them than the first'): and in Shaks. Henry V. IV. i. 143, 'All those legs and arms and heads, chopped off in a battle, shall join together at the latter day'; and 1 Henry VI. II. v. 38—

> 'And in his bosom spend my latter gasp.'

The expressions 'latter end' and 'last end' are thus equivalent, and both old-fashioned redundancies.

LATTICE.—See under Window in art. HOUSE, vol. ii. p. 435^{b}.

LAUD (taken directly from Lat. laudare, to praise) as a synonym for 'praise' seems never to have been very frequently used, either as verb or subst., though the latter was more common than the former. Shaks. has each twice. In AV the subst. does not occur, and the verb was retained only once, Ro 15^{11} 'Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.' The Greek verbs here are different (αἰνέω and ἐπαινέω), and no doubt Tindale, from whom the tr. comes, introduced the variation purposely; but AV seems simply to have accepted it from the immediately preceding versions, for in Ps 117^{1} of which this is a quotation, the Heb. verbs are again different, and Coverdale's tr. was again 'praise' and 'laud,' but the Geneva version, followed by the Bishops, changed 'laud' into 'praise,' and AV has 'O praise the Lord, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people.' RV obliterates the distinction between the Greek verbs in Ro 15^{11} giving 'praise' twice, but restores it in Ps 117^{1}; and in Ps 145^{4} RV again introduces 'laud' for 'praise' to tr. the same Heb. verb. But in Ps 147^{12} RV has taken over the AV tr. 'Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem; praise thy God, O Zion,' though the Heb. shows the same distinction in its verbs. Driver (Parallel Psalter, 1898) is more consistent, rendering שָׁבַּח by 'laud' wherever in the Psalter it can be so rendered (63^{3} 117^{1} 145^{4} 147^{12}), and keeping 'praise' for הִלֵּל.

Tindale uses the verb in Lk 19^{37} 'the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoyce, and to lawde God with a loude voyce'; and the subst. in 1 P 1^{7} 'that youre fayth . . . myght be founde unto lawde, glory, and honoure at the apperinge of Jesus Christ,' and 2^{14} 'for the laude of them that do well.'

It is doubtful if even the verb can be used now without affectation; but if it can, and the Revisers seem to have thought so, it is a pity it was not consistently used for ἐπαινέω (Lk 16^{8}, Ro 15^{11}, 1 Co 11$^{2.17.22}$), to distinguish it from the more common αἰνέω, to praise. J. HASTINGS.

LAUGHTER.—The laughter mentioned in the Bible is of three kinds, (1) loud laughter as opposed to demonstrative weeping, (2) wondering or incredulous, and (3) derisive.

(1) Ḳoheleth allows that there is a time to laugh as well as a time to weep (Ec 3^{4}), but he reckons sorrow better than laughter (7^{3}), and calls laughter madness (2^{2}). Bildad offers Job the prospect, if he be really upright, of a time when God will fill his mouth with laughter (Job 8^{21}); the returning exiles enjoyed such a time (Ps 126^{2} 'Our mouth was then filled with loud laughter'—De Witt); and Jesus promises it definitely in the Restitution to those who weep now (Lk 6^{21}). In every instance it is the Oriental loud laughter, which is rarely heard, and only upon occasion of the utmost glad surprise. Christ's woe is pronounced on those who laugh now when no such surprise is possible (Lk 6^{25}).

(2) More frequent is the laughter of wonder or incredulity. So Abraham (Gn 17^{17}) and Sarah (18^{12}) laughed when they heard the promise of a son. And even when the promise could not be doubted longer by themselves, they knew that all that heard would laugh at them (21^{6}), they were so old.

RV retains in Gn 21^{6} the AV translation 'all that hear will laugh with me.' But יִצְחַק־לִי can mean only 'will laugh at me'; cf. Job 5^{22} 39$^{7.18.22}$, Ps 59^{8}. Still it is not derisive laughter that Sarah fears; she does not fear the laughter at all; she only knows that when people hear of it they will laugh, it is so astonishing as to be still almost incredible. 'Laugh with me' is the rendering of the ancient versions and of all the English versions from Wyclif, except Tindale, 'And Sara sayde, God hath made me a laughinge stocke, for all that heare, will laugh at me.' Coverdale has even, 'God hath prepared a joye for me, for who so ever heareth of it, wyll rejoyse with me,' and is followed by the Geneva translators and the Bishops. Kalisch defends the AV tr., on the ground that 'no other sense is adapted here but the smile of surprise and admiration.' But Dillmann, Del., Kautzsch (über mich), Segond (de moi), and most modern commentators translate 'will laugh at me'—meaning, however, to express surprise rather than derision.

(3) But the most frequent occurrence of laughter is in derision. The feeling ranges in expression from the gentle mocking of Daniel (Bel ^{19}) to the judicial laughter of Him that sitteth in the heavens (Ps 2^{4}).

There are three Heb. verbs translated 'laugh,' צָחַק (except Jg 16^{25} Ezk 23^{32}, confined to Pent.), its later form שָׂחַק, and לָעַג. All three are occasionally rendered in AV 'laugh to scorn,' but esp. the last, which does not properly mean to laugh but to scoff at or scorn. In 2 Es 2^{21} claudum irridere noli is tr^{d} 'laugh not a lame man to scorn,' and the expression 'laugh to scorn' is found in the Gr. Apocr. as the tr. of καταγελάω, Jth 12^{12}, Sir 7^{11} 20^{17} (cf. also 1 Mac 10^{70} 'I am laughed to scorn for thy sake,' ἐγὼ δὲ ἐγενήθην εἰς καταγέλωτα); ἐκγελάω, Wis 4^{18}; καταμωκάομαι, Sir 13^{7}; and χλευάζω, 2 Mac 7^{27}; cf. also Sir 6^{4} 'Shall make him to be laughed to scorn of his enemies,' ἐπίχαρμα ἐχθρῶν ποιήσει αὐτόν. In NT καταγελάω is so tr^{d} where it occurs (Mt 9^{24} ‖ Mk 5^{40} ‖ Lk 8^{53} at the raising of Jairus' daughter), so that a distinction is maintained between the simple γελάω (only in Lk 6$^{21.25}$) and its more emphatic compound. The phrase is due to Tindale in these places, who thus improved on Wyclif 'thei scorneden hym.' Tind. was followed by all the versions.

The phrases 'laugh on' and 'laugh upon' are now obsolete, though we retain the equivalent 'smile upon.' They occur once each, Job 29^{24} 'If I laughed on them, they believed it not' (אֶשְׂחַק אֲלֵיהֶם, RVm 'I smiled on them when they had no confidence'; the AV tr. comes from the Geneva Bible, which explains its meaning by the marg. note, 'That is, thei thoght it not to be a jest, or thei thoght not that I wold condescend unto them'), I Es 4^{31} 'if she laughed upon him, he laughed also' (ἐὰν προσγελάσῃ αὐτῷ, γελᾷ). J. HASTINGS.

LAUNCH is now transitive only. In AV it occurs intransitively and only so. RV has changed the word into 'set sail' (Ac 21^{1}), 'put to sea' (Ac 27$^{2.4}$), or simply 'put' (Lk 5^{4}), and once has retained it (Lk 8^{22}). The transitive use must be the older, as the verb is formed from 'lance,' and means primarily to 'hurl a lance,' and then to send (a ship) into the water. Spenser uses it frequently in the simple sense of 'to pierce,' almost as we now use 'lance,' as FQ II. iv. 46, 'For since my brest was launcht with lovely dart.' Shakespeare has the word only once, and it is transitive, Troil. and Cress. II. ii. 82—

'Why, she is a pearl,
Whose price hath launch'd above a thousand ships.'

The Greek is either (1) the compound form ἐπανάγω, which occurs in MT only thrice, Mt 21^{18} in the sense of returning into a city, and Lk 5$^{3.4}$ in the sense of 'put out' (RV) to sea (in 5^{3} AV has 'thrust out,' after Tindale); or (2) the simple ἀνάγομαι, which is found only in the writings of St. Luke (though the active ἀνάγω 'bring up' occurs in Mt 4^{1}, Ro 10^{7}, He 13^{20}, as well as in Lk and Ac), but there it is of frequent occurrence. AV varies in its tr. between 'launch forth' (Lk 8^{22}), 'launch' (Ac 21^{1} 27$^{2.4}$), 'loose' (Ac 13^{13} 16^{11} 27^{21}), 'sail' (Ac 18^{21} 20$^{3.15}$), 'set forth' (Ac 21^{2}), and 'depart' (Ac 27^{2} 28$^{10.11}$). RV has usually 'set sail' (Ac 13^{13} 16^{11} 18^{21} 20$^{3.13}$ 21$^{1.2}$ 27^{21} 28^{11}), but also 'launch forth' (Lk 8^{22}), 'embark' (Ac 27^{2}), 'put to sea' (Ac 27$^{4.12}$), and simply 'sail' (Ac 28^{10}). The idea expressed in the prep. ἀνά is not 'up' to the ship, but up to the high sea from the lower harbour or coast-line; cf. καταβαίνω 'go down' to the coast from the higher land. J. HASTINGS.

LAVER (כִּיּוֹר or כִּיֹּר; LXX λουτήρ).—This is the name given to the ten brazen basins made by Hiram for Solomon's Temple, 1 K 7$^{30.38.43}$ (=2 Ch 4$^{6.14}$).* They were raised on high stands, and furnished with wheels. Anything beyond this is difficult to ascertain with certainty. Keil and others make out the bases or stands (מְכֹנוֹת) to have been square boxes with ornamented panels. Nowack (Heb. Arch. ii. pp. 44–46), following Stade (ZATW iii. 159 ff.), corrects the text, which at present is unintelligible in parts, and, further, utilizes for comparison the vessels now known to have been used in Semitic antiquity from the evidence of the Assyrian monuments. He thus arrives at a more probable reconstruction, though he is perhaps over-bold in venturing on a conjectural sketch of a laver as he understands it. In the following description of the details Nowack is followed in the main.

* In 1 K 7^{40} הַכִּירוֹת should be emended to הַסִּירוֹת (cf. v.^{45} ‖ 2 Ch 4$^{11.16}$ and LXX λέβητας).

The base or stand was made up of a lower and an upper division. The lower division was a square framework, of which the sides were partly open. If they had been massive plates of metal, each 3 × 4 cubits, the whole would have been too heavy to move. Moreover, the Assyrian examples show a much lighter kind of stand than those used in supporting the Greek amphora. The sides were like an unglazed window-frame, with horizontal borders or panels (מִסְגְּרוֹת) and vertical ledges or crosspieces (שְׁלַבִּים). At the corners were undersetters or shoulders, i.e. square pillars whose lower extremities were extended to form feet, in which were fixed the axles, on which the wheels turned. The wheels, each 1½ cubits high, were thus completely under the body of the base. Thus the lower part of the base being itself 3 cubits high, its top edge was 4½ cubits high. On the top of this lower part was a pedestal (1 K 7^{29}) consisting of a round compass or ring (v.^{35}) something like the capital of a column (v.^{31}). The outside measurement of this ring was 1½ cubits across, and the inside measurement 1 cubit, while it was raised half a cubit above the base proper (v.^{35}). As the diameter of the latter was 4 cubits, the supports (stays or hands) of the ring must have sloped inwards very considerably. These supports seem to have sprung from a square framework (v.^{31}) resting on the top of the base. As a dome with a central circular window is often built over four square walls and supported by four ribs from the corners sloping inwards, so this open metal frame had a square base and a round opening or ring, into which the basin or laver fitted. The borders and stays were ornamented with lions, oxen, and cherubim, and with embossed wreaths.

It is remarkable that these ten lavers do not reappear in the sketch of the new temple put forth by Ezekiel, or in the temple of Zerubbabel, nor is anything like them found in P's representation of the tabernacle. The last we hear of them is that Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases and took the laver off them (1 K 16^{17}). From this the suggestion has been supported that the connecting parts of the framework were, as in some similar constructions of which Semitic archæology has evidence, hollow, or that they were wood inside plated over with brass. As for the discarding of the molten sea and ten movable lavers, which seems to indicate some prejudice against them, it has been conjectured that they had some mythical associations which had now become distasteful. The great molten sea is connected with the deep (תְּהוֹם) and the lavers with the clouds. It is observed that Ezekiel, who describes no wheeled lavers ornamented with lions, oxen, and cherubim, yet has a vision (ch. 1) of living creatures, uniting the characteristics of lion, ox, man, and eagle, and of wheels closely associated with them, the whole imagery suggesting the personification of the clouds borne on by the storm blast. The explanation of the Chronicler (2 Ch 4^{6}), that the lavers were used for washing the sacrifices, has nothing to support it in Kings, and it is hard to see how such lofty basins could have been put to practical use. No hint is given in the elaborate description of any means for drawing off water. The symbolical interpretation gives a fine suggestiveness to these vessels. The priest of J″ draws near to Him as Lord of the furthest abyss and of the rolling storm clouds.

Although, as we have seen, the molten sea and ten lavers have no parallel in the account of the tabernacle, yet we find there a single laver. It is mentioned only in passages which are secondary in relation to P^{g} (Ex 30$^{17-21}$ 31^{9} 35^{16} 38^{8} 39^{39} 40^{11}, Lv 8^{11}), and nothing is said as to its size or shape. It consisted of two parts, the basin and its pedestal (כֵּן). The word 'base' (מְכוֹנָה) is not used. In Ex 38^{8} it seems to be stated that it was made of the mirrors of the serving women. Others, with some violence to the Hebrew, render '(provided) with mirrors for the serving women.' Its purpose was definite, viz. that the priests might wash their hands and feet there before entering the tabernacle, by the door of which the laver stood on the inner side of the brazen altar. So in He 10^{22} the imagery is applied to the true worshipper, and in Tit 3^{5} the laver becomes a type of the baptismal font, by which (διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας) believers have access into the Church of the firstborn. In Zerubbabel's and Herod's temples there was, in accordance with P's representation, a single laver.

LAW (IN OLD TESTAMENT).—

i. History of the term 'Torah.'
ii. Torah threefold—judicial, ceremonial, moral.
iii. Rise and history of written Torah.
iv. Synonyms of 'law':—
    (1) Mishpāṭ; (2) ḥōḳ, ḥuḳḳāh; (3) mizwāh; (4) 'ēdwōth or 'ēdōth; (5) piḳḳūdīm.
v. The different codes of Hebrew law:—
    A. JE: (1) the Decalogue; (2) Book of the Covenant—summary of its provisions—the 'Little Book of the Covenant'—age and character of the Book of the Covenant.
    B. Deuteronomy—summary of its provisions—changes in the laws repeated from JE—the new provisions introduced.
    C. The Law of Holiness (H)—summary of its provisions—compared with Book of the Covenant.
    D. The Priests' Code (P)—summary of its provisions—P characterized and compared and contrasted with earlier codes and with institutions of other Semitic peoples—danger of abuse of ceremonial law—pædagogic office of the Law.
Literature.

The Heb. word for 'law' is tôrāh (תּוֹרָה), from hôrāh (הוֹרָה), to point out Gn 46^{28}, or to direct Jg 13^{8}, meaning properly, a pointing out, or direction, and being used specially of authoritative direction, given in Jehovah's name—primarily, no doubt, by priests, though it is by no means limited to what is given by them—on points of moral, religious, or ceremonial duty.

The root yārāh signifies properly to throw or cast; and hence it is possible, as has been conjectured (Wellh. Hist. 394, cf. Skizzen, iii. 167, ed. 2, 143; Nowack, Arch. ii. 97; Benzinger, Arch. 408), that the primitive meaning of hôrāh in this connexion was to cast the sacred lot—or arrows used as lots—at a sanctuary, for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the deity on behalf of those who came to consult it (the word is used of casting lots Jos 18^{6}, and of shooting arrows 1 S 20^{36} al.). Comp. the use made by the priest of the Ephod and Urim and Thummim, 1 S 14$^{3.18}$ (LXX) ^{41} (esp. LXX) ^{42} etc. Tôrāh, if this view be correct, will have denoted originally the 'direction' obtained by means of the sacred lot: it remained a duty of the Isr. priest to teach J″'s tôrāh, though this particular method of ascertaining it no doubt fell early into abeyance, and the term acquired a more general sense. Comp. the pr. names 'Terebinth(s) of Moreh,' or 'the teacher' (Gn 12^{6}, Dt 11^{30}), and 'Gibeath-Moreh,' 'Hill of the teacher' (Jg 7^{1}), most probably the seats of ancient Canaanite oracles.

i. The word had a history; and in order to understand it properly, the stages of its history must be briefly noted. (1) One of the earliest passages in which it occurs is Ex 18$^{16.20}$ (E), where the decisions given by Moses on disputes 'between a man and his neighbour'—evidently on secular matters—are termed the 'statutes' and 'directions' of God. This passage sets before us Heb. law in its beginnings. 'It is to be remembered that in early Semitic life government was largely administered by means of "Tôrōth," authoritative decisions, delivered by the chief or judge, who gave his verdict upon the basis of custom or precedent. It was the reign of Themis, or of what we might call Consuetudinary Justice.* A picture of such an administration, actually conducted by Moses on such lines, stands before us in the narrative of Ex 18^{13-27}' (Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 32). Decisions given in this way, especially on difficult questions (cf. Ex 18^{26}), would naturally form precedents for future use (cf. OTJC^{2} 304); and thus an increasing body of civil and criminal law would gradually grow up. (2) In the prophets the term is used of teaching given in Jehovah's name—sometimes by priests, but more frequently by prophets—on questions of religious or moral duty. Hosea (4^6) attributes the crimes prevalent in Israel (vv.$^{1.2}$) to the priests' forgetfulness of the Tôrāh of their God (cf. $8^{1.12}$): this passage is important, as showing that the priestly 'tôrāh' included a moral element (cf. Ex 23^{1-9}, Lv 19), and was dependent for its effectiveness upon the 'knowledge' of God. The word is used similarly, of moral and spiritual teaching, in Am 2^4. In Is 1^{10} the 'Tôrāh of our God' is the exposition which follows (vv.$^{11-17}$) respecting the true character of religious service; Is 5^{24} the Tôrāh which Judah has rejected consists of the precepts of civil righteousness and morality, the disregard of which the prophet has been denouncing (vv.$^{8-23}$); Is $8^{16.20}$ it denotes the half-political half-religious advice just given by the prophet (vv.$^{12-15}$): it is used similarly in 30^9 (see v.$^{10f.}$; and cf. v.^{20}, where the prophets are called by the corresponding participle, the 'directors' [teachers] of the people of Jerusalem). In Jer 6^{19} 9^{13} 16^{11} 26^4 32^{23} $44^{10.23}$ the reference may be partly (see 26^4) to the preaching of the prophets, partly (notice the context, and the addition in 9^{13} 26^4 44^{10} of 'which I set before you') to the teaching of Deuteronomy. Other examples of the same general sense of direction, though not specially given by prophets, are Ps 78^1 (of a didactic Psalm), Job 22^{22} ('Receive now direction from his [God's] mouth'); in the mouth of a mother, Pr 1^8 6^{20}; of a teacher of practical wisdom, Pr 3^1 4^2 6^{23} (cf. RVm) 7^2 13^{14}; of the model woman, 31^{26} ('law,' in all these passages, is a misleading rendering). It is also used of the guidance, or direction, to be given by J″, or His representative, in the future ideal age: Is 2^3 (=Mic 4^2), Jer 31^{33}, Is 42^4 (of the preaching of J″'s ideal servant), 51^4. (3) Side by side with this broader prophetical application of the term, there was, however, a narrower one, in which it was particularly associated with the priests, and (like the cognate verb hôrāh) denoted the oral direction given by them in Jehovah's name, especially on matters of ceremonial observance, such as the nature of the different kinds of sacrifice, the cases in which they were respectively to be offered, the criteria of leprosy, the conditions upon which it depended whether a thing was 'clean' or 'unclean,' etc.; the laity came to the priests for instruction on all such points, and the answer given to them was tôrāh, 'direction.' Hag 2^{11}, though a late passage, shows what 'tôrāh' was very clearly: the prophet is told to inquire of the priests whether in two particular cases an object becomes 'holy,' or 'unclean,' in the words 'Ask now direction of the priests' [not as RV, 'concerning the law': there is no art. in the Heb.], the answer to the inquiries being the 'direction' or tôrāh (cf. Mal 2^6 'truthful direction was in his mouth'; v.^{7} 'they seek direction from his mouth'; v.^{8} 'ye have caused many to stumble by your [false] direction'; v.^{9} 'and have respect of persons in direction' [not 'in the law']). For earlier instances, partly of the subst., partly of the cognate verb, see Dt 17^{11} (of decisions given by the supreme court of priests and lay-judges on cases of civil or criminal law) 'acc. to the direction wherewith they direct thee, and acc. to the judgment which they tell thee, thou shalt do,' 24^8 'take heed that thou do according to all that the Levitical priests direct you' (in the case of leprosy), 33^{10} 'they teach Jacob thy judgments [Ex 21^1], and Israel thy direction,' Mic 3^{11} 'her priests direct for hire,' Jer 2^8 ('the handlers of the tôrāh [תֹּפְשֵׂי הַתּוֹרָה], i.e. the priests, know me not'), 18^{18} 'direction will not perish from his mouth,' i.e. the priest and his functions will never come to an end (said by those who disbelieved Jeremiah's predictions of disaster), Zeph 3^4 ('her priests have profaned what is holy, they have done violence to tôrāh,'—חָמְסוּ תּוֹרָה), Ezk 7^{26} ('direction shall perish from the priest, and counsel from the elder': cf. La 2^9 'without [priestly] direction'), 22^{26} ('her priests have done violence to my tôrāh, they have profaned my holy things, they have made no difference between the holy and the common'), 44^{23} (cf. Lv 14^{57}) 'they shall direct my people between the holy and the common, and make them to know between the unclean and the clean' (notice in these two passages the connexion of tôrāh with ceremonial distinctions), Hab 1^4 'therefore tôrāh is numbed' (i.e. is paralyzed, ineffectual: the violence and disorder, vv.$^{2.3.4b}$, incapacitates even the priests in the discharge of their duties). These passages show clearly the association of tôrāh with the priests (cf. also 2 K $17^{27.28}$, 2 Ch 15^3); they show not less clearly that, although it denoted a simply oral direction, this 'direction' was regulated by certain fundamental principles, which might be neglected or violated by unfaithful priests. (4) In process of time, tôrāh came further to denote a body of technical direction on a given subject: in this sense it occurs frequently in P, esp. in the expression 'this is the tôrāh ('law') of the burnt-offering, of the cereal offering, of leprosy, of the Nazirite,' etc., Lv $6^{9.14.25}$ $7^{1.11.37}$ 11^{46} 12^7 13^{59} $14^{2.32.54.57}$ 15^{32} 26^{46}, Nu $5^{29.30}$ $6^{13.21}$ $19^{2.14}$ 31^{21}. As, however, Wellh. has pointed out (Hist. 59, 395; cf. Nowack, ii. 98), the more original sense of tôrāh even here will have been that of directions given to the laity, not (as in Lv 6–7) rules regulating the priests' own praxis at the altar.

In Dt (1^5 $4^{8.44}$ $17^{18.19}$ $27^{3.8.26}$ $28^{58.61}$ $29^{21.29}$ 30^{10} $31^{9.11.12.24.26}$ 32^{46}) the term, esp. in the expression 'this law,' is used somewhat ambiguously: sometimes it denotes more particularly the code of laws embodied in Dt; sometimes it is used more generally of the exposition of an Israelite's duty contained in the book, and consisting partly of the actual laws, partly of the hortatory introductions and comments accompanying them, in other words it denotes the Deuteronomic legislation generally; in the last-named sense it also occurs repeatedly (often in such phrases as 'the book of the law,' 'the law of Moses,' 'the law that Moses commanded,' etc.) in the Deuteronomic sections of Jos and Kings (Jos $1^{7.8}$ $8^{31.32.34}$ 22^5 23^6, 1 K 2^3, 2 K 10^{31} 14^6 $17^{13.34.37}$ 21^8 $22^{8.11}$ $23^{24.25}$).

After the time of Ezra,* when P had been combined with JED, and the Pentateuch had assumed (virtually) its present form, the term is used, yet more generally, of the Pent. as a whole, as 1 Ch 16^{40} (with reference to Ex $29^{38ff.}$ P), 2 Ch 31^3 etc., Ezr 3^2, Neh $8^{1ff.}$. In the Psalms it is used often of the legislative parts of the Pent. in general, as Ps 1^{2} 19^{7} 37^{31} 40^{8} (perhaps here with particular reference to Dt), 94^{12} 119$^{1.\,18}$ etc.

ii. From the preceding survey of passages, it will be apparent that Hebrew tôrāh had a threefold character: it was judicial, ceremonial, and moral. The ceremonial tôrāh is most prominent in the OT; but the judicial and moral tôrāh was not less a reality, esp. in early times. Nor is it doubted by critics that this tôrāh, under all its aspects, originated with Moses. Wellhausen writes (Hist. 396, 397 n., 438): 'The priests derived their Torah from Moses: they claimed only to preserve and guard what Moses had left (Dt 33$^{4.\,9\text{f.}}$). . . . From the historical tradition [of the Pent.] it is certain that Moses was the founder of the Torah.'[*] Moses, however, did not create a finished code: he was the founder of a principle, and of a tradition; he was 'the first to call into activity the actual sense for law and justice, and to begin (Ex 15^{25} 18) the series of oral decisions which were continued after him by the priest.' And Montefiore, after emphasizing the fact that from the beginning J″ was a moral God, a God of justice, continues (Hibb. Lect. pp. 45, 64 f.), 'Most original and characteristic was the moral influence of Yahveh in the domain of law. Yahveh, to the Israelite, was emphatically the God of right. . . . From the earliest times onward, Yahveh's sanctuary was the depositary of law, and the priest was his spokesman. The oracle of Yahveh, of which the priests were the interpreters, decided suits and quarrels, and probably gave guidance and advice in questions of social difficulty. The Torah—or teaching—of the priests, half-judicial half-pædagogic, was a deep moral influence; and there was no element in the religion which was at once more genuinely Hebrew and more closely identified with the national God. There is good reason to believe that this priestly Torah is the one religious institution which can be correctly attributed to Moses. . . . Though Moses was not the author of the written law, he was unquestionably the founder of that oral teaching, or Torah, which preceded, and became the basis of, the codes of the Pentateuch.' That the priest, in giving judgment, was J″'s spokesman, is evident from the term of Ex 18$^{15\text{f.}}$ (the people come to Moses to 'inquire of God' for the settlement of civil disputes, and his decisions are 'the statutes and tôrōth of God') 21^{6} 22$^{8.\,9}$ (comp. 1 S 2^{25}).[†] Questions of ceremonial also fell naturally within the priests' province; and their answers on this subject were regarded similarly as the judgments of God. It resulted further, from the ethical character of J″, that the tôrōth of Moses and his successors, even on judicial and ceremonial matters, were always permeated by a strong moral element. The decisions framed by Moses and his successors accumulated: they were from the first the expression of the same, or similar, principles: the result was thus a fixed tradition, having a definitely marked character, which exerted naturally a regulative influence upon the new decisions which, as time went on, were found necessary for the purpose of meeting new needs.

iii. 'Tôrāh' was originally oral,—handed down orally from one generation of priests to another, and delivered orally by the priest to those who came to seek it of him (cf. Mal 2$^{6.\,7}$; also Job 22^{22}, Pr 31^{26}). The question arises, When was it first committed to writing? An examination of the Pent. shows (1) that the laws contained in it are not homogeneous, but fall into groups, differing from one another in style, in contents, and in scope; and (2) that the different groups cannot be regarded as the product of a single generation, but must spring from different periods of the history. These and other indications make it clear that the process of writing down the oral Tôrāh was a gradual one. First of all, small collections of priestly Tôrōth on particular subjects were written down: then these were enlarged, or supplemented by others: till the final result was the body of tôrōth embedded in our present Pentateuch. These different collections did not often remain in their primitive form: new provisions were introduced into them; they were revised and adjusted to suit the requirements of a later age: in some cases, they were largely expanded by parenetic or other additions. The frequently loose arrangement of subjects in the various groups is a sufficient proof that we no longer possess them in their original form. The process of writing down began, no doubt, at an early date; though we cannot say definitely how early. The Book of the Covenant is an early written collection of such tôrōth: it is true, the name is not actually given to it; but the analogy of Ex 18$^{16.\,20}$ shows that it would correctly describe it. The ritual section of this collection (23$^{10\text{-}19}$) appears in a different recension in Ex 34$^{10\text{-}26}$. Other collections of tôrōth are those forming the original nucleus of the 'Law of Holiness' (see below). The laws forming the basis of the Deut. code were also doubtless, at least in the great majority of cases, taken by the writer from a written source (or sources). The existence of written tôrōth is implied distinctly in Hos 8^{12} RV (where J″ says that, however many 'directions' He writes for Ephraim, His people treat them as something with which they have no concern): the context, however, and 4^{6} (see above) show that the allusion here is not to ritual, but to ethical and religious precepts, especially those relating to civil righteousness.[*]

There is an interesting, but obscure, passage bearing on this subject, in Jer 8^{8} 'How say ye, We are wise, and J″'s direction is with us? Surely falsely hath it wrought, the false pen of the scribes.' The priests here claim that they possess the legitimate tradition, and principles, of J″'s tôrāh: Jeremiah replies that the scribes—which must denote here those who committed this tôrāh to writing—had dealt falsely, i.e. (apparently) had been untrue to the principles which it was their duty to maintain, had in some way perverted or falsified the tôrāh of which they were the exponents (cf. 2^{8}, though there is not here any reference to writing). We do not know more precisely what Jeremiah alludes to: perhaps to heathen rites, for which, in the syncretistic fashion of the day, the false priests sought thus to gain the sanction of J″'s name.

Other priestly laws were written down by Ezekiel, in his draft for the worship of the restored community, esp. in chs. 43–45 (cf. OTJC^{2} 374–377; Ryle, Canon, 73); but the great bulk—those, viz., embraced in what is now generally known as the 'Priests' Code'—were not, it seems, codified till somewhat later, when, the temple having been destroyed, and the worship interrupted, the priests, that the traditions of their order might not be forgotten, reduced to writing and systematized what had hitherto been familiar to them from the daily exercise of their profession (cf. Wellh. Hist. 59 f., 404; Ryle, Canon, 71–74; Montefiore, Hibb. Lect. 234 f.).

iv. Synonyms of 'Law.'[†] — 1. מִשְׁפָּט mishpāṭ, 'judgment' (sometimes rendered 'ordinance'), properly a decision given in an individual case, and then established as a precedent for other similar cases. Mishpāṭ occurs in this sense in JE, Ex 15^{25} ('there made he for it (Israel) a statute and ordinance, and there he proved it,'— a noticeable passage, witnessing, like Ex $18^{16. 20}$ above, to Moses' work as a framer of laws for his people *), 21^1 and 24^3 (of the enactments in the 'Book of the Covenant' prescribing penalties for particular offences, introduced by if or when, and contained chiefly in 21^1–22^{17}); in H (always combined with חֻקּוֹת 'statutes') Lv $18^{4. 5. 26}$ 19^{37} 20^{22} 25^{18} $26^{15. 43. 46}$ (here חֻקִּים); in Dt, usually with 'statutes' (חֻקִּים, not as in H חֻקּוֹת), of the provisions of the Deut. code (chs. 12–26), $4^{1. 5. 8. 14. 45}$ $5^{1. 31}$ $6^{1. 20}$ $7^{11. 12}$ 8^{11} $11^{1. 32}$ 12^1 $26^{16. 17}$ 30^{16}; also in the Blessing of Moses, 33^{10} (as pronounced by the priests: ‖ 'direction'); in P rarely, and in the specific sense of Ex 21^1 24^3 only Nu 27^{11} $35^{24. 29}$, cf. 36^{13}. † The primary sense of the word is an enactment of the civil or criminal law; but it is also (as in H) applied to enactments of the moral or ceremonial law, which might be viewed analogously as Divine 'decisions.' (The word occurs also frequently in other books besides the Pent.) ‡

In Gn 14^7 Kadesh is called 'En-mishpāṭ,' 'spring of judgment,' —either, it seems, because it was the site of an ancient oracle, at which decisions were given for the settlement of disputes, or (Wellh. Hist. 343, 397 n., 430, 439) from its having been the scene of Moses' legislative activity, during what appears to have been Israel's long stay there (Driver, Deut. p. 32 f.).

Mishpāṭ also occurs sometimes in the enlarged sense of right ('Recht'), as a rule of action in general: it thus becomes virtually equivalent to religion, regarded as a system of practical duties; Jer 5^4 'they (the poorer classes) know not the way of J″, nor the mishpāṭ of their God,' v.^{5} 8^7, Is 42^1 'he shall bring forth (publish) right (i.e. religion) to the nations,' vv.$^{3. 4}$ 51^4 (‖ tôrāh), 58^2; cf. 2 K $17^{26. 27}$ (AV and RV, poorly, 'manner').

2. חֹק, חֻקָּה, ḥōḳ, ḥuḳḳāh, 'statute,' from חקק to cut in, inscribe, engrave (Ezk 23^{14}, Job 19^{23}, Is 10^1, Pr 8^{15} [AV and RV 'decree']), and therefore denoting properly something engraven on stone, or other durable surface, though applied in usage to any kind of fixed ordinance. It was a common practice in antiquity to engrave laws upon slabs of stone or metal (στῆλαι), and to set them up in some public place—and the same custom is presupposed in the use of these two words in Hebrew. Both terms occur frequently in H, Dt, and P. The earliest examples (JE) are Ex 12^{24} 13^{10} $15^{25. 26}$ $18^{16. 20}$ (E); cf. (in a different connexion) Gn 47^{26}, also Jos 24^{25}, Jg 11^{39}, 1 S 30^{25}. The combination 'statutes and judgments' is common in H and Dt (see above). For instances in P (often in the expression, 'a statute [RV frequently, 'due'] for ever'), see Ex 27^{21} 28^{43} $29^{9. 28}$, Lv 3^{17} $6^{18. 22}$ $16^{29. 31. 34}$ etc. §

3. מִצְוָה miẓwāh, 'commandment,' a general term, implying something commanded (viz. by J″). Most frequent in Dt (43 times), as $4^{2. 40}$ $5^{29. 31}$. Rare in the other codes: in JE, Ex 15^{26} 16^{28} 20^6 (prob. from Dt), 24^{12}; in H, Lv 22^{31} $26^{3. 14. 15}$; in P, Lv $4^{2. 13. 22. 27}$ 5^{17} 27^{34}, Nu $15^{22. 31. 39. 40}$ 36^{13}.

4. עֵדְוֹת 'êdwōth or 'êdōth, 'testimonies': in the Pent. only Dt 4^{45} $6^{17. 20}$; a theological term, denoting generally moral and religious ordinances, regarded as an attestation, or solemn declaration, of the Divine will. In P the sing. testimony is used frequently of the Decalogue, as a statement κατ' ἐξοχήν of God's will for man, esp. in the expressions 'Ark, tables, or tabernacle, of the testimony,' Ex $25^{16. 21. 22}$ 27^{21} 31^{18} 34^{29}, Nu $1^{50. 53}$, and elsewhere.

5. פִּקּוּדִים piḳḳūdīm, 'precepts': only in the Psalms (19^8 103^{18} 111^7, and 21 times in Ps 119).

v. Hebrew law falls into distinct Codes, those viz. of JE, Dt, H, and P, and the characteristics of these must next be examined.*

A. In JE we have (1) the DECALOGUE (wh. see), Ex 20^{2-17}, a concise but comprehensive summary of the fundamental duties of the Israelite towards God and man. We have (2) the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 20^{20}–23^{33}; in explanation of the name see 24^7), the laws contained in which comprise two elements (24^3), the 'words' (or commands) and the 'judgments': the 'judgments,' expressed all hypothetically, and relating to the civil and criminal law, being comprised in 21^1–$22^{17. 25-27}$, and the 'words,' consisting mostly of positive injunctions of the moral or ceremonial law, and introduced by thou shalt or thou shalt not, being comprised in 20^{23-26} $22^{18-24. 28-31}$ 23^{1-19}. With the form of the laws, and the parenetic additions which they sometimes exhibit (as 22^{23-24}), we are not here concerned: the laws themselves are designed to regulate the life of a community living under simple conditions of society, and chiefly engaged in agriculture. They may be grouped as follows †:—

i. Enactments relating to civil and criminal law:
   1. The rights of Hebrew slaves (male and female), 21^{1-11}.
   2. Law of murder and manslaughter vv.$^{12-14}$, of violence to a parent v.^{15}, of man-stealing v.^{16}, of cursing a parent v.^{17}.
   3. Bodily injury caused by men vv.$^{18-27}$ (bodily injury inflicted in a quarrel v.$^{18f.}$; beating a slave to death v.$^{20f.}$; injury done in a quarrel to a pregnant woman v.^{22}, or other bystander vv.$^{23-25}$; striking out the eye or tooth of a slave v.$^{26f.}$).
   4. Bodily injury due to animals, or neglect of reasonable precautions vv.$^{28-36}$ (injury done by an ox to a free man or woman vv.$^{28-31}$, or to a slave v.^{32}; injury caused by neglect in leaving an open pit v.$^{33f.}$; injury done by an ox to one belonging to another person v.$^{35f.}$: in the first and last of these cases, the penalty, where the neglect is culpable, is materially increased).
   5. Theft 22^{1-4} (theft of ox or sheep v.^{1}; burglary vv.$^{2-4}$).
   6. Compensation for damage v.$^{5f.}$ (damage done by straying cattle v.^{5}; damage done by fire spreading to another man's field v.^{6}).
   7. Compensation for loss or injury in various cases of deposit or loan vv.$^{7-15}$ (cases of deposit vv.$^{7-9. 10-13}$; case of injury to a borrowed animal v.$^{14f.}$).
   8. Compensation for seduction v.$^{16f.}$.

ii. Moral, religious, and ceremonial enactments:
   1. Law relating to altars 20^{24-26} (altars to be of earth or of unhewn stone, and not to be approached by steps).
   2. Sorcery and bestiality to be punished with death $22^{18f.}$.
   3. Sacrifice to 'other gods' to be punished with the 'ban' 22^{20}.
   4. Humanitarian laws 22^{21-27} (the gêr, or resident foreigner, the widow and the orphan, not to be oppressed 22^{21-24}; interest not be taken from the poor 22^{25}; a garment taken in pledge to be returned before nightfall $22^{26f.}$).
   5. God not to be reviled, nor a ruler cursed 22^{28}.
   6. Firstfruits and firstborn males to be given to J″ $22^{29f.}$ (cf. 13^{12}, where it is added that the firstling of an ass is to be either redeemed with a lamb or killed, and the firstborn of a man is to be redeemed); and flesh torn of beasts not to be eaten 22^{31}.
   7. Veracity and impartiality in giving evidence in a court of law 23^{1-3}.
   8. An enemy's beast to be preserved from harm $23^{4f.}$.
   9. Justice to be administered impartially 23^{6-9} (bribes not to be taken: the poor and the gêr not to be oppressed).
   10. The seventh year to be a fallow year, and the seventh day a day of rest 23^{10-12} (the motive in each case is a philanthropic one).
   11. God's commands to be honoured, and 'other gods' not to be invoked 23^{13}.
   12. The three annual pilgrimages (of Unleavened Cakes, Harvest, and Weeks) to be observed 23^{14-17} (all males to appear before J″ at each).
   13. Three closing regulations $23^{18. 19}$ (sacrifice not to be offered with leavened bread, nor its fat to remain un-

§ Both these words are also used sometimes of laws of nature: as Jer 31^{36}, Job 28^{26}, Ps 148^6 (חֹק); Jer 5^{24} 31^{35} 33^{26}, Job 38^{33} (חֻקָּה).

* The literary characteristics of the Codes do not fall within the scope of the present article; but it may be remarked in passing that each possesses distinctive literary features of its own, and that even the form of the laws sometimes differs in the different codes: thus, while in Ex 21–23 a law commonly begins in the form וכי יכה איש ($21^{20. 22. 26}$ etc.), in P the form אדם כי or נפש כי is frequent (Lv 1^2 2^1 4^2 etc.), and in H the form איש איש אשר (Lv $17^{3. 8. 10. 13}$ etc.).

† Comp. Stade, Gesch. i. 636; Holzinger, Einl. 243. Many of these laws seem to fall into groups of ten, which L. B. Paton has endeavoured recently to restore in their (supposed) original completeness; see JBL, 1893, p. 79 ff. (an abstract in LOT^{6} p. 40); and cf. Briggs, l.c. p. 211 ff.

burnt until the following morning; firstfruits to be brought to 'the house of J″'; a kid not to be boiled in its mother's milk).

The ceremonial provisions contained in 23^{10-19} are repeated in 34^{10-26}—a section sometimes called the 'Little Book of the Covenant,' and sometimes also (from 34^{28}) the 'Words of the Covenant'—with changes of order, and slight verbal variations, and with the addition in 34^{12-17} of more specific injunctions against idolatry.[*]

The 'Book of the Covenant' is the oldest Code of Hebrew law with which we are acquainted—older, no doubt, than the narrative (E) in which it was incorporated; it embodies, to use Cornill's expression, the 'consuetudinary law of the early monarchy,' and embraces (in accordance with the sense of tôrāh and mishpāt, explained above) the formulated decisions which had accumulated gradually up to that age. That the community for whose use it was designed had made some progress in civilization is evident from the many restrictions imposed on the arbitrary action of the individual; on the other hand, that it was still in a relatively archaic condition appears from such regulations as $21^{18f.}$ and 21^{23-25} (the lex talionis), or the conception of God as the immediate source of judgment (21^{6} $22^{8.9}$; cf. 1 S 2^{25}). The stage of society for which the Code was designed, and the characteristics of the Code itself, are well indicated by W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} 340 ff.). 'The society contemplated in it is of very simple structure. The basis of life is agricultural. Cattle and agricultural produce are the main elements of wealth; and the laws of property deal almost exclusively with them. The principles of criminal and civil justice are those still current among the Arabs of the desert, viz. retaliation and pecuniary compensation. Murder is dealt with by the law of blood revenge; but' the distinction—which in Greece was still not recognized in the age of Homer—is drawn between murder and manslaughter, and 'the innocent man-slayer may seek asylum at God's altar (21^{13}, comp. with v.^{14}: cf. 1 K $2^{28f.}$). With murder are ranked man-stealing, offences against parents, and witchcraft. Other injuries are occasions of self-help, or of private suits to be adjusted at the sanctuary (22^{9} [cf. 21^{6}]). Personal injuries fall under the law of retaliation, just as murder does. Blow for blow is still the law of the Arabs; and in Canaan, no doubt as in the desert, the retaliation was usually sought in the way of self-help. Except in this form, there is no punishment, but only compensation, which in some cases is at the will of the injured party (who has the alternative of direct revenge), but in general is defined by law. Degrading punishments are unknown, and loss of liberty is inflicted only on the thief who cannot pay a fine (22^{3}). Definite rights are secured for the slave. He recovers his freedom after 7 years, unless he prefers to remain a bondman, and seals solemnly his determination at the door of the sanctuary. His right of blood revenge against his master is, however, limited ($21^{20f.}$); though, instead of the lex talionis for minor injuries, he can claim his liberty ($21^{26f.}$). Women do not enjoy full social equality with men. Women slaves were slaves for life, but were often, it may be inferred, married to members or servants of the family ($21^{4.7-9}$). The daughter was her father's property (21^{7}), who received a price for surrendering her to a husband; and so a daughter's dishonour is compensated by law as a pecuniary loss to her father ($22^{16f.}$).'[†]

To many of the laws there are interesting parallels in the early codes of other nations (e.g. in Solon's Code at Athens): these are pointed out in the commentary of Dillmann. Some of the provisions seem to us harsh (21^{21} 22^{18}), but account must be taken of the age for which they were prescribed; and a humane regard for the unprotected and the helpless is unquestionably the dominant spirit of the Code.

Turning now to the more distinctively moral and religious aspects of the Code, we observe firstly the regard paid to the claims of humanity and justice. An emphatic voice is raised against those crying vices of Oriental government, the maladministration of justice and the oppression of the poor. The gêr, or foreigner living in Israel under the protection of a family or a community, has no legal status, but he is not to be oppressed. The Sabbath is enjoined as a day of rest for men and cattle; and the produce of every field or vineyard is to be left to the poor one year in seven. Religious institutions are in a simple, undeveloped stage. He who sacrifices to any god but Jehovah falls under the ban. The only ordinance of ceremonial sanctity is to abstain from the flesh of animals torn by wild beasts. Altars are to be of simple, almost rudimentary, structure. The sacred dues are firstlings and firstfruits; and the former must be presented at a sanctuary on the eighth day. This regulation of itself presupposes a plurality of sanctuaries, which also agrees with the terms of 20^{24b}. The three pilgrimages, at which every male is to appear before J″, mark three periods of the agricultural year—the beginning and the close of harvest, and the end of the vintage. The only points of sacrificial ritual insisted on are abstinence from leaven in connexion with the blood of the sacrifice, and the rule that the fat must be burnt the same night. The only sacrifices named are burnt-offerings and peace- (or thank-) offerings (20^{24}).

B. The next code which has to be considered is that of Deuteronomy. From a literary point of view, Deuteronomy (disregarding the few short passages belonging to P, and the two poems in chs. 32. 33) consists of a code of laws accompanied by hortatory introductions and comments. Here we are concerned only with the laws as such. A comparison of the laws embodied in Dt with those of the 'Book of the Covenant' at once shows that they are designed for a community living under more fully developed social conditions. Dt, speaking generally, may be described as a revised and enlarged edition of the Book of the Covenant, adapted to the requirements of a later age. With the exception of the compensations to be paid for various injuries (Ex 21^{13}–22^{15}), nearly all the provisions of Ex 20^{22}–23^{33} are included in it; and there are in addition many entirely new ones. A complete tabular synopsis of the two codes will be found above (vol. i. p. 600 f.); here, therefore, it will be sufficient to give a brief outline of the Deut. Code, and to make some general remarks on the Deuteronomic changes and additions.

Outline of laws in Deuteronomy:—

i. Religious Observances:
  1. Law of single sanctuary 12^{1-28} (burnt-offerings, sacrifices [i.e. peace-offerings], tithes, 'heave-offerings' [firstfruits, and other offerings from the produce of the soil], vows, freewill offerings, and firstlings, all to be offered at the central sanctuary: blood not to be eaten).
  2. Laws against the worship of 'other gods' 12^{29}–13^{18}.
  3. Sanctity of the laity 14^{1-21} (person not to be disfigured in mourning $14^{1f.}$; law of clean and unclean animals 14^{3-20}; flesh of animals dying of themselves not to be eaten 14^{21}).
  4. Laws tending to ameliorate the condition of the poor 14^{22}–15^{18} (disposition of the charitable tithe 14^{22-29}; relief secured to debtors every seventh year 15^{1-11}; law of slavery 15^{12-18}).
  5. Offerings and festivals (firstling males to be offered to J″ $15^{19\text{-}23}$; regulations respecting the observance of the three annual pilgrimages $16^{1\text{-}17}$).

ii. The Office-bearers of the Theocracy :
  1. Judges, $16^{18\text{-}20}$ (to be appointed in all cities; and to be strictly impartial in judgment).
    [$16^{21\text{f.}}$ asherahs and 'pillars' prohibited; 17^{1} sacrifices to be without blemish; $17^{2\text{-}7}$ an Israelite, convicted of idolatry, to be stoned to death].
  2. The supreme central tribunal $17^{8\text{-}13}$.
  3. The king $17^{14\text{-}20}$.
  4. Priests $18^{1\text{-}8}$.
  5. The Prophet $18^{9\text{-}22}$ (v.$^{10\text{f.}}$ against different forms of magic and divination).

iii. Criminal Law :
  1. Manslaughter and murder $19^{1\text{-}13}$ $21^{1\text{-}9}$ (cities of refuge $19^{1\text{-}13}$; symbolical rite of expiation for an untraced murder $21^{1\text{-}9}$).
  2. Law of the landmark 19^{14}.
  3. Law of witness $19^{15\text{-}21}$.
    [Four laws designed to secure self-control and forbearance in the conduct of war, c. 20. $21^{10\text{-}14}$].

iv. Miscellaneous Laws, relating chiefly to Civil and Domestic life.—21^{15}–25: e.g. primogeniture $21^{15\text{-}17}$; treatment of undutiful son $21^{18\text{-}21}$; lost cattle or other property to be restored to its owner (based on Ex $23^{4\text{f.}}$) $22^{1\text{-}4}$; law of 'tassels' 22^{12}; slander against a newly-married maiden $22^{13\text{-}21}$; adultery 22^{22}; seduction $22^{23\text{-}29}$; prohibition of marriage with step-mother 22^{30}; usury (interest) $23^{19.\,20}$; vows $23^{21\text{-}23}$; divorce $24^{1\text{-}4}$; man-stealing 24^{7} (based on Ex 21^{16}); leprosy $24^{8.\,9}$; pledges $24^{6.\,10\text{-}13}$; family of a criminal not to be punished with him 24^{16}; excessive severity in punishment forbidden $25^{1\text{-}3}$; Levirate-marriage $25^{5\text{-}10}$; just weights and measures $25^{13\text{-}16}$.

Note also the moral and religious duties which form the subject of the imprecations in $27^{15\text{ff.}}$ (all with parallels in JE, H, or Dt; see Driver, Deut. p. 299).

This outline will suffice to give an idea of the greater variety of subjects included in the Code of Dt as compared with that of JE, as also of the greater detail in which they are mostly treated. The organization of society is more complex; and institutions at once more numerous and more varied are needed to regulate it. The following are the principal changes in the laws repeated from JE. In Ex 21^{7} a daughter sold by her father into slavery does not go free in the 7th year: in Dt $15^{12.\,17}$ she does; since the law of Ex was formulated, society has advanced; a father's power over his daughter is less absolute than it once was, and it is no longer usual for a Hebrew girl to be bought to be the wife of her master or his son. In Ex 21^{13} the asylum for manslaughter is J″'s altar: in Dt 19 six cities are set apart for the purpose. In Ex $22^{16\text{f.}}$ seduction is treated among cases of injury to property; in Dt ($22^{28\text{f.}}$) it appears among laws of moral purity. In Ex 22^{30} firstlings are to be offered on the 8th day from birth; in Dt 15^{20} they are to be presented annually—a change rendered necessary by the substitution of a single central place of sacrifice for the local altars. In Ex $23^{10\text{f.}}$ the sabbatical year is essentially one of rest for the soil, in Dt $15^{1\text{-}6}$ the institution is so applied as simply to form a check on the power of the creditor.

In other cases, the principle of the older law is merely extended, or fresh definitions are added. Thus Dt 13 and $17^{2\text{-}7}$ may be regarded as expansions, with reference to particular cases, of the brief law against idolatry contained in Ex 22^{20}; $16^{1\text{-}17}$, as compared with Ex $23^{14\text{-}17}$, adds fresh regulations for the observance of the three annual Pilgrimages; $18^{10\text{f.}}$ (against divination and magic) extends the principle of Ex 22^{18} (sorceress alone) to other analogous cases; $19^{15\text{-}21}$ (the law of witness) is a development, with special provisions, of the general principle of Ex 23^{1}; $22^{1\text{-}3}$ extends the principle of Ex 23^{4} to other cases of lost property as $24^{6.\,10\text{-}13}$ (pledges) does that of Ex $22^{26\text{f.}}$; $22^{23\text{-}29}$ (seduction) particularizes with greater precision than Ex $22^{16\text{f.}}$ the cases which might arise. There are also instances in which the older law is repeated without further modification than that of form, as $16^{19\text{f.}}$ (Ex $23^{6.\,8}$), $23^{19\text{f.}}$ (Ex 22^{25}), 24^{7} (Ex 21^{16}).

Those provisions of Dt, which are without parallel in JE, relate mostly to conditions which, in the age when the laws of JE were drawn up, were not yet regarded as demanding legislative regulation: the greater variety of subjects included in the Code is evidence both of the growth of civilization in itself, and also of more systematic and maturer reflection upon its needs. A fundamental principle of the Deut. legislation is opposition to the heathen practices of the Canaanites: this is particularly prominent in the parenetic parts of the book, but it also determines several of the laws. The law of the single sanctuary (ch. 12), it cannot be doubted, is largely prompted by the desire to free the worship of J″ from the heathen elements by which it had been contaminated at the local shrines; the essential aim of the law of the king ($17^{14\text{-}20}$) is to guard this most important office against the influence of foreigners or participation in foreign policy; the laws of 12^{29}–13^{18} $14^{1.\,3\text{-}20}$ $16^{21.\,22}$ $17^{2\text{-}7}$ $18^{10.\,11}$ 22^{5} $23^{17\text{f.}}$, are also, some obviously, others, it is probable, implicitly, directed against heathen observances. Of ritual and ceremonial laws there are but few in Dt, though more than there are in JE. Sacrifices and other dues are to be brought to the central sanctuary (ch. 12), but little (v.^{27}) or nothing is said of the ritual with which they are to be presented. Only blood is not to be eaten ($12^{16.\,23}$ 15^{23}), in accordance with an old practice in Israel (1 S $14^{32.\,34}$), though no provision on the subject occurs in the legislation of JE. The laws regarding firstlings, and the observance of the three Pilgrimages ($15^{19\text{-}23}$ $16^{1\text{-}17}$), are fuller than the corresponding ones in JE. Regulations of a ceremonial character without parallel in JE are those relating to clean and unclean animals ($14^{3\text{-}20}$), tithe ($14^{22\text{-}29}$), the offering of sacrifices without blemish (17^{1}), the dues of the priests ($18^{1\text{-}8}$), the brief note on leprosy ($24^{8\text{f.}}$), and the liturgical forms to be used by the Israelite at the central sanctuary, when he presents his firstfruits ($26^{1\text{-}11}$), and after payment of the triennial tithe ($26^{12\text{-}15}$). It need only be added that it would be a serious mistake to suppose that the laws of Dt were the creation of the age in which the book was composed. This may be the case with one or two: but the majority are beyond question much older, the aim of Dt being merely to present them in a new literary setting, and to inculcate them with fresh motives.

C. We come next to the Law of Holiness (H), Lv 17–26. This consists substantially of an older body of laws, which have been arranged by a later editor in a parenetic setting, the whole thus formed being afterwards incorporated in P, with additions and modifications designed for the purpose of harmonizing it more completely with the system and spirit of P. For details see LEVITICUS, or LOT^{6} p. 47 ff.;* here our attention must be confined as far as possible to the older body of laws thus imbedded in this part of Lv.

Outline of the original nucleus of the Law of Holiness:—

$17^{3\text{a}.\,4}$ (partly). Domestic animals, when slain for food, to be presented at a sanctuary.

17^{9} (partly). All sacrifices to be offered to J″.

$17^{10.\,13\text{f.}}$ (partly). Blood, whether of domestic or wild animals, not to be eaten.

$18^{6\text{-}23}$. Laws of chastity (four pentads of laws: v.$^{6\text{-}10}$ kinship of the first degree; vv.$^{11\text{-}15}$ kinship of the second degree; vv.$^{16\text{-}19}$ relationships through marriage; vv.$^{20\text{-}23}$ purity outside the family, and Molech-worship).

$19^{3\text{-}4.\,9\text{-}20.\,26\text{-}36}$. Religious and moral duties: vv.$^{3\text{-}4}$ laws parallel with the first Table of the Decalogue; vv.$^{11\text{-}12}$ laws parallel with the 8th and 9th Commandments; vv.$^{13\text{-}18.\,32\text{-}36}$ laws of conduct towards one's neighbour,—justice in judgment, freedom from malice, respect of elders, justice in trade, etc.; vv.$^{26\text{-}31}$ nothing to be eaten with the blood, divination and other heathen superstitions not to be practised.

[Vv.$^{5\text{-}8}$ on peace-offerings, v.^{19} against dissimilar mixtures, v.^{20} a special case of unchastity, are unrelated to their present context, and probably once stood elsewhere in H. V.$^{9f.}$ (gleanings to be left) is better placed in 23^{22}; and vv.$^{23-25}$ (fruit of newly planted trees not to be eaten till the fifth year) is a ceremonial regulation more akin to ch. 23, or 25^{2-7}, than to the main topic of ch. 19].

20^{2-21}. Penalties for Molech-worship, and necromancy (vv.$^{2-6.\ 27}$), and for different cases of unlawful marriage and unchastity (similar to, and in many cases the same as, those prohibited in ch. 18).

Chs. 21–22 (with the exception of some redactional additions) ceremonial regulations respecting priests and offerings (restrictions in domestic life obligatory upon the priests 21^{1-15}; physical imperfections disqualifying from the priesthood 21^{16-24}; conditions for partaking in 'holy' food 22^{1-16}; animals offered in sacrifice to be free from imperfections 22^{17-25}; three special regulations regarding sacrifices 22^{26-30}).

$23^{10-12.\ 15-17.\ 18-19}$ (partly) ^{20} (mostly) $^{22.\ 39}$ (middle part), $^{40.\ 41a.\ 42}$ (regulations for the observance of the Feasts of Unleavened Cakes, Weeks, and Booths). The rest of the chapter consists of supplemental regulations relating partly to these Feasts, partly to other sacred seasons, incorporated from the point of view of P.

$24^{15b-16a.\ 17-21}$ (laws on blasphemy, and certain cases of injury to man and beast).

25^{2b-7a}, parts of vv.$^{8-55}$, perhaps in particular vv.$^{8-9a.\ 10a.\ 13-15.\ 17-22.\ 24-25.\ 35-40a.\ 43.\ 47.\ 53.\ 55}$. Land to lie fallow in the sabbatical year vv.$^{2b-7}$; land not to be sold beyond the next Jubile v.$^{13-15}$; and four regulations for the relief of the impoverished Israelite v.^{25}, v.$^{35-38}$ (usury not to be exacted of him), vv.$^{39.\ 40a.\ 43}$, vv.$^{47.\ 53.\ 55}$.

$26^{1f.}$ (certain fundamental religious duties).

To the original Law of Holiness belong also, in all probability, Lv $11^{2-7.\ 9-10.\ 13-22.\ 41}$ (animals permitted, and prohibited, for food); cf. 20^{25}.

The nucleus of Ex 31^{13-14a} (on the Sabbath); and of Nu 15^{38} (the law of 'tassels')

The original nucleus of H, when compared with the Book of the Covenant, will be seen to deal very much less fully with civil and criminal law, and more fully with the moral and ceremonial law. The only regulations relating to criminal law are those in 24^{17-21}: those in ch. 25 might be classed as belonging formally to civil law; but they are regarded more properly as expressions of religious or humanitarian principle. In chs. 18–20 the fundamental moral principles underlying the Decalogue and parts of the Book of the Covenant are applied to a much larger number of individual cases than is the case in the earlier legislation. Ceremonial legislation has evidently advanced: the number of regulations relating to priests and sacrifices is noticeable. The only species of sacrifices mentioned are, however, the same as those mentioned in Dt, viz. the burnt- and the peace-offering. The characteristic feature of this group of laws in its present form, viz. their subordination to the principle of holiness—partly ceremonial, partly moral—seems not to attach to the laws in their original form, but to be an addition due to the compiler (R^h).

D. The legislation of the Priests' Code, properly so called (P), is confined almost entirely (see exceptions in Nu 27^{1-11} 35. 36) to ceremonial observances, especially those relating to sacrifice and purification. The following is an outline of the subjects treated in it (directions for the construction of the tabernacle and its parts omitted):—

Gn 17 Circumcision.
Ex 12^{1-13} the Passover; vv.$^{14-20}$ Feast of Unleavened Cakes; vv.$^{43-49}$ qualifications for partaking in the Passover.
  28 the dress of the priests.
  29^{1-37} ritual for the consecration of the priests.
  29^{38-42} the daily burnt-offering.
  30^{22-38} composition of the anointing oil, and the incense.
  31^{12-17} (expansion of H), 35^{1-3} the Sabbath to be observed under pain of death.
Lv 1 ritual of the burnt-offering.
  2 ,, ,, meal- (or cereal-) offering.
  3 ,, ,, peace- (or thank-) offering.
  4–5^{13} ritual of the sin-offering, and cases in which it is to be offered.
  5^{14}–6^{7} (Heb. 5^{14-26}) cases in which a guilt-offering (אָשָׁם) is prescribed (the ritual of the guilt-offering follows in 7^{1-7}).
  6^{8-30} (Heb. 6^{1-23}) 7^{8-38} regulations, in the main ancillary to those in 1–6^{7} (Heb. 1–5), relating to the sacrifices there prescribed:—
  6^{8-13} the dress of the priest who offers the burnt-offering; fire to be always burning on the altar of burnt-offering.
  6^{14-18} the priests' portion of the meal-offering.
Lv 6^{19-23} the high priest's daily meal-offering.
  6^{24-30} disposal of the flesh of the sin-offering.
  7^{8-10} the priests' share of the burnt- and meal-offering.
  7^{11-21} on the species of peace-offering, and the conditions under which the flesh is to be eaten.
  7^{22-27} fat and blood not to be eaten.
  7^{28-34} the officiating priest's share of the peace-offering.
  $10^{12f.\ 14f.}$ the priest's share of the meal- and peace-offering (substantially a duplicate of 6^{16} and $7^{33f.}$).
  10^{16-20} the flesh of the people's sin-offering (4^{13-21}) to be eaten by the priest.
  11–16 Laws of Purification and Atonement:—
  11 Clean and unclean animals.
  $11^{1-23.\ 41-47}$ animals clean and unclean as food (H's law on the subject, with slight expansions).
  11^{24-40} on uncleanness caused by contact with the carcases of certain animals.
  12 purification after child-birth.
  13–14 Leprosy (in man, clothing, and houses; diagnosis of symptoms, and ritual of purification).
  15 Purification after certain natural secretions.
  16 Ceremonial of the annual Day of Atonement.
  17–26 Supplementary additions in various parts (as $19^{21f.}$); redactional additions harmonizing chs. 21–22 with the principles of P; in ch. 23 the parts not assigned above to H (the Day of Atonement, vv.$^{26-32}$; and regulations for the observance of the other sacred seasons, fuller than those of H, but not so minute as those of Nu 28–29); 24^{1-4} the lamps in the tabernacle; 24^{5-9} the shewbread; in ch. 25 additions, partly consisting of more detailed regulations, esp. regarding the redemption of land, and partly extending the benefits of the Jubile from lands to persons.
  27 the commutation of vows and tithes.
Nu 5^{1-4} Lepers, and other persons ceremonially unclean, to be excluded from the camp.
  5^{5-8} a supplement to Lv 5^{14}–6^{7} (Heb. 5^{14-26}), prescribing that, in case the defrauded person is dead, and there be no next-of-kin, the compensation is to be paid to the priest offering the guilt-offering.
  5^{9-10} Dedicated things to belong to the priest receiving them.
  5^{11-31} law of ordeal for a woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness.
  6^{1-21} the law of the Nazirite.
  6^{22-27} the formula of priestly benediction.
  8^{1-4} instructions for fixing the lamps upon the golden candlestick.
  8^{5-26} the consecration of the Levites, and (v.$^{23ff.}$) their period of service.
  9^{9-14} (a law arising out of the incident, 9^{1-8}) the supplementary or 'Little' Passover (to be observed by those accidentally debarred from keeping the regular Passover).
  15^{1-16} the meal- and drink-offering to accompany every burnt- and peace-offering.
  15^{17-21} a cake of the first dough of each year to be offered to J″.
  15^{22-31} the sin-offering, to be offered by the community, or an individual, for sins of inadvertence (a parallel to Lv $4^{13-21.\ 27-31}$).
  15^{37-41} the law of 'tassels' (expanded from the shorter law of H).
  18^{1-7} the duties, and relative position, of the priests and the Levites.
  18^{8-19} the revenues of the priests.
  18^{20-32} distribution of the tithe between priests and Levites.
  19 the rite of purification, by means of water mingled with the ashes of a red heifer, after defilement with a corpse.
  27^{1-11} the law of the inheritance of daughters, in families in which there is no son.
  28–29. A priestly calendar, prescribing the public sacrifices to be offered at each season. Cf. Lv 23.
  30 the law of vows.
  31^{21-30} the law of the distribution of spoil taken in war (after purification, to be divided equally between the soldiers engaged and the community,—the priests, however, to have $\frac{1}{500}$ of the former, and the Levites $\frac{1}{50}$ of the latter).
  35^{1-8} Forty-eight cities appointed for the residence of the Levites.
  35^{9-34} Law of murder and manslaughter (cities of refuge, with regulations for their use).
  36 Heiresses possessing landed property to marry into their own tribe (supplement to 27^{1-11}).

The highly systematized character of the legislation of P will be apparent from this outline. It centres in the 'tabernacle,' the prototype of the later temple; its aim is to secure the holiness of Israel, to maintain a community worthy, both collectively and individually, of the consecrating presence of God in its midst (cf. Ex 29^{44-46}, Nu 5^{3} 35^{34}). The priests, with the Levites as their ministers, serve the sanctuary: they maintain there, on behalf of the community, the suitable sacrifices and rites of atonement and purification; they are also at hand to present the sacrifices, and perform the purifications, obligatory from time to time upon individuals. The sacrifices are numerous; and the details are minutely regulated. P exhibits the idea of a holy people dedicated to God, and realizes it on a large scale. The 'congregation' (עֵדָה) is not a nation, but a church. This idea is substantially the same as that which underlies Ezk 40–48; but it is worked out in greater detail. The principles most prominent in the Code are those of atonement (כִּפֶּר) and purification (טִהַר, טִמֵּא); the sacrifices most frequently prescribed are the guilt-offering (אָשָׁם) and, especially, the sin-offering (חַטָּאת), neither of which is mentioned at all in any of the other codes, though both occur in Ezk* (see further SACRIFICE). The great aim of the Code is, in fact, by means of these rites, to remove the sins and defilements which are inconsistent with the presence of J" in His sanctuary in Israel's midst.

The silence, or the contradiction, of the earlier literature† makes it probable that the Priests' Code, in the form in which we have it, or, in other words, the completed Priests' Code, is the work of the age subsequent to Ezk. When, however, this is said, it must not be understood to be implied that all the institutions of P are the creation of that age. On the contrary, there are allusions in the earlier literature to many of them (though sometimes with evident variations of detail) which show that, at least in a more rudimentary form, they were already in force.

Examples: Gn 8^{21} (J) 'savour of contentment' (Lv 1^{9}, and often in P); Jg $13^{4.7}$ 'unclean' food; Jg $13^{5.7}$, Am $2^{11f.}$ Nazirites; 1 S 2^{28} 'fire-sacrifices' (Lv 1^{9}, and frequently); 3^{3} the 'lamp of God' (Ex 27^{20}); $6^{3ff.}$ a guilt-offering (אָשָׁם); 21^{6} the shewbread; Am $4^{4.5}$ tithes, thanksgiving offerings, and freewill offerings; 8^{5} (so Hos 2^{11}, Is 1^{15}) observance of the 'new moon' (Nu 28^{11-15}); Is 1^{13} a 'convocation' (Lv $23^{2.3}$ etc.); 2 K 16^{15} (but no evening burnt-offering, as in P; cf. Ryle, Canon, p. 84 f.). And in Dt, not only the parallels with H,‡ but also tithes (though with regulations very different from those of P), 'heave'-offerings (12^{6} etc.), vows, freewill offerings, ceremonial uncleanness in persons ($12^{15.22}$) as well as in things (14^{3-20}), and produced by particular causes (21^{23} [Nu 35^{34}] $23^{10f.}$ [Lv 15^{16}] 24^{4} [Nu 5^{13}] 26^{14} [Nu $19^{11.14}$; cf. Hos 9^{4}]), the 'azéreth, or 'solemn assembly' (16^{8}; cf. Am 5^{22}, Is 1^{13}), a tôrāh for leprosy (24^{8}). Ezk also, esp. in chs. 43–45, alludes to a still larger number of usages of the same kind, and, moreover, employs a priestly phraseology which presents many affinities with that of P (cf. LOT^{6} 145 ff.).

A priesthood in itself implies the existence of a ceremonial, more or less developed, as the case may be: the oldest traditions of the Hebrews mention repeatedly an 'Ark' and 'Tent of Meeting' as existing in the Mosaic age; and there are early allusions to Aaron, to a hereditary priesthood descended from him, and to the duties—consisting partly in giving decisions on points of civil and criminal law, partly in the maintenance of ritual observances—discharged by the tribe of Levi (Ex 4^{14} 18^{12}, Dt 10^{6b} 33^{10}; cf. Jg 17^{13}). The simplest and earliest ceremonial regulations are those contained in Ex 20^{24-26} 22^{29-31} 23^{14-19}, and the parallel code of Ex 34^{17-26}: but these are obviously of a rudimentary character; and it is only natural to suppose that, as time went on, fresh definitions and distinctions would be introduced, and more precise rules would be prescribed for the method of sacrifice, the ritual to be observed by the priests, the dues which they were authorized to receive from the people, and other similar matters. After the priesthood had acquired, through the foundation of Solomon's temple, a permanent centre, it is probable that the process of development and systematization advanced more rapidly than before; the allusions in Dt imply the existence of priestly usages beyond those which fall directly within the scope of the book, and Ezekiel, being a priest himself, refers to such usages more distinctly. Although, therefore, there are reasons for concluding that the legislation of P did not assume finally the shape in which we have it until after the age of Ezk, it rests ultimately upon an ancient traditional basis; it exhibits the final development and systematization of elements and principles, which in themselves are of great antiquity; and many of the institutions prominent in it are recognized, in various stages of their growth, by the earlier pre-exilic literature, by Dt, and by Ezk.*

The question is not one of great importance in the present connexion; but it should be added that it is doubtful whether the legislation of P springs throughout from the same age; there are indications that it exhibits sometimes the usage of different periods side by side. Cf. Dillm. Ex-Lv, 413 (^{2}455: on Lv 4), Nu-Dt-Jos, 84, 181 (on Nu 28-29), 635, 641 f., 643; Kuen. Hex. §§ 6. 13–15; 15. 28–30; Holzinger, Einl. 418–25, 453 f.; also Ryle, Canon, 84–88.

In its general features—i.e. the general principles of sacrifice, tithes, annual festivals, purification, etc.—the ceremonial system of the Hebrews did not differ essentially from the systems prevalent among other Semitic nations, and indeed among ancient peoples generally, as, for instance, the Greeks.† It is not improbable that elements in it were borrowed from the Canaanites. Some of the Heb. sacrificial terms (זבח, שלם, כליל, מנחה, כלל) are found in the Carthaginian inscription, relating to sacrifices, preserved now at Marseilles;‡ and vows are also frequently mentioned in other Phœn. inscriptions. There are analogies for the Sabbath among the Babylonians; and even CIRCUMCISION (which see) was not a rite peculiar to the Hebrews. The Levitical ritual, though its form is late, is based ultimately 'on very ancient tradition, going back to a time when there was no substantial difference, in point of form, between Heb. sacrifices and those of the surrounding nations' (RS 198, ^{2}215). Of course, among the Hebrews, these common Semitic institutions received, as time went on, many modifications and special adaptations. But the really distinctive character, which they exhibited in Israel, consists in the new spirit with which they are infused, and the higher principles of which they are made the exponent. The aim of the Heb. legislation was 'not so much to create a new system as to give a new significance to that which had already long existed among Semitic races, and to lay the foundation of a higher symbolism leading to a more spiritual worship' (Ryle, Canon, p. 28; cf. Ottley, Bampt. Lect. 229).

The most conspicuous feature in the legislation of P is perhaps the multiplication and specialization of ceremonial observances, which has been already touched upon.

Another characteristic, which Wellh. has emphasized, is the statutory character of religion in the Priestly Code, as contrasted with its more spontaneous character in the earlier codes. In the earlier codes religious observances arise largely out of the circumstances and incidents of daily life. Sacrifices are the spontaneous outcome of the religious feeling of the worshipper; the feasts are occasions of religious observance fixed by the annually recurring seasons of harvest and vintage; the Sabbath is an institution designed expressly for humanitarian ends. In P this is all different: the observances are systematized; their original significance is obliterated; they are to be regarded simply because J″ has enjoined them; the Sabbath is made not for man, but for God, and the slightest infringement of its sanctity is to be visited with death (Ex 31^{15}, Nu 15^{35}). A system of ceremonial observances of this kind manifestly lies in great danger of being abused: except in persons of more than ordinary spiritual vitality, it tends to stifle and sterilize real spiritual life. Among the later Jews (as allusions in the NT and the Mishna show) it led actually to these consequences, and a religion of excessive formalism was the result. The fundamental conception of the priestly legislation, that of a people ever serving God in holiness and purity, is, in the abstract, a great one; but the means adopted for its realization, viz. a routine of external observances, are not those which, in the long-run, can succeed. The routine degenerates inevitably into externality and formalism. There is also another point to be observed. In the ideas of holiness and purity, ritual and moral distinctions were confused. Exactly the same penalty is imposed for infringements of ritual (Ex $30^{33.\,38}$, Lv $17^{4.\,9.\,14}$ 19^{8}) as for grave moral offences (Lv 18^{29}). Death is the penalty, alike for murder (Nu 35^{31}) and for Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31^{15} 35^{2}). Purification from sin is prescribed after purely physical defilement, as through contact with a corpse, and even for a house which has been affected by leprosy (Lv $14^{49.\,52}$, Nu $19^{12.\,13.\,19.\,20}$ [the Heb. in these passages for cleanse, purify is properly to 'free from sin']). A sin-offering is also sometimes enjoined for merely ceremonial uncleanness (e.g. Lv $5^{2\cdot 6}$, Nu $6^{9\text{-}11}$). Mr. Montefiore comments on the indifference to bloodshed, combined with zeal for ritual purity, displayed by the singular—and, we may be sure, ideal — narrative of the war with Midian in Nu 31 (vv.$^{17.\,19\text{f.}\,23\text{f.}}$). The principle of ceremonial cleanness and uncleanness, it may be noticed, was the point on which our Lord broke most decisively with the Mosaic law (cf. p. 75^{b}).[*]

* Ezk 40^{39} 42^{13} 44^{29} 46^{20}: the חַטָּאת, also, $43^{19.21.22.25}$ 44^{27} $45^{17.19.22.23.25}$. Neither, it is to be observed, appears as a new institution in Ezk.

† See LOT 129–132 (^{6}136–139). The most noticeable contradictions with Dt relate to the position and revenues of the priestly tribe, the disposal of tithes and firstlings, and the manumission of slaves (ib. 77 f., ^{6}82 f.; Driver, Deut. xxxviii.–ix., 169–172, 185, 187). In 2 K 12^{16} observe that the guilt- and sin-offerings consist in money payments (cf. RS 402 f., ^{2}423).

‡ See vol. i. p. 600 f.

* W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} 372 f., 377, 382–4) points also to the evidences of ancient ritual law in the hands of the priests; cf. Stade, Gesch. ii. 66 (who instances in particular Lv 1–7. 11–15. 17–26, Nu 5–6. 9. 15. 19, as being for the most part 'Niederschrift vorexilischen Gebrauchs'); Cheyne, Jewish Rel. Life after the Exile, 81. There are also many examples of archaic ideas and usages embedded in P, not less than in the other codes: see, e.g., Lv 11 ('uncleanness'; cf. RS 428 ff., ^{2}447 ff.), $14^{7.53}$ (ib. 402, ^{2}422), $16^{21f.}$, 21^{6} al. (the 'bread of God'; ib. 207, ^{2}224), Nu $5^{11ff.}$ (ib. 164 f., ^{2}180 f.), $19^{2ff.}$.

The priestly legislation, however, though it bulks largely in the Pentateuch, never, it must be remembered, formed the sole rule of life for the Israelite. The codes of JE and Dt were not abrogated by it; the warm moral and spiritual teaching of Dt possessed exactly the same authority as the ceremonial of P; and the teaching of Dt was supported by the indirect, but by no means indistinct, testimony of the non-legislative parts of the Pentateuch. The prophets, moreover, remained the eloquent and moving exponents of spiritual religion, and of the paramount claims of the moral law above all ritual observances. The corrective for the ceremonialism of P was thus close at hand, in writings acknowledged by the Jews themselves as authoritative. The Jews were never exclusively under the rule of the ceremonial system of P. On its ceremonial side, the 'law' was undoubtedly liable to be misapplied, and to lead to formalism; but even its ceremonial institutions were the expression of profound religious ideas, and furnished an outlet for varied and genuine religious feelings; while, treated as a whole, the 'law,' as the later Psalmists abundantly attest, provided an atmosphere in which a religious spirit—for something, of course, in such matters, depends upon the temper of the worshipper—could breathe freely, and draw in spiritual refreshment. The ceremonial legislation never had a separate existence of its own; and the Jewish 'law,' if it is to be judged properly, must be judged as a whole, and not with exclusive reference to one of its parts.

In the earlier codes the broader duties of humanity, justice, and morality are chiefly and sufficiently insisted on. They were adapted to create a righteous and God-fearing nation. The Israelite who obeyed loyally the precepts of Dt could not deviate widely from the paths of truth and right. As time advanced, a ceremonial system was gradually developed, and this, though the earlier provisions just referred to were not abrogated, became ultimately the more formal and distinctive expression of Israel's faith. And this system played an important function in the religious education of mankind. 'It enforced and deepened the sense of sin. It declared the need of restoration and forgiveness. It expressed in the form of institutions the great principles which regulate man's converse with God. It emphasized the significance of sacrifice under its different aspects, as eucharistic, dedicatory, propitiatory.[*] It taught more and more distinctly that an atoning rite must precede the acceptance of the worshipper by God. It thus established the principles which in the fulness of time were to receive their supreme and final application in the sacrifice of Christ. In all its stages, the Mosaic law held before the eyes of Israel an ideal of duty to be observed, of laws to be obeyed, of principles to be maintained; it taught them that human nature needed to be restrained; it impressed upon them the necessity of discipline. And in the post-exilic age, when the disintegrating influences of Hellenism might have operated disastrously upon the nation, the institutions of the law bound together the majority of its members in a religious society, strong enough to resist the forces which threatened to dissolve it,'[†] and able to guard efficiently the spiritual treasures with which it had been intrusted. Through the ordinances of the law, imperfect in themselves though they might be, God thus trained and disciplined His people, till it should be ripe to cast off the yoke of external ordinances, and be ruled by principles operative from within (Jer $31^{33\text{f.}}$) rather than by commands imposed from without. And this is the sense in which St. Paul speaks of the law as a παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν (Gal 3^{24}). The παιδαγωγός was the 'tutor' (RV), or superior slave, intrusted with the moral education of a child; and the law was similarly an agency for discipline, or moral training, holding the nation in a moral constraint (ἐφρουρούμεθα, v.^{23}) till it was fit for the freedom of mature age, to be secured by Christ. And the means by which the law acted in this capacity was partly by quickening and disciplining man's moral sense, partly by bringing to light transgression, and so awakening the sense of sin and the need of forgiveness, which in view of man's moral weakness it could not itself provide.

On the view taken of the 'law' in the NT see the following article; and on the law in post-biblical Judaism (the Mishna, etc.), see TORAH.

[*] On the sense in which our Lord came to 'fulfil' the law (Mt 5^{17}),—i.e. in so far as it was imperfect, to complete it, especially by disengaging from its limited and temporary forms, and placing in their just light, the ethical and religious truths of which it was the expression,—see also Kirkpatrick, Divine Library of the OT, 134 ff.

[*] It ought not in this connexion to be forgotten that only unintentional sins were atoned for by the sin-offering, not sins committed 'with a high hand' (Nu $15^{30\text{f.}}$), i.e. in deliberate defiance of God's will.

IV. The Law in the other NT Books.
Literature.

The word law (νόμος) is used in the NT of 'any law whatsoever' (Grimm, Lex. s.v.), but when 'the law' is spoken of without qualification, it is always the law of God which is meant. This is not a classical meaning or use of the word, and explains the fact that in the NT (with the exception of a quotation from the LXX of Jer 31 (38)^{33} in He 8^{10} 10^{16}) it is always found in the singular. 'The law of God,' or 'the law of Moses,' or 'the law' simpliciter, is the style of Scripture; a classical writer would say 'the laws' of Athens or of Solon. But 'the law,' and 'law' without the article, are religious conceptions, and it is as such that they are treated here. The word occurs some 196 times in the NT, but it is not found in Mk, in Th, 2 Co, Col, Tit, 2 Ti, Philem, 1 and 2 P, Jude, the Epp. of John, and Rev. To bring out its significance in the NT it will be convenient to examine (1) the relation of Jesus to the law; (2) the attitude of the early Church to the law, and especially the practice and teaching of St. Paul; (3) the peculiar view of the law taken in the Ep. to the Hebrews; and (4) the indications in other NT books of legal or antinomian tendencies in the first century of the Christian era. The necessary preliminary to the understanding of all these points is a knowledge of the contents of the 'law' of the OT, for which reference may be made to the preceding article.

I. THE RELATION OF JESUS TO THE LAW.—To begin with, the relation of Jesus to the law was passive, like that of every Jew. He was born under the law (Gal 4^{4}); the requirements of the law in regard to circumcision and purification were complied with in His case as in that of any child of Jewish birth (Lk $2^{21\text{ff.}}$). He was taken up to the temple when He had completed His twelfth year (Lk $2^{42\text{ff.}}$), and became, like other Jewish youths, בֶּן הַתּוֹרָה (or בַּר מִצְוָה) a son of the law. He would be instructed in it, and its responsibilities would be laid on Him, simply because it was the law of the nation of which He was a member. He must have accepted it as part of the national inheritance to which He was born. The NT gives us no means whatever of judging how the passive unconscious relation to the law was changed into the conscious and responsible one which we see when our Lord entered on His public work. No doubt He grew into that power of judgment and liberty of action which characterize His ministry; but we cannot tell what effort and perplexity, or whether any effort or perplexity, accompanied this growth. When we consider the shortness of His ministry, it seems extremely improbable that we should be able to trace within its narrow limits any 'evolution' or progressive change in His attitude to the law. That attitude was really determined by His character, by the spirit of sonship, of free appreciation of God's will, of unrestrained love to man; and His character was complete when He identified Himself with our sinful race in His baptism, and received there the attestation of the heavenly Father as His beloved Son. No doubt, as one thing in His life led on to another, and as opposition defined His attitude, it became more and more clear what His relation to 'the law,' both as a divine institution and as a divine institution administered and corrupted by man, must be; but in principle this was determined from the beginning. Hence it is not necessary, under the idea that clear self-consciousness is the last result of action, to attempt to trace in detail the practical impulses under which our Lord's attitude to the law was gradually defined, or to assume that He was learning His own mind all the time (so practically Holtzmann, NT Theologie, i. 130–160); we may take the Synoptics as they stand, and aim at a more systematic view.

(1) Speaking positively, Jesus recognized the law as a whole as a divine institution, and therefore as invested with indefeasible divine authority. He expressed His sense of this authority in the strongest possible language; and, with the idea of the law as embodied in writing present to His mind, declared that 'till heaven and earth should pass, one jot or one tittle should in no wise pass from the law till all should be fulfilled' (Mt 5^{18}, cf. Lk 16^{17}). It has been asserted that Jesus, whose attitude (as we shall see) to certain parts of the law was at least critical, could not have used such language, and that it belongs to the Judaism of the First Gospel. But it is found also in the Third, which is Gentile or Pauline rather than Jewish, and the assertion is pedantic. Jesus certainly believed that the law embodied a revelation of God; it was, in short, God's law; and without considering in what respects it might be subject to modification or expansion, He could say broadly that just because it was God's law, not the dot of an i or the stroke of a t could be abrogated by any power on earth. And when confronted, as He is on both the occasions when He uses this strong language, with the deformed righteousness of the Pharisees (Mt 5^{20}, Lk $16^{14\text{-}17}$), by which the law of God was virtually annulled, we can easily believe that He could and did express Himself thus vehemently. This seems truer, psychologically, than to say with Wellhausen (*Israelitische u. Jüdische Geschichte*², p. 382) that He found room everywhere for His soul, and was not straitened by what was little in the law, so highly did He exalt the worth of that which was great: the latter one should do, the former not leave undone. It is a more placid and controlled statement of Christ's relation to the law in principle which is found in Mt 5^{17}, the text or theme of the Sermon on the Mount: 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil.' The law and the prophets is a compendious expression for the ancient religion as embodied in the OT. To no part of this—neither to the statutory elements in it nor to the elements of promise, neither to its morality nor to its hopes—was Jesus in any sense hostile. There must have been something in His conduct or teaching to raise the question, something which created difficulty for men who identified the law with the current interpretation of it in the Rabbinical schools or in the religious practice of the day; but when it was fairly stated, it created no difficulty for Jesus. In His conscience there was no sense of antagonism or antipathy to the old revelation either of God's will or of His purpose. On the contrary, He had come to identify Himself with that revelation, and to consummate it. The πληρῶσαι in Mt 5^{17} applies to the OT in both its parts. It is true that in the rest of Mt 5 it is the law alone which is taken account of, and this has made it possible to doubt whether πληρῶσαι means 'to show the full meaning of,' or 'to keep perfectly'; but the very absence of the object in v.^{17}, and the disjunctive ἤ (the law or the prophets), show that Jesus was thinking of the OT as containing elements at once of requirement and of promise, and asserting that all it meant in both kinds would be brought to its consummation in Him. Hence in principle there is no antagonism between Jesus and the law, between the NT and the OT. For the conscience of Jesus they needed no reconciliation. The New Testament was in Him, and He was thoroughly at home in the Old.

It agrees with this that Jesus refers freely to the law as a religious authority, and as the way to life. 'If thou wouldst enter into life, keep the commandments' (Mt 19^{17}). 'What shall I do to inherit eternal life? Jesus said to him, What is written in the law?' (Lk 10^{26}). 'They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them' (Lk 16^{29}). It agrees further with this, that in the most unsparing denunciation of Pharisaism and hypocrisy, He safeguarded with scrupulous care the sanctity of the law they 'hedged' and abused: 'The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all things therefore that they say to you do and observe' (Mt 23^{3}). Like Mt 5^{18} this saying has been impugned on the ground that Jesus could not, in consistency with His real opinion, have spoken thus. This is the criticism of persons who have never spoken to a crowd, and who do not know that the large consistency of leaving a sound and homogeneous impression on the mind is indifferent to the abstract precisian consistency which dictates such doubts. Why should not Jesus say, 'As interpreters of the law of God, show them all due reverence; as keepers of the law of God, beware of following their example'? They were poor interpreters, no doubt, but the function itself was a legitimate one, and all that they did in the exercise of it was, primâ facie, entitled to respect. Even if it were not so without qualification (and in part, of course, it was not, as Jesus immediately goes on to show), the qualification could be left to take care of itself; the main interest of the moment was to expose the Pharisaic practice by which the law was so wickedly annulled. That making void (ἀκυροῦν) the law of God (Mt 15^{6} ‖ Mk 7^{13}) which Jesus laid to the charge of the Pharisees was exactly the opposite of the πληρῶσαι, which He used to define His own relation to it. With them, in spite of all the hedges which guarded it, it lost its rights; with Him, in spite of all His freedom, it came to its rights.

(2) Besides this positive attitude of Jesus to the law as a whole, we have to take account in His life of what may be called a more critical attitude. Without any sense of hostility to the law, He was conscious of its imperfection; this is implied even in His having come to fulfil it. Of this there are various indications.

(a) He speaks of the old revelation as a whole, as of a thing which has had its day. 'The law and the prophets were until John: from that time the kingdom of heaven is preached'; it is a new era, in which they have no longer the same significance (Lk 16^{16}, Mt $11^{12\text{f.}}$). There is a parabolic hint of this also in Mk $2^{21\text{f.}}$ and ‖ Mt 9^{17}, Lk 5^{37}.

(b) He delights in summaries of the law, in which it is at once comprehended and transcended. 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets' (Mt 7^{12}, cf. Mt $22^{34\text{-}40}$). Such summaries lift the soul above all that is statutory and positive in the law; in other words, they enable it to conceive of religion as the keeping of law, and yet as without any element of legalism.

(c) He presents a positive new standard of life from which legalism has disappeared. Sometimes it is His own example (Jn 13^{15}), interpreted as in Jn 13^{34} into a new commandment of love like His own. Sometimes it is the example of the heavenly Father, whose love, impartial and inexhaustible, is the pattern for His children (Mt $5^{43\text{-}48}$). It is by this standard of love that all the nations are unconsciously judging themselves now, and will be judged by Him at last (Mt $25^{31\text{ff.}}$). Sometimes it is represented as 'the will of my Father who is in heaven' (Mt 7^{21} 12^{50}). All these modes of conceiving the standard of disciple life, though not annulling 'the law' but fulfilling it, are nevertheless indifferent to it, either as a historic document or as a national institution.

(d) Jesus distinguishes within the law between its weightier matters—judgment, mercy, and faith; and its more trivial ones—the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin (Mt 23^{23} ‖ Lk 11^{42}). This is not exactly the same as to say that He subordinated the ritual to the moral, though no doubt He did. Nothing could put this more forcibly than Mt $5^{23\text{f.}}$. A man is to leave his gift before the altar, to be reconciled to his brother. There is no law except love; no statute that can be pleaded against it, no rite so solemn but must give way to it. The tendency of legalism is to reduce all commandments to a level; they are all parts of a divine law, and it is not for men to pick and choose between them; and the Jewish conscience, to which the law was one law and God's law, could not find itself at home in the division of it into ritual and moral. For it there was a moral obligation to keep what we call the ritual law. But as this distinction of Jesus mastered the mind, the sense of moral proportion came back, and it was felt, by some at least, that there were elements in the law which were waxing old and ready to vanish away.

(e) Jesus expressly and formally criticised the law as it was interpreted in the conscience and practice of His countrymen. In Mt $5^{21\text{-}48}$ we have a series of illustrations. The sixth commandment (v.$^{21\text{ff.}}$), the seventh (v.$^{27\text{ff.}}$), the law of perjury (v.$^{33\text{ff.}}$), the lex talionis (v.$^{38\text{ff.}}$), the law as to the treatment of neighbours and enemies (v.$^{43\text{ff.}}$), are discussed in succession. It is not always clear when it is the letter of the OT itself, and when it is only the current legal rendering of it, which is under review; but in either case Jesus adopts a free critical attitude towards it, and exalts it to a new power. On one of the subjects touched in this chapter, in connexion with the seventh commandment, namely, the law of marriage and divorce, Jesus on another occasion tacitly withdrew a permission which He recognized as conceded by the Mosaic law (ἐπέτρεψεν Μωυσῆς), in the interest of the ideal of marriage. 'Because of your hardness of heart Moses allowed you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it was not so' (Mt 19^{8} ‖ Mk). The question was one on which Jewish schools were divided, and Jesus legislates upon it in independence, indeed, of Dt 24^{1}, but in harmony with the law embodied in the creation narrative, Gn 2^{24}. From the point of view of legalism it is impossible to say why the authority of Dt should be relative and that of Gn absolute; and the positiveness with which Christ pronounces marriage indissoluble, except by the sin which, ipso facto, annuls it, shows that He has completely transcended the legal standpoint. (See, further, art. MARRIAGE). The same holds of His criticism of the Sabbath law, the subject on which He came most frequently into conflict with His countrymen: cf. Mt 12$^{1-12}$ (the disciples plucking the ears of corn; the healing of the withered hand); Lk 13$^{10-17}$ (the woman with a spirit of infirmity), 14$^{1-6}$ (the dropsical man); Jn 5$^{1-17}$ (the paralytic at Bethesda); Jn 9 (the blind man restored to sight). Cf. Lk 6^{5} (D; the incident of the man working on the Sabbath). Here it is impossible to say that Jesus was hostile to the law of God, or to any ideal of the Sabbath having its roots in the OT. But He was irreconcilably hostile to the accumulation of traditional human precepts into which the prohibition of labour, in the interest of man and beast, had been expanded by the perverse ingenuity of the scribes (cf. Schürer, GJV^{3} ii. 470 ff. [HJP II. ii. 96 ff.]). He was hostile to the method of interpretation which defeated God's purpose in giving the law, and changed a blessing into a burden. He was especially indignant that on a day which was made for man He should be forbidden to do works of humanity, by exercising His power to heal. As Son of Man, the head of the kingdom in which humanity was to come to its rights, He claimed to be Lord of the Sabbath, and to judge all statutes concerning it according to their agreement or disagreement with its humane intention. It is in connexion with conflicts of this kind that we first read of His enemies plotting His death (Mk 3^{6}): He wounded their pride in their legal holiness too deeply to be forgiven. It is one of the defects of legalism that the less the grounds of the law can be discerned—in other words, the more positive and arbitrary it is—the greater seems the merit of punctually observing it. Hence the numberless prohibitions into which the fourth commandment had been developed had a greater importance for the legally-trained conscience than the weightier matters of the law; and the assumption of freedom toward them, as by Jesus, was regarded as the most daring impiety. How far the teaching and practice of Jesus were immediately grasped by His followers we cannot tell; there are indications in the Gospel (Lk 13^{17}) that there were many prepared to appreciate them. But if in relation to the Sabbath and to the law of marriage we can say that Jesus criticised the legalistic practice of His time by reference to the ideal enshrined in the OT itself, we are on different ground when we come to consider—

(f) The attitude of Jesus to what we should call the ritual law—that part of the law and custom of the Jews which was purely positive, and in which there was really no ethical content. As far, indeed, as this was represented by the cultus of the nation, He treated it with at least silent respect. We do not know that He was ever present at a sacrifice, but neither do we hear that He ever denounced sacrifice. He certainly spoke of the temple as His Father's house, and as destined to be a house of prayer for all nations; and in a flame of zeal He drove from it the traders who made it a market-place and a den of robbers (Mt 21^{13} ‖). He paid the temple tribute, not, indeed, because He was bound to do so,—on the contrary, He, and His disciples also, as the king's children, were free from such imposts,—but to avoid offence (Mt 17$^{24-27}$). He did not shrink from touching the leper (Mt 8$^{1-4}$), being raised above the thought of ceremonial pollution; but He told him to go and show himself to the priest, and offer the gift which Moses commanded, for a testimony to them. There is a combination here of inward liberty and indifference, with a formal outward respect determined by circumstances, and necessarily ceasing with them. Cf. also Lk 17^{14}. (In this connexion it may be noted that the idea of σκάνδαλον as a thing to be avoided in conduct is part of the new moral ideal of Jesus, dependent on the primacy He gives to love; we are bound to consider others—as He did, for instance, in paying the temple tax—with a consideration which we may not need ourselves; and to deny this consideration, and out of selfishness injure others or lead them into sin, is denounced by Him in the most passionate words, Mt 18$^{6f.}$). But there is one point in which, according to the evangelic tradition, Jesus completely broke not only with the practice of His time, but with the law of Moses itself—the distinction, namely, between clean and unclean foods, and the observance of various ritual purifications by washing, Mk 7$^{1-23}$, Mt 15$^{1-20}$. The discussion here starts from the violation by His disciples of 'the tradition of the elders.' To this, naturally, Jesus could allow no authority; but He went further, and assailed it as a morally malignant thing which practically annulled the law of God. He appealed to Scripture (e.g. to the fifth commandment, Mk 7$^{9f.}$) against this tradition—to the law of God against the ordinance of man—precisely as the Reformers appealed to the Bible against the Church (Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 141). But in explaining to the people ('Hear me, all of you, and understand') the principle on which He acted, He went further still, and, as the evangelist expressly asserts, 'made all meats clean' (καθαρίζων πάντα τὰ βρώματα, Mk 7^{19}). In Lk 11^{37} the same subject is treated more from the point of view of indifference; it is only when the dish is filled with the proceeds of rapine that there is anything offensive in insisting on its being outwardly (i.e. Levitically) clean; but in Lk 10^{7} (the mission of the Seventy) there may be a reference to the more thorough view. The missionaries are to eat and drink what they are offered, with no needless scruples. This decisive breach with the law was felt to be what it was both by the opponents of Jesus and by Jesus Himself: 'Then came the disciples and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended when they heard this saying?' . . . 'Let them alone,' He answered; 'they are blind guides; and if the blind guide the blind, both shall fall into a pit' (Mt 15$^{12ff.}$).

It is at this point, where this decisive breach with legalism is accomplished, that Jesus is compelled to leave Palestine (Mt 15^{21} ‖ Mk), to give up the attempt to win the people, and devote Himself to the training of the Twelve. It was only to a select company that His mind could now be unfolded; a great gulf had been fixed between Him and the worshippers of the law, across which no understanding was possible. Nor do the Gospels give us the means of knowing how far He was able to carry the education of the Twelve on this subject. The 'meats and drinks and divers washings' were part of a system; what of the remaining part of it? What of all that element of the law which was identified with the temple and its worship? What of animal sacrifice? What even of the covenant sign, circumcision? As for the temple, He predicted its fall, and with it the collapse of the ritual worship. But was this element in the law to have fulfilment through Him, or was it only to be destroyed? The one hint we have of an answer to this is the fact that Jesus spoke of His own death as the basis of a (new) covenant between God and man—that covenant which Jeremiah foretold ($31^{31ff.}$), which has as its fundamental blessing the forgiveness of sins. To connect the forgiveness of sins with the shedding of blood is in the Bible inevitably to conceive the shedding of blood as sacrificial; only sacrificial blood atones for sin. In the great word spoken at the Supper, therefore, Jesus hints at a fulfilment in His own person of that whole side of the law which has to do with approaching God in worship, Mt 26^{28}. He gives the impulse and the justification to that interpretation of His life and death in relation to the (Levitical) law which we afterwards find in the Ep. to the Hebrews.

On the whole, then, it may be said that the attitude of Jesus to the law was that of entire loyalty to it as the revelation of God's will, entire comprehension of it in its principle and aim, entire subordination of every expression of it to its principle, entire superiority to all human interpretations of it, as designed perhaps for its greater security, but actually making it of no effect; and entire indifference, not indeed to the law as constituting an order for approaching God in worship, but to those elements in the law which, because in themselves without ethical significance, operated to corrupt conscience, and to divide men from one another without moral ground.

II. THE ATTITUDE OF THE EARLY CHURCH TO THE LAW, AND ESPECIALLY THE PRACTICE AND TEACHING OF ST. PAUL.—A. At first the law presented no problem to the Christian society. All the members of that society were Jews, and devout Jews. The Ananias who baptized St. Paul is described as εὐλαβὴς κατὰ τὸν νόμον, and as having testimony borne to him by all the Jews inhabiting Damascus (Ac 22^{12}), and this character was no doubt typical. The early Christians, in company with the apostles, assiduously frequented the temple (Ac 2^{46} 3^{1} $5^{12.20}$); the observance of the law, so far as it was observed by common people, would be a matter of instinct with them—a part of their nationality, the relation of which to their religion never presented itself to their minds. The charges made against them by the priests have never any reference to the law, and the proofs adduced for the Messiahship of Jesus, which seem to have filled a considerable space in apostolic preaching, were related not to the law, but to prophecy. As far as the Bk. of Acts gives us any indication, difficulty first emerged in connexion with the preaching of St. Stephen. He was charged with speaking 'blasphemous words against Moses and against God'; with incessantly 'speaking words against this Holy Place and against the law'; with saying that 'Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered to us' (Ac 6). From these accusations we can only infer that the new wine was beginning to burst the old bottles, and that the enemies of Christianity, with senses sharpened by hatred and fear, saw perhaps sooner than its friends that it was essentially irreconcilable with the established legalism of the Jewish Church. It was divine and human; Judaism was national and traditional; it could not harmonize finally with the traditional and national framework. But in the Christian society itself, so natural was it for Jews to live as Jews, even after they accepted Jesus as the Christ, that the difficulty was not felt.

This difficulty was first forced on the attention of every one by the circumstances attendant on the reception of Cornelius into the Church. While St. Peter, divinely led from Joppa to Cæsarea, was yet preaching the gospel in Cornelius' house, the Holy Spirit fell on all those who heard the word (Ac 10^{44}). The circumcised believers who were there were amazed, but St. Peter saw the significance of the event, and at once had them received into the Church by baptism, and associated familiarly with them (Ac 11^{3}). When his conduct—which really meant that the ceremonial law, as a Jewish national law, separating the Jews as God's people from all others, had ceased to have religious significance—was called in question at Jerusalem (Ac $11^{2ff.}$), he defended it apparently with the full consciousness of what it meant. 'If God gave them the same gift as he gave us also when we believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, who was I that I should obstruct God?' (cf. Ac $15^{7ff.}$). It is implied here that the gift of God—in other words the Holy Ghost—is the essential of Christianity, and the only one; where it is found, nothing else counts, and no questions are to be raised; circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing. But if this is so, then (so far as it is a term of communion and a condition of salvation) does not the law as a whole, to which men were bound by circumcision, cease to have any religious significance? Is it not possible already to define the Church as a society in which there is neither Jew nor Greek?*

This inference, which was involved in St. Peter's conduct, and in his defence of it, was not, however, clearly drawn at once. The exceptional case of Cornelius was regarded as exceptional; one man and his family could not make a Church, and this isolated instance might perplex rather than enlighten the simple-minded. But with the extension of the Church to Antioch, and especially with its extension beyond Antioch through the mission conducted by Paul and Barnabas, the subject was brought up with greater urgency. In the account of the first mission of these apostles, we have a hint of the peculiar Pauline attitude to the law: 'in this man (Jesus) every one who believes is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses,' Ac 13^{39}. It is not in this, however, but in the doctrine of a crucified Messiah, and perhaps in personal jealousy, that an explanation may be found of the opposition offered to the mission en route. Not Jewish Christians attached to the law, but Jews who were not Christians at all, resisted the preachers.

When Paul and Barnabas returned, they summed up the result of their mission in the words: 'God has opened the door of faith to the Gentiles,' Ac 14^{28}. But this 'conversion of the Gentiles,' though the news of it caused great joy in Phœnicia and Samaria (Ac 15^{3}), awakened very different feelings even in Christian circles at Jerusalem. Emissaries from Jerusalem insisted on teaching (ἐδίδασκον, Ac 15^{2}) the brethren at Antioch—men who had believed in Jesus Christ and received the Holy Ghost—that without circumcision they could not be saved. It was a deliberate challenge not only to the work of Paul and Barnabas, but, as they believed, to the work of God; and as it involved the unity of the Church, it was arranged that Paul and Barnabas with some brethren from Antioch should go to settle it with the apostles and elders at Jerusalem. It was not a question on which the apostles to the Gentiles could compromise; and everything depended, not indeed for the future of Christianity, but for the present peace of the Church, on the conciliatory spirit and insight of the leaders of the Church at Jerusalem. Room was given for discussion (Ac 15^{7}), but the question was settled by the argument of St. Peter—an argument identical in principle with that of ch. 11: 'God who knows the heart bore witness to them (the Gentiles) in that he gave them the Holy Spirit just as he did to us; and he made no distinction between us and them, in that he purified their hearts by faith.' For the Gentiles, at all events, a place in the Church and a part in salvation is in no way dependent on circumcision, or on keeping the law of Moses. This was the principle for which St. Paul contended; and it was in consistency with it that he refused to have Titus circumcised on the occasion of this visit to the Jewish Church (Gal 2^{3}), and that he withstood St. Peter to the face when, during a subsequent visit to Antioch, he yielded to Jewish pressure, and withdrew from fellowship with Gentile believers.

* We have assumed above that the Cornelius episode is historical, and also in its right place.

The recognition of this principle on both sides does not discredit the decree of Ac $15^{22ff.}$. The decree is a measure of expediency, necessarily of a temporary character, but one to which (in the interests of peace and of the Church's unity) St. Paul could easily enough agree—once his principle had been recognized. Where Judaism was focused, in Jerusalem for instance, the law would assert itself as inevitably as nationality or patriotism; in purely Gentile Churches no question as to its place in revelation or its religious significance might ever be raised; in places where Jew and Gentile were much in contact there would no doubt be inconsistencies, misunderstandings, and practical compromises and accommodations of various sorts. Of these the decree is a specimen.

B. The centre of interest in the NT is now in the practice and the doctrine of St. Paul.—(a) In the course of his second mission he visited Europe, and in a few verses of the 1st Ep. to the Corinthians, written to a Church founded in the course of this mission, he gives a clear and precise account of the principles on which he acted. 'Being free from all, I made myself a slave to all, that I might gain the more. And I became to the Jews as a Jew, that I might gain Jews; to those under law, as under law, not being myself under law, that I might gain those under law; to those without law (i.e. the Gentiles as 'outlaws' from the Jewish point of view), as without law, not being without law to God, but under law to Christ (ἔννομος because the Christian lives in the law, he is not under it as one to whom it speaks from without and from above, and whom it oppresses), that I might gain those without law' (on the whole passage 1 Co 9^{19-22} see the masterly note of Edwards, Comm. ad loc.). It is in pursuance of this policy that St. Paul at the outset of this journey circumcises Timothy (Ac 16^{3}), and delivers to the Churches on his route the decree of the Jerus. Council (Ac 16^{4}); it is still in pursuance of it that he preaches at Corinth a gospel to which everything is indifferent but Jesus Christ crucified (1 Co $2^{1ff.}$), and declares that circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision nothing (1 Co $7^{18f.}$).

In these verses in 1 Co it may be assumed that St. Paul is interpreting the principle on which he had acted when at Corinth, and on which he acted everywhere. The man who is called (i.e. who becomes a Christian) uncircumcised is not to circumcise himself; the man who is circumcised when the call comes to him is not to undo or disguise the fact: as far as the gospel and membership in the Church are concerned, circumcision and uncircumcision are neither here nor there. It is of this principle and practice that St. Paul says: so I ordain in all the Churches (1 Co 7^{17}). The Jewish opposition to St. Paul at Corinth seems also to have fastened on this aspect of his work: it no longer flowed from personal jealousy, as probably in Galatia. The charge laid against him before Gallio was that he persuaded men to worship God παρὰ τὸν νόμον (Ac 18^{13}), by which is no doubt meant, in violation of the Mosaic law. Judaism was a religio licita, and as the teaching of St. Paul was frankly indifferent to the national character in virtue of which the law possessed this public standing, his enemies thought to bring him within the scope of the Roman law as violating it. Yet with all this he was anxious to maintain communion with the mother Church at Jerusalem, and at the close of his journey formally paid his respects to it once more (Ac 18^{22}).

(b) To the third mission of St. Paul, which is ordinarily dated as commencing 55 or 56 [Turner, 52] A.D., belong the great controversial Epistles, 1 and 2 Co, Gal, and Ro, in which his doctrine of the law (for he was obliged both by his spiritual experience and by the challenges of his adversaries to have a doctrine) is expounded in all its aspects. Law in a sense is the subject of all, but especially of the two last named. The very frequency with which the word occurs is significant. It is found 32 times in Gal, 76 times in Ro, 8 times in 1 Co; elsewhere in the Epistles ascribed to St. Paul only 6 times. In Gal the reference is mainly to what we should call law in its ritual aspect, for the claim made on the Christians of Galatia by the Judaizers was that they should submit to be circumcised; in Ro, on the other hand, it is the moral law which is the subject of discussion. Yet this distinction is not one which would be present, at least vividly, to St. Paul's mind. He thinks of the law as one, and as the law of God; and his point is that statutory obedience is not the way of salvation. Much of the difficulty which his opponents had in understanding St. Paul must have been due to the apparently (and inevitably) equivocal attitude which he assumed to the religion of Israel. On the one hand, the gospel was a specifically new thing. It was independent of the law. It did for him what the law could not do (Ro 8^{3}). It had to be defined by contrast with the law; sometimes it seemed as if it could be defined only by opposition to the law, as in 2 Co 3 where they are confronted as γράμμα and πνεῦμα, as ἀποκτέννειν and ζωοποιεῖν, as κατάκρισις and δικαιοσύνη, as τὸ καταργούμενον and τὸ μένον. Even in Ro, which is written in a more conciliatory mood, pains are taken to show that in principle the two religions (the law and faith, works and grace, wages and promise) are mutually exclusive (Ro 4). On the other hand, the connexion of the new religion with the old is as indubitable. The δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ preached in the gospel may be χωρὶς νόμου, yet it is witnessed to by the law and the prophets (Ro 3^{21}, cf. $1^{2.17}$ $10^{5f.}$). The last passage referred to is particularly striking, for in it St. Paul applies to the gospel words spoken by Moses about the law, and that for the very purpose of pointing the superiority of the gospel to the law. In other words, he read the OT as a Christian book, and yet proved from it the thesis that the OT religion was not Christianity. But though this inevitable formal difficulty must often have led to misunderstanding in controversy, it is no more than formal, and the apostle's position is intelligible enough. The OT, if regarded as a code, is not Christian, is indeed antichristian, as every religion based on statutes and therefore legal in spirit must be; but as a revelation it has the promise of Christianity in it, and bears witness to the gospel.

(c) Before examining St. Paul's doctrine, or the various suggestions of his Epistles, on the law, it is necessary to observe more closely his use of the word. (a) He sometimes has it with, sometimes without, the article. The question has been raised whether the meaning is the same in the two cases. If we ask questions which were not present to the mind of the writers whom we are interpreting, we are apt to get unreal and unreliable answers; and in answering this question there has been little agreement among scholars. No doubt when St. Paul says 'the law,' without any qualification, he is thinking of the law of Moses. There was nothing else in the world to describe by that name. The one specimen exhausted the species. Is anything else meant when he speaks of 'law' without so defining it? The answer given by such scholars as Lightfoot and Gifford is that in such cases what St. Paul has in view may indeed be the law of Moses, but it is that law not definitely as Mosaic, not as the historical institute with which the Jews were familiar, but indefinitely, and simply in its character as legal. In spite of the objections of Grafe, this view seems thoroughly sound. Even what is regarded as a decisive case on the opposite side (Ro 5^{20} νόμος δὲ παρεισῆλθεν) is much more effective and relevant to the apostle's argument if we render 'Law came in,' instead of 'The Law.' St. Paul is writing of the great spiritual forces which have dominated the history of humanity, Sin, Law, and Grace, and it is in their character as such, not in their historical definiteness, that he is concerned with them. It is only when this is admitted, that what St. Paul says of law has any interest for others than Jews. It was because he could conceive of the law of Moses not as Mosaic, but simply as legal, that he could find an analogue to it among the Gentiles, and preach to them also a gospel (and the same gospel) which meant emancipation from legalism. The Gentiles, he says, in explaining how it is possible for them to be judged by God, though they have no law (in the sense in which Israel had) yet do by nature the things required by the law, and so display 'the work of the law written in their hearts' (Ro $2^{14f.}$). They have the idea of a task to be done, just as the Jews have; and there is a 'natural legality,' to use an expression of Chalmers, in men which disposes them to aim at achieving righteousness in this way. The first thought of man, Jew or Gentile, is that he will do the things that are required of him,—in other words, keep the law,—and on the ground of what he thus achieves claim as of right the approbation of God. This is what St. Paul means by attaining righteousness ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, by works of law. The Mosaic law is included, but it is included not as Mosaic, but as legal, and it does not exhaust the concept. The law may be the form that haunts the mind of the 'natural legalist' the world over; and to all such alike, Jew or Gentile, St. Paul declares that the way they are treading can never lead to acceptance with God. It does not matter what the special content is which is embodied in the legal form; it may be mainly what we call ritual, as in the Ep. to the Galatians, or mainly what we call ethical, as in the Ep. to the Romans; in no case whatever can statutory obedience constitute a claim on God or command His approbation. 'By works of law shall no flesh be justified in his sight' (Ro 3^{20}).

(β) There is another point to be cleared up in St. Paul's use of the word. There are passages in which 'the law' is used with a genitive in a way which suggests to a modern, perhaps especially to an English reader, that the word is used with some approach to the sense it now bears in physical science. Thus 'the law of sin which is in my members' is interpreted as the sinful mode in which 'my members' normally or habitually act (Ro 7^{23}); similarly also 'the law of the spirit of the life in Christ Jesus' (Ro 8^{2}). But the passage most relied on to prove this sense is Ro 7^{21} εὑρίσκω ἄρα τὸν νόμον, τῷ θέλοντι ἐμοὶ ποιεῖν τὸ καλόν, ὅτι ἐμοὶ τὸ κακὸν παράκειται. This is often interpreted to mean, 'I find therefore this regularly recurrent phenomenon,—this "law" in the sense of modern science,—that when I would do good, evil is present with me' (so Winer, ed. Moulton, p. 697, who renders τὸν νόμον normam; and cf. Meyer or Sanday and Headlam, ad loc.). But the 'law' of modern science belongs to an intellectual world which was not then in being, and there can be little doubt that by εὑρίσκω ἄρα τὸν νόμον St. Paul means to say, 'this is what I find as far as the law is concerned,—I mean well, but am perpetually baffled by the presence of evil.' (So Vaughan). The words τὸν νόμον refer to the law of Moses, under which St. Paul had his experience of legal religion; but it is the experience also of every one who has tried legal religion in any shape, Mosaic or another. So in the other passages referred to above, 'the law' is to be conceived as related to a legislator, and not as in modern physics. 'The law of God' (Ro 7^{22}) is the law which God enjoins; the law 'of the mind' (v.^{23}) is the law which the νοῦς or practical reason of the man prescribes, or the law of God as re-enacted in conscience; the law of sin is the mode of life (not in which sin is normally exhibited, but) which Sin, personified as a rival to God, enjoins upon man and compels him to follow; the law of the Spirit of the life in Christ Jesus is the mode of life (not in which spirit acts automatically, and on the analogy of a physical force, but) which the Spirit authoritatively prescribes, and, as being in its essence impulse as well as law, enables man freely to realize.

There are, however, cases in which the genitive with νόμος is of a different kind, and in which νόμος itself seems to be used in a larger sense, almost= 'religion,' as something instituted by God. Thus in Ro 3^{27} St. Paul says boasting is summarily excluded, and asks διὰ ποίου νόμου; through what sort of law? In other words, What sort of character must we suppose Christianity as a divine institution to possess, in order that this result must follow? Is it to be characterized by works, or by faith? The latter, says St. Paul: the genitives in the verse being those of the characterizing quality. In v.^{31} of the same chapter νόμον is ambiguous. It may refer to the OT religion as a whole; and then the answer to the question, Do we annul (the) Law through faith? would be given in ch. 4, where St. Paul shows that the justification of Christians has its prototype in that of Abraham,—in other words, that the old order is confirmed (ἱστάνομεν), not subverted, by the new. But νόμον may be generic, and the question may mean, Do we then annul Law—all that has ever been known as moral order, all that has ever been supposed to safeguard morality whether of Mosaic or other origin—by our faith, i.e. by our new Christian religion? In this case, the proof of the assertion that we do not annul but establish Law by Faith—that the Christian religion is the only effective guarantee of morality—is given, not in ch. 4, but in chs. 6–8, where Christianity is shown to involve the possession of the Holy Spirit.

(d) We may now proceed to notice more particularly what St. Paul teaches about Law, bearing in mind that it was through the Mosaic law that he obtained the experience out of which he speaks, but that he speaks for the benefit of men who may have had a similar experience although they had never heard of Moses; in other words, that even where he is formally discussing the Law, it is Law itself, in all that is characteristic of it as legal, which he is really concerned with.

(1) As regards its place in history, it is an entirely subordinate thing. The great spiritual powers which have had dominance in the life of man are Sin and Grace; in comparison with them, Law is a minor matter. Sin entered the world (εἰσῆλθεν, Ro 5^{12}), and so did Grace, but Law only παρεισῆλθεν=entered as an accessory, or in a subordinate capacity (Ro 5^{20}). To a Jew, the most important figure in religion was Moses; St. Paul argues that the importance of Moses in the spiritual history of humanity is an entirely inferior thing when compared to that of Adam or of Christ. This is the purport also of the argument in Gal $3^{15ff.}$, where he aims at showing that the Promise—i.e. the Christian religion as it was announced to Abraham, and in a sense imparted to him—was not conditioned by the Law, which came 400 years afterwards, and that not by the immediate act of God, but 'ordained through angels, by the hand of a mediator.' It is not so clear whether St. Paul regarded Law, or the reign of Law, either in its more statutory form as in Israel, or in its vaguer form as present to conscience among the Gentiles, as a positive preparation for the gospel. The figures of the prison-house and the παιδαγωγός in Gal $3^{23f.}$ hardly amount to this. As Lightfoot remarks, 'the tempting explanation of παιδαγωγός εἰς Χριστόν, "one to conduct us to the school of Christ," ought probably to be abandoned.' Εἰς Χριστόν really means 'until Christ came.' During the pre-Christian stage of our life we were 'shut up and kept in ward under the law'; it was our prison and our moral guardian, but St. Paul does not regard it as leading us to Christ. The παιδαγωγός was a slave who had to exercise a certain moral restraint over the boy under his charge; the law, too, was servile, an inferior type of religion, and all it could do by itself was to attempt a similar restraint.

(2) On the mode in which Law acts in the individual who lives under it, St. Paul has much to say. (α) It brings the knowledge, especially the full knowledge (ἐπίγνωσις) of sin, Ro 3^{20} 4^{15}, and esp. $7^{7ff.}$ 'I had not known sin, but through the law,' etc. The description of spiritual experience in Ro 7^{7-25} is not to be mechanically interpreted; it belongs to what may be called 'ideal biography.' It is neither the experience of the regenerate nor of the unregenerate man, but the experience, if one might say so, of the unregenerate man seen through regenerate eyes, interpreted by a regenerate mind; it is individual experience, but universalized; it is not a deposition for a law court, but some kind of essential eternal truth. It contains much of St. Paul's doctrine of the law—a doctrine resting on experience of his own. The starting-point is purely ideal. 'I was alive without the law (χωρὶς νόμου) once.' This is not a date which can be fixed in any one's life. There is not really a golden age, a happy time to which we can look back, when we had no conscience, and therefore no bad conscience. It is, however, the assumed starting-point of the spiritual life for St. Paul. It lasts till its peace is invaded by the Law. When the commandment comes, sin wakes up to life, and the man dies. The prohibition of the Law reveals to man his antagonism to it. The Law comes to him, from without, and it is without: man and the law, the very moment the law appears as such, are discovered to be in some kind of antagonism to each other; conscience first exists as a bad conscience.

(β) The law not only brings the full consciousness of sin, it also brings its doom. The law works wrath, Ro 4^{15}. There is a 'curse of the law' which comes upon all who violate it. To know that one has broken the law is to know that he is subject to this curse. The doom of death stares him in the face. St. Paul nowhere gives an analysis of θάνατος, or κατάρα, or κατάκριμα, or any of the words he uses in this connexion, and it is merely misleading to introduce such distinctions as physical, spiritual, and eternal death to interpret his meaning. That death which is the doom or curse of the law is one awful indivisible thing, which only a despairing conscience can realize, and which is too overwhelming to be the subject of such distinctions. It includes in every case the feeling that God, whose the Law is, is against those who have broken it.

(γ) The Law, according to St. Paul, stimulates sin, and was given for that very purpose. 'The Law came in beside, that the trespass might abound,' Ro 5^{20}. The Law was added τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν, Gal 3^{17}: where 'because of transgressions' must be interpreted on the analogy of Ro 5^{20} ἵνα πλεονάσῃ τὸ παράπτωμα. Cf. also Ro 7^{13} 'that sin through the commandment,' i.e. through the law in one of the injunctions or prohibitions composing it, 'might become exceeding sinful.' This is one of the most daring points in St. Paul's doctrine, yet it rests on the familiar psychological fact that prohibition provokes resistance. When the law—any law whatever—says 'Do not,' there is something in man which is inclined to say 'I will.' The peculiarity is that St. Paul represents God as availing Himself of this characteristic of human nature in order (indirectly) to prepare man for salvation. When he says that the purpose for which Law came in was that the trespass might abound, the purpose is conceived as God's. It is as though God saw that the only way to get man to accept His righteousness was to make him despair of his own, and the way to make him despair of his own was to subject him to a discipline under which the sin that was in him would reveal its exceeding sinfulness, its irresistible tyrannical strength, and annihilate all his hopes. It is in this connexion of ideas that St. Paul says the law is the strength of sin, 1 Co 15^{56}. No doubt it was at this point that his doctrine would seem most impious to a pious Jew. The Law, his adversary would naturally assume, was given to be kept. It was given to guide man in the way of life, to be a light to his feet and a lamp to his path. It was a kind of insanity—so it would seem to him—to represent it as given to stimulate sin, to counteract its own nature, defeat its own purpose, and lead to its own supersession by a new religion. But, in reality, Law is used in two different senses by the parties to this controversy. The Jewish interlocutor whom we have supposed is thinking of the whole OT revelation, which is not necessarily legal at all; St. Paul is thinking of it specifically as legal, as that system of statutes and traditions to which it had been reduced in the Pharisaic circles in which he had been brought up; and he is interpreting God's purpose in giving the law through his own experience—surely an experience in which the hand and purpose of God could be traced—under those conditions. If experience proved anything, it proved that God could mean nothing by the law (as St. Paul had known it) except to make a full revelation of sin. It was not meant to bring salvation, it was meant to bring despair.

(δ) But though the law acts in this paradoxical way, and does so in pursuance of God's purpose, God is not to blame for the sin which is multiplied, nor is the character of the law itself in the least degree compromised. The law is spiritual and holy. Both πνευματικός and ἅγιος are words which indicate the connexion of the law with God. The commandment, the prohibition or precept in which the law expresses itself, is holy (=divine), just (=answering to the relations which subsist between God and man, or between men themselves), and good (=morally beneficent). The explanation of the disastrous working of the law (disastrous, though God's grace makes it an indirect preparation for the gospel) is to be found in man himself, and especially in his nature as flesh: 'I am σάρκινος, a creature of flesh, sold under sin,' Ro 7^{14}.

The law, perhaps, ought to be able to do for us something quite different from what it actually does; but it cannot do that other thing; it is weak 'through the flesh,' Ro 8^3. St. Paul nowhere explains how the flesh has come to have this peculiar, native, invincible antipathy to the law, and this is not the place to inquire; it is enough to notice that it is on his conception (which like all his other conceptions is not an abstract but an experimental one) of what the flesh is, that the most characteristic part of his doctrine of the law depends. It is because the flesh is what it is that the law stimulates sin, plunges man into despair, and so prepares him for the gospel, i.e. for a divine righteousness to which 'works of law' contribute nothing, though witness is borne to it 'by the law and the prophets.' The flesh and the law together explain the universal need and the universal craving for redemption.

(3) It is necessary, however, to define the relation of law and gospel more closely. It is true that the law contributes nothing to the gospel: no statutory obedience whatsoever enters into the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ preached by St. Paul to sinners whom the law has brought to despair. But the law is not ignored by the gospel. It is God's law. It is enforced by the most terrible sanctions: its sentence of condemnation, its curse, its doom of death, are awful realities, and cannot simply be passed by. Nor in St. Paul's gospel are they passed by. The very heart of that gospel is Christ's relation to the law—His relation to the law, not merely as a law which issues commandments, but as a law which has pronounced sentence upon man. When Christ is said to be made under law, to redeem them that are under law, it is this which is in view: St. Paul has a gospel to preach to men under the condemnation of the law, because that condemnation has been taken on Himself by Christ. This is the idea which explains all the formulæ the apostle uses in describing the redeeming work of Christ, and which explains above all the fact that the redeeming work of Christ is so constantly identified with His death. Death is the doom of sin, the sanction, the curse, the sentence of the law; and in dying for us Christ recognized without abatement the utmost claims of the law as expressive of the holy will of God. It is in this sense that He is said to have become a curse for us, and to have been made sin for us by God; it is in this sense also that God is said in Him to have condemned sin in the flesh. All these passages (Gal 3^{13} $4^{4ff.}$, 2 Co 5^{21}, Ro 8^3) describe the same thing: the absolute honour paid to the law by Christ in freely submitting to that death in which the law's condemnation of humanity is expressed.

We do not discredit this connexion of ideas by saying that death is merely physical, and that the conception of it as the doom of sin is fantastic or mythological. Nothing that happens to man is merely physical. All that happens to a spiritual being has in the last resort a spiritual meaning; and when death is interpreted (not through its physiological antecedents or conditions, but as it must be by the philosopher, the moralist, and the theologian) through the conscience, it will be hard to find for it any other significance than that which St. Paul accepts. It is the dreadful experience in which conscience sees not the debt of nature, but the wages of sin; and it is as such that Christ is conceived as submitting to it.

The same holds of the more elaborate passage Ro 3^{21-26}. Christ is there represented as set forth 'as a propitiation, . . . in his blood, with a view to demonstrate God's righteousness, owing to the passing by of foregone sins in the forbearance of God.' The idea is that God's treatment of sin hitherto—His suspense of judgment—cast a shadow on His righteousness: it might be questioned whether God was really concerned about the difference between right and wrong. But at the cross His righteousness has been cleared from this shadow. How? Because there the doom of sin has fallen upon His own Son. Nothing could show more conclusively that God was inexorable, irreconcilable to sin—that God's law was an inviolable law. There is nothing in the argument of Weiss (Comm. on Ro 3^{25}) that punishment and propitiation are alternatives between which God had to choose, but which had nothing to do with each other. God chose to make propitiation for the sin of the world, and He did it, according to St. Paul,—not in this passage only, but in all the others cited above,—in the following way: He sent His Son to take the sin of the world upon Him in all those consequences of it in which His condemnation and the sanctity of His law are expressed, and especially, therefore, in death. Death in Christ's case has propitiatory significance,—in other words, it is the basis of gospel,—because it is the bearing of sin, the full recognition, in their full extent, of the Law's claims upon man. To dissolve the relation between the Death of Christ and the sentence of the Law—to take the curse and condemnation out of the Cross—is to annihilate the gospel as St. Paul understood it. It is essential to a doctrine of atonement that it should in this sense at least 'establish the law.'

(4) But the question remains, What is the relation of the Christian to the Law, or to law in general? Much of the paradox of St. Paul's teaching gathers round this point. In all religion, of course, from the point of view of ethics, there is something paradoxical. It belongs to religion, as such, to transcend the ethical point of view, yet to conserve and promote, indeed to be the only effective means of conserving and promoting, ethical interests. Hence moralists are the most severe, if at times the most inept, critics of religion, and St. Paul's idealism and his paradoxes together provoked and still provoke infinite comment. Yet his position is quite clear. On the one hand, the Christian has nothing more to do with law in any way. 'I through law died to law that I might live to God.' An exhaustive experiment of living under law convinced him that there was neither life nor righteousness to be found that way, and he was done with law for ever. 'I am crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me.' The old end of life is not renounced; his aim is still righteousness; but the old means are renounced. Righteousness is not to be achieved out of his own resources, and brought to God for His approval; it is to be the work of Christ dwelling in him through His Spirit. Law was weak through the flesh, and could not do what was wanted; but the Spirit is stronger than the flesh, and can secure in spite of it what the law failed to secure; in us (Christians), as we walk not after the flesh but after the spirit, 'the just demand (τὸ δικαίωμα) of the law' is fulfilled, Ro 8^4. Sin has not dominion over us, for we are not under law (the working of which has been explained above under 2 (γ)), but under grace; law only enslaves to sin; but grace gives the quickening spirit and liberates.

Hence in the Christian religion, as St. Paul understood it, nothing statutory could have any place. To give a legal authority to any formal precept, ethical or ritual, is to shut the door of hope, and open again the door of despair. It is to contemn the Spirit, which is Christ's gift, and the cross, by which He won it, and to renounce the liberty with which He has made us free. St. Paul was not an *anti*nomian (for the just demand of the law is to be fulfilled in all Christians), but he was certainly an *a*nomian. He recognizes no law in the Church but the law of the spirit of the life in Christ Jesus, and while that is both law and impulse it is essentially personal, and can never be reduced to statutory form. He can speak of Christianity indeed (to which circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing) as 'the keeping of the commandments of God,' 1 Co 7^{19}; but all legalism is eliminated when the law is described as having its fulfilment in love, Ro 13^{10}, Gal 5^{14}, and 'the law of Christ' is explained as 'bearing each other's burdens,' Gal 6^{2}. Legalism, in short, and Christianity (life in the Spirit) are to St. Paul mutually exclusive ideas; and though in a formally constituted society, i.e. in sense a corporation in the eye of the law, a legal creed and a legal organization might become necessary, the idea that the existence of Christianity depended upon them could only have seemed to him a fatal contradiction of all that Christianity meant.

(e) At the close of his third mission, St. Paul came again to Jerusalem. He had with him the collection from the Gentile Churches, and was most eager to maintain brotherly relations between the Gentile and the Jewish sections of Christendom, though he had grave misgivings as to what might happen. Cf. Ac $21^{17ff.}$, 2 Co 8 and 9, Ro $15^{25ff.}$. The opposition to his 'lawless' Christianity, which had followed him in all his churches and been combated in his four great Epistles, had been busy in Jerusalem also. The native Christians there were devoted in their attachment to the law in its national aspects (πάντες ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου, Ac 21^{20}). They had been sedulously instructed (κατηχήθησαν) that St. Paul was teaching the Jews who lived abroad to apostatize from the law, neither circumcising their children nor keeping the traditional customs. This was undoubtedly the logic of St. Paul's gospel, though there is no evidence, apart from this unscrupulous assertion, that St. Paul ever sought to denationalize his countrymen; and it is a fair question whether St. James and his elders did not ask him to do something which would leave an essentially false impression when they asked him to associate himself with certain men in a vow, that all might know that none of the things which they had been drilled to believe about him were true, and that he himself also in his conduct was an observer of the law (v.^{24}). Probably, in yielding to this request, St. Paul was carrying to an extreme the conciliatory principles of 1 Co $9^{20ff.}$; but the tumult which ended in his imprisonment and transference to Rome prevented any further development of the controversy about law between the apostle and the Jewish Christian party.

(f) The later Epistles hardly enable us to add anything of importance. In Eph the law as a national institute—the law of commandments contained in ordinances, cf. Col 2^{14}—is regarded as a dividing wall between Jew and Gentile; it has been broken down and annulled by the death of Christ, and with it the enmity which severed the two great branches of the human family; they are now one new man. In Col what St. Paul has to deal with is a movement which in its requirements resembles the ritualistic legalism with which he had been confronted in Galatia; the difference is that in Galatia the legalism attached itself directly to the law of Moses, in Colossæ it seemed to be connected with some philosophical or theosophical system, possibly of Essene affinities, and therefore more exacting in its demands than the letter of Moses' law. Cf. Col $2^{16ff.}$. St. Paul was equally irreconcilable to it in both cases, and for the same reason. As dead with Christ, the Christian was dead to that whole mode of being, that whole conception of life, which allowed order to be prescribed from without. It was worse, of course, when the multiplied prohibitions, 'Touch not, taste not, handle not,' had no divine sanction (as the Mosaic law had) or even the pretence of it, but were merely a tradition of men. The conscience which has received the Spirit of Christ is shirking its own responsibilities when it allows others to lay down the law for it. To be perfectly free, and to take the whole responsibility of freedom, is the only way to wholesome morality and to Christian sanctification. 'Therefore let no one judge you in eating or drinking, or in respect of a festival or new moon or Sabbath.' All laws and customs as such tend to extinguish the feeling of personal responsibility, to blunt the keenness of individual conscience: hence to bind them on the conscience, in their character as legal and customary, is antichristian. In Ph 3^{1-11} there is a sudden fierce flash, provoked we cannot tell how, of the ideas and temper that belong to the great controversial Epistles. In the Pastoral Epp., which represent a considerably later date, we can see that questions connected with law still engaged attention, though there is nothing indicative either of the passion or the interest in principle which characterize the earlier years of the apostle. Titus (3^{9}) is warned to decline μάχας νομικάς, as though the whole subject were practically settled; and we catch the same half-contemptuous tone in 1 Ti 1^{7}, where persons are referred to, Judaizing no doubt, who wish to be νομοδιδάσκαλοι though they have no idea of the functions of law. It may be questioned whether the two verses following come up to the insight of Ro 7, but they have their own truth, and probably served the writer's purpose. When the battle was practically over, and the victory won, even St. Paul may have expressed himself in this almost indifferent commonplace; perhaps he despaired of gaining access to the general mind for any profounder statement of the truth. The legalism of the persons who forbade to marry and commanded to abstain from meats (1 Ti 4^{3}) cannot have been Mosaic, but must have been of some philosophical type, akin to that found in Colossæ.

III. THE LAW IN THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.—The Pauline affinities of the Ep. to the Hebrews cannot be denied, but the conception of law in it is very different. Law here is sometimes expressly the law of Moses (7^{28} 9^{19} 10^{28}), but it is regarded not so much as a set of statutes to be punctually obeyed, as a religious constitution under which the nation had to worship. Cf. the use of the verb νομοθετεῖν in 7^{11} 8^{6}. The fundamental idea of the book is that there is one people of God through all ages, though it has stood at different times in different relations to Him. Its relation to God, its nearness or distance, depends on the kind of priesthood it has; and when the priesthood is changed there is necessarily also a change of law: that is, the religious constitution is altered, 7^{12}. The old law—the religious constitution under which the people of God lived when mediation was that of the Levitical priesthood—'made nothing perfect' (7^{19}); there was no absolute or final religion then, no purgation of conscience, no sure immediate joyful access to God. Christianity, on the other hand—the religious constitution under which the people of God live now, when mediation is that of the Melchizedek priest, the Son of God—is the τελείωσις of what was promised of old. The new covenant is legally constituted on the basis of better promises (8^{6}). It has, with the definite outline of reality, the good things of which the law had only a shadow (10^{1}).

There is nothing in St. Paul which exactly corresponds to this: not even in Col 2^{17}, still less in what he says of the promise in Gal 3 or of the promises in 2 Co 1^{20}. In fact, we do not find in St. Paul any conception of Leviticalism as possessing a religious significance, as dealing even in a pathetically disappointing way with spiritual necessities in man, which would find their adequate satisfaction only in Christ. In the Ep. to the Hebrews Christ is still regarded as making propitiation for sins (2^{17}), but His death is not put, so prominently as in St. Paul, in relation to the Law. Yet in $10^{5\text{ff.}}$, where such emphasis is laid on Christ's obedience, it is to be noted (see v.^{10}) that the obedience required of Christ is specifically that of a Redeemer: i.e. ex hypothesi, the obedience of One who becomes one with the sinful not only in nature but in experience and in lot (one of the leading thoughts of the Epistle, cf. $2^{10\text{-}18}$), taking on Himself their flesh and blood, their temptations and discipline, the whole burden, curse, and doom of their sins, and so setting them free. Yet the difference between the conception of Law here and in St. Paul is seen in this, that while St. Paul expresses the result of this redemptive death by δικαιοῦν, in Hebrews it is expressed by ἁγιάζειν. In other words, the result to St. Paul is that there is no condemnation, the claim of the Law against the individual is annulled; to the writer to the Hebrews the result is that worship is made possible; the soul is able now, as it was not before, to draw near to God; true religion is put within its reach. This distinction justifies us, after all, in saying that the distinction between moral and ritual law belongs to the NT. St. Paul does mainly think of law as moral—God's demand for righteousness; Hebrews thinks of it as ritual—the medium through which or the constitution under which we worship. But in both cases the law comes to an end with the gospel. Christ finishes it as a way of attaining righteousness, Ro 10^{4}. Hebrews finishes it also as a mode of worshipping God, $13^{10\text{ff.}}$.

IV. THE LAW IN THE OTHER NT BOOKS.—Among the remaining books of the NT, those which exhibit most indications of the controversy which had raged between Jewish and Gentile Christians are the Apocalypse and the Ep. of James. In the former (2^{20}) the Church in Thyatira is threatened because it tolerates 'the woman Jezebel who . . . teaches and seduces my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things offered to idols,' i.e. to violate the compact of Ac $15^{28\text{f.}}$, cf. Rev 2^{24}. There may have been a spurious, antinomian influence at work here, which appealed to St. Paul's name, but it is absurd (with Renan, Saint Paul, pp. 303, 367, L'Antechrist, p. 363 ff.) to regard this as a denunciation of St. Paul's doctrine. Although, too, the Apocalypse lays great stress on works, it never regards them as having the character of statutory acts of obedience: in other words, they are not legal. They are the works of Jesus (2^{26}), and are co-ordinated in 2^{19} with love, faith, ministry, and patience (Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 465). A favourite expression for the Christian life (the keeping of the commandments of God, 12^{17} 14^{12}, cf. 3^{8}) is probably borrowed, like other things in the Apoc., from St. Paul (1 Co 7^{19}). The conception of a reward (22^{12} 11^{18}) no more proves legalism in the author of this book than in Jesus Himself (Mt 5^{11}). If there is a future which is determined according to man's works, and this is the teaching not of Apoc. only but of the whole NT, it is neither legal nor servile, but only sane to let it tell on the present life. In the Gospel of St. John the numerous references to the law, with the exception of 1^{17}, have no religious interest; and there it is contrasted with the gospel as a less perfect revelation, grace and truth (חֶסֶד וֶאֱמֶת) being the essential attributes of God.

The Ep. of James is more difficult. It has often been treated as a document of legal Christianity, the aim of which is to refute the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith apart from works of law. But it is remarkable that the critical passage ($2^{14\text{-}26}$), in which faith and works are discussed in their relation to each other, never once uses the Pauline expression ἔργα νόμου. If the writer is controverting St. Paul, it must be admitted that he has not grasped the Pauline point of view, and that Luther's verdict on his work was justified. His conception of faith is not the same as St. Paul's, and that is why he has to supplement it by works; and the works by which it is supplemented, and in which indeed it is exhibited, are not what St. Paul meant by works of law. They are not acts of obedience to any statutory embodiment of divine will. As illustrated in v.$^{15\text{ff.}}$ they are rather what St. Paul would have called fruits of the Spirit. They are, if we choose to say so, the fulfilment of a law, but the writer takes care that we do not conceive the law legally. It is a law which must be actually obeyed, no doubt, but it is also the law of liberty (1^{25} 2^{12}), which Christians freely and spontaneously fulfil; it is condensed, as in the teaching of Jesus, Mt 22^{40}, into the 'royal law,' Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; and it is perfect. The law, in short, is the same as the word of God, and to St. James this is not external and preceptive. There is a native affinity between man and the word; when he receives it, it becomes an implanted word, a thing that strikes root in his nature and has power to save his soul (1^{21}). With this word God has begotten him; it is in his heart, as Jesus promises, spirit and life (Jn 6^{63}); the law, that is, is impulse as well as law to the Christian, and the keeping of it is perfect freedom. Formally a contradiction of Paulinism, it is at bottom the same kind of experience which is here described. To St. Paul Christianity is a new religious relation to God, which he defines by contrast to legalism; to St. James it is rather a new ethical life, which he describes in terms of law, but of law from which legalism has been eliminated. See, further, JAMES (EPISTLE OF).

The conception of St. James is that from which the phenomena of nascent Catholicism can best be understood, and this is a strong argument for putting the book late. In the other Catholic Epistles Law is not mentioned, but it is clear from Jude, 2 P and 1 Jn, that there were tendencies to antinomianism at work in many places. Such tendencies seem inseparable from every revival of religion, religion, as already remarked, transcending even while it guarantees morality. To counteract them without reintroducing legalism and lapsing from a Christian to a pre-Christian type of religion, was not easy; and the use of νόμος by St. James, the habit of conceiving the OT as a revelation of God's will for the ordering of life, and of regarding Jesus as the Legislator by whom the revelation was made perfect, led inevitably and not slowly to the conception of Christianity itself as a new law. This conception is common to Christian writers from Barnabas onward. The new law might have been, and at first was, akin to 'the law of liberty' in St. James, 'the law of faith,' 'the law of Christ,' 'the law of the spirit of the life in Christ Jesus' in St. Paul; but as the Church became a State, and orthodoxy took the place of inspiration, the new law was correspondingly degraded, and in the early and the mediæval Catholic Church the very idea of spiritual liberty was lost. The religious idealism of St. Paul was far above out of its sight, and it was not till the Church was born again in the 16th cent. that the gospel, which brings a righteousness of God to which works of law contribute nothing, fairly found access into the human mind.

LAWGIVER occurs six times in AV of OT (Gn 49^{10}, Nu 21^{18}, Dt 33^{21}, Ps $60^{7\,[\text{Heb. }9]}=108^{8\,[\text{Heb. }9]}$, Is 33^{22}) and once in NT (Ja 4^{12}). In the OT it is the tr^{n} of מְחֹקֵק, in NT of νομοθέτης. The root חקק means 'to cut in,' 'inscribe,' 'engrave,' and hence, from the practice of inscribing a decree (חֹק, חֻקָּה) upon tablets [see LAW (IN OT) above, p. 67^{a}], 'to enact or command.' Thus we find in Jg 5^{9} חוֹקְקֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל = 'the commanders of Israel.' The Po'el ptcp. מְחֹקֵק appears to have two distinct senses: (a) that of 'leader,' 'commander' ('lawgiver' is too narrow a term, especially as in the mind of the English reader it is associated so closely with the Mosaic law). This is the meaning of the word in Dt 33^{21} ('a commander's portion was reserved'), where it is used of the leader of the warlike tribe of Gad; in Jg 5^{14} ('out of Machir came forth leaders' [מְחֹקְקִים ‖ חוֹקְקִים of v.^{9}]); and in Is 33^{22}, where מְחֹקְקֵנוּ 'our lawgiver' (LXX ἄρχων) is used in parallelism with שֹׁפְטֵנוּ 'our judge' and מַלְכֵּנוּ 'our king.' (b) The other meaning which it appears to be necessary to postulate is that of 'ruler's or commander's staff,' which it would bear in Gn 49^{10} (where מְחֹקֵק is parallel with שֵׁבֶט), 'The [royal ?] sceptre shall not depart from Judah nor the ruler's staff from between his feet'; in Nu 21^{18} (‖ מִשְׁעֲנֹת 'staff'), where RV 'with the sceptre' is plainly more appropriate as a rendering of בִּמְחֹקֵק than AV and RVm 'by direction or order of the lawgiver' (LXX ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ αὐτῶν, Vulg. in datore legis); and in Ps $60^{7}=108^{8}$ 'Judah is my sceptre,' although LXX has βασιλεύς 'king' (similarly Pesh. and Vulgate).

The most controverted of the above passages is Gn 49^{10}. For וּמְחֹקֵק מִבֵּין רַגְלָיו the LXX has καὶ ἡγούμενος ἐκ τῶν μηρῶν αὐτοῦ, Vulg. et dux de femore ejus, Targ. Onk. וספרא מבני בנוהי, all three taking מְחֹקֵק in a personal sense, and understanding מִבֵּין רַגְלָיו to be a promise of an unbroken succession of descendants. But the parallelism between מְחֹקֵק and שֵׁבֶט demands that these two words have similar senses (the LXX is consistent in this respect, rendering שבט by ἄρχων); and as there can be little doubt that '(royal ?) sceptre' is the meaning of שֵׁבֶט, 'ruler's staff' seems a very appropriate sense for מְחֹקֵק. Then again the expression מִבֵּין רַגְלָיו, which is parallel to מִיהוּדָה, may mean 'from before him' (cf. בֵּין רַגְלֶיהָ used of Jael in Jg 5^{27}), referring to 'the actual position of the long staff, grasped in the right hand as the chief walks or stands still' (Ball in SBOT, ad loc.). The mention of the 'feet' rather than the hands Ball explains as due to the fact that it is not a short ornamental sceptre that is in view but a long staff reaching to the ground, and he compares the Egyp. hieroglyph for 'great man,' 'chief,' 'king' (ura), which is a figure holding the staff as described above. He notes, further, that similar insignia of authority are still carried by the Bedawin sheikhs and headmen of villages, and considers that the idea of a sitting figure, with the staff held between the feet, as seen in some ancient sculptures, does not harmonize so well with the context which suggests movement. In any case the meaning of the couplet, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah nor the ruler's staff from before him,' appears to be that Judah is to retain the hegemony among the tribes of Israel (or probably the royalty [note שֵׁבֶט absolutely]), עד כי יבא שילה, on the meaning of which last words see art. SHILOH, and cf., above all, Driver in Camb. Journ. of Philology, xiv. (1885), and in Expositor, July 1885, p. 10 ff. See also Dillm. and Spurrell, ad loc.

The only NT occurrence of 'lawgiver' is, as we have said, in Ja 4^{12}, where νομοθέτης is coupled with κριτής, the two terms being used of God as at once the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge. This is the only instance in which νομοθέτης is used in the NT, although the verb νομοθετέω occurs in He 7^{11} 8^{6} and the noun νομοθεσία in Ro 9^{4}, in all these three passages the reference being directly or implicitly to the giving of the law to Israel.

On the work of Moses as the lawgiver of Israel see LAW (IN OT), above, p. 66, and MOSES.

LAWYER (νομικός).—In the NT the name usually given to the scribes is γραμματεύς (man of letters); but νομικός ('lawyer') and νομοδιδάσκαλος ('doctor of the law') are also occasionally used. Of the two latter terms, the second is found only in Lk 5^{17}, Ac 5^{34}, and 1 Ti 1^{7} (where it is used of would-be teachers of the law in the Christian Church); while the first occurs most frequently in Lk (7^{30} 10^{25} $11^{45.\,46.\,52}$ 14^{3}), once in Mt (22^{35}), and nowhere else in the NT except in Tit 3^{13}. A comparison of Lk 5^{17} with v.^{21} and Mk 2^{6} Mt 9^{3} shows that the three terms were used synonymously, and did not denote three distinct classes. The scribes were originally simply men of letters, students of Scripture, and the name at first given to them contains in itself no reference to the law; in course of time, however, they devoted themselves mainly, though by no means exclusively, to the study of the law; they became jurists rather than theologians, and received names which of themselves called attention to that fact. Some would doubtless devote themselves more to one branch of activity than to another; but a 'lawyer' might also be a 'doctor'; and the case of Gamaliel shows that a 'doctor' might also be a member of the Sanhedrin (Ac 5^{34}).

Long before the time of our Saviour, the law, written and oral, had become the absolute norm of Jewish life. Every detail of life, civil as well as religious, was regulated in the minutest manner by the law. It was impossible for the ordinary Jew to be fully acquainted with the innumerable statutes referring, e.g., to Levitical purity or the keeping of the Sabbath, and to apply them to the fresh cases that emerged daily; and yet his standing before God depended upon his scrupulous observance of these statutes. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that a special class of men should devote themselves expressly to the study of the law. These were the 'scribes,' 'lawyers,' or 'doctors of the law.'

(a) Their first and main function was to study and expound the law, including the innumerable 'traditions of the fathers'; they had so to explain it as to show its application to the circumstances of the present time; for every new case that occurred they had to find out some pertinent statute or precedent; and, in the absence of such a statute or precedent, they had to deduce some rule from their knowledge of what was legal.

They were thus men whose special calling it was to know what was legal.

(b) Their special knowledge of the law naturally qualified them for holding the office of judge; and in all probability the members of the various Sanhedrins throughout the country were chosen, as far as possible, from among their number. From such passages as Mt 16^{21} 20^{18} 21^{15} 27^{41}, Mk 8^{31} 11^{27} $14^{43.53}$ 15^{1}, Lk 9^{22} 20^{1} 22^{66}, Ac 4^{5}, in which they are named among the supreme Jewish authorities, it is evident that some of them were members of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem. Though they had no official standing in the synagogues, their knowledge of the Scriptures generally and of the law in particular would lead to their being the principal speakers in religious assemblies (Mk 1^{22}).

(c) The teaching of the law was also one of their essential functions. In the time of our Saviour there were special academies (beth hammidrash) in various parts of the Jewish world; in Jerusalem certain halls and rooms of the outer court of the temple were set apart for this purpose (cf. Lk 2^{46}). The pupils sat in a semicircle round their teacher, who also sat on a slightly raised bench. The teaching was mostly oral and catechetical; it consisted mainly of a constant repetition of the various 'traditions of the fathers' dealing with all manner of real and imaginary cases; the pupils were encouraged to put questions to their teachers; they also attended the discussions that leading Rabbis held among themselves, and were probably also allowed to be present at meetings of the Sanhedrin.

For their judicial and teaching activity the 'lawyers' or 'doctors' were understood to receive no payment. Some of them would therefore maintain themselves by following a trade (cf. Ac 18^{3}), and doubtless many men of means would adopt a profession which was almost universally held in the very highest esteem. They were not, however, always so unselfish as Jewish sources represent them (cf. Mk 12^{40}=Lk 20^{47}). They were also exceedingly ambitious of honour (Mt 23^{5-11}, Mk $12^{38.39}$, Lk $11^{43.45}$ 20^{46}). More especially they demanded, and received, such honour from their pupils. According to the Talmud, one's teacher is to be more reverenced and honoured than one's father, if the latter is not also a man of learning; 'for his father has only brought him into this world, while his teacher, who teaches him wisdom, brings him to life in the future world' (quoted in Schürer, HJP II. i. 317). LAY.—An abrupt use of the simple verb to lay is found in Mt 8^{14} 'He saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever.' It is a literal tr. of the Gr. βεβλημένην καὶ πυρέσσουσαν; RV gives 'lying sick,' ignoring the καὶ. The full form occurs in Mk 7^{30} 'She found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed' (βεβλημένην ἐπὶ τῆς κλίνης (edd. τὸ παιδίον βεβλημένον ἐπὶ τὴν κλίνην)). Cf. Ac 13^{36} 'David . . . fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers' (προσετέθη πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας αὐτοῦ). Hall, Works, ii. 52, says, 'His servant is sick; he doth not drive him out of doores, but layes him at home.'

The simple verb to lay is used in Jon 3^{6} in the sense of 'lay aside,' 'He arose from his throne and he laid his robe from him.' The expression is irregular, and due to the word 'from' following.

To lay means to 'impute' in Job 24^{12} 'God layeth not folly to them' (לֹא־יָשִׂים, RV 'imputeth it not for folly'; cf. 1 S 22^{15} 'Let not the king impute anything unto his servant,' Heb. אַל־יָשֵׂם). So Jonson, Sejanus, ii. 1—

> 'So prepare the poison
> As you may lay the subtle operation
> Upon some natural disease of his.'

Some phrases demand attention: 1. Lay along, see ALONG. 2. Lay apart, Ja 1^{21} 'Wherefore lay apart all filthiness' (ἀποθέμενοι, RV 'putting away,' a metaphor from the putting off of clothes—Mayor). 3. Lay at, meaning 'strike at,' Job 41^{26} 'The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold.' Cf. Holland, Suetonius' Caligula, c. 25, 'With her perilous fingers shee would not sticke to lay at the face and eyes of other small Children playing together with her.' 4. Lay away, i.e. lay aside, Ezk 26^{16} 'Then all the princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, and lay away their robes'; Ad. Est 14^{2} 'Esther . . . laid away her glorious apparel.' Cf. Spenser, FQ I. viii. 49—

> 'Such the sight
> Of fowle Duessa, when her borrowed light
> Is laid away, and counterfesaunce knowne.'

5. Lay down, meaning to stake or deposit, Job 17^{3} 'Lay down now (שִׂימָה נָּא, RV 'Give now a pledge'), put me in a surety with thee.' Cf. Is 14^{15}, Cov. 'Yet darre I laye, that thou shalt be brought downe to the depe of hell.' 6. Lay hands on. The verb κρατέω 'to gain power over,' 'seize,' is so tr^{d} in Mt 18^{28} 21^{46}, and πιάζω 'to seize,' 'capture,' in Jn 8^{20}. For κρατέω RV prefers the more modern 'lay hold of,' and for πιάζω 'take.' 7. Lay open, Pr 13^{16} 'A fool layeth open his folly' (RV 'spreadeth out,' as AVm). Cf. Fuller, Holy Warre, v. 2 (p. 231), 'I will lay open my cause, and justice shall be done without any by-respect.' 8. Lay out, 2 K 12^{11} 'And they gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work . . . and they laid it out to the carpenters and builders,' a compromise between the Gen. version 'payed it out' and the literal tr^{n} 'brought it forth,' RV 'paid it out.' 9. Lay wait occurs often. The more modern form 'lie in wait' is also found, as well as 'laying await' and 'laying of wait.' See WAIT.

J. HASTINGS.

LAYING ON OF HANDS (ἐπίθεσις χειρῶν, Vulg. impositio manus or manuum), Ac 8^{18}, 1 Ti 4^{14}, 2 Ti 1^{6}, He 6^{2}.—The ceremony thus described is mentioned frequently both in OT and NT, where it appears in connexion with religious acts of widely different character.

i. OLD TESTAMENT.—(a) It occurs as a symbol of benediction in Gn $48^{14ff.}$ 'Israel stretched out his right hand and laid it (וַיָּשֶׁת, ἐπέβαλεν[*]) upon Ephraim's head . . . and Joseph said . . . Put (שִׂים, ἐπίθες) thy right hand upon his (Manasseh's) head.' In giving the high priestly blessing to the congregation 'Aaron lifted up his hands toward the people' (Lv 9^{22} וַיִּשָּׂא, ἐξάρας); but the action, though ritually distinct,[†] seems to have had in this case the same significance as the imposition of hands upon an individual (cf. Nu 6^{27} ἐπιθήσουσιν τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐπὶ τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰσραήλ, καὶ ἐγὼ Κύριος εὐλογήσω αὐτούς). (b) The laying on of hands occupies an important place in the sacrificial system of P (Ex $29^{10.15.19}$, Lv $1^{4.11}$ (LXX) $3^{2.8.13}$ $4^{4.24.29.33}$ 8^{14-18} 16^{21}; cf. 2 Ch 29^{23}). It is prescribed in the case of (1) the bullock and the rams offered at the consecration of Aaron and his sons; (2) private offerings of quadrupeds on all occasions;[‡] (3) sin offerings made on behalf of the whole congregation, in the event of a common ἀγνόημα; (4) the goat 'let go for Azazel.' (c) Witnesses laid their hands on the head of a person charged with a capital offence (Lv 24^{14}, Sus ^{34}). (d) The tribe of Levi at their dedication received imposition of hands from representative members of the other tribes (Nu 8^{10}). (e) Moses appointed Joshua to be his successor in the same manner (Nu $27^{18.\,23}$, Dt 34^{9}). In all these cases except (a), סמך, LXX ἐπιτιθέναι, is used.

[*] ἐπιβαλεῖν τὰς χεῖρας usually—in the NT always—implies hostile action.

[†] Cf. Dict. Chr. Ant. i. p. 757 f.

[‡] See Dillmann on Lv 1^{4} 7^{2}.

It is not easy to grasp the common idea which underlies the various OT uses of this primitive ceremony. In (a) and (e) the laying on of hands seems to denote the imparting of a personal gift or function; see Dt, l.c. 'Joshua . . . was full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands upon him.'[*] But in (b), (c), (d) the prominent thought is that of the devotion to God of the object on which hands are laid, to which must perhaps be added in the case of certain offerings the idea of a transfer of responsibility or guilt to the victim (Lv 16^{21}: cf., however, Schultz, OT Theology, Eng. tr. i. p. 391 ff., and W. R. Smith, RS^{2} p. 422 f.). On the whole, it would appear that the fundamental meaning of the symbol was identification by contact, with the subsidiary idea of transference, whether from man to man, or from man to God. By laying his hands on a child or disciple, the patriarch or prophet signified that he desired to impart to the younger life powers or gifts which had been committed to himself; by laying his hand on an offering, the offerer solemnly identified himself with the victim which he dedicated to the service of God; by laying their hands on the head of a criminal, the witnesses of the crime delivered him over to judgment.

ii. NEW TESTAMENT.—(a) This symbol was once employed by our Lord in an act of benediction (Mt $19^{13.\,15}$=Mk $10^{13.\,16}$=Lk 18^{15}): 'then were there brought unto him little children that he should lay his hands on them and pray . . . and he laid his hands on them.' As the desire originated with the friends of the children, it must have had its origin in the custom of the time (cf. Buxtorf, de Synag. p. 138). The blessing of the ascending Lord was given to the Eleven in the manner prescribed to Aaron (Lk 24^{50} ἐπάρας τὰς χεῖρας αὐτοῦ εὐλόγησεν αὐτούς). (b) Our Lord habitually laid His hands on the sick as a sign of healing (Mt 9^{18}=Mk 5^{23}, Mk 6^{5} 7^{32} $8^{23.\,25}$, Lk 4^{40} 13^{13}); we may probably add the passages where ἅπτεσθαι is used in similar contexts with or without ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα (Mt 8^{3}=Mk 1^{41}, Lk 5^{13}, Mt 8^{15} 9^{29} 20^{34}, Mk 7^{33}, Lk 22^{51}).[†] This practice was continued by the apostles and their followers ('Mk' 16^{18}, Ac $9^{12.\,17}$; cf. Irenæus, ap. Eus. HE v. 7, τοὺς κάμνοντας διὰ τῆς τῶν χειρῶν ἐπιθέσεως ἰῶνται). (c) The Apostles used the laying on of hands with prayer in the act of imparting the Holy Spirit to the baptized (Ac $8^{17.\,19}$ 19^{6}). The Lord had breathed upon them when He communicated the Spirit (Jn 20^{22}), and this ἐμφύσησις was peculiarly appropriate (Jn 3^{7}, cf. Gn 2^{7}); but as it symbolized a divine power and a personal relation to the Spirit of God which was incommunicable, no attempt was made to repeat it; when the Apostles passed on to other believers the gifts which they had received, they were guided to the ordinary symbol of benediction. It is to this use of the imposition of hands that reference appears to be made in He 6^{2} βαπτισμῶν διδαχὴν ἐπιθέσεώς τε χειρῶν (cf. v.^{4} φωτισθέντας γευσαμένους τε τῆς δωρεᾶς, κ.τ.λ.). (d) The imposition of hands was also used by the Apostolic Church on certain occasions when members of the Church were set apart to a particular office or work (Ac 6^{6} 13^{3}, 1 Ti 4^{14}, 2 Ti 1^{6}). The occasions specified are those of the appointment of the Seven, the sending forth of Barnabas and Saul, and the subsequent sending forth of Timothy to accompany St. Paul (Hort, Ecclesia, p. 215 f.). Of the use of the rite in the ordination of presbyters and deacons there is no direct evidence, if we except 1 Ti 5^{22} (on which see below); for in Ac 14^{23} χειροτονεῖν doubtless refers to the election of presbyters in the various churches, and not to the ceremony of their admission to office. Nevertheless, as Dr. Hort points out, 'Jewish usage in the case of Rabbis and their disciples[*] renders it highly probable that (as a matter of fact) laying on of hands was largely practised in the Ecclesiæ of the apostolic age as a rite introductory to ecclesiastical office.' In the post-apostolic Church the rite was practically universal; the exceptions which have been observed admit of an intelligible explanation.[†] (e) The context of 1 Ti 5^{22} (χεῖρας ταχέως μηδενὶ ἐπιτίθει, μηδὲ κοινώνει ἁμαρτίαις ἀλλοτρίαις) has led some eminent expositors (Hammond, Ellicott, Hort) to see in that verse a reference to the use of the imposition of hands in the reconciliation of penitents. The custom was undoubtedly early, if not primitive; cf. Eus. HE vii. 2; Const. Ap. ii. 41; Cypr. de laps. 16, ep. 15. On the other hand, the main current of patristic interpretation is against this explanation of St. Paul's words, and it is not impossible to explain them in reference to ordination without doing violence to the context; see, e.g. Theod. Mops. ad loc.: 'non facile ad ordinationem quemquam producas sine plurima probatione . . . si (inquit) te ut convenit probante ille deliquerit, non est tuum crimen.'

LAZARUS OF BETHANY.—The name Lazarus is an abbreviation of the Heb. Eleazar='God hath helped.' In the LXX we find both Ἐλεαζάρ and Ἐλεάζαρος; in Josephus commonly Ἐλεάζαρος. But Λάζαρος occurs BJ v. xiii. 7

All that we know of L. is told us in the Fourth Gospel. He was the brother of Martha and Mary, who are mentioned by both St. John and St. Luke. In Jn 11^{5} the names are probably given in order of age, 'Martha, her sister, and Lazarus.' In both Gospels Martha seems to be the eldest, and the mistress of the house; and the fact that Luke does not mention L. points to his being younger, and perhaps much younger, than his sisters. All three were specially beloved by Christ (Jn 11^{5}). We know that He visited them more than once (Lk 10^{38-42}, Jn 11^{1-53}), and it is probable that He often did so when He was at or near Jerusalem. They were probably well-off. The number of condoling friends from the city, and the costly ointment used by Mary, point to this. That they had a funeral vault of their own may be true, but is not stated. Luke does not give the name of the village in which they lived, probably because it was not stated in the source which he used; but John tells us that it was Bethany, which is barely two miles from Jerusalem. He calls L. 'a certain man, Lazarus of Bethany, the village of Mary and her sister Martha' (11^{1}). There has never been any doubt about its site, and the modern name is derived from Lazarus—El-Azerîjeh, or *Lazarieh. Here Christ raised Lazarus from the dead. Here Mary anointed His feet. Here He began His triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Here He rested during several of the days before His Passion. And from some spot near to Bethany He ascended into heaven. L. was sitting at meat with Him when Mary anointed His feet, and his presence attracted many of 'the common people of the Jews' to the village, that they might see, not only Jesus, but the man whom He had raised from the dead: and the hierarchy in their plots against Christ 'took counsel that they might put L. also to death, because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away and believed on Jesus' (Jn $12^{2.\ 9-11}$). The multitude that had been present when Jesus called L. out of the tomb were enthusiastic in bearing witness during the triumphal procession, and attracted others from the city to meet Him (Jn $12^{17.\ 18}$).

[*] A somewhat different account appears in Nu 27^{18}, 'take thee Joshua . . . a man in whom is the spirit [lit. 'there is spirit,' i.e. the necessary endowment for the office in view], and lay thine hand upon him.'

[†] In several of these instances hands were laid upon the part affected and not upon the head. The communication of healing power by contact (Mk $5^{30\text{f.}}$) is probably the thing signified.

[*] See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Talm. s.v. סְמִיכָה; Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie, s.v. 'Ordinirung': a Rabbi could make his scholar a Rabbi by the use of a formula which was ordinarily accompanied by imposition of hands.

Here all that we know about L. ends. The chief interest in the brief account of him lies in the miracle of which he was the subject. The raising of L. is commonly regarded as the climax of Christ's miraculous activity; and perhaps no portion even of the Fourth Gospel has been more vigorously assailed by hostile critics. Not only the miracle as a whole, but a large number of the details, have been made the objects of rigorous and minute criticism. It would be hardly too much to say that every objection, reasonable or unreasonable, that ingenuity could devise has been urged. And the reason for this is intelligible. The consequences of the truth of the narrative are so considerable. Spinoza is said to have declared that, if he could be convinced of the truth of the raising of L., he would break up his system and become a Christian (Bayle, Dict. s.v.). That is not a logical statement, for the Christian faith depends, not upon the raising of L., but upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Yet such a declaration shows that, as at the time when it was wrought, a miracle of this character is capable of exercising a mighty influence upon the intellects and hearts of men. It cannot fail to raise the question, 'What manner of man is this, that even death and the grave obey Him?'

The two most reasonable objections to the narrative as a whole are (1) the silence of the Synoptists, and (2) the amazing character of the miracle. It will be best to take them in this order; for injustice may be done by taking the second to augment the weight of the first. It may be doubted whether any one evangelist was ever induced to record any particular miracle by the thought that it was of a specially surprising character. They give us samples of all Christ's mighty works, especially those which had a marked effect upon His disciples and other hearers.

(1) The difficulty respecting the silence of the Synoptic Gospels as to the raising of L. has been seriously exaggerated even by apologists. Thus Trench says, 'It must always remain a mystery why this miracle, transcending as it does all other miracles which the Lord wrought, so memorable in itself, drawing after it the consequences which it did (Jn 11^{53}), should have been passed over by the three earlier evangelists' (Miracles^{8}, p. 394). The Synoptic Gospels have been more minutely studied since these words were written (1846), and the fact that in the main they give us one and the same tradition, and that a very fragmentary one, is now much more fully realized. It has been seen that this common fragmentary record has preserved hardly any particulars about the interval between the close of the ministry in Galilee (which is its chief theme) and the last Passover. St. Luke alone has done anything considerable to fill this blank, and the silence of the Synoptists should rather be called 'the silence of St. Luke.' And here again a similar explanation is applicable. 'The great intercalation' in the third Gospel (9^{51}–18^{14}) is itself very fragmentary, and seems to come from more than one source; and there is nothing very astonishing in the fact that St. Luke had no source which mentioned the raising of Lazarus. Indeed there is nothing unreasonable in the conjecture that, if he had used a source which mentioned it, he would still have omitted it; for he had already recorded two instances of Christ performing this miracle. And we misunderstand Jn 11^{53} if we suppose that it was the raising of L. which determined the hierarchy to put Jesus to death. Some time before this His enemies decided to kill Him, and tried to do it, as St. John himself tells us ($7^{1.\ 25.\ 26.\ 44}$ 8^{59} 10^{31}, and even in this very narrative $11^{8.\ 16}$). The raising of L. was the cause, neither of the enthusiasm of the people at the triumphal entry, nor of the deadly hostility of the priests. It merely augmented the one and quickened the activity of the other. Both would have existed and have been efficacious, even if L. had not been raised. None of the evangelists need the story of L. to make the narrative intelligible. John, knowing that the others had omitted it, tells us what he himself had heard and seen. It was of special interest to him, because of its effect in converting some of 'the Jews'; and he had recorded no other instance of Christ's raising the dead.

(2) Is it correct to say that the raising of L. 'transcends all other miracles which the Lord wrought'? It would be safer to affirm that it seems to us to transcend them. But is this view correct? In the main it is a modern view. To us raising the dead seems to be a miracle sui generis; and raising a man who has been dead four days seems to be a stupendous instance of a stupendous kind of miracle. But to the philosophic believer in miracles all genuine miracles are alike. When natural causes are inadequate and a supernatural cause is admitted, all degrees of difficulty are excluded. One who has Omnipotence to aid him cleanses lepers and raises the dead as easily as he heals ordinary diseases. If any miracle is credible, raising a man who has been dead four days is credible. It is illogical to say that the evidence would warrant us in believing a miraculous cure, but does not warrant us in believing in the raising of a dead man.

The objection, that Jn 11^{47-53} is inconsistent with the fact that in accusing Jesus before the Sanhedrin and Pilate no mention is made of the miracle, is not reasonable. It would have paralyzed the Sanhedrin to admit that Jesus had worked such a sign. The dismay of the priests at the miracles, and their silence about it at the trial, are entirely consistent.

Some of the criticisms of the details require notice. Very different views are taken about the 'four days' (see Andrews, Life of our Lord, p. 405). Probably L. died the day that Jesus heard of his illness, and was buried almost immediately (2 K 9^{34}, Ac $5^{6.\ 10}$). This would be all the more necessary if he died of some infectious disease. Then, after two days (11^{6}), Jesus set out for Bethany, and was part of two days on the road. But this is unimportant. It is urged that His waiting two days and allowing L. to die, in order to prove the sisters and reveal His own glory more signally, was heartless. So far as we know, He did not act thus. Had He started at once, He would probably have arrived too late to see L. alive. 'But he could have healed him from a distance.' No doubt He could, if it had been God's will. But He ever worked in accordance with the divine plan; and in this plan the raising of L. was to do three things: (a) strengthen the disciples' faith; (b) convert many of the Jews; (c) cause the priests to hasten their movements, so as to be ready when 'his hour had come' ($11^{15.\ 45.\ 53}$). Healing L. from a distance would have been less efficacious for the first of these, and would have done little towards the other two.

* Schwarz seems to be alone in disputing the site; but many modern travellers are incredulous about the vault at the bottom of 26 steps, in the middle of the village, which is shown as the tomb of Lazarus.

The indignation and sorrow attributed to Him ($11^{33.\ 35}$) are said to be unworthy of the incarnate Logos. Evidently St. John, the exponent of the Logos doctrine, did not think so. To those who believe in the reality of Christ's humanity there is nothing strange in His being angered by the hypocritical wailings of His enemies, and shedding tears of sympathy with the sisters (11^{33}).

We are told that ἤδη ὄζει (11^{39}) expresses, not merely Martha's expectation, but a fact. And are we prepared to maintain that Christ restored a putrid corpse to life? The reply to which is, that we have no right to dogmatize, but that we have full right to believe that God, who had determined that L. should be raised, had preserved his body from corruption.

When the stone was raised, Jesus lifted up His eyes to heaven and said, 'Father, I thank thee that thou didst hear me' (11^{41}). It is maintained that such words on the lips of the God-Man are unreal. Only those who think that the incarnation involves the extinction of the human nature by the divine can so think. Christ here intimates whom they have to thank for the immense mercy that is before them. The Son can do nothing of Himself; His power is from the Father (5^{19-26}). The words are parallel to 'declare how great things God hath done for thee' (Lk 8^{39}).

Our intellectual difficulties would not be at an end if we were to admit that no such miracle ever took place. The hypothesis that the story is a fiction is quite incredible. The narrative holds together with the closest consistency (11^{1-16} and $^{17-38}$ with $^{39-44}$); and the story as a whole not only harmonizes with what follows, but explains it section by section ($11^{45-53.\ 54-57}$ $12^{1-8.\ 9-11.\ 12-19}$). The people who take part in it are intensely real, and quite beyond the evangelist's powers of invention. In particular, the characters of the two sisters are not only very true to life, but receive remarkable confirmation from the entirely independent sketch of them by St. Luke (10^{38-42}). There, in utterly different circumstances, the practical Martha and contemplative Mary are as real as in St. John's narrative. The only reasonable explanation of the harmony between the two pictures is that both are taken from life (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 38; Fairbairn, Expositor, 1st series, ix. p. 189).

The narrative with its evidence of the miracle is there, and must be explained. How did the report of such an event arise? We have our choice of various suggestions. (1) The old Rationalism offers us a remarkable coincidence. L. was in a trance, from which he was recovering just as Jesus reached the tomb. When the stone was removed, Jesus perceived that he was not dead, and cried, 'Lazarus, come forth.' (2) Renan sees clearly that something really did take place at Bethany which was looked upon as a resurrection; but he rejects the idea of mere coincidence. The family of devoted disciples arranged that L. should pretend to be dead, in order that Jesus might overwhelm His foes by seeming to restore him to life: and Jesus allowed Himself to take part in this imposture. (3) Keim regards the whole as undoubtedly a fiction, made up largely of Synoptic materials, and composed partly as a great final picture of Christ's powers, partly as an exposition of His saying that Jews who did not listen to Moses and the prophets would not be persuaded though L. rose from the dead (Lk 16^{31}). It is a parable translated into fact. (4) Others take a similar view, but differ as to the central germ. These make the whole story an allegorical illustration of Christ's declaration, 'I am the Resurrection and the Life,' etc. (Jn 11^{25}), which is the one substantial factor in the composition. (5) Strauss falls back on his usual expedient of treating the narrative as a myth. There are many variations in explaining details, but these five are typical of the expedients employed by those who regard a miracle as wholly incredible. Each person must judge for himself whether any of these explanations is more satisfactory than a belief in the reality of the miracle. The first two are revolting even to those who hold that Jesus was only the best man who ever lived, and they entirely fail to explain either 11^{1-16} or $^{17-38}$. The others ascribe to the evangelist a creative power which would be a miracle in the literature of that age. For, even if he got some ideas from the other Gospels or from popular imagination, the form of the narrative, with its impressive reality and vividness, its internal consistency and its harmony with the rest of the Gospel and with St. Luke, is his own. The Apocr. Gospels show us what kind of stories early Christians could invent, when they tried to add to what was known about Christ. 'No narrative of NT bears so completely the stamp of being the very opposite of a later invention' (Meyer, ad loc.). 'The Johannine narrative is both unexplained and inexplicable, unless its historical character be accepted' (B. Weiss, Leben Jesu, bk. vi. § 6). In particular, the silence of the narrative is as impressive as its contents, and is in marked contrast to fiction. Nothing is told us of the emotions or experiences of Lazarus. No word of his is recorded. Not even his amazement, or joy, or trouble at being restored to life is described; and he makes no revelations about the other world. Would a writer of romance have denied himself this attractive theme? Would he have been thus careful to avoid gratifying unhealthy curiosity? See art. JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. p. 625.

Various untenable identifications have been made in connexion with the story of Lazarus. Mary has been identified either with Mary Magdalene, or with the sinner in the house of Simon the Pharisee, or with both. Almost certainly they were three different persons. Simon the Pharisee has been identified with Simon the leper, in whose house was the meal at which Martha served, Mary anointed the Lord's feet, while L. was one of those who reclined with Him at table. This also is highly improbable. All these identifications, however, have been suggested by some patristic writers as well as by some moderns. It was reserved for the imagination of a modern scholar to identify L. himself not only with the young ruler who had great possessions (Mt 19^{16}, Mk 10^{17}, Lk 18^{18}), but with the young man with a linen cloth about him, who was near being arrested with Christ (Mk 14^{51}). We do not know that L. was young; it is most improbable that he was a ruler; and although the family seems to have been well-to-do, there is no evidence that L. had great possessions. And were there so few young men in Palestine that wherever we find one mentioned we must assume that he is the same as some other one? To identify the ruler of Lk 18^{18} with the young man of Mk 14^{51}, and both of these with L., is against all probability. The interesting article on Lazarus in Smith's DB is an excellent example of spinning ropes of sand.

In various forms of early Christian art the resurrection of Lazarus was a favourite subject. It is found, from the 3rd cent. onwards, very often in paintings and sculptures, and sometimes in mosaics. And there is evidence that it was also woven or embroidered on clothing. In early examples Christ is a large figure and Lazarus a very small one, and the latter is wrapped tightly in grave cloths. Small images of Lazarus were sometimes fastened outside tombs. See the authorities quoted in Trench, Miracles, § 29 sub fin.; Smith's Dict. of Chr. Ant. ii. p. 949; Kraus, ii. p. 286.

Legends about Lazarus are less common than one might expect. The Jews are said to have sent him and his sisters with other disciples to sea in a leaky boat, which took them safely to Marseilles, where he became a bishop. Writers of mediæval romances sometimes made him their mouthpiece in publishing their ideas about the unseen world (T. Wright, St. Patrick's Purgatory, p. 167 ff., London, 1844). No trust can be placed in the tradition preserved by Epiphanius that Lazarus was thirty when he was raised, and lived thirty years afterwards (Hær. ii. 2. 652). In short, nothing historical can be added to the brief narrative of St. John, which has never ceased to impress the mind of Christendom.

In conclusion, it is worth noting that this narrative contains important evidence respecting Christ's human consciousness. Supernatural knowledge was within His reach (Jn $11^{4.11.14}$); but when He could acquire the necessary information in the usual way He did not make use of supernatural means ($11^{17.34}$). A. PLUMMER.

LAZARUS AND DIVES.—In this parable alone is a name given to any of the persons introduced. The name Lazarus may be a later addition, to connect the parable with L. of Bethany, who did 'go to them from the dead,' and still they did not repent. More probably, the name suggests the helplessness of the man, so far as his fellow-men were concerned. Tertullian argues that the name proves that the story is historical, and that the scene in Hades confirms his view that the soul is corporeal (de Animâ, vii.). In this parable also popular usage has given the other chief character a name. In the West 'Dives' has become almost a proper name; and this in spite of the fact that tradition had given the name of Nineuis to the rich man (Euthym. Zig. on Lk 16^{20}).

This parable is the counterpart of the parable of the Unjust Steward. That teaches what good results may be won by a wise use of present advantages. This teaches how calamitous are the results of failing to make a wise use of them. It illustrates also the preceding saying, that what is exalted among men may be an abomination in the sight of God (Lk 16^{15}). It is not 'Ebionitic.' It neither states nor implies that it is wicked to be rich. Dives is condemned, not for having been wealthy, but for having found in wealth his highest good, and for not having used it to win something better. Out of this mammon he might have made L. and others his 'friends,' and through them have secured 'eternal tabernacles.' Both halves of the parable are original, and each is needed to explain the other. It is a grave error to suppose that the scene in Hades is the only part of the parable that is significant, or that its purpose is to teach us the nature of the unseen world. The one thing that it teaches is that our condition there depends upon our conduct here, and that this may produce a complete reversal of human judgments. The details of the picture represent Jewish ideas about Sheol, but they in no way confirm those ideas. In order to enable us to realize the picture, disembodied spirits are described as if they were bodies. The finger, the tongue, the flame, etc., are figurative, for the actual finger and tongue were in the grave.

In both halves of the parable L. (like his namesake in all the scenes at Bethany) is silent; and his silence is instructive. It indicates that, just as Dives is not punished for his wealth, so L. is not rewarded for his poverty. He is rewarded for his patient submission. In life he does not murmur at God's unequal distribution of goods, nor rail at Dives for his neglect of him. In Sheol he does not triumph over Dives, nor protest against the idea of his being at his beck and call. He leaves Abraham (a righteous rich man) to decide everything; and Abraham points out that as the one had had uninterrupted luxury, and the other uninterrupted misery, in life, so there can be no interruption in the reversed conditions of either in Sheol.

The hypothesis that Dives and his five brethren represent six of the Herods (father, sons, and grandsons being called brethren for simplification) is incredible. Those who hold it consistently maintain that the parable is wrongly attributed to Christ, and is a later composition. Christ certainly would not have made a personal attack of this kind on any one, although He did not hesitate to censure Antipas publicly (Lk 13^{32}).

The belief that Lazarus was a leper has produced such words as lazzaro for leper and lazzaretto or lazar-house for leper-hospital. During the Crusades an order of knights of St. Lazarus was founded (1119, 1255), with the special duty of protecting and tending lepers. It lasted till modern times, but is distinct from the much more modern order of Lazarists or Lazarians. A. PLUMMER.

LEAD (אֹפֶרֶת 'ophereth) is often named among the spoils from Syria under Tahutmes III.; and it was common enough by B.C. 1200 to be used in Egypt for the sinkers of fishing-nets. This use was familiar to Israelites, as the Song of Moses has 'sank like lead in the mighty waters' (Ex 15^{10}). Lead in the literal sense is mentioned in Nu 31^{22} (P) along with brass, iron, and tin, and along with the same metals is used figuratively of Israel in Ezk 22^{18} (cf. v.^{20}); and it appears in Ezk 27^{12} along with silver, iron, and tin as an article of commerce brought from Tarshish to Tyre. In Job 19^{24} the sufferer exclaims, 'O that with an iron pen and lead [my words] were graven in the rock for ever!' There may be a twofold reference here: (a) to the use of a leaden tablet to be written on with an iron pen, (b) to the cutting-out of an inscription on a rock, but more probably there is but one figure before the mind's eye of the speaker,—that of pouring molten lead into the letter-forms sunk in the stone. LEAH (לֵאָה, Λεία).—The elder daughter of Laban, and one of Jacob's wives. The ruse by which she was palmed off by her father upon Jacob, who imagined that he was marrying Rachel, is described in Gn $29^{21\text{ff.}}$. As to her personal appearance, we are told that her eyes were רַכּוֹת, which the LXX render by ἀσθενεῖς, and EV by 'tender,' i.e. weak or dull. The context and the etymology of the word both favour this meaning rather than that of 'beautiful,' which is attributed to the word by Onk. and Sa'adya, who imagine that the sense intended is, that though Leah had fine eyes she was otherwise not so handsome as Rachel. By her marriage with Jacob, Leah became the mother of six sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and a daughter, Dinah, Gn 29^{31-35} $30^{18.20.21}$. See JACOB, vol. ii. p. 528. Along with her sister she expressed sympathy with Jacob on account of his treatment by Laban, and agreed to accompany her husband in his flight from her father, $31^{4.14.33}$. When the meeting between Jacob and Esau was about to take place, Leah and her children were placed in an intermediate position between the handmaids with their children in the front and Rachel with her children in the rear, $33^{1.2.7}$. Leah is mentioned in 49^{31} as having been buried in the cave of Machpelah, having evidently died prior to Jacob's going down to Egypt. In Ru 4^{11} the women who invoke a blessing on the union of Boaz and Ruth, make honourable mention of Leah and Rachel as having 'built' the house of Israel.

It is clear that the most ancient division of Israel distinguished Leah tribes and Rachel tribes. Wellhausen (Proleg. 150; cf. W. R. Smith, Kinship, 195, 257; Stade, ZATW i. 112 ff.) regards Levi as a patronymic derived from Leah. See LEVI.

The meaning of the name Leah is somewhat uncertain. Gray (Heb. Prop. Names, 96) accepts the meaning 'wild cow' (so W. R. Smith, Kinship, p. 119 ['bovine antelope']; Frd. Delitzsch, Proleg. 80, and [doubtfully] Nöldeke, ZDMG, 1886, p. 167). Others, as Haupt (GGN, 1883, p. 100), compare the Assyrian li'at in the sense of 'mistress.' Upon the ground that the narrative in Gn 29^{17} describes the one sister as ugly and the other as beautiful, Ball (in SBOT, ad loc.) suggests a connexion between לֵאָה (and perhaps לֵוִי) and the Arab. root لوى 'to be ugly,' II. 'to look ugly or malignantly.' See Lane, p. 2677. J. A. SELBIE.

LEANNOTH, Ps 88 (title).—See Mahalath under art. PSALMS.

LEASING is the Anglo-Saxon leásung, 'a lie,' and comes from leás, 'false,' which Skeat believes to be the same word as leás, loose, so that 'leasing' is literally 'looseness of statement.' In the Acts of James I. of Scotland, 1424, 'It is ordanyt—that all lesingis makaris and tellaris of thaim, the quhilk may ingener discorde betuix the king and his pepill,—salbe challangit be thaim that power has, and tyne lyff and gudis to the king'—Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary, s.v. 'Lesing-makare.' And still older, in the Preface to king Alfred's Laws, the 44th article is, Onscûna thû â leásunga ='Shun thou ever leasings.' Wyclif uses the word often. Thus, Jn 8^{44} 'Whanne he [the deuel] spekith a lesinge, he spekith of his owne thingis; for he is a lyiere, and fadir of it.' He also has the forms 'leasing-maker,' Pr 21^{6}, and 'leasing-monger,' as Sir 20^{27} 'Betere is a theef than the customablenesse of a man, a leesyngmongere' (1382, 'than the besynesse of a man liere'). With Wyclif's translation of Jn 8^{44} cf. Knox, Historie, p. 288, 'But who can correct the leasings of such as in all things show them the sons of the Father of all lies'; Elyot, The Governour, ii. 217, 'And the devill is called a lyer, and the father of leasinges. Wherfore all thinge, which in visage or apparaunce pretendeth to be any other than verily it is, may be named a leasinge; the execution whereof is fraude, whiche is in effecte but untrouthe, enemie to trouthe, and consequently enemye to god'; and Twysden, Decem Script. col. 2650, 'For before that the fende fader of lesynges was lowside, was never this gabbyng contryvede.'

The word occurs three times in AV, Ps 4^{2} 'how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing?' (Heb. תְּבַקְשׁוּ כָזָב, Wye. 'sechen lesing,' Cov. 'seke after lyes,' Gen. 'seking lyes,' Douay 'seeke lying,' Bish. 'seeke after leasing,' RV 'seek after falsehood' [so also Driver, Parall. Psalter, with note 'i.e. probably vain plans (2^{1}) for the ruin of the Psalmist, and false charges or calumnies against him,' to which he adds on p. 487, under Corrigenda, 'Or better, perhaps, false and baseless imputations' by impatient and distrustful companions, 'reflecting discredit upon the Psalmist']); 5^{6} 'Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing' (דֹּבְרֵי כָזָב, Wyc. 'Thou schalt leese alle that speken leesyng,' Cov. 'Thou destroyest the lyers,' Gen. 'Thou shalt destroy them that speake lyes,' Dou. 'Thou wilt destroy al that speake lie,' Bish. 'Thou shalt destroy them that speake leasing,' RV 'Thou shalt destroy them that speak lies'); 2 Es 14^{18} 'For the truth is fled far away, and leasing is hard at hand' (appropinquabit mendacium, RV 'For the truth shall withdraw itself further off, and leasing be hard at hand'; the AV is again the tr^{n} of the Bishops). In Is 59^{3} Cov. has 'leasing' as tr^{n} of שֶׁקֶר (AV and RV 'lies').

The word, which is frequently used by Spenser in his antiquated English, is found only twice in Shaks. (Twelfth Night, I. v. 105, and Coriolanus, V. ii. 22), and by the time of Thomas Fuller had dropped out of use. In Ch. Hist. III. i. 33, Fuller says, 'Amongst the many simoniacal Prelates that swarmed in the land, Herbert, Bishop of Thetford, must not be forgotten; nicknamed (or fitnamed shall I say?) Losing, that is, the Flatterer; our old English word leasing for lying retains some affinity thereunto, and at this day we call an insinuating fellow a Glozing Companion.' J. HASTINGS.

LEATHER, LEATHERN (עוֹר 'ôr, δέρμα, δερμάτινος).—Elijah and John the Baptist wore a girdle of leather (2 K 1^{8} אֵזוֹר עוֹר, Mt 3^{4}, Mk 1^{6} ζώνη δερματίνη. In the last passage AV needlessly introduces the variety, 'girdle of skin'). Although mentioned in EV only in connexion with girdles, leather must have been used for many purposes. The Heb. and Gr. words properly mean skin; and in such passages as Ex 25^{5} ('rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins') they clearly refer to tanned skins, and perhaps in Nu 31^{20} ('all that is made of skins') they do the same. Leather was used for thongs, latchets of sandals, etc. Water-bottles and wine-bottles were often made of leather, as at the present day in Syria and Palestine. The Egyptians used it for many purposes besides those mentioned, such as coverings for shields, seats of chairs, etc. (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. ii. 185-189); also for writing (ib. 183), rolls being made of it like papyrus. See, further, SKIN, TANNER. H. PORTER.

LEAVE.—The verb to leave is often used in AV in the sense of 'desist,' 'leave off,' as Gn 18^{33} 'And the LORD went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham'; Ru 1^{18} 'When she saw that she was stedfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto her'; Ac 21^{32} 'when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul.' Cf. Tind. Expos. p. 106, 'He that buildeth a costly house even to the tiling, will not leave there, and lose so great cost for so small a trifle more.' So Latimer, Serm. of the Plough, 'If I might see any such inclination in you, that you would leave to be merciless, and begin to be charitable, I would then hope well of you'; and Shaks. I Henry IV. V. v. 44—

> 'Let us not leave till all our own be won.'

'Leave off' is also found in AV, as Sir 23^{17} 'All bread is sweet to a whoremonger, he will not leave off till he die'; 47^{22} 'But the Lord will never leave off his mercy.' And it is used both with the ptcp. in -ing, and with to and the infin., as Gn 17^{22} 'And he left off talking with him'; 1 K 15^{21} 'he left off building of Ramah'; Gn 11^{8} 'they left off to build the city'; Hos 4^{10} 'they have left off to take heed to the LORD.' In Gn 17^{22} Tindale's Pent. of 1530 has 'left of talking,' but the ed. of 1534 'left talking.'

In Ac 18^{18} and 2 Co 2^{13} ἀποτάσσομαι is tr^{d} 'take leave of.' RV retains this tr. and introduces it in Mk 6^{46} for AV 'send away'; but in Lk 9^{61} RV retains 'bid farewell' of AV, and in 14^{33} (the only other occurrence of the Gr. verb in NT) changes AV 'forsake' into 'renounce.' The verb ἀσπάζομαι is once (Ac 21^{6}) rendered 'take leave of' in AV, when RV prefers 'bid farewell.'

With the expression in Ac 21^{3} 'Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand': cf. Ac 20^{16} Rhem. 'Paul had purposed to saile leaving Ephesus'; Nu 34^{12} Tind. 'And then goo downe at the Iordayne, and leve at the salte sea'; and especially Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 14, 'whiche yle we lefte on our lefte hande towardes Grece.' J. HASTINGS.

LEAVEN (שְׂאֹר, ζύμη, fermentum).—The Hebrew word sĕ'ōr (שְׂאֹר), which probably expresses the idea of fermentation, is found only five times in the OT (Ex $12^{15.19}$ 13^{7}, Lv 2^{11}, Dt 16^{4}); more commonly we find a word from another root, denoting to be sour, and hence to be leavened (חָמֵץ ḥāmēẓ). Bread, kneaded in a baking trough (מִשְׁאֶרֶת Ex 8^{3} 12^{34}), and leavened, probably by means of a lump of fermented dough, must have been a common article of food among the Israelites; but as time was required to allow the leaven to work (Hos 7^{4}), bread of another kind was used when food was required at short notice. This took the form of unleavened cakes (Gn 19^{3}, Jg 6^{19}, 1 S 28^{24}), called mazzôth (מַצּוֹת), either as being sweet, unsoured (מָצַץ='to suck,' so Ges.), or on account of their dry, insipid character (Fleischer in Levy, NHWB iii. 315; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 145). It was, according to Ex $12^{34.39}$ (JE), unleavened cakes of this kind that the Israelites baked for themselves on their hurried departure from Egypt, since they had not time to leaven their dough.

In early times leavened bread, as a common article of food, probably formed a part of a sacrificial meal, and of the gifts offered to the Deity by the worshipper (cf. 1 S 10^{3}). In the Northern kingdom leaven was an accompaniment of the thank-offering, though Amos seems to refer to the custom in terms of disapproval (Am 4^{5}). Traces of a similar usage are to be found even in P; for the shewbread (Lv 24^{5-9} [P]) was probably leavened, while leavened cakes, as bread of the first-fruits, formed part of the sacred gifts presented at the Feast of Weeks (Lv 23^{17}, cf. ^{20} [H]), and also accompanied the peace-offering, when offered as a thanksgiving (Lv 7^{13} [P]). In none of these cases, however, was the leavened bread actually placed upon the altar. On the other hand, to eat anything leavened, or even to keep it in the house, was strictly forbidden during the seven days of mazzôth (Ex 13^{3-7} 23^{15} 34^{18} [JE], Dt $16^{3.4.8}$, Ex 12^{14-20}, Lv 23^{6-8}, Nu 28^{17} [P]), a festival which was originally distinct from the Passover, though Dt shows a tendency to combine the two (Dt 16^{8}, and cf. Driver, ad loc.). A historical explanation of the prohibition is given in JE, where, as we saw, the use of unleavened cakes is connected with the events of the exodus (Ex 12^{34-39}), and a connexion between the exodus and mazzôth is suggested elsewhere (Ex $13^{3\text{ff.}}$ 23^{15} 34^{18}). Similarly, in Dt 16^{3} the unleavened cakes of this season are termed 'the bread of affliction,' from their association with the Egyptian bondage of the Israelites, and their hurried departure. Probably, however, the feast of mazzôth was originally the opening festival of the harvest season (cf. Dt 16^{9}, Lv $23^{9\text{ff.}}$); in this case the use of unleavened cakes may be explained from the use of new corn, hastily prepared for food in the busy time at the beginning of harvest, and from the desire not to mix the first-fruits with the last year's dough (see Wellhausen, Proleg., Eng. tr. pp. 85–87; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 145 f.). The more general prohibition of leaven in sacrifices was doubtless due to the association of the processes of fermentation and putrefaction. Leaven was regarded as a source of corruption; and accordingly P excludes it from any meal-offering (Lv 2^{11} 6^{17}, and cf. Dillm. ad loc.), and lays down the principle that nothing leavened, nor even honey, which might produce fermentation (cf. Pliny, 11, 15), was to be burnt as an offering to J". The laws in JE (Ex 23^{18} 34^{25}) also forbid the use of leaven in a sacrifice, but in both passages a special reference is made to the Passover, and it is possible that the prohibition was originally confined to this feast (cf. RS p. 203 f.).

The association of leaven and corruption is not confined to the OT. Plutarch explains on this ground why the Flamen Dialis was not permitted to eat bread prepared with leaven (Quæs. Rom. 109); and fermentum is used in Persius for 'corruption' (Sat. i. 24). In the NT there is, indeed, the parable of the leaven, where its unseen influence and penetrating power is taken as a symbol of the growth of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 13^{33}, Lk $13^{20\text{f.}}$); but elsewhere our Lord warns His disciples against the 'leaven' of the Pharisees and of Herod (Mt 16^{6-12}, Mk $8^{15\text{ff.}}$, Lk 12^{1}); and St. Paul, emphasizing its secret and expansive working, quotes the proverb, 'A little leaven leavens the whole lump' (Gal 5^{9}, 1 Co 5^{6}), to warn his converts against the contagious example of evildoers, and exhorts them to purge out the old leaven of malice and wickedness (1 Co 5^{8}). Similarly, in Rabbinical writers leaven is used as a symbol of evil: thus R. Alexander prays against 'the leaven in the dough,' i.e. the evil inclination in the heart, which prevents man from doing the will of God (Talm. Berachoth, 17*a*; and cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 16^{6}). H. A. WHITE.

LEBANA (לְבָנָא), Neh 7^{48}, or LEBANAH (לְבָנָה), Ezr 2^{45}.—The head of a family of returning exiles, called in 1 Es 5^{29} Labana.

LEBANON (in prose with art. הַלְּבָנוֹן, except 2 Ch $2^{8\text{b}}$ [Heb.$^{7\text{b}}$]; in poetry 18 times with art., 20 times without. LXX Λίβανος, generally with art.; Vulg. Libanus).*—Derived from root [לָבַן] 'to be white,' either from the snow which covers the summits seven months in the year, or from the light colour of the limestone in its upper ranges.

Lebanon is mentioned in the OT over 60 times, but almost two-thirds of the references occur in poetical passages. It is not mentioned in the NT. While included in the land assigned to the Israelites, Jos 13^{5} (D^{2}), these mountains were never conquered by them (Jg 3^{1-3}), the actual limit of conquest being 'Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon' (Jos 11^{17}). This valley of Lebanon was known to the Greeks as Cœle-Syria, and is the modern Buḳa'. Anti-Libanus proper is mentioned but once in the OT as 'Lebanon towards the sunrising' (Jos 13^{5}). The Hivites are said to be inhabitants of the Lebanon (Jg 3^{3}), and the Giblites dwelt at Gebal (the modern Jebail, Greek Byblos, at the base of the mountains) (Jos $13^{5.6}$). During the reign of Solomon, the Lebanon appears to have been subject to Hiram king of Tyre, who contracted to bring cedar trees, firs, and almug (algum) trees by sea to Joppa for the temple (1 K 5^{6}, 2 Ch 2^{8}). On the other hand, Solomon appears to have erected buildings in the Lebanon (1 K 9^{19}, 2 Ch 8^{6}). At the rebuilding of the temple, after the restoration, cedar trees were again brought from the Lebanon (Ezr 3^{7}). See, further, art. CEDAR.

Mt. Lebanon runs N.N.E.–S.S.W. for 95 miles from Nahr Ḳasmîyeh, lat. 33° 20′ (known as the Liṭâny, the classic Leontes, along its upper course), to Nahr el-Kebîr, the ancient Eleutherus. The plain of the Buḳa' separates it from the Anti-Libanus, which, starting from the Barada, runs for 65 miles roughly parallel to the Lebanon.

* The name appears in Assyr. as Labnânu, etc. (see Schrader, COT^{2} on 1 K 5^{13}), and in Egyp. perhaps as Ramannu (see W. Max Müller, As. u. Europ. 198 f., 204).

Strabo (xvi.) represents the two ranges as parallel, but is in error in stating their direction: Lebanon, according to him, beginning at Tripolis, and Anti-Libanus at Sidon, both running towards Damascus. The foot-hills of Lebanon—the western range—rise abruptly from the seashore, except for the narrow strip of plain at Sidon, and for the triangular projections of the promontories of Beyrout and Tripoli. At its southern end the main ridge is divided into two ranges, roughly parallel, by the brook Zaharâni, which, after flowing southwards, turns abruptly west and enters the sea south of Sidon. The eastern ridge is known as Jebel Riḥân, and the western as Jebel Taura (alt. 4500 ft.). Both are more or less wooded. Near the plateau on which stands Kefr Ḥouni, these two ridges merge into one, which is separated from the twin peaks Taumât Nîḥa (alt. 5625 ft. and 5550 ft.) by a notch 600 ft. deep. The ridge now becomes higher and more pronounced, rising to an altitude varying from 5500 to 7000 ft. Its various parts are locally named from the larger villages, as Jebel Nîḥa, and Jebel Barûk. North of the latter the ridge falls to an altitude of 4700 ft., and is crossed by a transverse ridge, Jebel Kuneiseh (alt. 6960 ft.). A narrow watershed connects this with Jebel Ṣannîn, a triangular-shaped mountain—one face being parallel to the sea, one in the line of the main ridge, and the third or northern one running roughly east and west. Its highest point is on the eastern face. From a distance the top appears to be level, but it is exceedingly rough owing to numerous conical depressions, in which snow may be found late into the summer. For some distance beyond Ṣannîn the top of the main ridge is really a broad, rolling plateau, called Jebel Muneitri, varying in altitude from 5800 to 6000 ft. North of the village 'Aḳûrah the altitude increases rapidly, and the western part of this broad mass is broken up by a series of intricate ridges, suddenly breaking down into the great amphitheatre of the Nahr Ḳadîsha. This is bounded on the east by the narrowed main ridge, joining on to the huge mass which forms the northern side of the amphitheatre. This is named as a whole Ḍahr el-Ḳaḍîb, and is surmounted by two series of peaks, roughly parallel, varying in height from 9800 to 10,225 ft. The highest peak is called Jebel Mukhmal by Burton, but no local trace of the name appears to have been recovered by later travellers. The western face of this northern mass is a series of sheer cliffs. To the north another great amphitheatre opens out, in which are found the head waters of the northern branch of the Nahr el-Bârid. Beyond this rises the Jebel el-Abiadh (alt. 7380 ft.), after which the mountain breaks down to the valley of the Nahr el-Kebîr, and the low, rolling hills joining the Lebanon to the mountains of the Nuseirîyeh.

With very few exceptions all the Lebanon streams rise on the western face. South of Beyrout the main rivers have their sources in high valleys between ridges approximately parallel to the main ridge. Their course is thus first southerly, then westerly, to the sea. They are the Zaharâni, the Awwali (Bostrenus), and the Damûr (the Tamuras of Strabo, and the Damuras of Polybius). North of Beyrout the head waters of the rivers are in wide amphitheatres, separated from each other by narrow watersheds, in places 5000 to 6000 ft. high; and in their course to the sea they break through the spurs of the great hill in narrow gorges. The western face of the Lebanon is thus extremely rugged and varied in contour. The main streams are—Nahr Beyrout (the Magoras), with its two branches, rising on the face of Kuneiseh, and between Kuneiseh and Ṣannîn respectively, Nahr el-Kelb (Lycus flumen) draining Ṣannîn; Nahr Ibrahim (the Adonis) with its main sources at Afḳa and 'Aḳûrah; Nahr ej-Jauz; Nahr Ḳadîsha, draining the Cedar amphitheatre, and entering the sea at Tripoli; Nahr el-Bârid; and, finally, the boundary river, Nahr el-Kebîr, which sweeps around the northern end of the mountain. The eastern face of Lebanon presents a very different aspect from the western, as it slopes directly down to the plain of the Buḳa', sometimes with no foot-hills, and unbroken by any important valleys, except at the south end of Kuneiseh and at Zaḥleh, where the Nahr Berdaûni comes out of a wild gorge. There are several large fountains at the base of the main ridge, and the Lake Yammûneh, with its intermittent fountains, lies in a depression between the main ridge and the partly wooded foot-hills, north-west of Baalbek.

A few words as to geology. The Lebanon is composed of three conformable series of strata, all of which are sometimes exposed on the sides of the deepest valleys. The lowest is regarded by some authorities as lower cretaceous, by others as upper jurassic. It consists of several thousand feet of hard, thick-layered limestone, containing few fossils, among which are sponges, corals, brachiopods, and, most characteristic, Cidaris glandaria, from which the formation has been named the Glandaria limestone. While forming the bottom of the deepest valleys, by foldings it is in places elevated to the height of from 4000 to 5000 ft. It weathers into grand castellated rocks, whose bluish-grey sides are beautifully fluted by the frosts and rains. The second series of strata has been named from a characteristic fossil, Trigonia syriaca, the Trigonia zone. It consists of sandstone, soft limestone, and clay, with here and there small quantities of poor bituminous coal and bituminous limestone, with pyrites and efflorescent salts. The sandstone is from fifty to several hundred feet thick, and by its red colour serves readily to distinguish the other series of rocks. Most of the Lebanon pines grow on this sandstone. The limestone and clays of the Trigonia zone may attain a thickness of from 500 to 1000 ft., and are very rich in fossils. The third series has been named the Hippurite limestone, as some of its strata are almost entirely composed of fragments of hippurites, which in places are found well preserved. There are also many nerineas. The hippurite limestone occurs on the sides of Lebanon, where, with the other formations, it is extensively faulted and folded, and it forms the summits of all the highest mountains, where it is in most cases nearly level. Its greatest thickness must be nearly 5000 ft. At low levels near the sea are found chalks, with and without flint, which are the uppermost of the cretaceous rocks, and which appear to have been deposited after the mass of the mountains was well above the sea, since they are in no case found in the centre of the range. In several localities the chalk has yielded numerous finely-preserved fishes. Upon the chalk is found soft miocene limestone, and a porous sandstone of a quarternary date which is largely calcareous.

From the above description it will be seen that the Lebanon presents some magnificent scenery. It is no wonder that the salient features of this border-land to their country seized upon the imagination of the Hebrew poets. The deep and sudden gorges, the sweeping amphitheatres, the variety of colouring in the soil, the towering snow-covered peaks, the gushing fountains,—all unite in producing pictures of almost bewildering variety. Villages are scattered everywhere; some nestle at the mountain base, others cling to the steep sides, while still others are perched on ridges over 4000 ft. above the sea. Many of the bald promontories of rock are crowned by belfried monasteries. The extent of cultivation is extraordinary, and the system of terracing is carried to a height of almost 6000 ft. Wheat, the vine, the olive, the mulberry, and the walnut all abound. The water from the various fountains is carefully stored up and led off in irrigation. A considerable quantity of silk is manufactured. The Lebanon was once well wooded, but the charcoal burners and the browsing goat are now powerful destructive agents. The valley of the Nahr Ibrahim, however, is still thickly wooded with oak and pine, while the stream is shaded with plane trees. Besides the historic grove of the cedars above Besherreh, there are still small groves on the ridge south of Kuneiseh, and a more extensive forest at el-Hadeth, south of the Nahr Ḳadîsha. Jackals abound, but hyænas, wolves, and panthers are fast disappearing.

Of ancient buildings there are very few traces, the principal ones being the ruin at Deir el-Ḳula'a, above the Beyrout river; Ḳula'at el-Fuḳra, near Ṣannîn; and the temple of Venus at Afḳa, the source of the Adonis. This was destroyed by Constantine owing to the licentious rites practised there. The site is striking: behind the temple there rises, for 1200 ft., an almost perpendicular cliff, richly coloured, at the base of which is a large cave, from which in the spring-time a volume of water gushes forth, immediately joining the perennial stream, which plunges down in a series of three cascades. The water is said to be at times impregnated with mineral salts, giving a red colour, typifying to the ancients the blood of Adonis. At the mouth of Nahr el-Kelb are inscriptions in Assyrian, Egyptian, and Greek. At the bottom of the wild Ḳadîsha gorge there are many early anchorite caves; in front of some of them convents have been erected—notably Ḳannubîn, the traditional seat of the Maronite patriarch.

The feudal system lasted in the Lebanon far into the present century. In consequence of the massacres of 1860 the government of the mountains was reorganized, with a Christian governor under the general protection of the Powers. The population is about half a million, and includes the following sects, which are given as nearly as possible in the order of their numbers, the most numerous being first:—

Maronites.
Greek Orthodox.
Druzes.
Papal Greeks.
Mutawileh.
Mohammedans.
Protestants.
Syriac and Armenian.

In general the Druzes are to be found south of the Beyrout river, while the stronghold of the Maronites is to the north. (For details as to the Maronites, see PEFSt, 1892, Bliss). Owing to recent efforts of missionaries, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, the number of schools is very large. The natural abilities of the Lebanese are decidedly above those of the rest of the peasantry in Syria and Palestine.

The Buḳa'.—The Lebanon is divided from the Anti-Libanus by a broad valley known in its southern part as the Buḳa' el-'Azîz, and in its northern part as Sahl-Ba'albek. It is drained by two rivers, the Liṭâny (Leontes), which rises in the neighbourhood of Baalbek and flows south, and by the 'Asi (Orontes), which rises a short distance farther north, and flows northward. The watershed is almost imperceptible. The Buḳa' proper is very fertile, and supports a large population in the villages scattered over it, and especially in the valleys along its sides. The northern end is much less fertile. (For the splendid ruins of Ba'albek see reff. at end of this article). At its southern end the plain suddenly contracts into a narrow gorge, through which the Liṭâny flows. Both the plain and Anti-Libanus are subject to the Governor of Damascus.

Anti-Libanus, Jth 1^{7} only (Ἀντιλίβανος. In Dt 1^{7} 3^{25} 11^{24} and Jos 1^{4} 9^{1} the Heb. לְבָנוֹן is rendered by Ἀντιλίβανος).—The southern limit of Anti-Libanus may be conveniently placed at the Barada river and Damascus, leaving the mountains to the south to be considered as part of the system of Mount Hermon. It runs roughly parallel to the Lebanon for 65 miles, terminating rather abruptly at the plain of Ḥums. The main ridge is separated from the plain of Cœle-Syria by a small plain and ridge at the north end; by a rough mass of low ridges, called Jebel Ḳusha'a, in the central part; and by the plain of Zebedâni with ridge in the southern part. At the north the main ridge is narrow, but broken by a series of prominent peaks; the central mass is broader, higher, and rougher; while the southern part is diversified by long wadis leading off to the east, with a single wady (Ḥarîri) leading to the south. To the east of the main ridge there is a descending series of plateaux, gradually dropping to the level of the plain of Damascus, and separated by five ridges which spread out somewhat like a fan, and which, if produced, would meet in the main mass of Hermon.

The highest plateau (alt. 5255 ft.), which is called 'Asal el-Ward, drains northward, past the towns Yabrûd and Nebk, and is watered by a number of fine fountains. The principal peaks of the Anti-Libanus are: Ḥalîmat Ḳâbu (8250), Ḥalîmat Ḳârah (8150), and Ḥalîmat Ḳurraîs (8150) at the northern end; Tâla'at Mûsa (8755) in the central mass; Abu el-Ḥîn (8135) and the Blûdân ridge (8090) farther south. The only considerable streams of Anti-Libanus are the Yaḥfûfah, emptying into the Liṭâny; Ḥelbûn, flowing eastward to the Damascus plain; and the Barada (Abana of Scripture). This important river has its main upper source in the south end of the plain of Zebedâni, in a beautiful pool fed by many springs, but drains the whole of that plain; the volume of water is much more than doubled by the fountain of 'Ain Fîjeh, which joins it less than half-way to Damascus.

Literature.—The geographical and geological descriptions are condensed from unpublished notes made by Professor West and Professor Day respectively, both of the Syrian Protestant College, Beyrout. The table of population is taken from the Book of Statistics of the Lebanon, published in Arabic, 1898. The reader may refer further to such works as Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 435 ff., 493; G. A. LEBAOTH (לְבָאוֹת perhaps 'lionesses').—A city in S. Judah, Jos 15^{32}. Site unknown. It is called in Jos 19^{6} Beth-lebaoth, and in 1 Ch 4^{31} (perhaps by textual error) Beth-biri (wh. see).

LEBBAEUS (Λεββαῖος) is the name given to one of the Twelve in AV of Mt 10^{3}, but rejected by RV as without sufficient authority. The reading and the meaning of the name will be fully discussed in art. Thaddæus. See also WH^{2}, Notes, pp. 11, 24, 144, and Dalman, Worte Jesu, p. 40. The greatest obscurity prevails regarding him, but the view which identifies him with the Thaddæus of Mk 3^{18} and Mt 10^{3} (RV), the Judas of James of Lk 6^{16} and Ac 1^{13}, and the Judas, not Iscariot, of Jn 14^{22}, may be accepted without serious hesitation. There are no references to him in NT except those in the lists of the Twelve and the question recorded by St. John, who carefully distinguishes him from the traitor, and nothing whatever is known of his ultimate career. See, further, art. THADDÆUS. W. MUIR.

LEBONAH (לְבוֹנָה, Λεβωνά).—A place near Shiloh on the way to Shechem, Jg 21^{19}. It is the ruin called Khan el-Lubban, about 3 miles W.N.W. of Seilûn (Shiloh). See SWP vol. ii. sheet xi.; Robinson, BRP^{2} 271 f.; Guérin, Samarie, ii. 164 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{3}, 217. C. R. CONDER.

LECAH (לֵכָה).—A name occurring in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4^{21}) as the 'son' of Er. Most probably it is the name of a place, although it is impossible to identify it. See GENEALOGY, IV. 2.

LEECH.—See HORSELEECH.

LEEKS.—The word חָצִיר ḥāẓîr is usually tr. 'grass' (see GRASS) or 'hay' (see HAY), but in one passage (Nu 11^5) it is tr. 'leeks.' Its occurrence in this passage with the other two alliaceous plants onions and garlic, and the authority of the LXX πράσα, Vulg. porri, ancient Syriac and Arab., have caused most interpreters to accept the AV and RV 'leeks.' The plant is Allium Porrum, L. It is extensively cultivated in the East. It has an ill-defined bulb, leaves about an inch broad, and a stem about 2 ft. in height. The young stem, enveloped in its leaves, is banked up, as in the case of celery, and plucked up while tender, before the flowering head is developed. It is eaten raw, or made into a salad, or used as a flavouring for cooked dishes. It has a more delicate flavour than onions or garlic. It is known in Arab. by the name kurrâth. G. E. POST.

LEES.—This is the tr^n in AV and RV of Heb. שְׁמָרִים in Is $25^{6\,bis}$, Jer 48^{11}, Zeph 1^{12}; in its only remaining occurrence, Ps 75^9 [Eng.^{8}] it is rendered 'dregs.' The word 'lees' is a plur., formed from Fr. lie (the sing. seems never to have been used in Eng.), which is defined in Cotgrave's Fr. Dict. as 'the lees, dregs, grounds, thick substance that settles in the bottome of liquor.' The further derivation from Low Lat. lia, accepted by Skeat, is rejected by Brachet. In Is $25^{6\,bis}$ the word is used in an apparently good sense, 'a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined'; and that passage, being most frequently quoted, has given 'lees' a somewhat less offensive meaning in mod. Eng. than 'dregs.' But there is no difference between the words, as may be seen from Shaks. Troil. and Cress. IV. i. 62—

> 'Drink up
> The lees and dregs of a flat tamed piece.

Macbeth, II. iii. 100—

> 'The wine of life is drawn, and the mere lees
> Is left this vault to brag of.'

And in Is the sense of shĕmârîm is the same as elsewhere, the fæces or dregs of wine. But wine that, after fermentation, is allowed to stand long on its dregs, gathers strength or body, and when filtered before drinking is superior to recently fermented wine. The figure in Jer and Zeph is of one who has had little trial in life, has been too long at ease, and grown indolent and indifferent. See WINE. J. HASTINGS.

LEFTHANDED (in 1611 two words) is the tr^n in Jg 3^{15} 20^{16} of אִטֵּר יַד־יְמִין, which is literally 'shut up (or bound) as to the right hand,' as in AVm. The Heb. phrase, which occurs nowhere else, is used first of Ehud and then of '700 chosen men' of Benjamin, who 'could sling stones at an hair breadth, and not miss.' The adj. אִטֵּר is in New Heb. 'lame,' and the AV translation is no doubt right. It comes from the margin of the Geneva Bible at 3^{15}, the text being 'lame of his right hand,' and from the text of the same at 20^{16}. The LXX gives ἀμφοτεροδέξιος, 'double handed,' and the Vulg. 'qui utraque manu pro dextera utebatur' (in 20^{16} 'ita sinistra ut dextra præliantes'), whence Wyc. 'the which either hoond uside for the right' (in 20^{16} 'so with the lift as with the right fightynge'). Cov. has 'a man that mighte do nothinge with his righte hande.' The Douay follows the Vulg., 'who used both handes for the right.' J. HASTINGS.

LEG.—1. [כֶּרַע New Heb. from root כרע 'bow' or 'bend'] The sing. is not found in OT, but the dual fem. כְּרָעַיִם occurs repeatedly in the ritual of P, Ex 12^9 29^{17}, Lv $1^{9.\,13}$ 4^{11} 8^{21} 9^{14} (chiefly in the collocation 'the inwards and the legs'); in Lv 11^{21} of the long bending hinder legs of the saltatorial Orthoptera (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and the illustration on p. 84 of Driver's Joel and Amos). The only other occurrence of the word is Am 3^{12} (of the shepherd rescuing two legs of a lamb out of the mouth of a lion).

2. רֶגֶל, lit. 'foot.' 1 S 17^6 Goliath had greaves of brass 'upon his legs' (עַל־רַגְלָיו; LXX ἐπάνω τῶν σκελῶν αὐτοῦ).

3. שׁוֹק, denoting the upper part of the leg, including, or sometimes synonymous with, the thigh (יָרֵךְ). (a) Of animals. This word is wrongly translated 'shoulder' by AV (cf. LXX τὸν βραχίονα) in Ex $29^{22.\,27}$, Lv $7^{32.\,33.\,34}$ $8^{25.\,26}$ 9^{21} $10^{14.\,15}$, Nu 6^{20} 18^{18}, 1 S 9^{24}, in all of which RV correctly renders 'thigh.' The שׁוֹק was a choice piece, and as such is mentioned in 1 S 9^{24} as having been reserved by Samuel for Saul. One of the chief points of difference, in the matter of the priestly revenues, between the Deuteronomic and the Priestly Code, is that in the latter the priest's share of a sacrifice is the breast and right thigh (Lv $7^{32\text{-}34}$), whereas in the former it is the head, maw, and shoulder (זְרוֹעַ, lit. 'arm,' Dt 18^3). See W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 383 note 3, and Driver, Deut. 215. (b) Of men. In Dt 28^{35} one of the curses threatened on disobedient Israelites is that they will be smitten 'upon the knees and upon the legs with an evil boil,' where the reference is probably (see Driver, ad loc.) to a species of elephantiasis.—In Ca 5^{15} the Shulammite compares the legs of her beloved to pillars of marble.—Nebuchadnezzar's image had his legs (Aram. שָׁקוֹהִי) of iron, Dn 2^{33}.—In Pr 26^7 the pointing of the text is somewhat doubtful. The MT has דַּלְיוּ שֹׁקַיִם מִפִּסֵּחַ (AV 'the legs of the lame are not equal' [AVm 'are lifted up'], RV 'the legs of the lame hang loose'). If we adopt RV tr^n, probably we ought to point דַּלְיוּ (so Ewald, Siegfried-Stade, and [doubtfully] Oxf. Heb. Lex.). Delitzsch (Comm.), followed by Kamphausen (in Kautzsch's AT) and Wildeboer (Comm.), points דִּלְיִי, which he takes to be a noun = 'a hanging down.' The tr^n of the verse would then be, 'as the hanging down of the legs of the lame,' etc. In any case the general sense of the passage is clear, namely that a 'parable' is as useless in the mouth of a fool as are the legs of a lame man.—In Ps 147^{10} 'legs' are a symbol of strength, '(The Lord) delighteth not in the strength of the horse, he taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man.'—For Jg 15^8 'He smote them שׁוֹק עַל־יָרֵךְ,' lit. 'leg upon thigh,' see art. HIP.

4. שֹׁבֶל in Is 47^2 is wrongly translated 'leg' in AV. The correct rendering is 'train.' The proud daughter of Babylon is called upon to assume the guise of a slave, to take the millstones and grind meal, to remove her veil, to strip off her train, to uncover her leg (שׁוֹק 'thigh'), i.e. to gird up her garments that she may wade through the rivers.

5. In NT σκέλος—only of the breaking of the legs to hasten death, which was practised on the two crucified robbers but not upon Jesus, Jn $19^{31ff.}$. This practice, known as σκελοκοπία (cf. the hap. leg. σκελοκοπεῖν in Ev. Petr. 4) or crurifragium, is referred to in Aur. Vict. Cæs. 41; Plaut. Asin. II. iv. 68; Cic. Rosc. Am. 20; Seneca, Ir. iii. 22, etc. (see full list in Keim, Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. vi. 253 note 3).

LEGION.—This word, familiar as it is to us, was not a familiar word to the inhabitants of Palestine in NT times, for the legions were stationed in the frontier provinces, and nothing happened to bring them into Judæa until the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (see AUGUSTUS' BAND). Λεγιών (so spelt in ℵ* B* D; λεγεών usually in AC) occurs in NT only in Mt 26^{53}, Mk $5^{9.15}$, Lk 8^{30}—and even so never in its proper sense of 'a legion of Roman soldiers'; it never occurs in LXX (so Hatch-Redpath); and it is rare (if it occurs at all) in Josephus (τάγμα stands for 'legion' in BJ ii. 544, iii. 8, 97, ed. Niese, et passim).* Nor, again, is there much evidence that the word in its Semitic form (לגיונא or לגיון, pl. לגיונא or לגיונין or לגיונות) was well known in Palestine early in the Christian era. It is found (S. A. Cook, Glossary of Aram. Inscr.) in the Palmyrene Inscriptions (1st-3rd cents. of the Christian era), and at least once in the OT Peshiṭta, Nu 24^{24} 'Legions shall go forth from the land of the Kittim' (similarly Targ. Jer. ib.). On the other hand, the word is fairly common in Talmudic and Midrashic literature (from 3rd cent. of the Christian era onwards), and some instances may be quoted in illustration of λεγιών in NT.

(1) It connotes a great number. 'It is easier to feed one legion in Galilee than one sucking child in the land of Israel' (Genesis Rab. xx. 6 fin., ed. Wilna, 1878).

(2) Connoting special and severe punishment. The waters of the Flood are compared to a 'cruel legion' (Gen. Rab. iv. 6; cf. also v. 6).

(3) Connoting (under certain circumstances) uncleanness. A legion on the march is unclean because skulls to be used as charms are always carried with it (Talm. Bab., Ḥull. 123^{a}).

(4) Connoting attendance on a king. God speaks of Israel at the passage of the Red Sea as 'My legions' (Exod. Rab. xxiii. 7). The tribe of Levi is the legion which stands in God the King's presence (Num. Rab. i. 12). God when He goes forth 'for peace' is attended by multitudes (אוכלוסין) and legions (Num. Rab. xi. p. 89, col. a, ed. Wilna).

These references illustrate both Mt 26^{53} ('Twelve legions of angels'); cf. (1) (4); and Mk 5^{9} ('legion; for we are many'); cf. (1) (2). The idea of uncleanness is not prominent in the word.

A Roman legion in our Lord's time was an army complete in itself, consisting of both infantry and cavalry, and amounting to upwards of 5000 men; cf. Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverwaltung, ii. p. 430 ff. See also Schürer, HJP I. ii. 49–51; Swete, St. Mark 5^{9} note; Plummer, St. Luke 8^{30} note; J. Levy, NHWB, s.v. לגיון.

LEHABIM (Gn 10^{13}, 1 Ch 1^{11} לְהָבִים, Λαβιείμ, Λαβείν, Vulg. Laabim) occurs as the name of a nation descending from Mizraim, i.e. nearly related to the Egyptians. Scholars always have noticed the great similarity of the name to that of the Lubim, Libyans. Some suppose Lehabim to be merely a corruption for original לוּבִים; others, a double writing of this name, which they suppose to be hidden in the לוּדִים Ludim connected with it; others suppose Lehabim and Ludim (Lubim ?) to have been different tribes of the same nation, therefore, with similar names. Certainly, the graphic similarity between h and u is small, only לאבים might form a transition. An insertion of h for phonetic reasons is anything but probable; the insertions of h in other cases are not sufficiently analogous. Therefore, the origin of the present form remains obscure. On the other hand, it can hardly be doubted that the Libyans are meant (see LUBIM). Strange etymologies such as from לַהַב 'flame,' i.e. those living in a flaming hot country (!), or wild guesses such as the translation of Walton's Arabic version, 'the inhabitants of Behnesa' (Middle Egypt, near Oxyrhynchus of the Greek time), deserve no consideration.

LEHI (לֶחִי 'jawbone,' 'cheek'; LXX Λευ(ε)ί, Λεχί, Σιαγών; Luc. Λεχεί; 'Α.Σ.Θ, Jos. Ant. V. viii. 8, 9 Σιαγών).—A place in Judah, the scene of Samson's slaughter of the Philistines, Jg 15^{9-19}. In 2 S 23^{11} לֶחְיָה 'to Lehi' (LXX Luc. ἐπὶ σιαγόνα), is to be read for לַחַיָּה 'to the troop (?).' The site is unknown. Schick (ZDPV x. 152 f.) suggests Khurbet es-Sijjâgh (σιαγών), 2 m. S.S.E. of Ṣor'ah; but see Smith, HGHL 222 n., and Moore, Judges 348, where other identifications are quoted. The name 'jawbone' must have been suggested by the formation of a prominent rock; cf. Ὄνου γνάθος, the name of a peninsula on the W. of Cape Malea, the S.E. promontory of the Peloponnese (Strabo, p. 363, ed. Casaub.). Perhaps Beer-lahai-roi (Gn 16^{14}) is to be explained in the same way, לְחִי ראי 'the jawbone of the antelope,' Arab. 'urwiye 'mountain goat' (Wellh. Proleg.^{3} 339 and n.; Ball, 'Genesis' in SBOT 66); cf. also the place-name in Arab., laḥy gamal 'camel's jawbone.'

The Philistine marauders made Lehi their headquarters for attacks upon the Hebrews of the district; the name of the place was suggestive; and tradition attached to it the story of Samson's exploit with the 'fresh jawbone' (lĕḥi) of an ass. Popular etymology explained Ramath-lehi, Jg 15^{17}, 'the height (from rûm) of Lehi,' as the place where Samson threw away (rāmāh) the jawbone; a hollow basin in the hill-side, shaped like a 'mortar' (maktēsh v.^{19}, cf. Zeph 1^{11}, Pr 27^{22}), which held the water of the 'Partridge Spring' ('ên hakḳôre', cf. 1 S 26^{20}, Jer 17^{11}), became the spring which God granted when Samson called (ḳārā') for help in his exhaustion (see EN-HAKKORE). Thus the legend was founded upon the popular explanation of these names; indeed the word בִּלְחִי v.^{16} might mean either 'in Lehi' or 'with a jawbone' (Moore, Judges 347). It is noteworthy that the exploit of Shammah, one of David's mighty men, also took place at Lehi, 2 S 23^{11} (see above), and bears considerable resemblance to the story of Samson. Cf. also the story of Shamgar, Jg 3^{31}.

G. A. COOKE.

LEMUEL (לְמוּאֵל or לְמוֹאֵל).—The name of a king otherwise unknown, to whom his mother addressed the words recorded in Pr 31^{2-9}. Most moderns understand Pr 30^{1} (see RVm) to imply that Lemuel was 'king of Massa' in Arabia; where lived the descendants of Massa, the son of Ishmael mentioned in Gn 25^{14}, 1 Ch 1^{30}. See AGUR. The name Lemuel may be compared with Jemuel in Gn 46^{10}, or Nemuel 1 Ch 4^{24}; and in meaning with Lael, a man consecrated 'to God,' in Nu 3^{24} (see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 207).

LENDING.—See DEBT.

* Λεγιών (λεγεών) does not appear in the Index Voc. Græc. in Havercamp's ed. of 1726, nor is Josephus cited s.v. in Liddell and Scott (ed. viii.), or in Stephanus (ed. Hase-Dindorf), or in Sophocles, Lexicon (ed. 1870).

LENTILS (עֲדָשִׁים 'ădâshîm, φακός, lens). — The authority of the LXX and Vulg., and the identity of the Arab. 'adas, make it certain that the grain intended in the four passages where 'ădâshîm occurs (Gn 25^{34}, 2 S 17^{28} 23^{11}, Ezk 4^{9}) is the lentil, Ervum Lens, L. It is an annual, of the order Leguminosæ, with pinnate, tendril-bearing leaves, of 5–6 pairs of oblong-linear leaflets, 1–4-flowered peduncles, white corolla, and ovate-rhombic, 1–2-seeded pods half an inch long. The seeds are lenticular, with a reddish outer coat. They are cultivated everywhere in the East. They are usually stewed with onions, rice, and oil, or small bits of meat and fat, and seasoned to the taste. This dish, which is known as mujedderah, is universal among the poor. It is by no means unpalatable, and is common enough on the tables of the rich also. The colour of it is a darkish-brown. It would seem that it was red in Esau's day (Gn 25^{30}). The term red, however, is a somewhat indefinite one in the East, and applies to a number of shades of red and brown. It was 'pottage' of lentils, similar to if not identical with mujedderah, for which Esau sold his birthright (v.^{34}). Lentil flour is still made into bread in Egypt by the very poor, as in ancient times (Ezk 4^{9}).

LEOPARD (נָמֵר nâmêr, πάρδαλις, pardus).—A well-known animal, Felis pardus, L., still called nimr in Arab., a name which, however, it shares with the tiger. It is a fierce carnivorous creature, often attaining a length of 4 ft. from the tip of the nose to the insertion of the tail. It is a type of ferocity (Is 11^{6}). It is exceedingly agile, and swift in its attacks (Hab 1^{8}). A four-winged leopard is used as a type of the Macedonian, or, according to another interpretation, of the Persian Empire (Dn 7^{6}). It is specially noted for the patience with which it waits, extended on the branch of a tree, or a rock near a watering-place, expecting its prey, on which it springs with a deadly precision. Hence 'a leopard shall watch over their cities' (Jer 5^{6}), and 'as a leopard by the way will I observe them' (Hos 13^{7}). The black spots on the yellow ground of its fur (Jer 13^{23}) make it one of the most beautiful of animals. The skins sometimes sell in Syria and Palestine for as much as £10. They are used as rugs and saddle covers. Some dervishes wear a leopard's skin over their back. Leopards are still found in Lebanon (cf. Ca 4^{8}), though rare. One was shot near Kefr Matta, within 15 miles of Beirût, in the winter of 1866–7, after it had killed 60 goats. A young one was taken at Bano, about 15 miles north of Tripoli, the same winter. One was seen at Jisr el-Ḳâḍi, about 10 miles from Beirût, a year or two before. They are not rare along the Liṭâny (Leontes), and in the Antilebanon, and the ravines which open into the Jordan Valley. Another species of leopard, Felis jubata, Schreb., the chetah, or hunting leopard, the fehd of the Arabs, is found in Galilee and Gilead. It is occasionally domesticated, and used by the Arabs for hunting. Both Nimr and Fehd are names commonly given to boys, as emblems or presages of strength and valour.

The word nâmêr, in its feminine form nimrah, and its plural form nimrîm, is several times used in the names of places, as 'Nimrah' and 'Beth-nimrah (Nu $32^{3,36}$), now Nahr Nimrîn, and the 'waters of Nimrim' (Is 15^{6}, Jer 48^{34}), and 'the mountains of the leopards' (nimrîm, Ca 4^{8}). The leopard is also alluded to in Sir 28^{23} and Rev 13^{2}.

G. E. POST.

LEPROSY (צָרַעַת or נֶגַע צָרַעַת ẓâra'ath, nega' ẓâra'ath; LXX and NT λέπρα).—A genus of diseases with which, in a special degree, the element of uncleanness was associated. The removal of other maladies is spoken of in NT as healing, but the removal of leprosy is called cleansing (Mt 8^{3} 10^{8} 11^{5}, Mk 1^{42}, Lk 4^{27} 7^{22} 17^{17}). The only case in which the verb ἰᾶσθαι is used in this connexion is in Lk 17^{15} in the case of the Samaritan, whose relation to the ceremonial law would perhaps not be recognized by a Jew: in all other passages it is καθαρίζειν. Leprosy also involved exclusion from the community as did no other disease; and the leper was looked upon, not only as defiled himself, but as a source of defilement to his neighbours.

There is an initial difficulty in the identification of these diseases, as the Greek word λέπρα is used by the early physicians as the name of a skin disease, now called psoriasis, characterized by an eruption of rough, scaly patches. Hippocrates, Polybius, and Paulus Ægineta treat it in general as a curable disease of not very serious import. This skin disease is neither contagious nor dangerous to life, nor, in most cases, productive of much inconvenience or suffering to the individual; and, except for the sense of disgust engendered by the disfigurement which it causes in the rare case of its affecting the face, it is not injurious to the community. And yet the LXX translators and St. Luke must have known of this use of the word which they employ as the equivalent of ẓâra'ath. On the other hand, the disease now called leprosy must have been known in Bible times, and could scarcely escape notice. Besides, other diseases of the skin did not produce ceremonial uncleanness, and this group of scaly eruptions which the Greeks called lepra was not necessarily associated with dirt or vice, and could scarcely be singled out from allied diseases as divine visitations; also the scaliness which, from the first, is distinctive of these, is not mentioned as a specific character.

The true leprosy has been known in India since the days of Atreya, about B.C. 1400; and it is said to be referred to in Japanese records about 500 years later. In the Egyptian papyrus Ebers, written in the reign of Amen-hotep I., about B.C. 1550, there are over a score of prescriptions for an apparently intractable disease called ukhedu, which attacked the head, the limbs, the face, and the body generally; which was attended with the development of bean-like nodules (ḥunḥun), open sores, or skin spots, which were liable to ulcerate, and had to be covered with plasters. The singular form of this word was probably khed, and in Coptic the derivative c̄hot is used for a swelling, and, with the status constructus of the verb er prefixed (erc̄hot), it is used for a sore or an ulcer. There is little doubt that this disease was leprosy. In the Coptic version of Leviticus another cognate word is used, çeht, to denote leprosy.

The first classical reference to the disease is in the Prorrhetica of Hippocrates (ii.), where, after referring to lepra, he mentions the Phœnician disease as a far more serious malady. There is also a reference to leprosy, although not by name, in a fragment of Hesiod quoted by Eustathius in his Comment. in Odyss. v. p. 1746. Galen mentions it under the name elephantiasis, and says that it is common in Alexandria, on account of the coarse food of the people. To this also Lucretius (vi. 1114) refers—

> 'Est elephas morbus qui propter flumina Nili
> Gignitur Ægypto in media neque præterea usquam.'

Some have supposed that the λειχὴν λευκός of Æschylus (Choephoroi, 281) is leprosy, but it is more probably the scaly psoriasis, as is the same word in Eumenides, 754. Themison is said by Cælius Aurelianus, iv. 1, to have described it about B.C. 100, but his description is lost. The scantiness of the references in classical literature before the beginning of the Christian era support the statement of Pliny (xxvi.), that it was brought into Europe from Syria by the army of Pompey (B.C. 61). Others of the Greek and Latin physicians of later date describe it under the name elephantiasis (Celsus iii. 25, and Soranus, according to Marcellus, xix.). Paulus Ægineta compares it to cancer of the whole body. Aretæus also gives a graphic description of its loathsome later stages. For an account of the characteristics of the advanced stages see Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 530.

The first biblical reference is in the account of the signs given by God to Moses whereby he was to prove to Pharaoh his divine commission (Ex 4^6 J); but in Ex 7^{10-13} (P), where his interview with Pharaoh is reported, there is no mention of this sign being shown. The reason of this omission is not difficult to understand. This incident may be the foundation of Manetho's story quoted by Josephus (c. Ap. i. 31), that Moses was a leper, and was expelled from Heliopolis on this account. Manetho also said that the Jews were driven out of Egypt because they were afflicted with this disease (ib. i. 26).

The second historical mention of it is very significant. In Nu 12^{10} the smiting of Miriam with leprosy is recorded. Here we have a graphic reference to the effects of the disease in Aaron's prayer for his sister, when he says, 'Let her not, I pray thee, be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed (eaten away) when he cometh out of his mother's womb' (v.^{12}).

In Lv 13 there are minute instructions given for the recognition of these diseases in their early stages. Here the name is used with nega' prefixed to indicate that it is regarded as a 'stroke from God' (cf. Vulgate rendering of 'smitten' by leprosum in Is 53^4). There are here apparently seven varieties of the disease to be distinguished. (1) שְׂאֵת sĕ'êth, LXX οὐλή, a rising of the skin or subcutaneous nodule. (2) סַפַּחַת ṣappaḥath, LXX σημασία, a scab or cuticular crust. (3) בַּהֶרֶת bahereth, LXX τηλαύγημα, a bright or shining spot. These are the earliest appearances, and even at this stage the disease is said to exhibit the two distinctive features of being really subcuticular, and of turning the hairs white. If these diagnostic marks are present when the suspect is brought before the priest, he is to be pronounced unclean at once; but if not, he is to be shut up for seven days, and then again inspected. Should the disease have undergone no change during this period, he is again to be isolated for another week, and again examined. (4) Another form, or perhaps a later stage of the disease, is that in which 'quick raw flesh,' that is, red granulation tissue, appears in the tumid spot (v.^{10}); this was to be recognized as a sure sign, and the person declared unclean. (5) One of the most singular provisions of the law is that in v.^{13}, referring to the cases in which the white efflorescence becomes universal from head to foot; when this occurs, the person is pronounced clean. It is probable that in this case the priest was to consider it as a form of psoriasis, and not as a genuine leprosy, which is rarely universal until a late stage, and then is not white. If, however, any sign of the coexistence of leprous ulceration with the whiteness should appear, he is to be declared unclean (v.$^{14f.}$). To provide for the case in which this redness or sore is only a temporary pustule, such as often occurs in almost any skin disease, the patient is to come again to the priest as soon as the sore is healed, when he is again to be pronounced clean (v.$^{16f.}$).

In all these cases the diagnosis in the early stages is between leprosy in which the infiltration is dermal and the hairs lose their colour, and eczema or psoriasis in which the swelling is chiefly epidermal and the hairs do not change. If, during the periods of quarantine, the spot appears to be fading (כֵּהָה kāhāh, RV 'dim,' AV 'somewhat dark,' following LXX ἀμαυρά), and not spreading, he is to be pronounced clean, and the disease is said to be only מִסְפַּחַת mispaḥath, a scab, i.e. psoriasis, unless on further inspection it appeared to be spreading.

(6) Another variety, described in v.^{18}, is that which attacks the cicatrix of an ulcer or a boil, שְׁחִין shĕḥîn, in which there is a white rising, sĕ'êth lĕbhânâh, that is, a smooth shining spot, red in patches; the description seems to indicate some one of an obscure group of diseases of the skin, called by various names, cicatricial keloid, scleriasis, etc. Between all these diseases and leprosy there are many points of resemblance, but there is no evidence that they are contagious. In doubtful cases the priest is to require a week's quarantine in order to decide whether it is true leprosy or only ẓârebeth hashshĕḥîn (RV 'the scar of the boil,' AV 'a burning boil'), a temporary swelling from the irritation of the scar, or else only the cicatrix itself (v.^{23}). A similar form of the disease may attack the scar of a burn (v.^{24}), and is to be treated in the same way.

(7) The form of disease affecting the hairy scalp (v.^{30}) is called נֶתֶק netheḳ (LXX θραῦσμα, AV 'a dry scall'), and is to be diagnosed by the presence of thin yellow hairs. Every suspicious case is to be inspected, and if there be no black hair in the spot whereby its nature may be tested, the person is to be subjected to a week's quarantine, after which, if the disease is not spreading, all the hair is to be shaven except that on the scall. If, after another week's seclusion, the scall still appears to be spreading, he is to be pronounced unclean, whether there be yellow hair or not. In the Tract Negaim, x. 5, it is directed that two hairs should be left in shaving the part, outside the margin of the scall, so as to test its spreading. Yellow thin hair and yellow crusts are characteristic of favus or crusted ringworm, which is a very contagious disease, due to the presence of a fungus, Achorion Schœnleinii. The presence of black hair in any diseased patch is usually sufficient evidence that no parasitic fungus is present.

In v.$^{38ff.}$ rules are given for the diagnosis of behârōth lĕbhânōth, white shining spots on the skin,—whether another variety of disease or not it is difficult to say. If these are dim or dull in colour, they are only 'freckled spots' (AV, 'tetters' RV). This eruption, which is called בֹּהַק bōhaḳ (ẓaḥar in Jerus. Targ., LXX ἀλφός), is probably the λέπρα of the older Greek physicians, the vitiligo of Celsus, and does not render the sufferer unclean. A common eczematous skin disease is called in some places in Arabia by this name still; see Forskål's note to Niebuhr's Arabia, 1774, 119. According to Minch, a form of vitiligo is prevalent among the Sarts of Turkestan and is called by them pycz. Those afflicted with it are segregated from the community along with the lepers, as it is regarded as contagious. Baldness and forehead baldness are distinguished from leprosy in vv.$^{40-41}$, unless they are complicated by the other signs of leprosy, in which case the man is to be pronounced utterly unclean, as the plague is in the head.

The Rabbinic comments on these regulations in Negaim, Siphra, and Mechilta are very prolix, and add nothing to our real knowledge of the disease. R. Chanina recognizes 16 kinds; R. Dosa, 32; and Akiba, 72. In Jalkut on Job 28^{25} man is said to be made up half of water and half of blood; if he sin, this balance is disturbed,—either the water becomes excessive and he is dropsical, or the blood increases and he becomes leprous. Many of the later commentators, medical and otherwise, are not much better. See Mason Good, Study of Medicine, iv.

For those pronounced unclean there was no further seclusion; but they are to be excluded from the community, to live outside the towns, with rent clothes (in the case of men; women were not to rend their garments, Sota ii. 8), and the hair of their head going loose. They are directed to cover their upper lip, and to cry 'unclean.' This exclusion is represented as put in practice when the tabernacle was constructed (Nu 5^2, P), and Miriam was one of those temporarily shut out in the early days of the law (Nu 12^{14}, JE). The Deuteronomic code refers to these laws (Dt 24^8). The four lepers of 2 K 7^3 were thus outside Samaria even during the siege. According to Negaim xii. 11, if lepers entered into a house, they rendered it unclean (see also Kelim i. 4); or, if under a tree, they defiled any one passing beneath its shade. As they could not enter a walled town, they were excluded from synagogue services there; but in unwalled towns there was often a place set apart for them in the synagogue, into which they could enter before the rest of the congregation; but they could not leave until every one else had departed. Any transgression of these rules was punished by 40 stripes (see Otho, Lex. Rabbin. 324).

The Jews regarded leprosy as a contagious disease, and recent investigations have confirmed this opinion, although it is not communicated very easily, and seems to have a long incubation period. It is produced by a specific schizomycetous fungus, Bacillus lepræ, discovered by Hansen in 1871, which is of very minute size. These organisms retain their vitality for a long time. Köbner found them living in a piece of leprous tissue that had lain forgotten, wrapped in a piece of paper, for ten years. It is a peculiarly human parasite, the result of many experiments showing that it is not communicable to animals by inoculation. The bacillus has been found, though sparingly, in the earth of a pathway frequented by lepers at the Almora Asylum. Cases like that of Damien show that it is communicable to healthy persons. For other instances see Abraham in Allbutt's System of Medicine, ii. 41. It is interesting to note that Calmet long ago supposed leprosy to be due to organisms, which he describes as animalculæ that eat the skin from within (Comm. on Levit.).

It was probably a fairly common disease among the Jews (Lk 4^{27}), although not many cases are mentioned; but there are more references to it than to any other ailment. It has been supposed, though without any reason, that the kiln-work in Egypt fostered it in the days before the Exodus. Buxtorf, however, says it is not as common among the Jews as among other peoples, and ascribes this to their separateness, and to their abstinence especially from swine's flesh (see Tacitus, Hist. v. 4). In the NT there are records of only twelve cases: the ten lepers in Lk 17^{12}, the leper in Mt 8^2 whom our Lord touched (cf. Mk 1^{40}, Lk 5^{12}), and Simon the leper (Mt 26^6, Mk 14^3); but these are only specially selected cases, for He commanded His disciples to cleanse the lepers (Mt 10^8; see also Mt 11^5 and Lk 7^{22}).

The course of the disease is slow, especially in the early stages; there are cases on record of persons who lived as lepers for 40 years. Observations in Trinidad gave an average of nearly 9 years as the duration of the disease (Beavan Rake). According to Danielssen, in Norway, and Carter, in Bombay, the average duration of life in the nodular form is about 9 years, and in the form which affects the nerves and causes anæsthesia (the commonest form in the East) it is 18½ years. Cures are rare; the official report for Norway gives 38 cures during the period 1881–85 (the total number of lepers there in 1892 was 500). Simon the leper may have been one of those cured by Christ (for traditions see Ambrose, Comm. on Lk 6; Theophylact in Mt 26; Nicephorus, HE i. 27). In the early stages there are often few symptoms and little discomfort, and sometimes 'the eruption may vanish altogether, giving rise to illusory hopes of cure' (Abraham). It is therefore easy to understand how a great general like Naaman might retain his office although a leper (2 K 5^1). (See in this connexion Jos. Ant. III. xi. 4). King Robert the Bruce, who according to Ker (ii. 357) died of this disease, was apparently suffering from it when he held the Parliament at Cambuskenneth, and organized his last invasion of England. According to a doubtful tradition the emperor Constantine was a leper; see Zonaras, Annales, xiii. c. 3.

The sudden infliction of leprosy as a divine judgment is recorded not only in the case of Miriam, but also in that of Gehazi (2 K 5^{27}), which could not be due to infection, although it is called the leprosy of Naaman, as in all known instances the incubation period is much longer. There is also the example of Uzziah (2 K 15^5, 2 Ch 26^{23}). Of him it is said that he lived in a בֵּית הַחָפְשִׁית beth haḥophshîth, LXX οἶκος ἀπφουσώθ (or ἀφφουσώθ, or ἀφφουσιών), 'a several house' or (RVm) 'a lazar house.' According to Jos. Ant. IX. x. 4, this judgment was accompanied by an earthquake (see Zec $14^{4.5}$). This author also states that, being a leper, Uzziah was buried in his own garden; but another account is given in Ch. Herodotus says that the Persians believed that a man was afflicted with leprosy for having committed some offence against the sun; that every stranger who had the disease was driven out of the country; and that they even destroyed white pigeons, thinking them to be leprous (i. 138). For other references to leprosy as a judgment see Erachin 16; Baba Bathra 10. 4; Midrash Rabba on Lv 14, etc. Chrysostom says, however, that in his day lepers were not excluded from the cities (Vidi Dominum, etc. iv.).

The heredity of leprosy was generally believed in by the Jews; it is referred to in the curse on Joab (2 S 3^{29}), and in the punishment of Gehazi (2 K 5^{27}). The Leprosy Commission in India could discover a history of heredity only in 5 per cent.; and of the 108 cases in the Tarn Taran Asylum only 16 had a leprous parent or grandparent. No treatment is referred to in the Bible; the washing of Naaman was a trial of faith, not a remedy (in connexion with his speech about Abana and Pharpar see Strabo, viii. 3. § 19, concerning the river Alpheus). Jehoram, from his ejaculation in 2 K 5^7, evidently thought leprosy beyond human skill to cure.

The date of the spread of the malady to Western Europe is unknown, but it was in Britain before the first Crusade, as the leper house at Canterbury was founded in 1096, the year of the starting of the Crusade. Between that date and the building of the last in 1472, one hundred and twelve such asylums were set apart for lepers in England. In early Christian times there were special rules for lepers. The Council of Ancyra (314) excluded them from the churches, and ordered them to remain outside with demoniacs and those guilty of unnatural crimes, all of whom were called hiemantes (χειμαζόμενοι) on this account (Martene, Coll. Ampliss. vii. p. 1365). It is supposed that the small skew window often seen in old churches, and commanding a view of the altar, was for the purpose of allowing the hiemantes to see the mass, hence these squints are often called leper windows or hagioscopes. The Third Council of Orleans forbade lepers to wander from one diocese to another; and Gregory II., in his letter to Boniface in A.D. 715, directed the administration of the Eucharist to them by themselves. The bishops were also ordered to supply them with food and raiment out of the Church funds.

There is no reference in the Bible to leprosy as a type of sin; the nearest approach to this is in Ps 51^{7}, where the reference is to the ceremonial cleansing of the leper. Among the Fathers, also, there are few who take note of a similitude so familiar in modern homiletics. Origen (Hom. vii. in Nu) speaks of heretics outside the Church as having leprosy of mind; and Chrysostom (Hom. iv. in Ti 2) is one of the earliest writers who directly compares the defilement of sin to leprosy. The one part, indeed, of the Levitical law which is most often noticed, is the cleanness of the man who is all leprous, and this is used to illustrate the most diverse lessons by Tertullian (de Pudicitia, xx.), Theodoret (Quæstiones in Lv 13), and Origen (in Levit. viii. 231). In one of the epistles doubtfully attributed to Jerome, he treats of the various kinds of leprosy (Ep. xxxiv.). Leprosy was most commonly regarded as a type of heresy rather than of other sin (Rupertus Tuitiensis, p. 271; Bede, in loco, 'Lepra doctrina falsa est'; see also Rabanus Maurus, Allegoria, s.v. 'Lepra').

When a leper became cured of his plague, he did not resume his place in the community until he had been ceremonially cleansed. The priest went outside the city to look on him, and if he saw that he was healed (1) he commanded that two living clean birds be brought, with a rod of cedar wood (probably juniper, the wood of Juniperus oxycedrus supposed to be incapable of decaying) a cubit long (Neg. 14. 6), scarlet (wool), and hyssop ('the humblest plant for a disease generated by pride,' Midrash Rabba, Koheleth 10. 4). One bird was to be killed, in an earthen vessel, over running water—that is, water from a running stream is to be put into the earthen vessel to keep the blood liquid, and as a type of purification. The living bird and the cedar, to which the hyssop was to be tied with the scarlet woollen band, are to be dipped in the blood, and the leper is to be sprinkled therewith seven times. Some have supposed that, as 'the blood is the life,' this signifies the imparting of a new life to one who has, ceremonially, been dead. He is then declared clean, and therefore permitted to come into the city; and the living bird is set free in the open country—a symbol of the carrying away of the evil (see Frazer, Golden Bough, ii. 151). (2) The leper is then to wash his clothes, shave off all his hair, and bathe; but must stay outside his house for 7 days; he then repeats the ablutions and shaving, and (3) on the 8th day makes his final offering at the temple. This consists (a) of a guilt-offering of a he-lamb, which with a log (about 3 gills) of olive oil was to be waved before the Lord, and the lamb was to be killed. The priest was then to take some of its blood, and to touch with it the right ear, the right thumb, and the right great toe of the cleansed man; the priest was then to pour the consecrated oil into the palm of his left hand, and, dipping his right forefinger in it, he was to sprinkle some of it seven times before the Lord, and then to touch with it the places upon which the blood of the guilt-offering had been put, and the rest of the oil was to be poured on the leper's head. This offering was a reparation to God for the loss of service during the time of his seclusion—the blood and oil typifying atonement and reconsecration. (b) A second he-lamb was to be offered as a sin-offering, as an atonement for sin on his readmission into the congregation, and afterwards (c) a ewe-lamb was to be offered as a burnt-offering, and $\frac{3}{10}$ths of an ephah (about $7\frac{1}{2}$ quarts) of flour as a meal-offering. During these ceremonies the man stood in the Nicanor gate between the Court of the women and the Court of Israel, into which he was not free to enter until the purification was accomplished. A poor man was allowed to substitute two doves for the second pair of lambs, one for the sin-offering and one for the burnt-offering, and needed only to bring $\frac{1}{10}$th of an ephah of flour for the meal-offering (Lv 14^{1-32}).

In mediæval times a man who was a leper was formally excluded from the Church by a funeral mass, in which earth was thrown on his feet as a sign of symbolic burial, the priest saying 'sis mortuus mundo, vivens iterum Deo.' The leper then laid aside his garments in the church and put on a black habit. An account of the rituals observed in connexion with lepers is given by Martene (de Rit. Antiq. iii. 10). The ceremonies for the readmission of those healed were similar to the penitential and reconciliation ceremonies for the other hiemantes.

Opinions are divided as to the nature of Job's disease. The Talmudists called it ḥakok or scratching leprosy (Baba Kamma 80*b*). From the description of the symptoms ($2^{7f.}$) and of his isolation (19^{14-21}), it has been supposed to be some form of leprosy * (see MEDICINE). For older opinions on the subject see Wedel, de Morbo Hiobi, Jena, 1687.

Leprosy in Garments.—In Lv $13^{47ff.}$ is a description of certain reddish or greenish discolorations in garments, woollen, linen, or leathern, which are called ẓāraʻath mamʼereth (v.^{51}), a fretting leprosy, eating a hole in a garment. It is probably the effect of a fungus or mildew, said, but with slight evidence, to be from the use of the wool of dead or diseased sheep (Michaelis, Com. on Laws of Moses, iii. 290), or from the skin of a diseased animal; but this would not account for its attacking linen. Whether it is due to a specific parasite (as Formstecher supposed, Isr. des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts, 1847, No. 32) or not is uncertain, but this is improbable. If after a week's seclusion the stain spreads, the garment is pronounced unclean, and is to be burnt. If it have not spread, the fabric is to be washed and shut up for seven days more, when, if it remain unchanged, it is to be burnt; but if it fade after washing, the spot is to be torn out and burnt, and the rest of the garment is to be washed and pronounced clean. Where garments are worn for a long time, as they often are in the East, fungus growths are not unlikely to occur. It has been supposed that the 'garment spotted by the flesh' of Jude^{23} refers to this; perhaps also there is a reference in Job 13^{28} and 30^{18}.

Leprosy in the House.—Certain discoloured patches on the inner walls of a house are said to be leprous (Lv $14^{34ff.}$). These are described as hollow strakes, shĕḳaʻărûrōth, that is, depressed spots, coloured greenish or reddish. When discovered, the occupant is to empty the house, lest, if pronounced unclean, all in the house be defiled. The priest is then called to inspect, and he shuts up the house for a week. If it spread in this time, the stones are to be taken out and cast into an unclean place; the plaster is to be scraped off the walls, and the house re-plastered. If no return take place, the house is clean; but if it recur, the whole house is to be destroyed. Before the cleansed house is inhabited, a cleansing ceremony similar to the first part of the cleansing ceremony of the leper is to be performed. It is probable that this disease is the formation of a flocculent mass of calcium nitrate, such as often takes place when the gases set free from decaying animal matter act on the lime of plaster, and is sometimes called mural salt. This, with an accompaniment of mould or other hyphomycetous fungus, produces an appearance like that described (see Blechrodt, Theoret.-Pract. Abhandl. über die Ursachen der Feuchtigkeit in Gebäuden, Weimar, 1839, 45). Jerome spiritualizes this plague, 'Arbitror cum in parietibus domus lepra esse referatur, hæreticam perfidiam notari' (Ep. xxxiv.).

LITERATURE.—The bibliography of leprosy is immense, but most of the older treatises are of little value. The best are Bartholinus, de Morbis Biblicis, Hafniæ, 1671; also the treatises of Dorndorf (Zurich, 1728), Withof (Duisburg, 1758), Eschenbach (Rostock, 1774), Chamseru (Mém. de la societé d'émulation, Paris, 1810, iii. 335), Jahn (Biblische Archäologie, Wien, 1818, ii. 355), Zensler (Geschichte des abendländischen Aussatzes).

For the modern literature the most useful works are Abraham, in Allbutt's System of Medicine, ii. 41; Report of the Leprosy Commission to India, London, 1893; also Report of the Commission to the Cape of Good Hope, 1894-95; Hillis, Leprosy in British Guiana, 1881; Carter, Leprosy and Elephantiasis, 1874; Rake, Reports of the Trinidad Asylum, 1889-1893; Danielssen and Boeck, Traité de la Spédalskhed, Paris, 1898; Minch, Prokaza na Tuge Rossii, Kiev, 1889; Fox and Farquhar, Endemic Skin Diseases of India, London, 1876; Wolters in Centralblatt für Bakteriologie, xiii. 1893; Simpson, Edinburgh Medical Journal, 1841-42, vols. lvi., lvii.; Thin, Leprosy, London, 1893; J. R. Bennett, Diseases of the Bible, 1887. For an account of the Knights of St. Lazarus, who had always a leper for their Grand Master, see Hélyot, Ordres Monast. 1721; Mochsen, de med. equit. dignit. ornat. p. 56.

On the Levitical prescriptions regarding leprosy, see, above all, Dillmann-Ryssel, Ex-Lv, p. 553 ff., where further references to the literature of the subject will be found.

A. MACALISTER.

LESHEM (לֶשֶׁם).—A form, occurring only in Jos $19^{47\ bis}$, of the name Laish (which see). Wellh. (de Gentibus, etc. 47) emends לְשֵׁם, which is admitted by Dillm. to have been 'perhaps' the original pronunciation.

LESSAU (A Λεσσαού, V$^{\text{vid}}$ Δεεσαού).—A village (κώμη) where an encounter took place between the Jews and Nicanor, 2 Mac 14^{16}. The site is unknown, and the text is uncertain. Dessau of AV may be due to the frequent interchange of Λ and Δ in uncial Greek, or (as Ewald conjectured) it may be another form of Adasa (cf. 1 Mac 7^{40}).

LET.—There are two Anglo-Saxon verbs somewhat alike in spelling but directly opposite in meaning, lætan to permit, and lettan to hinder. In middle English lætan became leten, and lettan became letten, and they were still distinguishable. The double t was kept by careful writers in the verb meaning 'to hinder,' or the subst. meaning 'hindrance,' as by Milton in Areopagitica (Hales ed. p. 57, l. 1), 'evill hath abounded in the Church by this lett of licencing.' But when it was dropped there was no way, except by the general sense of the passage, of distinguishing two words whose meanings were so different that a mistake was equivalent to the insertion or omission of a not. In AV the verb occurs six times with the sense of 'hinder,' and is always spelt in the ed. of 1611 with one t, Ex 5^4 'Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works?' (תַּפְרִיעוּ, RV 'loose'); Nu $22^{16\ \text{marg.}}$ 'Be not thou letted from coming unto me' (text, 'Let nothing hinder thee'); Is 43^{13} 'I will work, and who shall let it?' (יְשִׁיבֶנָּה, AVm 'shall turn it back,' RVm 'reverse it'); Wis 7^{22} 'an understanding spirit . . . which cannot be letted' (ἀκώλυτον, RV 'unhindered'); Ro 1^{13} 'oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, (but was let hitherto)' (ἐκωλύθην, RV 'was hindered'); 2 Th 2^7 'only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way' (ὁ κατέχων, RV 'one that restraineth'). The verb occurs also in Pr. Bk., Collect for 4th Sun. in Advent, 'we are sore let and hindered in running the race that is set before us.' In the Pr. Bk. of 1552, 1559, and 1604 (Communion), we read, 'It is an easy matter for a man to say, I will not communicate, because I am otherwise letted with worldly business'; but in 1662 'letted' was changed into 'hindered.' Examples from the earlier versions which have been changed in AV are Job 31^{31} Cov. 'Yet they of myne owne housholde saye: who shal let us, to have oure bely ful of his flesh?' 1 P 3^7 Tind. 'that youre prayers be not let.' Cranmer is fond of the word, frequently using it along with one or more synonyms, as Works, i. 82, 'she wrote letters to the Pope, calling upon him in God's behalf to stop and let the said marriage'; p. 85, 'do not interrupt, let, or hinder the said David.'

As a subst. 'let' is found in AV only in the heading to Dt 15, 'It must be no let of lending or giving.' It occurs occasionally in Pr. Bk. In the Preface to the Scotch Liturgy of 1637 we read, 'After many lets and hindrances, the same cometh now to be published, to the good, we trust, of all God's people, and the increase of true piety, and sincere devotion amongst them.' 'In all our promises,' says Tindale (Expos. p. 57), 'it is to be added, If God will, and If there be no lawful let.'

J. HASTINGS.

LETHECH occurs in AVm and RVm of Hos 3^2 instead of 'an half homer' which is read in the text of both AV and RV. Both the original reading of the passage and the capacity of the measure (?), called lethech, are uncertain. For the MT לֵתֶךְ שְׂעֹרִים the LXX reads νέβελ οἴνου, 'a skin of wine,' which may or may not imply that a different Heb. text from the present lay before the Greek translator (see Nowack, ad loc.). According to Jewish tradition, the lethech=½ homer=4 bushels. See art. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. It has been computed that the whole amount of grain here mentioned would have been equal in value to 15 shekels of silver, so that the price paid by Hosea in money and kind together would be 30 shekels. He thus re-acquired his wife for the cost of a slave (cf. Ex 21^{32}).

LETTER.—See EPISTLE.

LETUSHIM (לְטוּשִׁם, Λατουσιείμ) and LEUMMIM (לְאֻמִּים, Λοωμ(ι)είμ).—Sons of Dedan, Gn 25^3. The MT gives the names of Dedan's sons as Ashurim, Letushim, and Leummim; but the LXX prefixes to this list Raguel (Ῥαγουήλ) and Nabdeel (Ναβδεήλ). The three given by the MT are pointed as plurals, and hence were regarded by some ancient interpreters as descriptive epithets (so Targ. Onk.); and the third of the names, Leummim ('nations' in Heb.), lends itself well to that explanation; some races which the ethnologist chose to classify among Dedanites may have been known as 'nations' or 'hordes,' just as the Berbers are called by the Arabs Ḳabā'il or 'tribes,' and their language Ḳabīlī. For Letushim the Rabbis (Rashi, ad loc.) suggest an etymology from the Hebrew verb נָטַשׁ meaning 'scattered'; they can indeed point with justice to the interchange of ל and נ at the beginning of words, but this explanation does not seem satisfactory. The apparent connexion of this word with the verb לָטַשׁ 'to sharpen' is rather in favour of the view (taken by Steiner in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon) that the words represent names of trades; and such a classification would bear a curious likeness to that of the S. Arabian Parias, some of whom are called Ḥā'ik, 'weavers,' etc. (Maltzan, Reisen in Arabien, i. 190, 191). The greater number of authorities, however, regard these words as proper names, and Letushim has been compared with לטשו of some Nabatæan inscriptions (Ley, ZDMG xiv. 403, 404), while a name resembling Leummim has been found in a Sabæan inscription (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). If they are personal names, the final ם could be more easily explained from Sabæan than from Nabatæan. Glaser (Skizze, ii. 461) thinks the home of the tribes thus designated is to be sought in the Sinaitic peninsula, but he throws no new light on the name.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

LEVI (לֵוִי, LXX Λευ(ε)ί(ν)).—Son of Jacob and

Leah. The meaning and derivation of the name are uncertain. (1) In Gn 29^{34} (J) Levi is interpreted as joined, i.e. husband to wife; the root lavah is used with this meaning in the reflexive conjugation (Niphal), Is $56^{3.6}$, Ps 83^{8}: in Arab. it = 'turn, bend.' In Nu $18^{2.4}$ (P) there is a word-play; the tribe of Levi is joined to, attendant on, Aaron. After the establishment of the Levites as subordinate temple ministers, this meaning was read into their name; it does not, of course, represent an etymology in the strict sense. (2) Lagarde, Orientalia ii. 20, Mittheilungen i. 54 ff., explains Levites as those who attached themselves to, accompanied, the Israelites at the Exodus from Egypt; like Moses, they were Egyptians. The name might also mean those who were attached to the ark. Thus Levi is not a name like the names of the other patriarchs, but an adjective; and it need not have borne the same meaning in the time of Ezra as in the time of Solomon or Moses. (3) Baudissin, Gesch. AT Priesterthums 72 n.[1], finds in the name an original abstract meaning, lēv = 'following, escort,' from which the adj. lēvi was formed, in the sense of one who escorted the ark. The name was thus first given to the tribe of priestly servants, and from them to the ancestor of the tribe. Against these views see Kautzsch, SK, 1890, 771 f., who points out that the manner in which Levi is connected with Simeon by a merely genealogical and political relationship, such as exists in the case of the other sons of Jacob, makes it impossible to see in Levi the special character which the above views presuppose. The name of the tribe was not derived from the name of any official function; the escort of the ark was not the prerogative of the Levites only, for in the older narratives it is the priests who have this charge. Similarly, Stade, ZATW i. 1881, 112–116, insists, with reason, that no different origin can be allowed to Levi than is given to the other patriarchs. Against deriving lēvi from lavah, he urges the form of the noun with ē, and the fact that in early times Levi was a purely secular tribe, Gn 49^{5-7}. (4) Hommel, Aufsätze u. Abhandlungen 30 f., Süd-Arab. Chrestom. 127, AHT 278 f., connects levi with lavi'u (fem. lavi'at) = priest, on the Minæan inscriptions from el-Ola, N. of Medina; and Mordtmann, Beiträge z. minäischen Epigraphik, 1897, 43, and Sayce, Early Hist. of the Hebs. 1897, 80, agree with him. The usage of the word in these inscriptions ('a priest of Wadd,' 'his priestess') is, however, very different from the usage of Levi in the OT. Such an expression as 'a Levite of J''' is never found; and the primary meaning of Levite is not 'priest,' but 'a member of the tribe of Levi.' (5) Wellhausen, Prolegomena^{3} 146, proposes an etymology which has been widely accepted, and may be considered the most plausible yet put forward: Levi is simply a gentilic form of his mother's name, Leah = 'wild cow' (Arab. la'ay, la'at). So Stade, ZATW i. 112–116, GVI i. 146, 152 f.; Gray, Hebr. Pr. Names 96, etc. Nöldeke on the whole accepts this, though not without hesitation, ZDMG xl. 1886, 167.* Robertson Smith, who maintains that 'the most ancient division of the Israelites is between Rachel and Leah,' both animal names, detects in this family history the presence of the matriarchal system of reckoning descent, and the custom of calling tribes after the names of animals (totemism); Kinship and Marriage 30, 195, 219 f., 257. (6) Two other etymologies may be mentioned. Wellhausen, Skizzen u. Vorarbeiten iii. 114 n. [the note is omitted in the second edition (1897), p. 119], alludes to the ancient Arabic custom of consuming the flesh of a sacrifice at a family meal. A portion of the flesh was set aside for a guest whom it was desired to treat with special honour (cf. 1 S 9^{23}), and called the lavijja (Agh. vii. 76. 6). The lavijja would be the priests' portion; hence possibly the origin of the name Levi. In this connexion we can hardly fail to remember the Minæan lavi'u = 'priest.' G. H. Skipwith, in the JQR xi. 1899, 264, ingeniously connects levi with leviathan, the root lavah describing the coils of the serpent. This suggests that Levi derived his name from a serpent-god, and may explain why the Levite Moses selected the brazen serpent, Nehushtan, as an emblem of the God of Israel!

Early history of Levi.—An incident in the early history of Levi is preserved in Gn 34. The young Canaanite chief, Shechem, had conceived a passion for Dinah, the sister of Simeon and Levi, and had 'humbled' her, to the indignation of the sons of Jacob (vv.$^{2b.3a.5.7}$). The two brothers undertook to avenge the outrage themselves; they assassinated Shechem, and carried off Dinah out of his house (vv.$^{25b.26}$). That the action of Simeon and Levi was treacherous and savage is implied in J, the earlier of the two documents which are combined in Gn 34. Shechem had accepted the terms imposed upon him by the father and brethren of the damsel (vv.$^{11.12.19}$). What the terms were is not stated; possibly the circumcision of the bridegroom before marriage (Wellhausen, Proleg.^{3} 355 n., Composition 319: cf. Ex 4^{24-26}, and Robertson Smith, RS 310), or the grant of a piece of territory to Jacob near Shechem (Cornill, ZATW, 1891, 12, cf. Gn $37^{12ff.}$). Whatever the agreement was, Simeon and Levi violated it, and acted independently of their brethren, who took no part in the deed of violence, and of their father, who bitterly resented it. We may notice that Jacob's reproof is prompted by instincts of self-preservation, and not by moral displeasure. The two brothers, however, take up a moral ground in their retort, evidently with the sympathy of the narrator ($34^{30.31}$).*

The story may be understood to describe an episode in the early struggles of Israel in Canaan after the Exodus. The attachment of Shechem, son of Hamor, to Dinah, daughter of Jacob, will then represent an alliance between a branch of the Israelite family and the city of Shechem; and the action of Simeon and Levi may be interpreted either as an attempt to seize by force this important city for themselves, or as a blow struck to free the Israelite element in the city from the danger of being swallowed up by the Canaanite majority. Whatever the motive may have been, the tradition is clear that there was treachery and violence on the Israelite side, and that in consequence Simeon and Levi received a repulse from which they never recovered. Simeon became merged in Judah, with undefined possessions on the S. frontier (cf. Jos 19^{1-9} with $15^{26-32.42}$), though the tribe does not seem to have been so completely shattered as Levi (Jg $1^{3.17}$); while Levi also found shelter in Judah, but for the most part became a homeless wanderer in the territory of the other tribes.

This is the state of things implied in Gn 49^{5-7} 'I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in

* Of the sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons of Levi, almost half have names with this gentilic ending, e.g. Merari, Mahli, Mushi (from Mosheh, Moses), Libni, Shimei, Bukki, Uzzi, Kishi, etc. (Nu 3^{17-21} 26^{58}, 1 Ch 6^{1-48}).

* The above follows the earlier narrative, J. In the other account, by some assigned to E (Wellh., Cornill, Holzinger), by others to P (Dillmann, Driver P possibly based on E, Ball P^{2}), Hamor, on behalf of his son, negotiates a general marriage alliance, vv.$^{8.9}$; the circumcision of all males is stipulated and accepted as the condition, vv.$^{14-17.20-24a}$, and all the sons of Jacob wreak their vengeance with wholesale slaughter vv.$^{25ac.27-29}$ (cf. the later narratives of the conquest of Canaan). Perhaps the vengeance was ascribed to all Israel because of the later feeling about mixed marriages, cf. Nu 25^{6-9} 31^{7-11} (P), Ezr 9^{12} 10. If this narrative belongs to E, an editor of the school of P (vv.$^{15b.22b.24}$) has worked over the whole after the combination of J and E. See especially on this ch. Kuenen, ThT xiv. 257 = Gesammelte Abhandlungen vi.; Wellhausen, Composition 312–319; Cornill, ZATW, 1891, 1–15.

Israel.' The verses express, in the language of vigorous denunciation, the popular verdict upon the offending tribes. It must have taken shape not long after the deed was done; and as the incident of Gn 34 belongs most probably to the early days of the conquest of Canaan, this will agree very well with the date generally accepted for the Blessing of Jacob, the period of the Judges, Samuel, and David. Neither Simeon nor Levi is mentioned in the Song of Deborah, Jg 5.

Levi and the Priesthood.—The next important evidence for the early history of Levi is furnished by Jg 17 and 18, a most ancient document. Here, for the first time, the Levite is a priest. The following facts are to be gleaned from these chapters. (1) The Levite comes from Judah, the headquarters of the tribe, Jg 17^{7-9}. Both in these chs. and in $19^{1.18}$ the Levites are connected with Judah; two of them come from Bethlehem $17^{7.8}$.* We can detect traces of this connexion in the names of some Levitical families, such as Libni, Hebroni, Ḳorḥi.†

(2) But if the Levites had found a home in Judah, their dispersion had already begun; the pressure of circumstances was driving them to seek a maintenance where they could find one, Jg $17^{8.9}$.

(3) At this period any one might become a priest. Micah could consecrate one of his sons to the priesthood, 17^5. But if a Levite could be found, he was much preferred, as being specially qualified for the office, Jg $17^{10.13}$ 18^{10}. The Levite ministered in any private or local sanctuary where his services were paid for, Jg $17^{4.10.12}$ $18^{4.30}$. His special skill lay in consulting and interpreting the sacred oracle ($18^{5f.}$), and in conducting the ritual of the ephod, teraphim, and graven or molten image (17^5 $18^{18.20.30}$).

(4) Two points about the family of the Levite (or Levites) in this story call for special notice. In 17^7 it is said that 'the young man' was 'of the family of Judah'; in 18^{30} that the Levite Jonathan was a grandson of Moses. The former of these statements raises a difficulty: how could a Levite be described as belonging to the family of Judah? It has been suggested (Wellhausen, Moore) that 'Levite' here denotes the office, not the race; the point of importance in early times being not the pedigree but the art of the priest. If this could be established, the difficulty is disposed of. But it is hard to believe that at this early period, which cannot be far removed from the date to which Gn 34 and 49^{5-7} belong, the Levites as a tribe had disappeared, and that their name had been given to a priestly caste which was open to the member of any tribe who might care to enter it (see Wellhausen, Proleg.^{3} 146; Hommel, AHT 268). No satisfactory explanation has been given of the words 'of the family of Judah' as they stand. They seem to be omitted by LXX B, and are treated by Kuenen and Kautzsch (Heil. Schr.) as a gloss; but a scribe would hardly invent such a statement about a Levite. Budde, Richter 116, suggests (after Studer) that the words have been altered out of respect for Moses,‡ and that the original reading was 'of the family of Levi,' or 'of the family of Moses.' For want of any better explanation, this correction may be provisionally accepted. At the close of the story (18^{30}) it is stated that Micah's Levite, who had been kidnapped by the Danites, became the founder of a line of priests who ministered at the chief sanctuary of Dan until the exile of the ten tribes in 722, or of the N. tribes in 734 (2 K 15^{29}). Jonathan's priesthood was therefore hereditary,* and, what is more, his descent is traced back through Gershom to Moses. It is probable that we have here a clue to the obscure problem, How did the Levi of Gn 34 and 49 become the Levi of the sanctuary? Most likely the answer is, Through the influence and position of Moses. Moses was the founder of Israel's religion, the chief minister of the sanctuary; and Moses was a Levite. His own clan supported and followed him (Ex 32^{26-29} E). The sacred lore of the priesthood, the traditions of public worship, the usages of the oracle, were preserved in his family and handed down to his descendants. Thus we find the Mosaic families of Gershom and of the Mushites (probably from Mosheh, Moses) mentioned in the genealogies of P, Nu $3^{17f.21.33}$ $26^{57f.}$, 1 Ch $6^{1.17.19}$. The priesthood, however, was not confined to the family or tribe of Moses; but the prestige of his name, the importance of his position in the history of the national religion, induced those priests, who did not necessarily belong to his race, to call themselves Levites, and to justify the title by some kind of genealogical fiction, or by the common Semitic practice of regarding membership of a guild or order as equivalent to sonship.† In this way there grew up a priestly tribe of Levi which looked upon Moses as the founder of their order and the ancestor of their race.‡ The formation of such a tribe was rendered all the easier because there had existed an ancient tribe of Levi, which, although it was broken up in the early days of the occupation of Canaan, nevertheless produced one famous son who became the ancestor of a new Levi with a changed character. When the change began it is impossible to say; it must have come about by degrees. Those who maintain that the Levite of the early period of the Judges (Jg 17. 18) could belong to 'the family of Judah' and at the same time claim to be a grandson of Moses (18^{30}), do not appear to allow sufficient time for the official sense of Levite and the artificial connexion with Moses to have established themselves.

A different account of what may be called the conversion of Levi from the barbarous tribe to the priestly caste is given by van Hoonacker in his work, La Sacerdoce Lévitique, 1899, 304–311. His view may be mentioned as representative of those which differ from the account given above. He takes Gn 34 as referring to an incident of the first immigration of the Hebrew clans into Canaan. Gn 49 is also assigned to a pre-Mosaic date, chiefly on the ground that it is unlikely that the tribe to which Moses belonged would be spoken of in the terms of vv.$^{5-7}$ so soon after his death, if the Blessing of Jacob be assigned to the period of the Judges. In the early days of the settlement in Canaan after the Exodus, the tribe of Levi possessed not only the prestige of its connexion with Moses, but the prerogatives of the priesthood which it owed to him. Not much later, in the period of the Judges, we find Levites popularly regarded as priests: the interval is not long enough for the change in the character of the tribe to have taken place. Accordingly, van Hoonacker believes that the 'conversion' of Levi occurred during the sojourn of Israel in Egypt, and supposes that Levi developed not only a capacity for assimilating the culture and civilization of Egypt,* but a special zeal for the national religion. In this way the Levites naturally rallied round Moses in his great religious enterprise, and because of their superior culture became recognized as the spiritual organ of the community. Against the view of van Hoonacker it may be said that the evidence is no more in favour of the conversion of Levi having taken place in Egypt than in the period which followed the struggle for Canaan; while the historical and geographical conditions implied in the Blessing of Jacob are not those of the pre-Mosaic but the post-Mosaic age.

* Two narratives are interwoven in ch. 17. According to one there is a young Levite (הַנַּעַר) residing in Micah's neighbourhood, whom Micah treats as a son, consecrates and makes his priest (vv.$^{7.11b.12a}$). The other narrative tells how a Levite (הָאִישׁ) from Bethlehem comes, in the course of his wanderings, to Micah's house, and is hired by him as his priest (vv.$^{8-10a.12b.13}$).

† Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Geschichte^{2} 191 n. Korah (Ḳoraḥ) seems to have been originally a clan of Judah, 1 Ch 2^{43}.

‡ The same motive, to avoid connecting the priest of Dan with Moses, instigated the Jewish correction of Moses into Manasseh in 18^{30}. Perhaps this is the reason why LXX B omits the words here.

* Similar establishments of hereditary priests are mentioned at Shiloh (Eli) and at Nob (Ahimelech), 1 S $1^{3ff.}$ 21. The priesthood of Shiloh was traced back to the family of Moses (1 S 2^{27}, though this is a post-Dt. passage) through Phinehas, son of Eleazar, son of Aaron (Nu 25^{13} P, 1 S 2^{30}, Jos 24^{33} E). Wellhausen regards Eleazar as = Eliezer, son of Moses (Ex 18^4), and so makes the priesthood of Shiloh directly Mosaic, Proleg.^{3} 144.

† In the oldest documents the descent is traced back to Moses rather than to Aaron. Moses, not Aaron, is the chief minister of the sanctuary in Ex 33^{7-11} E. The designation of Levites as 'sons of Aaron' belongs to P.

‡ See Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 416 ff.

It does not fall within the scope of this article to deal with the later developments and organization of the priestly tribe of Levi, which will be fully treated of in art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES. Besides Jg 17 and 18, 19 and 20, the only other places in pre-exilic historical books where Levites are mentioned are 1 S 6^{15}, 2 S 15^{24}, 1 K 8^{4} 12^{31}, and all of these appear to be secondary or Deuteronomic.† One other important passage, however, requires mention, to complete the early account of Levi, Dt 33^{8-11}. The Blessing of Moses 'breathes the bright and happy spirit of the earlier narratives of the Kings,' and may be dated shortly after the separation under Jeroboam I. By this time, then, we find that Levi has become thoroughly established as the priestly tribe, enjoying the priestly rights of administering the divine oracle and instruction (torah), and offering incense and sacrifice; though it appears that the exclusive priesthood of the Levites was not without its opponents even at this period (Dt 33^{11}). The Blessing describes the character of the ideal Levite by an allusion to past history when the fidelity and disinterestedness of the tribe were conspicuously proved. Though Levi is not mentioned in connexion with the events of Massah and Meribah (Ex17^{1-7}, Nu 20^{10-13}), yet it is possible that another version of these incidents was current in which the tribe was in some way tested by Jehovah.‡ The other past event alluded to is that in Ex 32^{27-29}, when the Levites distinguished themselves by remarkable disinterestedness. The reference to this occasion is, however, disputed; for the verbs in Dt 33^{9abc} may be translated as presents and not as pasts, and the statement may be merely a general one. Nevertheless, the allusion to Ex 32 may be implied at the same time.

The principal authorities have been cited above. Besides these may be mentioned Graf, Geschichte des Stammes Levi in Merx, Archiv. 1867, i. 68–106, 208–236; Edu. Meyer, Geschichte des Alterthums, 1884, i. 377 ff.; Fr. v. Hummelauer, S.J., Das vormosaische Priesterthum in Israel, 1899.

LEVIATHAN (לִוְיָתָן liwyāthān).—The description of leviathan (Job 41) clearly points to the crocodile (LXX δράκων). Again, the mention of leviathan (LXX δράκοντες, Ps 74^{14}) is in the middle of an allusion to the miracles connected with the Exodus of the Israelites. Leviathan here is to be understood as the crocodile, the emblem of 'Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, the great dragon (tannîm) that lieth in the midst of his rivers' (Ezk 29^{3}). 'The people inhabiting the wilderness' (Ps, l.c.) are the wild beasts of the desert, to which Pharaoh's host became a prey (comp. 'people,' 'folk,' Pr $30^{25.26}$). On the other hand, leviathan of the sea (Ps 104^{26}, LXX δράκων) cannot be the crocodile. It is probably the whale. Whales are not rare in the Mediterranean, which is doubtless the 'sea great and wide' (v.^{25}). Parts of skeletons of two rorquals are preserved in the Museum of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirût. One was thrown on shore near Tyre, and the other at Beirût itself. In Job 3^{8} 'leviathan' of RV and AVm (AV 'their mourning') is taken by most modern commentators to refer to the dragon, which in popular mythology was believed to darken or eclipse the sun and moon by 'throwing its folds round them or swallowing them up. Enchanters were supposed to have power to set this dragon in motion' (Davidson, Job, p. 20). The same mythological allusion underlies Job 26^{13} (see Dillmann's note) and Is 27^{1} (see Cheyne, ad loc.).

LEVITICUS (called by the Jews, from its opening word, וַיִּקְרָא; other names found in the Mishna are תּוֹרַת כֹּהֲנִים ('Law of Priests'), סֵפֶר כ׳ ('Book of Priests'), סֵפֶר קָרְבָּנוֹת ('Book of Offerings'), cf. Menach. iii. 4; Megilla, iii. 6; Siphra, etc.; LXX Λευ(ε)ιτικόν (cf. Philo, Λευιτικὴ βίβλος); Vulg. Leviticus).—Leviticus is the third part of the sixfold work now generally known as the Hexateuch. It belongs in its entirety to the Priestly school of writers (P). For the explanation and proof of this statement see art. HEXATEUCH.

As the whole book can be ascribed to a single 'document,' it might seem that the literary problem was a simpler one than in the case of Genesis and Exodus. In fact, however, the questions that demand solution are, though in large measure different from, yet no less complex than, those of the earlier books. The geologist who has settled to what 'formation' the rocks of a district belong, has yet to investigate the composition and relative order of the perhaps dislocated and contorted strata which are comprised under the same general title. In the art. on EXODUS (§ IV.) we have already seen how documents after being separated from others may be again resolved into distinct components. The extent to which this process is carried out below may seem unwarranted, for, though many of the points are fully treated in well-known works like Kuenen's Hex. and Driver's LOT, it has not been usual to press the analysis so far. It is, however, believed that the main lines are firmly laid on grounds that have proved generally convincing, even though details may be regarded as unsettled.

LITERARY STRUCTURE.—The 27 chapters fall readily apart into four divisions which are successively discussed, i.e. (1) the Law of Sacrifice, 1–7; (2) the Consecration of the Priesthood, 8–10; (3) the Law of Clean and Unclean, with appendix on the Day of Atonement, 11–16; (4) the Law of Holiness, with appendix, 17–27.

B. Critical Notes.

With regard to this division there are two questions to answer. (1) Does it form part of the great Priestly writing (P^g) which contains Ex 25–29? (2) If not, what is its relation to it? Is it, like Ex 35–40, later, or is it in the main earlier? Let the facts decide. The process of exhibiting them will bring out other points requiring special attention in these chapters.

a. The directions in Ex 29 for Aaron's consecration ordered burnt-, sin-, and peace-offerings. Now the ritual there prescribed precisely accords with the requirements of Lv 1–7, which are therefore already assumed in a passage which precedes.

b. After Ex 35–40 (or the shorter account of the erection of the Tabernacle which it has replaced) we expect to hear of the fulfilment of the other command, in Ex 29, to consecrate Aaron. But Lv 1–7 comes in before Lv 8, the account of the consecration. It appears, that is, as an interruption.

c. At the same time, Lv 1–7 is linked with P^g by a practical identity of sacrificial terminology.

d. Certain elements, however, which are often mentioned and constantly presupposed in P^g and P^s, are either absent from these chapters, or appear in clauses which can be readily removed as interpolations, or find place in passages otherwise marked as exceptional. Such are the presuppositions that the people are living in a camp, that their sanctuary is the Tent of Meeting, and that the only priests are Aaron and his sons.

For instance, the Tent of Meeting is unmentioned from 1^{10} to 2^{16}; in 1^3 its occurrence is plainly an interpolation, for it interrupts the connexion (for the acceptance of the victim depends, according to 22^{19-25}, on the absence of blemish). Again, in 1–3 the priest occurs 11 times, and Aaron's sons the priests (or an equivalent phrase) 11 times. The facts, that each paragraph reverts to the singular, that sing. verbs follow plural subjects $1^{5f. 11f.}$ etc., that LXX twice, and Sam. once, correct to pl., all go to prove that the priest was the original term, and that the peculiar phrase Aaron's sons the priests, $1^{5.8.11}$ 2^2 3^2, is an adaptation of the simple term the priest by prefixing Aaron's sons and altering sing. to pl. Contrast the uniform formula of P^g Aaron and his sons.

e. Moreover, the conspectus A, given above, on the face of it suggests that 1–7 is not itself homogeneous. It falls apart into two codes, each of which treats the whole round of offerings, but without reference to the other, and with a different aim and plan. Again, the two codes 1–6^7 and 6^8–7^{38} have been themselves subject to revision and enlargement. The nucleus of 1–6^7 is 1–3, a little code which perhaps never dealt with sin- and guilt-offerings. In any case 5–6^7 are distinct in form, and much more so 4 (P^s).

A few instances of the clues which have been followed may be given as illustrations of method. 2^{4-16} is marked as supplementary, for (1) it repeats $^{1-3}$, and (2) it uses thou and ye instead of he as in the rest of 1–3.—4 distinguishes the altar of sweet incense from the altar of burnt-offering (see art. EXODUS, IV.), and elaborates ceremonial; it is therefore given to P^s (perhaps better to $P^{s'}$). In Ex 29 P^g and Lv 8 P^s even at the consecration of Aaron the blood of the sin-offering was not as here ($4^{6f.}$, cf. $^{17f.}$) brought into the holy place.—5^{1-6} is older than 4, because of the variety of cases in view, and the absence of ritual direction. It has features that connect it with P^h.—5^{14-16} and 6^{1-7} are not by author of 5^{1-6}, for the guilt-offering, which in ^{6} is confused with the sin-offering, is here clearly assigned to cases of damage done to the interests of Jahweh or a neighbour.—5^{17-19} interrupts the connexion, and completes $^{1-6}$, not $^{14-16}$. In $^{1-6}$ atonement is provided for unconscious offences after discovery; but what if calamity vaguely convicts of unknown guilt? Here is the remedy.

The remaining section 6^8–7 has also been edited afresh with several additions. The original work is easily separated by following the clues given by the introductory formula This is the law of . . ., and by the list of subjects given in the colophon 7^{37}, which concludes this little 'Priests' Manual.'

Both the order of subjects (see A above), and the framework in which they are set, support the view that this section is not based on 1–6^7, nor by the same author as 1–3.

f. Except in 4, where the indications point to a later date than P^g, there are no clear signs that any of the sections in 1–7, THE LAW OF SACRIFICE, formed part of P^g or were subsequent in date. On the contrary, when a few isolated phrases have been removed, there is an unbroken appearance of independence and priority. (In the Oxf. Analyt. ed. of the Hex. the text is printed so as to bring this out clearly). And, as this conclusion agrees with the preceding indications, it is regarded as established that these chapters belong to an earlier series of priestly teachings (toroth), and may be designated P^t.

B. Critical Notes.

As Ex 35–40 is generally supposed to have taken the place of an earlier and briefer account of the fulfilment of Ex 25–28, so Lv 8 is held to be an expansion of an original short narrative of the consecration of the priesthood as ordered in Ex 29. In view of its laborious reproduction of Ex 29, and a few modifications introduced, it would be rash to assign it to the original draft of P^g.

The anointing of the tent ^{10b}, the altar, etc. ^{11}, and Aaron's sons with his and their garments, ^{30}, is irreconcilable with the absence of such injunction in Ex 29^{7-9}, and marks these verses as glosses, like Ex 28^{41} and part of 29^{21} (and of the anointing oil). LXX puts Lv 8^{10b} after ^{11}.

In 9^1 the main thread of the Priestly Law and History Book P^g is resumed from Ex 29, the original brief account of the making and erection of the sanctuary and consecration of the priesthood having probably been displaced by fuller narratives in Ex 35–40 and Lv 8, as suggested above. Note that only one altar is mentioned, and that the blood of the sin-offering is not brought into the Holy Place. That 9 is earlier than 4 is seen from ^{3}, and than 8 from ^{13}.

$10^{6f.}$ is late P^s, for in ^{7} anointing is extended to Aaron's sons (see above).—$10^{8f.}$ is itself a fragment, and to it $^{10f.}$ is loosely attached. The latter betrays affinity with P^h, cf. 20^{24b-26}. Cf. also Dt 14^{3-20} 24^8 33^{10}.—10^{12-15} Except the introductory clause, this par. recalls P^t. In particular, notice the peculiar expression a holy place ^{13} (∥ a clean place ^{14}), which occurs also in $6^{16. 26f.}$ $7^{6.}$ It is defined in ^{12} as beside the altar; whereas the clause in the court of the tent of meeting is probably a gloss in $6^{16. 26}$ (in 10^{17} it is altered into the place of the sanctuary).—In 10^{16-20}, a late supplement, fault is found for contravention of 6^{26} (see further Kuen. Hex. § 6 n. 21).

B. Critical Notes.

Like 1–3. 5–6^7 6^8–7, the chapters 11–15 betray that they are substantially earlier than P^g, though subsequently united in their present form with the main Priestly code. In the case of 11 on food and contact, and 13 f. on leprosy, it is possible to discover several layers of legal material.

11: On eating and touching animals.—The reasons for the analysis given above lie mainly on the surface. A section $^{2-8}$ on land animals which are clean or unclean is followed by $^{9-23}$ which are in subject a sequel, dealing with water animals, birds, and winged creeping things, but which no longer discriminate animals as unclean (cf. Dt 14^{3-20}), but as an abomination (שֶׁקֶץ, not תּוֹעֵבָה, as Dt 14^3). These verses, again, are continued in $^{41f.}$ on creeping things upon the earth which are an abomination; while $^{43-44a}$, which uses the same word as a verb, forms the obvious conclusion of the series. Into this series $^{24-40}$ has been thrust, dealing with the different subject of uncleanness through contact. It is doubtful whether this last passage is included in the colophon $^{46f.}$

Dt 14^{3-20} compared with 11. Though interpreters differ, the facts, when taken all together, favour the priority of Dt over Lv. (1) The clean animals' names, given Dt $14^{4f.}$, are omitted in Lv as covered by general law in $^{6f.}$; while names of birds, etc., are retained of necessity. (2) The cases of camel, hare, and coney are expanded in Lv 11^{4-6}. (3) Lv 11^{9-12} is an expansion of Dt $14^{9f.}$ (4) The new term abomination is used in Lv. (5) In its present form at least Lv 11 in $^{24-40}$ covers the question of contact, which Dt would hardly have omitted had it been contained in the ordinance quoted. (6) Dt omits mention of creeping things upon the earth, Lv $11^{41f.}$ (7) The exceptions in $11^{21f.}$ are wanting in Dt. (8) The prohibition which is absolute in Dt 14^{21a} is relaxed in Lv 11^{39}; cf. 17^{15}.

It is hard to say why the abomination series of verses should begin where it does, seeing that the terminology in Dt is uniform over the whole range of cases. Perhaps the compiler had before him two variants of the ordinance quoted in Dt, and found one fuller than the other in dealing with the later cases. The signs of reduplication in $^{9-12}$ confirm this conjecture, by revealing the presence of a 'join' of the two legal threads.

11^{24-40}. This section is distinct from $^{1-23}$, for (1) it deals mainly with touching (eating ^{40a} only), while $^{1-23}$ deals mainly with eating (touching ^{8} and perhaps ^{11}); (2) it enumerates only the unclean, and mentions only two classes instead of five; (3) it prescribes means of cleansing; (4) it is doubtful if it is included in the colophon. But $^{24-40}$ is hardly to be reckoned homogeneous. $^{32-38}$ is probably secondary on its own account, for the transition is very abrupt from cases of animals that make persons unclean to cases of things that any of those animals may make unclean. But if $^{39f.}$ originally belonged to $^{24-40}$, then $^{32-38}$ is clearly an addition. $^{39f.}$, however, looks more like a completion of $^{2-8}$, perhaps misplaced by intrusion of the abomination passages. $^{24-31}$, on the other hand, at no point presupposes $^{2-23}$, but is complete in itself.

12: On purification after childbirth.—This short chapter, whose chief interest lies in the fulfilment of its conditions at the presentation of Christ in the temple, seems in ^{2b} to refer to and depend upon 15, and presents the same features.

The only trace of the camp form of legislation characteristic of P^g is found in ^{6b}. V.^{8} is marked as a supplement; for (1) it comes after the colophon ^{7b}, and (2) elsewhere (5^7 14^{21}, cf. 1^{14}) the provision for cases of poverty is seen to be a later addition.

13 f.: On leprosy.—The laws in this section present a very complex problem to the student. Dt 24^8 gives no details such as are found about clean and unclean in 14^{3-20}, but refers for the procedure in a case of leprosy to the torah of the priests, presumably oral. The extreme elaboration of treatment detailed in 13 f. may perhaps indicate that the usage was not committed to writing till a late period; but, apart from introductory phrases and an occasional gloss, there are no signs of the influence of P^{g} in the sections assigned to P^{t}. But these relatively older portions are not homogeneous. For while 13 is entirely occupied with the detection and discrimination of leprosy and the regulation of the leper's life, and 14 provides for the cleansing of the recovered leper, each is independent of and distinct from the other. Each, too, contains earlier and later elements, which may be readily separated as in the analysis above.

The colophon 14$^{54-57}$ will furnish a good starting-point in indicating the nature of the argument. Originally, it probably consisted only of ^{57b}: this is the law of leprosy, in accordance with the usage elsewhere (fifteen times this is the law of . . . in P^{t}), and came after 13^{46}, for even in its expanded form there is no reference to cleansing, and 13$^{47-59}$ has its own colophon. Then the reference was made more explicit: this is the law for (unique phrase) all manner of plague of leprosy, and for a scall ^{54} (referring to 13$^{2-28}$ and $^{29-44}$), to teach when it is unclean and when it is clean ^{57a}. The addition of 13$^{47-59}$, though it has its own colophon, produced the clause and for the leprosy of a garment ^{55a}, and similarly there followed (for the Heb. construction is different) and for an house ^{55b}, to refer to 14$^{33-53}$, which was kindred to 13$^{47-59}$; while ^{56}, which clearly was a gloss to make pointed allusion to 13$^{2-28}$, providing for a rising and for a scab and for a bright spot, has been inserted wrongly, instead of before and for a scall.

In 13^{6} etc. the priest, after examining a man with a favourable result, shall pronounce him clean . . . and he shall wash his clothes and be clean. But in 14, if the plague be healed, many ceremonies must be performed before the priest shall pronounce him clean ^{7}, and then he has not only to wash his clothes, but to shave off all his hair, and bathe himself before he shall be clean ^{8a}. Yet both the archaic colouring and the alternate vagueness and precision of the ritual directions in 14$^{2-8}$ proclaim that this passage is comparatively early. Was the author of 13 ignorant of this ceremonial, or did he think it superstitious or unintelligible?—14$^{9-20}$ seems to be a description of an independent form of cleansing after the pattern of the latest sacrificial law (perhaps introduced to supersede the old form, or because it was becoming obsolete), which the compiler has combined with 14^{2-8a} by the link ^{8b}. For originally a second shaving ^{9a} could hardly have been required. Moreover, although the present arrangement is meant to suggest that the first cleansing only admitted to the camp, there is no higher grade of sanctity conferred in ^{20}, only he shall be clean as before. The clause ^{3a} which leads up to this view contradicts ^{2b}.—14$^{21-32}$ is a supplement, as it has a separate colophon (cf. 12^{8}).—14$^{33-52}$ is a fresh supplement independent of 13$^{47-59}$, for it combines the mode of cleansing in 14$^{2-8}$ and $^{9-20}$, and has other marks of later origin.

15: On secretions.—This chapter by its tedious repetitions suggests a later date than most of P^{t}. But only twice does a clause recall P^{g}, i.e. in ^{14} and ^{29} unto the door of the tent of meeting, and this is a frequent gloss. The sacrificial ritual enjoined does not go beyond the prescriptions of 5, and is omitted in the case of normal secretions. The case of 12 is similar.

In 15^{31a} we catch an echo of P^{h}; and ^{31b} (RVm: when they defile my dwelling that is in the midst of them), which most naturally refers to the gracious inhabitation of the land by its Divine Lord, recalls a time when the visible structure had not been elevated to the place it occupies in P^{g}, monopolizing the term dwelling.

16 (Appendix): On the Day of Atonement.—This is not the place to discuss the historical origins of the great Jewish fast. See art. ATONEMENT (DAY OF). It must suffice to support briefly the analysis given above, which takes a middle course between the conservative view that 16 is an early homogeneous whole, and the radical view that no part of it is even as early as P^{g}. (1) It is possible to disentangle a main thread of ordinance providing for the cleansing of the holy place, and the tent of meeting, and the altar, and for a solemn atonement for the sins of the people. This bears the marks of P^{g}. (2) From this there falls apart a series of verses (see above) providing for a special atonement for Aaron and his sons, which is connected in ^{1} with the death of Nadab and Abihu, but which does not fit in with the context. (3) $^{32f.}$ orders the ceremonial to be repeated by each subsequent high priest. (4) $^{29-31}$ and ^{34a} make it an annual fast day.

(1) The main thread is given to P^{g}, because it contains nothing inconsistent with the ritual in Ex 29 or Lv 9, and because the altar $^{12. 18. 20. 25}$ is used as if only one were known, while the use of a censer in $^{12f.}$ seems to exclude the presence of an altar of incense. (2) The atonement for Aaron, being omitted in the summaries in ^{14} and ^{20}, can hardly be original, and the awkwardness of ^{3} and ^{6} justifies their excision as supplements. The sevenfold sprinkling and the heightening of the high priest's dignity are both peculiar to P^{s}. (3) The ahsence of any Aaron phrases, the substitution of holy sanctuary ^{33} for holy place $^{16f. 20}$, and of the priests ^{33} for himself and his house $^{11. 17b}$, and the generality of the terms, confirm the view that $^{33f.}$ is a later addition. (4) Again, if $^{29-31. 34a}$ were original, mention would not be made only of one element, the atonement for the children of Israel, while the cleansing of the holy place, the tent of meeting, and the altar, is passed over. ^{34a} would fit better before ^{31}.

B. Critical Notes.

For a general account of the Law of Holiness, and of the criteria which distinguish it from the rest of P, see art. HEXATEUCH. Careful lists of peculiar words and phrases are given in Driver, LOT; Holzinger, Einl. in d. Hex.; and Oxf. Anal. Hex. Here we have to do only with the actual use of the criteria in the analysis, and with the internal structure of P^h itself. Any general remarks under the latter head will be found under § 5. It will be enough to point out in advance that traces of more than one series of parallel laws will be found in the present code.

17^{1-7r} : The place of sacrifice.—As it stands, this passage requires that no animal shall be slaughtered except as a sacrifice, and at the door of the tent of meeting. In any case this conflicts with Dt 12, which allows slaughtering at home. But the clauses referring to the camp and the (door of the) tent of meeting can be excised without loss, as in many other cases where they ill suit the context. When they are removed, the injunction remains that all slaughtering is to take place at the altar of J″, which is only reasonable, on the one hand, if many altars are allowable, as is recognized in E's Covenant Book, Gn 20^{24}, and in the pre-Deuteronomic narratives ; or, on the other hand, if a small company of exiles are gathered round the restored temple in Jerusalem after the Exile. The latter alternative is upheld by Baentsch, Addis, etc. The former is maintained by Kittel, Baudissin, W. R. Smith, and Driver.—$17^{8f.}$ is to the same effect, only including strangers.—In 17^{10-16} the work of the later editor may be suspected, but cannot be pointed out with precision.

18^{6-19} : On sex relations.—This section has a close parallel in 20^{10-21}, but it is not agreed how the two are connected. The latter passage is composed of various elements, not all on the same subject. Its ordinances are in the form of Cases, or Judgments, the man that . . ., or if a man . . ., whereas in 18 we have the older type of Words, Thou shalt not. . . . Only in 20 are penalties stated. Probably we have in 18, nearly intact, the series which, in an altered form, with Judgments instead of Words, and with penalties attached, underlies 20^{10-21}, where it is combined with other quoted laws.

19 : Miscellaneous.—The contents of this chapter are clearly selected from various sources, many of them early, as is shown by the numerous parallels with the most ancient codes (for refs. see Oxf. Anal. Hex.). They illustrate both the diversity of form in which ordinances were cast, and the fondness of Hebrew jurists for sets of 5 or 10. An outline of the 14 sections will show this.

$^{2b-4}$ has 5 commandments of the type, ye shall (not) . . .—$^{5-8}$ is a cultus-section like 21–22 below.—$^{9f.}$ has 5 words about gleaning.—$^{11f.}$ has 4 commandments and 1 word, 5 in all, about honesty and reverence.—$^{13f.}$ has 5 words, not quite uniform, on kindness.—$^{15f.}$ has 5 words, preceded by a commandment, on justice.—$^{17f.}$ has 5 words on kindness, clinched by the grand positive word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.—^{19} has a general commandment, and 3 words on mixtures, the last altered.—^{20} is a Judgment on seduction, with a supplement by P^s $^{21f.}$.—$^{23-25}$ is an ordinance on young fruit trees, like the law on the Sabbath year in $25^{2b-7\ etc.}$.—$^{26-31}$ has 10 commandments against superstition and irreverence, the last 2 in ^{31} being altered, and with supplements using 2nd person sing. in $^{27b.\ 29}$.—^{32} has 3 words on reverence.—$^{33f.}$ contains laws of 3 types on strangers.—$^{35-37}$ contains 2 commandments on weights and measures, and a general conclusion.

The next chapter, 20, is remarkable for the fact that 4 of its 5 sections have a parallel in P^h elsewhere. Thus $^{1-8}$ ‖ 18^{21}, $^{10-24a}$ ‖ $18^{6-20.\ 22-30}$, $^{24b-26}$ ‖ 11^{43-47}, ^{27} ‖ 19^{31}. For $^{10-24a}$ see on 18^{6-19}.

21–22 : On the priesthood and sacrifices.—These chapters, while presenting many of the features of P^h, have undergone more revision, it would appear, than 18–20, perhaps because their subject was one which occupied more of the attention of later legislators. Differences of form, changes from 3rd to 2nd pers., and the introduction of fresh superscriptions $11^{1.\ 16}$ $22^{1.\ 17.\ 26}$, all point to diversity of source.

21^{8}, with its thou shalt, referring to Israel, may be a fragment from an earlier source.—22^{17-25} appears to be made up of two ordinances, $^{18b-20}$ and $^{21-25}$, with many parallels in detail. Both this section and $22^{29f.}$ have been ascribed to P^t, not P^h, but without sufficient reason. The marks of P^h are not absent, and there is enough difference in the ordinances from those on the same subjects elsewhere (7^{11-18}) to suggest that an earlier stage is reflected here.

23 : A sacred calendar.—In this chapter there is prescribed a series of 'holy convocations,' in language largely made up of phrases characteristic of P^g and P^s, with exact dates by numbered days and months. This is ascribed to P^g. But with it is combined another series of holy days, which does not mention 'holy convocations' or use the peculiar phrases of P^g and P^s (except in isolated sentences distinguishable as interpolated), but bears indications of P^h and is marked by a picturesque style. Each of these series has been interpolated or revised.

23^{2b-3} on the Sabbath can hardly be original, for ^{4} is clearly the commencement, and ^{4} also hardly includes the Sabbath under its terms.—$^{9-14}$ has been expanded. The original elements from P^h are clearly seen in $^{10b-11.\ 14a}$. Here a feast of firstfruits is described which is not referred to elsewhere. The morrow after the Sabbath, $^{11.\ 15f.}$, requires explanation by some context now missing. But probably it is rightly connected with Unleavened Bread.—$^{15-21}$ relates to Pentecost, or Feast of Weeks. ^{21} only is preserved from P^g, but in $^{18f.}$ particulars have been incorrectly added from Nu 28^{27-29}. P^h had ye shall present with the bread two he-lambs of the first year for a sacrifice of peace-offerings.—^{22} is repeated from $19^{9f.}$.—$^{23-25}$ institutes the Feast of New Year's Day, with trumpet blasts.—$^{26-32}$ is marked P^s, because on 16 we found that the Day of Atonement as a yearly fast was not original in P^g. ^{26} is a briefer title than $^{1f.\ 23f.\ 33f.}$.—$^{33-36}$ contains P^g's ordinance as to the Feast of Booths complete, and $^{37f.\ 44}$ his conclusion of the calendar. But in $^{39-42}$ the editor has introduced from P^h a graphic account of the manner in which it is to be kept. The stress in this is on the mode of keeping the feast, as above in $^{9-20}$, and the date is left indefinite, when ye have gathered in the fruits of the land, ^{39a} being a harmonizing addition by the editor, in accordance with later practice. Similarly ^{39c}, which uses the phraseology of P^g, and mentions an 8th day, is foreign to the context, which like Dt 16^{13-15} only knows 7 days for the feast.

24 : On oil for the lamps $^{1-4}$, shewbread $^{5-9}$, and blasphemy $^{10-23}$. $^{1-4}$ is parallel with Ex $27^{20f.}$ and Nu 8^{1-4}, and it is not easy to determine the order of priority. On the whole, the present passage seems most original. Both it and $^{5-9}$ are regarded as fragments of P^g, put here possibly to replace similar ordinances of P^h, even as in 23 a like process has gone on. In each case the phraseology is purely that of P^g.—$^{10-23}$ is a curious paragraph, in which a central core $^{15b-22}$, containing various ordinances on blasphemy $^{15f.}$, murder $^{17.\ 21b}$, assault $^{19f.}$, killing a beast $^{18.\ 21a}$, is found surrounded by a narrative envelope, which resembles others found in P^s, while the phraseology supports this ascription. The laws are given to P^h, as they contain several words and phrases characteristic of that code, and follow the same models. Contrast also ^{11a} and ^{16ab}.

25 : On the Sabbatical and Jubile years.—$^{2b\text{-}7}$ with $^{19\text{-}22}$ institutes the Sabbatical year as a general fallow-year for the whole land. The particulars harmonize with the feast regulations of P^h, and the phraseology is also that of P^h. Its ascription to that code is therefore generally allowed. But it is different with regard to the rest of the chapter, where undoubted marks of P^g or P^s are found side by side with words and phrases (Baentsch notes 14 such) characteristic of P^h. These phenomena point to the intermixture of elements, but how to effect a separation is matter of conjecture. The Analysis above adopts the view that the term jubile and the clauses or passages in which it occurs are P^s. This is thought probable, because—(1) Lv 26, which lays stress on the Sabbath years, does not allude to the jubile ; (2) most of these clauses and verses bear other marks of late origin ; and (3) general considerations (see art. SABBATICAL AND JUBILE YEARS) support the same conclusion. The linguistic evidence, however, leads to the inference that the main ideas of the institution of the 50th year as a year of release were expressed in legal form by the school of P^h and have survived in a modified shape in this chapter.

$^{8\text{-}18}$ is full of redundancies, and when the clauses given to P^s are removed, the remainder is almost complete as an intelligible whole. ^{9b} mentioning the day of atonement as an annual fast must be late, and it is conjectured from Ezk 40^1 that the 10th day of the 7th month was the old New Year's Day. Thus in the original source the incongruity of the trumpet blasts on the solemn fast day is not found, but has been inserted as an interpretation of ^{9a}. ^{14} shows in Heb. a confusion of sing. and plur. persons, and its last clause seems to be altered to lead up to ^{15}, itself modified by P^s, while something which introduced ^{14} is now missing. That $^{8\text{-}18}$ breaks the connexion between ^{7} and ^{19} is another proof that it has been the subject of editorial handling.—^{23} is given to P^s for linguistic reasons, cf. ^{30}, and from analogy with ^{41}, a jubile piece. It contains, moreover, the final stage of principle, explicitly stated instead of merely implied.—^{24} states the rule of which ^{25} is a particular case. Like ^{23}, however, it may be P^s, as the plural is less common in P^h.—In $^{26\text{-}31}$ the jubile references are so embedded in the material that no analysis is feasible, though an earlier basis is possible. Contrast and if a man $^{26.\ 29}$ with $^{25.\ 35}$.—$^{29\text{-}31}$ providing for city property has the air of later legal refinement.—$^{32\text{-}34}$ is the latest addition of all, with its provision for Levites who have not yet been mentioned themselves, much less their cities ; cf. Nu $35^{1\text{-}8}$.—For further particulars about this difficult chapter, see the art. referred to above.

26 : Concluding exhortation.—$^{1\text{-}3}$ contains brief laws forbidding false worship and commanding the true.—In $^{3\text{-}45}$ is found a long discourse, similar to those found at the end of other codes, Ex $23^{20ff.}$ E, and Dt 24 D. Already hortatory fragments have appeared in $18^{2\text{-}5.\ 24\text{-}30}$ $19^{36f.}$ $20^{22\text{-}26}$ $22^{31\text{-}33}$. In all a common phraseology is used, identical expressions frequently occur, the same stress is laid upon the supreme deity of J″, the need for holiness, and the danger of contamination by the Canaanites. There can be no doubt that the last and longest marks the completion of the code known as the Law of Holiness. (See, further, below under § 5).

27 : On vows and tithes.—$^{1\text{-}25}$ deals with the subject of vows, and employs the fully developed terminology of P^g and P^s. It is assigned above to the latter, because in $^{17\text{-}24}$ the year of jubile is so prominent an element.—$^{26\text{-}29}$ contains certain supplemental provisions.—$^{30\text{-}33}$ is an appendix on tithes which must be pronounced of very late composition. Even in Nu $18^{21\text{-}32}$ tithes seem to be, in accordance with the prescriptions of D, restricted to vegetable produce.

§ 5. AUTHORSHIP AND DATE.—As we have seen, the Book of Leviticus turns out to be made up of many pieces, so distinct from one another in style and contents and tone that they can only be assigned with probability to many writers, none of whom can be identified with Moses. Though, however, we cannot arrive at names of authors, we may approximately reckon up the number of distinct writers whose hands betray themselves in the striking example of well designed literary product, which we call the Book of Leviticus.

a. We begin with that portion of the book which all will admit is the oldest, i.e. the Law of Holiness in 17–26.

(1) The structure of this section is analogous to that of two other important Hebrew codes, viz. E's combined Words of the Covenant and Judgments in Ex 20^{22}–23, and the Deuteronomic Code in Dt 12–28. In all three cases we have a collection of somewhat miscellaneous enactments, introduced by a law as to sacrifice and the place of worship, and closed by a prophetic discourse. In Lv 26^{46} there is in addition a colophon explicitly marking the termination of a body of Sinaitic legislation.

(2) The style and language prevailing in these chapters distinguish them from the rest of P. The peculiarities are best seen in 18–20 and in 26. But, after gaining an impression of them there, it is impossible to examine closely 17 or 21–22 or 23–25 without recognizing the presence of the same characteristics. It is true that passages are encountered without these signs, and others in which the phenomena are mixed. But these are sufficiently explained by supposing that the compiler who incorporated P^h in P revised and supplemented his original, as was universally the custom with ancient editors. It agrees with this that the portions which have thus received alteration are those which deal with ritual and the priesthood. Considering the shortness of the whole, it is wonderful how many words and phrases are peculiar to it among the Pentateuchal documents. (See the lists already referred to, p. 106^a, § 4 B line 3). In the legislation the style is far more concise and direct, and far less technical, than in the rest of P, while the rhetorical mould in which the discourse in 26 is cast has left its impress upon a number of shorter hortatory passages recurring amidst the legislation in a manner equally foreign to P as a whole. But the most marked effect of style is produced by the reiteration of phrases expressing the leading ideas of the collection.

(3) These leading ideas are few but great, and they dominate every chapter. i. There is a unique sense of the majesty and presence of God, expressed by the constant recurrence of the 'Divine I' in the phrases I am J″, etc. If the more diffusely rhetorical style of Dt is like the varied harmonies of organ music, in the Law of Holiness we rather hear the solemn strokes of a great church bell, proclaiming the dwelling of the Most High God amongst men, and calling them to worship and obey. ii. This effect is enhanced by the isolation of one attribute, the holiness of God, which carries with it as a corollary the holiness of His people. iii. The negative to these positives is supplied by the awful peril of profanation from the peoples of the land, with their heathen orgies and abominable customs.—No other section of the Pent. shows the explicit combination of the same elements.

(4) The nature of the contents makes for the same conclusion. The entire legislative material of the Pent. may be grouped under the following heads :—1. The Family, 2. Persons and Animals, 3. Property, 4. Judgment and Rule, 5. Idolatry and Superstition, 6. Clean and Unclean, 7. Sacrifice, 8–11. Sacred Dues, Seasons, Places, and Persons. The last six classes thus relate to ceremonial and ritual, the first five to religion and morals generally in social life. Now, while E and D are relatively most copious on these five heads, P^h is practically the only part of the large mass of P which deals with these matters at all, except the law of jubile (certain temporary regulations in Nu are not reckoned). 60 per cent. of the ordinances of P^h belong to these five classes and have no parallel in the rest of P, but, with one doubtful exception, may all be matched from E or D. Only 40 per cent. come under heads where parallels with the rest of P are numerous.

(5) The resemblances with Ezekiel have long attracted attention. They are indeed so striking as to have led many critics to argue that the prophet was the author of the code. The similar relation between Dt and Jeremiah was indeed often interpreted in the same way. But if in each case it has been found impossible to sustain the hypothesis of identity of authorship, in each case also it has been demonstrated that a close connexion subsisted between the two. And if it cannot be a mere coincidence that Jeremiah is the first writer to betray indebtedness to Dt, so it is natural to conclude that, if P^h had been long in existence as a literary whole, it would not have been left to Ezekiel to show traces of its peculiar phrases and ideas. Some of the most striking of these parallels may now be enumerated for the examination of the student.

(6) From the above (taken in connexion with the previous critical notes) certain inferences may be drawn: i. There is a substantial unity in Lv 17–26, but it is the unity of a school and not of an individual. ii. It is difficult to say whether the compiler of the code and author of the closing discourse was before or after Ezk, but on the whole it is more probable that he was later, towards the end of the Exile. iii. But no part of the legislation (occasional glosses excepted) need be later than Ezk. iv. The prophet appeals to and rests upon the collections of laws which underlie the present text. v. In their form (cf. their frequent grouping in 10's and 5's) and in their substance (cf. the Anglo-Saxon Penitentials, framed also for a rude age) these laws may well be very ancient. Their antiquity is indeed better established than any theory of their origin. An attractive and plausible conjecture, however, is that they represent J's missing legislation. The sympathy of J with the priesthood is repeatedly shown.

b. Enough has been said above under § 1 B and § 3 B to justify the inference that there was a second school of priestly canonists (P^t), who set themselves to reduce to writing the current religious praxis of the Jerusalem Temple, all of which was apparently accepted as Mosaic. It may be considered doubtful whether their work had been carried very far, even if it was begun, before the destruction of the Temple rendered it necessary, if the whole tradition was not to be lost. 1–3 and 6^{8}–7 probably represent two collectors, and 11–15 one or more.

c. It may very well have been one of this school who developed its presuppositions yet further, and carried them out more vigorously, embodying them in the great book of History and Law called P^g, of which but little is included in Lv. In it all takes place in and for the camp, and centres round the Tabernacle and its single altar, Aaron the one anointed priest forming with his sons the exclusive priesthood, and the sons of Levi the ministering tribe. The most natural date is after the Restoration, as no trace of this system is found till the arrival of Ezra.

d. Last came a long line of scribes (P^s), combining, revising, expanding, and supplementing, until the Pentateuch reached its present form.

§ 6. HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF LEVITICUS.

a. As thus resolved into its component parts, arranged in chronological order, though not all furnished with definite dates, the book becomes a great witness to the Christian doctrine of evolution. As, under the inspiration and prompting of the Spirit of God, the laws for conduct and worship were shaped and modified, their form largely dependent on historical circumstances, so we who have had committed to us the revelation of absolute truth in Christ may expect to have amongst us a presence of the Spirit adequate to enable us to apply that truth for each age till the end comes.

b. Lv is the literary monument of the Hebrew priesthood. Overshadowed in the earlier history by kings and prophets, represented in the pages of written prophecy by the degenerate members of the order, it is in Lv and Ezk that we see how the priests trained Israel to associate a high standard of morality with a stately form of worship, which, though freely using material means, was, in its essence, and still more as compared with contemporary forms of religion, severely spiritual and rich in symbolical significance.

c. The earlier collections in the one case (P^h) carry us back to the earlier years of the monarchy, and in the other (P^t) preserve probably with accuracy the procedure at the Temple during the period after Josiah's reformation, and no doubt partially reflect the praxis of previous centuries, for the continuity of custom and persistency of ritual where no historical revolution has taken place must be remembered.

d. As a whole, Lv is the mirror of the Second Temple and its system. Whenever it or its several parts were written, it is on all hands admitted that its provisions were never fully executed till the time of Ezra.

§ 7. RELIGIOUS VALUE OF LEVITICUS.

a. We still need, side by side with the prophetic, the priestly view of religion. (See § 6 b). For all J" was Israel's God, but for the one His Righteousness, and for the other His Holiness was the dominant attribute. (The earlier prophetic term 'Holy One of Israel' hardly belongs to the same circle of ideas as Lv.)

b. Amid the labyrinth of connected but frequently conflicting ordinances the watchwords of the Law of Holiness enable us to thread the maze securely. There are differences in the way by which it is sought to realize the ideal: the ideal is but one, the Holy God amid a Holy People in a Holy Land.

* These instances are all taken from the forthcoming Oxf. Anal. Hex., where they will be printed in full in the introduction, which deals fully with the whole question.

c. The Law of Sacrifice reminds us of our human need for something visible and outward in our worship, while its particulars happily illustrate, even if they do not teach, the various parts of Christian devotion. Sacrifices are elements in the visible fabric of religion by which the spiritual service of the Holy God was given a protective shell for its growth: eternal moments in the life energy of the worshipping spirit, visualized in temporary form: signposts pointing to the Perfect Sacrifice: earnests of that Sacrament which replaces sacrifice proper by commemoration and communion.

d. The Law of the Consecration of the Priesthood, with the multitude of ordinances on the duties and holiness of the priests, must ever remain solemn reading for all those who believe themselves to have been made priests unto their God, and especially for them on whom the great High Priest has laid the awful burden of ministering as His commissioned representatives.

e. Lastly, the Law of Clean and Unclean enforces one great lesson alike of the Incarnation itself and of the life of the Incarnate, that the body matters intensely. Health helps not happiness only, but holiness. Cleanliness and godliness have their real and close relations. The study of hygiene, the promotion of public health by helping to make or enforce good sanitary laws and bye-laws, the provision of baths and wash-houses or of a water supply, simple living, good housewifery, the stamping out of infectious diseases, the treatment of the poor and sick,—if Lv only furnished texts for the commendation of these things, could we say that its religious value was insignificant?

LITERATURE.—(See art. HEXATEUCH). Kalisch's Comm. is the best in Eng.; cf. also Driver and White in Polychrome Bible (brief comments); Kellogg in Expos. Bible (for application); Hexapla in Leviticum, 1631 (older views fully given); see also arts. PRIESTS AND LEVITES, SACRIFICE, TYPE, UNCLEANNESS.

G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

LEWD, LEWDNESS.—The Anglo-Saxon laéwed (or geléwed) was the past ptcp. of laéwan, to enfeeble; in middle Eng. it appeared as lewed, which was afterwards contracted to lewd. Thus the earliest meaning is 'enfeebled,' 'useless,' as in Piers Plowman, ii. 186—

> 'Chastite with-oute charite worth cheynid in helle;
> Hit is as lewede as a lampe that no lyght ys ynne.'

Next we find the meaning of 'ignorant,' which was the usual sense of the word down to Shakespeare. Thus Chaucer, (?) Romaunt, Frag. C. l. 6217—

> 'Lered or lewd, lord or lady';

Spenser, Shepheards Calendar, ii. 10—

> 'Lewdly complainest thou, laesie ladde,
> Of winters wracke for making thee sadde';

and Ascham, Scholemaster, p. 45: 'This lewde and learned, by common experience, know to be most trewe.' From this arose a special use of the word to designate the laity, who are the lewd inasmuch as they are the unlearned, and so are distinguished from the 'clergy' or 'clerks,' the learned.* Wyclif (1382) translates 1 S 21^{4} 'And answerynge the preest to David seith to hym, I haue not leeuyd loouys at hoond (1388, 'Y haue not lewid, that is comyn, looues at hoond'), but oonli hooli breed.' Again, in the Wycliffite tr. of 1388, Ac 4^{13} is rendered, 'And thei siyen the stidfastnesse of Petre and of Joon, for it was foundun that thei weren men unlettrid, and lewid men, and thei wondriden, and knowen hem that thei weren with Jhesu'; which in 1380 had been 'founden that thei weren men with oute lettris, and idiotis' (Gr. ἰδιῶται=private persons, 'laymen'; Vulg. idiotæ; Tind. 'laye people'; Cran. 'laye men'; Rhem. 'of the vulgar sort'). The two meanings of 'ignorant' and 'lay' are closely combined in Ascham, Works, (ed. 1815), p. 206, 'Hereby is plainly seen, how learning is robbed of the best wits; first, by the great beating, and after, the ill choosing of scholars to go to the universities: whereof cometh partly that lewd and spiteful proverb, sounding to the just hurt of learning, and shame of learned men, that the greatest clerks be not the wisest men'; and in Sir John Davies, The Soul, st. 13—

> 'Thus these great clerks their little wisedome shew, > While with their doctrines they at hazard play;
> Tossing their light opinions to and fro,
> To mocke the lewde, as learnd in this as they.'

From this developed next the sense of 'wicked' by an easily understood transition. Sir John Davies, Discoverie of the State of Ireland (ed. 1613), p. 181, says the followers of the Irish chieftains 'were borne out and countenanced in all their lewde and wicked actions'; North (Plutarch, 'Cicero,' p. 862) has 'This Verres had been Praetor of Cicilia, and had committed many lewd parts there'; and this is the meaning in Milton, PL iv. 193—

> 'So clomb this first grand thief into God's fold:
> So since into his Church lewd hirelings climb.'

And then, finally, came the meaning of 'lustful,' the special wickedness to which the ignorant were prone, and the only meaning that has remained to the word. This is as old as Chaucer; cf. also Spenser, FQ II. i. 10—

> 'O would it so had chaunst,
> That you, most noble Sir, had present beene
> When that lewd ribauld, with vile lust advaunst, > Laid first his filthy hands on virgin cleene';

Milton, PL i. 490—

> 'Belial came last, than whom a Spirit more lewd
> Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
> Vice for itself';

and Comus, 465—

> 'But, when lust,
> By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
> But most by lewd and lavish act of sin,
> Lets in defilement to the inward parts,
> The soul grows clotted by contagion.'

In AV lewd, lewdly, and lewdness are found in both the meanings last noted, and there is no sharp distinction between them. The special sense of 'lustful,' while usual in OT, does not occur in Apocr. or NT.

The Heb. words are (1) זִמָּה zimmah, which is tr^{d} 'lewdness' in Jg 20^{6} (Moore, 'abomination,' which is the Geneva word), Jer 13^{27}, Hos 6^{9} (Cheyne, 'outrages'), and often in Ezk (16$^{43.\ 58}$ 22^{9} 23$^{21.\ 27.\ 29.\ 35.\ 48\ bis.\ 49}$ 24^{13}: see Davidson on 16^{43}). This word has a range of meaning from the colourless 'plan' or 'purpose' (only Job 17^{11}) to the special sin of unchastity. Besides the above, it is rendered in AV 'purpose' (Job 17^{11}), 'thought' (Pr 24^{9}, so RV, but OHL 'evil device'), 'wicked device' (Is 32^{7}), 'wickedness' (Lv 18^{17} 19^{29} 20$^{14\ bis}$, RVm 'enormity'), 'mischief' (Ps 26^{10} 119^{150}, Pr 10^{23}, RV in last two 'wickedness'), 'heinous crime' (Job 31^{11}); in Ezk 16^{27} the Heb. 'way of lewdness' is tr^{d} 'lewd way,' so 'women of lewdness' in 23^{44} 'lewd women'; in Pr 21^{27} Heb. 'in lewdness' is 'with a wicked mind,' RVm 'to atone for wickedness'; and in Ezk 22^{11} it is 'lewdly.' (2) The derivative מְזִמָּה is once (Jer 11^{15}) rendered 'lewdness'; and (3) נַבְלוּת nabhlûth, in its only occurrence (Hos 2^{10}) is so translated, AVm 'folly or villany,' RVm 'shame.'

In Apocr. the adj. occurs in Ad. Est 16^{4} 'lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons that were never good' (τοῖς τῶν ἀπειραγαθῶν κόμποις παρελθόντες, RV 'lifted up with the boastful words of them that were never good'); 16^{6} 'lewd disposition'

* Trench and Skeat hold that the sense of 'lay' came first, and that 'ignorant' developed out of it, the laity being seen to be 'the ignorant party.' But the other order seems proved by the examples we have gathered.

(κακοπιστία); Sir 30^{13} 'lewd behaviour' (ἀσχημοσύνη, RV 'shameless behaviour'); and Sir 16^{heading} 'It is better to have none, than many lewd children'; the adv. in Wis 15^{8} 'employing his labours lewdly' (κακόμοχθος, RV 'labouring to an evil end'); and the subst. in To 4^{13} 'in lewdness is decay and great want' (ἐν τῇ ἀχρειότητι, RV 'in naughtiness'). In NT the adj. occurs but once, Ac 17^{5} 'certain lewd fellows of the baser sort' (τῶν ἀγοραίων τινὰς ἄνδρας πονηρούς, RV 'certain vile fellows of the rabble'); and the subst. once, Ac 18^{14} 'If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness' (ῥαδιούργημα πονηρόν, RV 'wicked villany').

LIBANUS (Λίβανος, Libanus).—The (Greek) form of the (Heb.) name LEBANON (wh. see), 1 Es 4^{48} 5^{55}, 2 Es 15^{20}, Jth 1^{7}, Sir 24^{13} 50^{12} [all].

LIBERTINES.—In Ac 6^{9} we read that 'there arose certain of them that were of the synagogue called (the synagogue) of the Libertines, and of the Cyrenians, and of the Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and Asia, disputing with Stephen.' In close relation to the question who the Libertines were, stands the question as to the number of synagogues here indicated. It has been held that only one synagogue is implied (Calvin, Wieseler; cf. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 50); that there were two synagogues—the one consisting of Libertines and Cyrenians and Alexandrians, the other of Cilicians and Asiatics (Winer, Holtzmann, Wendt); that each of the five parties had a separate synagogue (Schürer, Hausrath). The last view is supported by the fact that in Jerus. the synagogues—though they did not number 480, as affirmed in rabbinical traditions—were very numerous, and by the consideration that even if the inhabitants of all the places mentioned could have been accommodated in one synagogue—a supposition which the largeness of the Jewish population in Cyrene and Alexandria renders very improbable—there was no common bond to bring together men from towns or districts so widely separated.

If this view be sound, it helps to determine the question whether by the L. we are to understand the inhabitants of some town or the designation of a class. The association of the Libertines with the Cyrenians, etc., would naturally suggest the inhabitants of some town in Proconsular Africa, and conjectural emendations of the text (Λιβυστίνων (Wetstein, Blass) or Λιβύων τῶν κατὰ Κυρήνην) based on this assumption have been made (see Blass, Philology of Gospels, 69f.). It is argued by Gerdes ('de synagoga Libertinorum,' Exercit. Acad. 1738, who at the same time furnishes a complete statement and discussion of other views) that if Luke had meant Libertini in the Roman sense, he would have used a Gr., not a Lat. word; that Suidas mentions a town named Libertum; and that among those present at the Council of Carthage in 411 was Victor Episcopus Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Libertinensis, between whom and the rival Donatist bishop a sharp recrimination took place (Mansi, iv. 91, 92). But the statement of Suidas is probably derived from the passage in Ac; and, moreover, it is altogether improbable that the Jewish contingent from a town so obscure could have maintained a separate synagogue at Jerusalem. Moreover, the addition by Luke of τῆς λεγομένης seems intended to guard against the possibility of our misconceiving that the Libertines, like the others mentioned, were inhabitants of a place.

Setting aside the fantastic conjectures that the Libertines were a philosophical sect, or the adherents of the school of one Libertus, and the suggestion of Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. et Talm.) that they were Pal. Jews who had been enslaved and subsequently set free, we conclude that the Libertines were freedmen in the Roman sense of the term. They were mainly descendants of those Jews who had been taken as prisoners to Rome by Pompey in B.C. 63, and there sold as slaves. We learn from Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, c. 23, ii. 568 (Mang.)) that the majority of the Roman Jews belonged to the class of freedmen (cf. Tacitus, Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Tib. c. 36). Their enslaved condition lasted but a short time, and they soon became an important factor in the community. Whether they were manumitted by their masters because their value as slaves was greatly lessened by their tenacious adherence to their national customs (Hausrath), or because their fidelity as slaves suggested to their masters that as freemen they would be of still greater service (Berliner), or whether they were ransomed by their own countrymen (Grätz), we do not know; but the language of Philo seems to indicate that the first-mentioned cause was the most influential. The fear of the Jews expressed by Cicero (pro Flacco, c. 28) is no doubt rhetorical; but rhetorically it would have been pointless if the Jews had been a feeble folk (cf. Hor. Sat. i. 4. 143). By such of them as returned to settle in Jerus. or were temporarily resident there, a synagogue was built. According to Hausrath the building of a separate synagogue was a necessity, as from a theocratic point of view they were subject to certain disabilities. Among the inscriptions quoted by Schürer (Die Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom, p. 15) is one referring to a synagogue τῶν Αὐγυστησίων; and if, as is probable, this refers to freedmen or slaves in the house of Augustus, it seems to show that at Rome was reproduced the type of distinctions that existed in Jerusalem. Like the other Hel. Jews, the Libertines were keenly opposed to the new faith, and the very inferiority of their social and theocratic standing may have caused them to emphasize the distinctiveness of their religious position (cf. Gerdes, op. cit.; Schürer, op. cit., HJP II. ii. 56 f., 276; Hausrath in Schenkel, Bibel-Lexicon; Meyer on Ac 6^{9}; Expositor, July, 1895, p. 35).

JOHN PATRICK.

LIBERTY.—The only passage in which this word needs verbal attention is 1 Mac 10^{43} 'And whosoever they be that flee unto the temple at Jerusalem, or be within the liberties thereof, being indebted unto the king, or for any other matter, let them be at liberty, and all that they have in my realm.' The 'liberties' of the temple are its precincts, the parts within which its inmates have liberty of action. The Gr. is ὅρια, borders, bounds. Scrivener gives this as one of the colloquialisms peculiar to the Apocr., which the AV translators accepted with slovenliness from the Bishops' Bible. It is also the tr. of Coverdale and the Geneva Bible. Wyclif's word is 'coasts' = boundaries, and so Douay, after Vulg. fines.

J. HASTINGS.

LIBERTY.—This idea forms one of the characteristic differences between OT and NT conceptions of religion. In OT the idea is almost entirely absent. 'The fear of the Lord' is the distinctive name for religion (Ps 34^{11} etc.), 'servant' is the distinctive title of the good (Ps 19^{11}, He 3^{5} etc.). God is thought of chiefly as the supreme, universal sovereign and ruler, Is 33^{22}. Obedience is the central virtue of religious character, to which all blessings are promised, 1 S 15^{22}. To illustrate this position fully, it would be necessary to quote a large part of the OT. We do not mean that there are no indications of more intimate relations between God and man. The freer, gentler side of religion is undoubtedly known. The law of love for God and man is promulgated. Many of the psalmists and prophets rise to lofty heights of divine joy and fellowship. But the ground-tone of OT piety is reverential fear. This order of development in revelation was fitting and indeed inevitable. The OT age was the age of childhood in revealed religion, and children are trained for independence by a course of obedience and subjection to authority (Gal $4^{1f.}$). 'The law hath been our tutor to bring us unto Christ' (Gal 3^{24}). The patriarchal age certainly seems to breathe a freer spirit than the age of the law proper. Still, even then religious thought and feeling can only have been elementary; and this is the impression made by the narrative. Of later days St. Paul uses strong, even harsh, language, 'weak and beggarly rudiments' (Gal 4^{9}). The prevailing spirit was a 'spirit of bondage to fear' (Ro 8^{15}). At the same time the emphasis laid on God's work of redemption must have given rise to thoughts of spiritual freedom (Ex 13^{14}, Dt 7^{8}, 1 Ch 17^{21} etc.), and in Is 61^{1} this truth finds glorious expression. It is perhaps worth while to notice that, while in the political system of Israel there is no trace of the idea of liberty in the modern sense, that system is distinguished from the despotisms of the day by many humane regulations unknown elsewhere, such as those with regard to slavery (Ex 21^{2}) and land (Lv $25^{10.23}$).

Christianity brought, first of all, freedom from the ceremonial restrictions and conditions of OT religion. The Mosaic law is described as 'a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear' (Ac 15^{10}). To all attempts to continue or reimpose the yoke on Christian believers, St. Paul offered unflinching and successful resistance (Gal 3^{24} $5^{1ff.}$), and so won the victory of Christian freedom for all time. The teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews throughout supports St. Paul (9^{23} 10^{1}). The NT condemns beforehand all attempts to reduce Christianity to a mere system of ritual. The Lord Jesus, St. Paul, and St. John are at one in their insistence on spiritual religion.

But the chief NT doctrine on this subject is that of inward freedom as the privilege of all believers. Sin brings into bondage (Jn 8^{34}, Ro $6^{16f.}$); but from this bondage believers are saved both negatively and positively. This is the profound meaning of redemption in the NT sense—deliverance from that sense of guilt and fear and condemnation which oppresses and fetters the soul (Ro 8^{2}, Tit 2^{14} etc.). 'Ye were servants of sin, ye became servants of righteousness' (Ro $6^{17f.}$). Knowledge of the truth is the means (Jn 8^{32}), Christ Himself the source (Jn 8^{36}, 2 Co 3^{17}), of this highest freedom. The 'spirit of bondage' gives place to the 'spirit of adoption' (Ro 8^{15}, Gal 4^{6}). Sin, death, the world, are conquered enemies (1 Co $15^{55ff.}$, Ro 8^{37-39}, 1 Jn 5^{4}). The exultant sense of power, of present and future triumph, enjoyed by the believer, is vividly expressed in passages like Ro $5^{2.10}$ $6^{12.22}$ 8^{38}. Spiritual freedom culminates in the relation of children in which believers stand to God. In our Lord's teaching, in St. Paul's and St. John's, this is always represented as the distinctive privilege of the saved, so profound and far-reaching is the NT revelation of the divine Fatherhood in the fullest sense: 'your Father in heaven' (Mt 5^{48} 7^{11}, Jn $1^{12.13}$, Ro 8^{16}, 1 Jn $3^{1f.}$). St. Paul expressly contrasts the state of the servant and the son: 'Thou art no more a servant, but a son' (Gal 4^{7}). God is thought of as Father, no longer as Ruler merely. The most signal exercise of the liberty of children of God is the boldness with which believers draw near to God (He 4^{16} 10^{19}). Christians are invested with the full privileges of the priesthood (1 P 2^{9}). Liberty is not to pass into licence (Gal 5^{13}, 1 P 2^{16}). St. James speaks of a 'law of liberty' (1^{25} 2^{12}).

On the thorny questions which have arisen in connexion with liberty and necessity, Scripture says nothing, but implies much. By always appealing to man as responsible, by calling upon him to repent and believe, by holding him accountable for the results of his action, it assumes that he is free, and in the most definite way refutes the doctrine of moral fatalism. Man may become the slave of sin, sinking into spiritual paralysis; but it is his own act, and recovery is always possible in this life. Only so far as his action is voluntary, and his slavery self-induced, is he guilty. Pharaoh who hardened his heart repeatedly, Ahab who 'did evil above all that were before him,' Jeroboam 'who made Israel to sin,' are terrible examples of the hardening effects of sin; but their ruin was their own work; they 'sold themselves to work evil' (1 K 21^{20}). Otherwise, they could not have been punished by God as they were. Whatever speculative difficulties may be raised on the ground of the divine omniscience, or the law of heredity, or the principle of cause and effect, they vanish before man's invincible consciousness of moral responsibility and the Scripture declarations of God's righteousness and man's freedom (Gn 18^{25}, Ezk $33^{11f.}$, Jn 3^{19} 5^{40}).

LIBNAH (לִבְנָה).—1. The third of the 12 stations following Hazeroth, mentioned only in Nu $33^{20.21}$ (see EXODUS, IV.), unless it is the same place that is called in Dt 1^{1} Laban. Its position is not known.

quered kings (12^{15}) between Arad and Adullam, in a group of 9 cities of the Shephēlah (15^{42}) and in the lists of priestly cities (21^{13}, 1 Ch 6^{42} [v.^{57} LXX and Eng.]). The MT in Ch describes it as a city of refuge, but the text requires emendation, and the renderings of AV and RV give the probable sense. The city revolted at the same time as Edom from under the hand of Judah in the time of Joram [Jehoram] (2 K 8^{22}, 2 Ch 21^{10}). It appears to have been a stronghold, for the king of Assyria attacked it in the time of Hezekiah (2 K 19^{8}, Is 37^{8}). In the last days of the kingdom of Judah it was inhabited by Jewish families, for Josiah took to wife a daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah (2 K 23^{31} 24^{18}). This is the last biblical notice of the place, and no reference to it occurs in later times. It was probably in the neighbourhood of Beit Jibrin, and a site 4 miles to N.W. has been proposed, and (PEFSt, Jan. 1897) another, 10 miles S.E. of Tell el-Hesy.

The LXX renderings are very varied, Λεβνά or Λοβνά occurring most frequently; for β is substituted μ in some places, and λεβμνά occurs in A. The first vowel is often varied, but generally no vowel is found between β and ν, and in this respect the renderings are distinguished from those of Libnah (1), which introduce ω between β and ν; Λεβωνά, with μ for β in B. The first syllable of the rendering Σεννά in 2 K 8^{22} may be a duplication of the last syllable of the preceding word. On the previous page is a list of the LXX variations.

LIBNI (לִבְנִי, Λοβεν(ε)ί).—The eldest son of Gershon, that is to say, the eponym of a principal family of Gershonite Levites, Ex 6^{17}, Nu 3^{18}, 1 Ch 6$^{17.\,20}$ [Heb. $^{2.\,5}$]. In 1 Ch 6^{29} [Heb. ^{14}], perhaps owing to some dislocation of the text, the name appears as that of the eponym of a family of Merarites. The patronymic Libnites (הַלִּבְנִי) occurs in Nu 3^{21} 26^{58}.

LICE (כִּנָּם, כִּנִּים kinnîm, כִּנָּם kinnām, σκνίφες, κνίπες, sciniphes, cinifes).—The usual meaning of σκνίψ=κνίψ is plant-louse. It is also used for various species of gnats. Some have supposed it to designate a species of worm. Whether it can be understood of the louse also is not clear. The tr. in the text of EV (Ex 8^{16} RVm 'sandflies' or 'fleas,' $^{17.\,18}$, Ps 105^{31}) 'lice' is based upon the authority of the Talmud; on the fact that the insects alluded to sprang from the dust, not from the water; that the lice were in, not on men and beasts, i.e. in their hair; that the Targum, Syriac, and Arabic VSS tr. the word by one which appears to mean lice rather than gnats. Scholars are still divided on the subject (see MEDICINE, p. 330), but the weight of evidence seems to be in favour of lice as the third of the plagues of Egypt. Lice swarm on the persons of uncleanly people in the East. The better classes of the ancient Egyptians, however, were scrupulously clean; and Herodotus says that the priests shaved all the hair from their heads and bodies every third day, lest they should harbour any of these unclean insects, and so defile the temples. Such a pest, therefore, would be peculiarly abhorrent to them. See, on the whole subject, Dillm. on Ex 8^{13}.

G. E. POST.

LICENCE is simply 'permission' in all its occurrences in AV, where its spelling is indifferently 'licence' (1 Mac 1^{13}, 2 Mac 4^{9}, Ac 21^{40} 25^{16}), or 'license' (Jth 11^{14}, Sir 15^{20}), and the verb does not occur. RV retains 'licence' (spelling so always), except in 2 Mac 4^{9}, AV 'if he might have licence to set him up a place for exercise' (ἐὰν συγχωρηθῇ διὰ τῆς ἐξουσίας αὐτοῦ, RV 'if it might be allowed him through the king's authority'); Ac 21^{40} AV 'And when he had given him licence' (ἐπιτρέψαντος δὲ αὐτοῦ, RV 'And when he had given him leave'); and 25^{16} AV 'have licence to answer' (τόπον ἀπολογίας, RV 'have had opportunity to make his defence'). AV had already changed 'licence' of earlier versions into 'leave,' as Jn 19^{38} Tind. 'And Pylate gave him licence.' The verb was once common in the same sense, as Ac 22 $^{\text{heading}}$ Rhem. 'Being licensed by the Tribune to speake to the people'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 294, 'he licenced Plato to departe without damage.' Milton uses both subst. and vb. in their modern meaning in Areopagitica (Clar. Press ed. p. 6), 'But lest I should be condemn'd of introducing licence, while I oppose Licencing.'

LIDEBIR (לִדְבִר).—Proposed in RVm of Jos 13^{26} as alternative rendering to of Debir (text). See DEBIR No. 2 and LODEBAR.

LIE, LYING, and the many other words of the group, describe various forms of the sin against truth, and serve to illustrate an important element of the biblical morality.

The principal Heb. and Greek terms are the following:—1. שָׁקַר 'lie' (Qal and Pi.). שֶׁקֶר 'falsehood' (Jer 10^{14}), 'a lie' (Ps 119^{69}), frequently preceded by דבר, also used adverbially = 'falsely' (2 S 18^{13}).

2. כָּזַב (root meaning quite uncertain) 'to speak falsely,' esp. in Pi. (with לְ or בְּ pointing to the person addressed); Niph. 'to be found or show oneself a liar' (Pr 30^{6}), Hiph. 'make or make out a liar' (Job 24^{25}). כָּזָב 'a lie'; אִישׁ כָּ' 'a liar' (Pr 19^{22}); cf. אַכְזָב Jer 15^{18} (of failing, deceptive brook, cf. vb. in Is 57^{11}), Mic 1^{14}.

3. כָּחַשׁ 'to be lean,' 'become emaciated' (Ps 109^{24}); Pi. with לְ or בְּ 'to lie to one' (1 K 13^{18}, Jer 5^{12}); Niph. 'to feign obedience' (Dt 33^{29}). כַּחַשׁ 'leanness' (Job 16^{8}), usually 'a lie,' 'a calumny' (Hos 10^{13}). כֶּחָשׁ 'deceitful' (Is 30^{9}). The root meaning is uncertain, possibly that of failing.

4. בַּד, only in plur. בַּדִּים (root ברד, i.e. ברא 'to invent') 'empty or boastful talk' (Job 11^{3}), thence applied to utterers of such, as liars, diviners (Is 44^{25}, Jer 50^{36}).

5. שָׁוְא 'emptiness,' 'vanity' (Ps 60^{11}), thence applied to things of no substance or injurious, as the falsehood, the idol, the wicked or criminal act (Pr 30^{8}, Ps 24^{4} 26^{4}, Job 11^{11}); cf. עֵד שָׁוְא 'a hollow, insincere witness' (Dt 5^{20}) with עֵד שֶׁקֶר 'a false witness' (Ex 20^{16}).

6. In NT the subject is handled by the use of the group of words connected with ψεύδω, here used only in the middle voice. ψεύδεσθαι is used abs. (Mt 5^{11}, 2 Co 11^{31} etc.); with acc. of person lied to (Ac 5^{3}); with dat. (Ac 5^{4}); εἰς τινά (Col 3^{9}); κατὰ τῆς ἀληθείας (Ja 3^{14}). The list includes ψεύστης 'a deceiver' (Jn 8^{44} etc.), 'a false teacher' (1 Jn 2^{22}); ψευδής 'false,' 'wicked' (Ac 6^{13}, Rev 21^{8}); ψεῦδος 'lying,' 'a lie,' esp. of false religion (Jn 8^{44}, Ro 1^{25}); ψεῦσμα 'a falsehood' (Ro 3^{7}); ἀψευδής of God 'that cannot lie' (Tit 1^{2}); ψευδολόγος 'teaching falsely' (1 Ti 4^{2}); and various compounds descriptive of enemies of the faith, as ψευδάδελφος (Gal 2^{4}), ψευδαπόστολος (2 Co 11^{13}), ψευδοπροφήτης (Mt 7^{15} etc.), ψευδοδιδάσκαλος (2 P 2^{1}), ψευδόχριστος (Mt 24^{24}, Mk 13^{22}).

1. The biblical writers describe various types of lying. In its most general aspect—the saying what we know to be false with intent to deceive—it is clear that it was reprobated by the common conscience of Israel (cf. Pr 19^{22} 30^{6}), and it is expressly condemned in the ancient Law of Holiness (Lv 19$^{11.\,12}$). Usually, however, in the legislation, including the Decalogue, special cognizance is taken of lying of the criminal kind—consisting either in the perjured testimony which procures an unjust sentence (Dt 19$^{15\text{-}21}$, cf. Ex 20^{16}), or in the false statement which is the instrument of fraudulent dealing (Lv 6$^{1\text{ff.}}$). In the prophetical writings lying is conceived, not merely as a principal kind, but almost as the soul, of wickedness, and so sometimes appears as the symbol of all moral evil (Hos 12^{1}, cf. Is 6^{5}). At a later period 'lie' is a favourite description of the message of the false prophets (Jer 27^{10}), and of the utterances of soothsayers (Is 44^{25}), and the same idea is often expressed in the designation of idols and idolatry.

In NT, in which the duty of truthfulness is strongly insisted on in contrast to Oriental deceitfulness, it is suggested that there are three lies par excellence—heathen religion (Ro 1^{25}), the claim of the false apostle (Rev 2^{2}), and the denial 'that Jesus is the Christ' (1 Jn 2^{22}).

2. The heinousness of lying appears in various particulars—that it is utterly inconsistent with the holiness which is of the essence of the divine nature, and gives a law to the people (Lv 19^{11}), and more particularly with the commandments of a God who Himself is absolutely true (Ps 89^{35}); and also that it has anti-social effects of a ruinous and far-reaching kind (Prophets, passim; cf. Pr 26^{28}). In NT its sinfulness is further emphasized by tracing it to the example and inspiration of Satan (Jn 8^{44}, Ac 5^{3}), or to the old man which is put off in conversion (Col 3^{9}).

3. The penalties of lying are set forth in an ascending scale. Various saws in Pr point to the heritage of contempt which is the portion of the habitual liar. The judicial punishment of the false witness is the recoil upon himself of the evil 'he had thought to do unto his brother' (Dt 19^{19}). In the history of Gehazi (2 K 5), and of Ananias and Sapphira (Ac 5), the aggravated lie is punished by a special judgment of appalling severity. In Ps 24^{4} lying is numbered with the sins which disqualify from the worship of, and so exclude from communion with, God. And as a consistent development of this stern judgment we find it in the NT as one of the list of sins by which the essence of character is tested, and which, become habitual, entail the forfeiture of eternal salvation (Rev 21^{27} 22^{15}).

Two problems arising out of the subject may be briefly referred to. The first is connected with the passages which seem to represent God as using deceitful means—esp. 1 K 22^{23}, where He is said to have lured Ahab to destruction by 'putting a lying spirit in the mouth of the prophets,' and in a lesser degree 1 S 16^{2}, where He instructs Samuel to conceal his real purpose from Saul by offering a sacrifice. As regards the first of these cases it may, however, be fairly held, as is indeed required by the general tenor of OT religion, that the sense is satisfied by regarding God, not as the author of sin, but as overruling wickedness to the working out of His righteous purposes. 'All that is meant is that, in carrying out God's decree of condemnation, he (the lying spirit) becomes a means of leading the king on to his doom through the fawning guile of these false prophets' (W. S. Bruce, Ethics of OT, p. 269). It should be added that the difficulty of this class of passages is less keenly felt when the mechanical theory of inspiration is abandoned.*

A second problem concerns the attitude of the Bible in its moral teaching towards the casuistical controversy over the lie of exigency. In other words: when we have said of a statement that it is wittingly false, or intended to deceive, is it thereby condemned as having the character of guilt? or does it lose this character if it can be shown that the false statement was required in self-defence, or by the law of love? Of such lies we have examples in the lives of Abraham (Gn 20^{2}) and of David (1 S 21^{13}), although obviously it does not follow, any more than in the case of the graver failings of OT saints, that they are recorded for example and guidance. On the whole, the rigorous doctrine must be judged more in harmony with the spirit of the biblical morality, the common scriptural ground being that it is ours to obey the commands of the moral law, and that God may be trusted for the consequences. For a full discussion of the lie of exigency in the light of Christian principles, see Martensen's Christian Ethics (Eng. tr. ^{4}), vol. ii. p. 216 ff., also Newman Smyth's Christian Ethics, p. 392 ff.

W. P. PATERSON.

LIE.—The verb to lie was formerly used in the sense of pass the night, lodge, sleep. We find an example of this in Is 14^{18} 'All the kings of the nations, even all of them, lie in glory, every one in his own house' (שָׁכְבוּ; RV 'sleep,' as Gen. Bible): cf. Jos 2^{1} AVm 'and lay there,' for text 'and lodged there' (וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ־שָׁמָּה). So North, Plutarch, 'Demetrius,' p. 895, 'For they ordained that the place behind the Temple of Minerva called Parthenon (as who would say, the temple of the Virgin) should be prepared for his house to lye in'; and Bunyan, PP (Clar. Press ed. p. 240), 'Then they called for the Master of the House, and he came to them. So they asked if they might lie there that night?' On which Venables remarks, 'To lie continued in familiar use till the end of the last century for to stop the night at a place. This is the hinge of Walton's witty translation of Sir Henry Wotton's definition of an ambassador—"an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country."'

The following phrases should be noticed: 1. Lie along. See ALONG. 2. Lie on or Lie upon. This phrase occurs in the figurative sense of 'oppress,' 'annoy,' as Dt 29^{20} 'all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him' (רָבְצָה בּוֹ; Driver remarks that רָבַץ is 'to lie down as an animal' [Gn 49^{9}], and thinks the metaphor forced, preferring the Sept. κολληθήσονται, 'shall cleave to him'); Jg 14^{17} 'and it came to pass on the seventh day that he told her, because she lay sore upon him' (הֱצִיקַתְהוּ, RV 'she pressed him sore,' Moore 'she besieged him'; the same verb is tr^{d} in 16^{16} 'she pressed him,' AV and RV); Ps 88^{7} 'Thy wrath lieth hard upon me' (עָלַי סָמְכָה, Driver 'presseth upon me'); Sir 6^{21} 'She will lie upon him as a mighty stone of trial' (ἰσχυρὸς ἔσται ἐπ' αὐτῷ, RV 'shall she rest upon him'); Ac 27^{20} 'no small tempest lay on us' (χειμῶνος . . . ἐπικειμένου): RV accepts this very literal and old-fashioned tr. here, as well as in 1 Co 9^{16} 'lie upon' for the same verb, but elsewhere ἐπίκειμαι is tr^{d} 'press upon' (Lk 5^{1}), 'be instant' (23^{23}), 'impose on' (He 9^{10}); but where the meaning is literal, 'lie upon' (Jn 11^{38} AV, but RV 'lie against,' with m. 'upon') or 'lie on' (21^{9}) is of course used. Tindale (Expos. p. 100) says, 'Covetousness made the Pharisees to lie on Christ, to persecute Him, and falsely to accuse Him'; and again (p. 119), 'Thou wouldest not that men should do thee wrong and oppress thee; thou wouldest not that men should do thee shame and rebuke, lie on thee, kill thee,' where the editor of the Parker Soc. ed. explains 'on is used for of or against,' apparently taking 'lie' to mean 'tell lies.' In Jg 19^{20} the phrase has a somewhat milder but very similar meaning, 'let all thy wants lie upon me' (the Heb. is simply 'be all thy wants upon me'). In Nu 21^{15} the meaning is 'touch.' 'And at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab' (נִשְׁעָן, RV as AVm 'leaneth upon'). 3. Lie out = project, Neh 3$^{25. 26. 27}$ of the tower which projected from the king's palace (RV 'standeth out'). The phrase appears not to be English, but a literal rendering by Coverdale (who in v.^{27} has 'lieth outwarde') of the Heb. הַיּוֹצֵא, LXX ὁ ἐξέχων, Vulg. quæ prominebat.

The old past ptcp. lien occurs in Gn 26^{10}, Ps 68^{13},

* Under the same category reference may be made to the passage (Jn 7$^{8. 10. 14}$) where our Lord said, 'I go not up to this feast'; then 'went he also up, not openly.' But, with the reading of BL (οὐκ . . . οὔπω), or even without it, if the sentence is continued (ὁ ἐμὸς καιρὸς οὔπω πεπλήρωται), the difficulty almost disappears. What is quite certain is that the author of the Fourth Gospel cannot have thought that any unveracity was implied. See Meyer, in loc.

Jer 3^{2}, and RV retains (except in Ps 68^{13}, where a different tr. dispenses with it), but Amer. RV changes to 'lain.' Cf. Job 3^{13} Cov. LIEUTENANT, RV SATRAP, Ezr 8^{36}, Est 3^{12} 8^{9} 9^{3}; also Dn $3^{2.\,3.\,27}$ $6^{1\text{ff.}}$, where AV 'Prince.'—The Heb. אֲחַשְׁדַּרְפְּנִים ('ăḥashdarpĕnîm) represents the Pers. khshatrapâvan (=protectors of the realm), a title found on Persian inscriptions, e.g. that of Behistun (cf. Lagarde, Ges. Abh. 68, 14; Spiegel, Altpers. Keilinsch. 215). In Gr. the word became ἐξατράπης or σατράπης; in the LXX we find a considerable variety of rendering, διοικηταί Ezr, οἰκονόμοι 1 Es 8^{67}, στρατηγοί, ἄρχοντες τῶν σατραπῶν Est, σατράπαι Dn, ὕπατοι Dn (Theod.); in Vulg. satrapes, principes. The satrap was the governor of a whole province (cf. Dn 6^{1} [but see Bevan, ad loc.], Herod. iii. 89), and he held the position of a vassal king. His power, however, was checked by the presence of a royal scribe, whose duty it was to report to the 'great king' on the administration of the province. Also, the troops were for the most part under the command of an independent general. Under the satraps were the 'peḥahs,' or governors of smaller districts. In Ezr 8^{36} the term satrap seems to be used somewhat loosely, or the historian has unduly extended the scope of Ezra's commission; the only satrap whom it would really concern was the ruler of the district west of the Euphrates, 'the governor beyond the river' (Ezr 5^{3}). i. THE TERMS.—(1) In the OT the regular word for 'to live' is חיה from the older root חוה (so Phœn.; Aram. חיא) with the same signification, and similar forms occur in Arab., Syr., and allied tongues. It occurs in the sense of 'having life,' e.g. Ex 33^{20} 'man shall not see me and live'; Gn 5^{3} etc. 'Adam lived an hundred and thirty years'; of 'continuing in life' when death threatens, e.g. Gn 20^{7} 'he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live'; or specially of the soul as source of life, as in Gn 12^{13} 'that my soul may live because of thee.' It is also used with preps. = 'to live upon or by,' as Gn 27^{40} 'by thy sword shalt thou live,' Dt 8^{3} 'man doth not live by bread only, but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live.' So the life of man is spoken of as consisting in obedience to the divine statutes (as in Ezk 20^{11} etc. 'if a man do, he shall live in (by) them'). To live is used absolutely in the sense of 'to prosper,' as in 1 S 10^{24} 'Let the king live' (RVm). It also has the signification of returning to life from sickness, weariness, or death, as 2 K 8^{8} 'shall I recover of this sickness?' Jg 15^{19} 'his spirit came again, and he revived'; Is 26^{19} 'Thy dead shall live.' In its causative forms it signifies 'to give life,' 'to preserve alive,' 'to quicken,' 'to restore,' as Job 33^{4} 'the breath of the Almighty giveth me life'; Ezk 13^{18} 'will ye save souls alive?' Is 38^{16} 'make me to live'; 2 K 8^{1} etc. 'whose son he had restored to life.'

The adjective חַי 'living' is used of God as the source of all life, as Jos 3^{10} 'the living God is among you'; and most commonly in the formula of the oath 'as the Lord liveth,' e.g. Ru 3^{13}. It is the ordinary word for 'living' of men or animals.

The word for 'life' most generally is a plural emphatic form (חַיִּים) from the same root. This is used to denote not only physical life, but also welfare or happiness, as Pr 16^{15} 'in the light of the king's countenance is life'; Dt 30^{20} 'to love the Lord thy God . . . for he is thy life and the length of thy days'; Ps 30^{5} 'in his favour is life.' Once (in late Hebrew) it is used of eternal life, viz. Dn 12^{2} 'many shall awake, some to everlasting life' (חַיֵּי עוֹלָם). It bears also the signification of means of life, sustenance, as in Pr 27^{27} 'maintenance for thy maidens,' though the general word in this latter sense is מִחְיָה. There is also the form חַיָּה, which denotes 'a living being,' 'an animal,' and more particularly 'wild animals,' but it is used occasionally in later poetical writings in the sense of 'life,' as Ps 143^{3} 'he hath smitten my life down to the ground'; Job 33^{18} 'he keepeth back his life from perishing.'

It is noteworthy that the Hebrew name for 'Eve' (חַוָּה) is traced in Gn 3^{20} to this root, though it has been otherwise interpreted (see EVE).

A very important word is נֶפֶשׁ, lit. 'breath,' signifying the soul as the principle of life. We find it in its literal sense in such passages as Job 41^{13} [Eng.^{21}] 'his breath kindleth coals,' and Is 3^{20}. As life, its seat was supposed to be in the blood, cf. Lv 17^{11} 'For the life of the flesh is in the blood.' It is a general term for life in many senses, as 1 K 2^{23} 'at the peril of his life'; Pr 10^{3} one's life 'hungers.' A special combination is נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה 'living creatures,' as in Gn 1^{24} etc.; so it is used by synecdoche for a 'man,' as Lv 5^{1} etc. 'if any man sin'; Gn 46^{18} 'even sixteen souls, i.e. persons' (cf. corresponding Eng. usage), and even for the emphatic personal pronoun, as Is 46^{2} 'themselves are gone into captivity'; Ps 11^{1} 'why say ye to me?' Curiously it is sometimes = 'a dead body,' cf. Nu 5^{2}. לֵבָב 'the heart' is occasionally used as = נֶפֶשׁ, see Ps 102^{4}, Jer 4^{18}. See, further, art. SOUL.

In the LXX the usual equivalent of חַיִּים is ζωή, though once (Pr 31^{12}) βίος is used, and the latter frequently has the signification of the period or course of life in the NT, e.g. Lk 8^{14} 'pleasures of this life'; as also of resources, as Mk 12^{44} 'even all her living.' The special NT ideas covered by ζωή are discussed below. For נֶפֶשׁ and also לֵב, ψυχή is the equivalent; and this word also plays an important part in the language of the NT, as also does its derived adj. ψυχικός.

(2) The most ordinary Hebrew verb signifying 'to die' is מות, and this is used in the most general sense of man, beast, and even of trees and land. Cf. Job 14^{8} 'the stock thereof die in the ground,' and Gn 47^{19} 'wherefore should we die, both we and our land?' From this is derived the word מָוֶת 'death,' sometimes personified, as in Ps 49^{14} 'Death shall be their shepherd'; cf. Is 38^{18}. It is used as = the abode of the dead, as in Ps 9^{13} 'the gates of death,' and Pr 7^{27} 'the chambers of death' (though these might be understood in the former sense as a person). There is the derived form תְּמוּתָה, only found in the phrase בְּנֵי־ת׳, as Ps 79^{11} 'the sons of death' = 'those that are appointed to death' (EV). (For Sheol and Abaddon, see arts. on these words, and also ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT in vol. i. p. 740). For death in the special aspect of a destructive plague on men, as Ex 5^{3} 'lest he fall upon us with pestilence,' or on cattle Ex 9^{3}, there is the word דֶּבֶר (LXX θάνατος).

The most general word in the LXX as equivalent to the Hebrew terms above noted is θάνατος. In the NT it is used in the same signification, and is also found personified, as in 1 Co 15^{55} 'O death, where is thy victory?' Rev 1^{18} 'I have the keys of death and of Hades.' It is frequently used of spiritual death, either during earthly life, as in Ro 7^{13} 'Did then that which is good become death unto me?' 1 Jn 3^{14} 'He that loveth not abideth in death,' or in the world to come, as specially 'the second death' (ὁ δεύτερος θάνατος), as Rev 2^{11} 'he shall not be hurt of the second death.'

For ᾅδης see art. HADES, sub voc., and also ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT in vol. i. p. 752.

ii. EXAMINATION OF THE BIBLICAL TEACHING ON THESE IDEAS.—A. OLD TESTAMENT TEACHING.—(1) In the Early Narratives of Genesis.—At the very opening of Scripture, in both accounts of the Creation, we find definite teaching on life and death. God created every living creature. Gn 1^{20} 'And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life.' Again we read in Gn 1^{30} of 'every beast of the earth, and every fowl of the air, and everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life.' The second account is more definite in its teaching as to the creation of man; thus Gn 2^{7} describes how 'the LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.' Next we read of the 'tree of life,' which is common to the traditions of other Semitic peoples, and of the punishment attached to the eating of the 'tree of the knowledge of good and evil'; Gn 2^{17} 'in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.' The literal and metaphorical senses of the word 'die' constitute the force and subtlety of the serpent's temptation in Gn 3^{4} 'Ye shall not surely die.' To prevent man gaining the gift of immortality he is driven out of the garden, and the tree of life guarded, Gn 3$^{22\text{-}24}$.

(2) In the Pentateuch.—The ordinary word for 'life' is נֶפֶשׁ (LXX ψυχή), as in Gn 9^{4} 'but flesh with the life (נֶפֶשׁ) thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat.' This recurs repeatedly throughout the whole of the legal writings, and the narrative that is coloured by the priestly tradition (see, e.g., Lv 17^{11} 24^{18}, Dt 12^{23}). Life is used in the familiar absolute sense in Dt 30$^{15\text{f.}}$ 'See, I have set before you this day life and good, and death and evil' (cf. Sir 15^{17}).

(3) In the Prophets.—The main prophetic teaching on this subject is found in Isaiah and Ezekiel. In a poetical (probably late) passage of the former we read, Is 25^{8} 'He hath swallowed up death for ever' (cf. 2 Ti 1^{10}), and in Is 26^{19} 'Thy dead shall live, thy dead bodies shall arise . . . and the earth shall cast forth the dead (lit. the Rephaim, i.e. shades).' In another poetic passage, the psalm of Hezekiah, recorded in Is 38$^{10\text{-}20}$, there is much important material, but it is probably late, and should be classed with the teaching of the poetic books (see below). The passage speaks of 'the gates of Sheol' (v.^{10}). Death is presented as the end of all communion with God and men, 'I shall not see the Lord, even the Lord, in the land of the living: I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world' (v.^{11}). But God speaks to him, and he cries, 'O Lord, by these things men live, and wholly therein is the life of my spirit.' And again, 'Sheol cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth. The living, the living he shall praise thee as I do this day' (vv.$^{18.\ 19}$).

In the teaching of Ezekiel there is frequent reference to life in the pregnant sense of enjoying God's favour, and the accompanying earthly prosperity that is its sign. Thus Ezk 33$^{10\text{-}20}$, the teaching of which is summarized in vv.$^{18.\ 19}$ as follows: 'When the righteous turneth from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, he shall even die therein. But if the wicked turn from his wickedness and do that which is lawful and right, he shall live thereby' (cf. 3$^{18\text{-}20}$ 18$^{24\text{-}27}$ 20^{11}). In the prophetic portion of the Bk. of Daniel there is one reference, though probably of very late date, to 'eternal life' in 12^{2} 'many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life.'

(4) In the Poetical Books.—References are much more numerous in the Psalms and in Job. Thus in various passages of the Bk. of Job we have presented the popular conception of the existence of the dead, e.g. 3$^{12\text{-}19}$, where the 'wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest,' where 'the prisoners are at ease together, and the servant is free from his master'; or 10$^{20\text{-}22}$, where that world is described as being 'of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness'; yet the writer rises to the vision of something much higher and brighter, as in 14$^{13\text{-}15}$, where he asks, 'If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time would I wait till my release should come.' Cf. 33^{28} 'He hath redeemed my soul from going into the pit, and my life shall behold the light.' His 'blood' is used for his wrongful death (see legal idea of identity of the blood and the life, below) in 16^{18} 'O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no resting-place' (cf. Gn 4^{10}, Ezk 24$^{7.\ 8}$, Is 26^{21}). As to the great passage 19$^{23\text{-}27}$, and in what sense it denotes personal immortality, see A. B. Davidson's commentary on Job, in loco, and Appendix.

In the Psalms we read of 'the path of life' in an ethical and spiritual sense as the way of obedience to God (cf. Ps 16^{11}); of God as the 'fountain of life,' Ps 36^{9} (cf. Jer 2^{13}); Ps 30^{5} 'in his favour'; Ps 21^{4} 'he asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him'; Ps 27^{2} 'the Lord is the strength of my life'; Ps 34^{12} 'What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good?' 42^{8} 'the God of my life'; 66^{9} 'God . . . which holdeth our soul in life.'

Death has all the gloom and disappointment it had in Job, e.g. Ps 6^{5} 'In death there is no remembrance of thee: in Sheol who shall give thee thanks?' In 49^{14} death is personified.

(5) In the Wisdom Literature.—(a) In the Bk. of Proverbs the same poetic figures of life frequently occur, e.g. 'the paths of life,' 2^{19} 5^{6}; 'tree of life,' 3^{18} 11^{30} 13^{12}; 'well or fountain of life,' 10^{11} 13^{14} 14^{27}. In the absolute sense the word occurs, e.g. 3^{22} 'so shall they be life unto thy soul'; 8^{35} 'whoso findeth me findeth life.' Contrast the use of 'death' in 8^{36} 'all they that hate me love death.'

By a figure 'light and darkness' are used for 'life and death' in Ec 11$^{7.\ 8}$.

B. TEACHING OF THE APOCRYPHA AND THE APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.—These words occur most frequently and with most special significance in the two books of the Wisdom Literature in the Apocrypha, viz. those of Wisdom and Sirach. In the former ζωή occurs in several interesting connexions, cf. Wis 1^{12} 'Court not death in the error of your life' (cf. Pr 8^{36} and 21^{6}); 13^{18} 'for life he beseecheth that which is dead,' where reference is made to idolatry; cf. also 14^{12} 'the invention of them (i.e. idols) was the corruption of life'; 16^{13} 'for thou hast authority over life and death, and thou leadest down to the gates of Hades, and leadest up again.'

In the Book of Sirach ζωή occasionally means sustenance, e.g. 4^{1} 'My son, deprive not the poor of his living,' 34^{21} 'The bread of the needy is the life of the poor.' The general use is that of the figurative and absolute sense we have found in Pr and elsewhere, e.g. 4^{12} 'He that loveth her (i.e. Wisdom) loveth life,' cf. Pr 3^{18}; 6^{16} 'a faithful friend is a medicine of life,' 15^{17} 'before men is life and death' (cf. Dt 30^{19}). For the special phrase πηγὴ ζωῆς, see 21^{13} 'The knowledge of a wise man shall be made to abound as a flood, and his counsel as a fountain of life' (cf. Pr 13^{14} and 14^{27}). An instructive contrast is found in 40^{29} 'A man that looketh unto the table of another, his life is not to be counted for a life.' ψυχή has also one or two usages that may be noted here. It is, of course, ordinarily translated soul in the general sense of that word, as in Wis 3^{1} 'the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God,' but frequently comes near to its NT significance, e.g. Wis 9^{15} 'a corruptible body weigheth down the soul' (cf. 2 Co 5^{1-4}), cf. 15^{8} 'when he is required to render back the soul (life) which was lent him.' Two verses bring the several terms into close conjunction, Wis $15^{11.\ 12}$ 'He was ignorant of him that inspired into him an active soul (ψυχή), and breathed into him a vital spirit (πνεῦμα ζωτικόν). But he accounted our very life (ζωή) to be a plaything, and our lifetime (βίος) a gainful fair'; cf. also 16^{14}.

In Sirach we may note two passages: 10^{29} 'Who will justify him that sinneth against his own soul (ψυχή)? and who will glorify him that dishonoureth his own life (ζωή)?' and 16^{30} 'the soul of every living thing' (ψυχὴν παντὸς ζῴου).

In 2 Esdras, ch. 7, there is a very important passage, mainly contained in the portion recovered by Bensly, a translation of which is to be found in the RV. It is a vision of the last judgment, which is to be preceded by seven days of such silence as was before the Creation; then follows the general resurrection, and the seating of the Most High in majesty as judge. The seer understands how few can stand in the judgment, and exclaims, 'An evil heart hath grown up in us, which hath led us astray from these statutes, and hath brought us into corruption and into the ways of death, hath showed us the paths of perdition, and removed us far from life; and that not a few only, but well-nigh all that have been created' ($7^{[48]}$). Thereafter follows a vision of the various stages through which the wicked and the righteous pass after death. The day of judgment is declared to be 'the end of this time and the beginning of immortality' (though et initium is omitted in the Lat. MS) ($7^{43\ [113]}$). Again, in the 8th chapter the Most High declares to the seer, 'Unto you is paradise opened, the tree of life is planted, the time to come is prepared . . . weakness is done away for you, and [death] is hidden; hell and corruption are fled into forgetfulness . . . and in the end is showed the treasure of immortality' ($8^{52.\ 53}$).

In the Psalms of Solomon a few passages deal with the resurrection, e.g. 3^{16} 'They that fear the Lord shall rise again to life everlasting. And their life shall be in the light of the Lord, and shall fail no more'; 13^{10} 'The life of the righteous is for ever, but sinners shall be taken away for destruction'; $14^{2.\ 6}$ 'The holy of the Lord shall live in him for ever; the paradise of the Lord, the trees of life, are his holy ones. The holy of the Lord shall inherit life in gladness.' For sinners the lot is also appointed in accordance with their deeds; thus 3^{13} 'He fell, because evil was his fall, and he shall not rise again; the destruction of the sinner is for everlasting'; and 15^{13-15} 'Sinners shall perish in the day of the Lord's judgment for ever, when God shall visit the earth in His judgment, to repay sinners for everlasting.'

In the Book of Enoch (chs. 38–44) occurs a passage resembling the one quoted above from 2 Esdras, in which are seen in vision the celestial abodes prepared for the righteous, where they bless and magnify the Lord for ever and ever. Similar passages on the judgment are found in chs. 51. 61. 92. 103. and 108, from which we learn that the resurrection of the body pertains only to the righteous.

In the Apocalypse of Baruch we have the universal resurrection foretold, and the punishment of the wicked, as, e.g., in ch. 30 'And the secret places shall be opened wherein have been kept the souls of the righteous, and they shall come forth . . . but the souls of sinners shall languish the more, for they know that their punishment has come.'

C. NT TEACHING.—(1) The Synoptics.—In the first three Gospels these words are used with considerable fulness and variety of meaning. We have 'life' (ζωή) used absolutely as an equivalent for salvation in its fullest sense, as in Mt 7^{14} 'For narrow is the gate and straitened the way that leadeth unto life, and few be they that find it'; and in the repeated phrase 'to enter into life,' Mt 18^{8} etc., Mk 9^{43} etc.; once (Lk 16^{25}) the word is used of 'lifetime on earth.' 'Eternal life' (ζωὴ αἰώνιος) occurs a few times, cf. Mt $19^{16.\ 29}$, Mk 10^{30}. ψυχή is frequently used for the natural physical life in the body, as in Mt 2^{20} 'the young child's life,' Mt 6^{25} 'Be not anxious for your life.' Yet these are separable, and are commonly spoken of as 'body' and 'soul.' Thus Mt 10^{28} 'Be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna.' This double sense of the word, as denoting the higher and lower life,—that inherent in the earthly body, and that which remains when the union is broken,—lends itself to what may be almost called a play upon the word, as in the recurring thought, e.g. Mt 10^{39} 'He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it,' cf. Mt 16^{25} and the parallels. In the same sense is life used in such passages as 'rest unto your lives' (EV 'souls'), Mt 11^{29}; 'In your patience ye shall gain possession of your lives' (EV 'souls'), Lk 21^{19}. In one case ζωή is used with a similar meaning, viz. Lk 12^{15} 'a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' ψυχή is also used of our Lord's offering of Himself, as in Mk 10^{45} 'to give his life a ransom for many.'

βίος is used of 'living' in the sense of maintenance, and only occurs once outside of Luke, and that in a parallel passage quoting our Lord's own words, viz. 'all her living,' Mk 12^{44}, cf. Lk 21^{4}. See also Lk $15^{12.\ 30}$ and 8^{43}. In one case it denotes the earthly existence, viz. Lk 8^{14} 'cares and riches and pleasures of this life.' θάνατος in the Synoptics denotes death as the termination of this earthly life, as Mt 16^{28} 'shall not taste of death,' Mk 10^{33} 'condemn him to death,' Lk 22^{33} 'I am ready to go to death,' etc.

(2) The Johannine Writings.—(a) The Gospel.—The idea of life (ζωή) is a favourite one with the writer of the Fourth Gospel, and has a special significance. 'Life' in the absolute sense (with or without the epithet 'eternal') in which he uses it is the special possession of God, of which He makes men sharers when they believe in Him through His Son. Thus Jn 1^{4} 'In him was life, and the life was the light of men'; 3^{15} 'that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life'; 3^{36} 'he that believeth not the Son shall not see life'; 5^{26} 'as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself'; 17^{3} 'This is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ'; 10^{10} 'I came that they may have life,' etc. Specially noteworthy are the phrases Christ uses to describe Himself and His mission. 'The bread of life,' 6^{35}; 'the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life,' 6^{63}; 'he that followeth me shall have the light of life,' 8^{12}; 'I am the life,' 11^{25} 14^{6}; cf. also 4^{14}.

ψυχή is used in similar senses as above noted, but of special value is the form of our Lord's word in 12^{25} 'He that loveth his life loseth it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal.'

θάνατος in this Gospel forms a distinct contrast to ζωή, as above illustrated, e.g. 5^{24} 'He that heareth my word and believeth him that sent me . . . hath passed out of death unto life' (cf. Pauline use below); but it is also frequently used in the ordinary signification.

(b) The First Epistle.—The special signification of ζωή and θάνατος that we have noted in the Gospel recurs in the first Epistle, and receives new applications. Thus 1 Jn $1^{1.\,2}$ 'That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard . . . concerning the Word of life (and the life was manifested . . . and we declare unto you the life, the eternal life, which was with the Father)'; 'we know that we have passed out of death into life,' 3^{14}; 'God gave unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son,' 5^{11}. Special note must be taken of the verses ($5^{16.\,17}$) that deal with 'sin unto death' (ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον), probably 'tending towards' death (see Westcott's Commentary, in loco, and Add. Note, p. 209).

(c) The Apocalypse.—This mystical book has many references to life, particularly in figurative phrases, such as 'the tree of life,' 2^{7} 22^{2} (in which return is made to the imagery of the early traditions of Genesis, cf. Ezk 47^{12}); 'the crown of life,' 2^{10}; 'the book of life,' 3^{5} 13^{8}; 'waters of life,' 7^{17} 21^{6} 22^{17}. ψυχή is used of the life separated from the body, hence rendered 'souls' in our version in 6^{9} and 20^{4}. Very Hebraic are its uses in 8^{9} and 16^{3}, being an obvious imitation of the language of Gn 1 (נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה). A striking use is that in 18^{13}, where ψυχὰς ἀνθρώπων are reckoned among the merchandise of the traders, probably meaning slaves (cf. Ezk 27^{13}; also Nu $31^{35.\,40.\,46}$ [Heb]).

(3) The Epistles of St. Paul.—In addition to uses of ψυχή similar to those already given, the following are noteworthy: 'doing the will of God ἐκ ψυχῆς ('from the heart,' EV),' Eph 6^{6}; obviously it means 'putting all the power of one's life into it'; cf. Col 3^{23}. The threefold partition of human nature is given in 1 Th 5^{23} 'may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire.'

St. Paul's use of ζωή in the absolute sense is very much akin to St. John's. The phrase 'eternal life' is common, cf. Ro 2^{7} 5^{21} 6^{23}, Gal 6^{8}, 1 Ti 1^{16} etc. Illustrations of the use of ζωή as fully expressing the highest possible life are found in Ro 5^{17} 'they . . . reign in life through the one, even Jesus Christ'; Ro 6^{4} 'we also might walk in newness of life'; Ro 7^{10} 'the commandment which was unto life'; Ro 8^{10} 'the Spirit is life because of righteousness'; 2 Co 2^{16} 'a savour from life unto life'; 2 Co 4^{10} 'that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body'; 2 Co 5^{4} 'swallowed up of life.' In the same way he frequently uses the verb ζῆν, e.g. 2 Co 6^{9} 'as dying, and, behold, we live'; Ph 1^{21} 'to me to live is Christ'; 1 Th 3^{8} 'for now we live if ye stand fast in the Lord.' The Heb. form אֵל חַי, in its LXX equivalent, θεὸς ζῶν, is frequent, not only in direct quotations, but in St. Paul's own writing, e.g. Ro 9^{26} (from LXX), 2 Co 3^{3} 6^{16}, 1 Th 1^{9}, 1 Ti 3^{15} 4^{10}.

In the case of the word θάνατος, while frequently used in its common signification, as, e.g., Ro 8^{38}, 1 Co 15^{21}, Ph 2^{8} etc., it bears in the Pauline writings very deep and wide-reaching meanings. Sometimes it is personified (as in the OT), e.g. Ro 5^{14} 'Death reigned from Adam until Moses'; 1 Co 15^{26} 'the last enemy that shall be abolished is death.' It is frequently used in a figurative sense to describe the putting away of sin, as in Ro 6^{4-9}, where we read of being 'baptized into Christ's death,' of 'him that hath died' being 'justified from sin,' and so on; or, on the contrary, Ro 7^{10} speaks of the commandment being 'found unto death,' for 'sin, finding occasion through it, slew' Paul. The sinful flesh is called 'this body of death' (Ro 7^{24}). 'The mind of the flesh is death; but the mind of the Spirit is life' (Ro 8^{6}). 'Death' in its figurative sense is further illustrated in 2 Co $1^{9.\,10}$ 'we ourselves have had the answer of death within ourselves . . . God who delivered us out of so great a death.' The messengers of the Cross are 'in them that are perishing a savour from death unto death' ($2^{15f.}$). The law is 'the ministration of death' (2 Co 3^{7}, cf. 7^{10}). Death as a dissolution is spoken of as a present power in 2 Co $4^{11.\,12}$ 'we which live are alway delivered unto death for Jesus' sake . . . so then death worketh in us, but life in you.'

In 2 Ti 1^{10} we read of Christ 'who abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel.'

(4) The Rest of the NT.—In He 7^{16} we read of 'the power of an endless life (ζωῆς ἀκαταλύτου= indissoluble).' In Ja 1^{12} we have the figure of the 'crown of life.' In 1 P 3^{7} we read of 'the grace of life,' and in 2 P 1^{3} of 'all things that pertain unto life,' obviously in the absolute sense. In Jude ^{21} there is the striking phrase 'looking unto the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.' In 1 P ψυχή is of frequent occurrence in Hebraic senses, and might sometimes be rendered 'life,' as in 4^{19} 'commit their souls in welldoing unto a faithful Creator'; cf. He 10^{39} 12^{3} 13^{17}.

The most important passages on 'death' are in He $2^{9.\,14.\,15}$, which tells of 'Jesus, because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that by the grace of God he should taste death for every man . . . that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage'; and He $9^{15.\,16}$. See also Ja 1^{15} 'Sin, when it is fullgrown, bringeth forth death'; and 1 P 3^{18} of Christ 'being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the Spirit.'

iii. CONCLUSIONS TO BE DRAWN FROM SCRIPTURAL USE OF THESE WORDS.—(a) Doctrinal.—God is in Himself the source of all life, physical, moral, and spiritual. He has not only called it into being, but sustains it. Life is God's gift, and can have no other origin. It is therefore a direct offence against God to destroy even physical life. This sentient life is, in the OT, represented as inhering in, and inseparable from, the blood of the animal. Hence blood becomes sacred. It is a symbol of the mystery of life with which it is identified. Blood thus becomes the most sacred and solemn sacrificial offering.

Sin is rebellion against God, and so involves separation from Him, which culminates in death. Thus death is the final punishment of sin. By death, then, can it alone be destroyed. Therefore sacrifice was necessary; and in the sacrifice the victim and offerer become identified, so that the latter's sin is cleansed through the acceptance of the offered life of the victim. Not only so, but this sacrifice must be continual, in order to maintain the fellowship that is being daily broken. Life is possible only through sacrifice. Yet 'death is common to the race.' What then? Death in the OT means a land of gloom and shadow, where intercourse with God is impossible. The inhabitants of that realm can neither pray nor praise. Their life is joyless and colourless. That this could not be the end for all gradually became clear, so there arose a doctrine of a double meaning both in 'life' and 'death.' True life meant conscious and purposed fellowship with God; true death was not the dissolution of body and soul, but the separation of sin persisted in. Thus we find Job and the Psalmists rising to the conception of escape from Hades, and to the assurance of an endless life in God's presence. The way to ensure this is to walk in God's statutes, and love and honour Him with all one's heart. He will vindicate His chosen against all enemies.

Thus, through the more definite teaching on immortality of later Judaism, was paved the way for the doctrine of the New Testament. Our Lord did not have to explain the meaning of 'eternal life' and its opposite, but to show how they were respectively to be avoided and won. Fellowship is once more the prominent and central idea. All words point to it. To 'know,' to 'love,' to 'eat,' to 'drink,' to 'keep words and commandments,' to 'have'—these constitute the language of the eternal life. The intimacy of union with God through Christ becomes its one essential condition; and, on the contrary, the lack of that union entails eternal death.

In the teaching of St. Paul we find that the lower life is purified and transformed into the higher. All that is sensual, sinful, earthly, dies, and only the spiritual elements remain. But life is one and undivided, so that even the body has its spiritual protoplasm (so to say), like the germ within the seed, which develops into the spiritual body, and so gives reality to the resurrection. It is the resurrection that crowns the work of faith, 'if in this life only we have hoped in Christ, we are of all men most pitiable.' It is no unreal, shadowy, or partial life that lies beyond the grave, but life in all its fulness and perfection—'the life that is life indeed.'

The NT is consistent in presenting Christ as the sole mediator of life. His life inheres in God, and the life He is enabled to communicate to men inheres in Him. Even the life of the physical universe is possible only in Him—'all things have been created through him and unto him' (Col 1^{15-18}, 1 Co 8^{6}). In St. Paul and in St. John we find the fullest presentation of these teachings, but all agree in the primary conceptions. St. John's teaching on the eternal life is very full and varied, and is thus admirably summed up by Dr. Westcott: 'It is a life which, with all its fulness and all its potencies, is now: a life which extends beyond the limits of the individual, and preserves, completes, crowns individuality by placing the part in connexion with the whole: a life which satisfies while it quickens aspiration . . . a life which gives unity to the constituent parts and to the complex whole, which brings together heaven and earth, which offers the sum of existence in one thought' (Comm. on Epp. of John, pp. 217, 218).

(b) Ethical.—Because life is God's unique gift, it is held to be sacred. Hence all crimes against life, that lessen its value by maiming the body's physical powers or purity, by rendering life burdensome through oppression, or still more by destroying it altogether in the act of murder, are reckoned as amongst the most heinous. The sacredness of life in all these forms is safeguarded in the commandments of the Decalogue, and in the various elaborate provisions of the Jewish legislation. The ethical value of life is distinctly felt by all the prophets, so that their most severe denunciations are levelled against those who oppress or debauch the poor, and by acts of injustice render life hard and bitter. In this same thought the OT finds its strongest arguments for immortality. Life is too great to be destroyed, therefore God will either save His servants from Sheol altogether, or will rescue them eventually from its thraldom. God is interested that men shall live and not die;—this makes the great basis of Ezekiel's appeal. One of the greatest lessons of the Book of Jonah is to enforce the value of life in the eyes of God. He had pity on the great city of Nineveh because it had within it 'sixscore thousand persons . . . and also much cattle.' Life, even that of animals, is precious in His eyes, and all that is possible must be done to save it.

Life must be guided by moral precepts, and these are clearly set forth as the condition of a long and honoured career, e.g. Ps 15, which states the characteristics of the man 'that shall never be moved'; Ps 16, which contains the assurance of fellowship with God, continued after Sheol has been passed through; Ps 91^{14-16} 119, Pr passim, but specially 8^{32-36} 10^{16-25} $19^{8.\ 16.\ 20-23}$.

When we turn to the NT we find these ideas much more clearly emphasized and enforced by additional considerations. Jesus in His teaching re-sets the moral law, and renders it more stringent by His interpretation. Murder is no longer confined to an outward act, but is an attitude of the soul; lust is in thought as well as in deed. And these standards are to be the guide of the new life He bestows. A man can live only by obeying these statutes in their spirit. To be an inheritor of the kingdom of God one need only keep the first and second commandments,—love God and love one's neighbour; but their interpretation and outreach is very wide; they are not to be understood in the letter but in the spirit. If His conditions are understood, then His command gives the promise, 'This do, and thou shalt live' (Lk 10^{28}). 'Eternal life' is not only the gift of God, but the condition of maintaining it is to be in constant communion with God. 'He that eateth me, he also shall live because of me,' are Christ's mystical words in Jn 6^{57}. And again, in Jn 10^{10} we read, 'I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly (καὶ περισσὸν ἔχωσιν).' This links our Lord's teaching closely with that of St. Paul, who is very clear on the ethical side of the doctrine of the divine life. Thus in Ro 5^{10} he argues that 'if we were reconciled to God through the death of his son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.' From this thought springs the whole conception of the new life in Christ, with its powers, privileges, and responsibilities. It is not the man himself who lives, but Christ who lives in him. The controlling force is Christ. 'To me to live is Christ,' says the apostle. A new code of ethical conduct therefore emerges, 'We are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh; for if ye live after the flesh, ye must die; but if by the spirit ye mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live' (Ro $8^{12.\ 13}$). Hence there is a mortal conflict in the man who is 'alive unto God' between the fleshly law and the spiritual. The tragedy of Calvary is re-enacted in each individual soul, which has both to be crucified with Christ and to rise with Him. The evidence of this new life is in the production of the 'fruits of the Spirit,' of which we have a list, as contrasted with the 'works of the flesh' in Gal 5^{19-24}. Thus the great doctrine of the resurrection becomes the central power in daily Christian living, and affords not only the assurance of a life beyond the grave, but renders possible the advance in 'holiness,' without which no man can see the Lord.

LIGHT (Heb. אוֹר, מָאוֹר, the latter of the sun and moon as the abode of light, Gn 1^{14-16}, Gr. φῶς).*—i. With the Jews, as among other Oriental peoples, there was a feeling of sanctity connected with the idea of light. It was, according to Gn 1^{3}, the first thing shaped by God out of chaos, and afterwards located in the sun and moon. In Job 38^{19} the original source of light is a mystery known only to God.

ii. By very natural processes of thought many secondary ideas became attached to the word. (1) In Job 3^{20} it is a synonym of life, contrasted in 3^{16} with the darkness of the womb, and in 10^{22} with the shadow of death. (2) It is associated very frequently with joy and prosperity, as in Est 8^{16}, Job $18^{5.6}$, where the light of the wicked is to be put out, whereas in Job 22^{28} the light shines on the ways of the righteous. In Is 9^{2} the joy of Israel under the government of the 'Prince of Peace' is to be like the shining of a great light in contrast to the preceding misery (cf. 2 S 23^{4}). (3) It is used as a symbol of moral excellence, as in Pr 4^{18}, where progress in goodness is compared with the dawning 'that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.' This use is very frequent in NT, as in Mt $6^{22.23}$ (Lk 11^{34-36}), often with the collateral thought of the influence which the light has upon others, as in Mt 5^{14-16} (Lk 8^{16} 11^{33}); so of Christianity in contrast with the darkness of heathendom, as in Eph $5^{8.13}$, Col $1^{12.13}$, 1 P 2^{9}. In Ro 13^{11-14}, 1 Th 5^{4-8}, in connexion with this thought there is a contrast between the active duty of a soldier's life by day and the debauchery of night. (4) The term is also applied to spiritual knowledge. Thus in Lk 16^{8} the 'sons of light' are contrasted with the 'sons of this world' in point of wisdom. In 2 Co 4^{4-6} the glory of Christ's revelation illumining the hearts of Christians is beautifully compared with the light on Moses' face in Ex 34^{29-35}. See also iii. (3) (a) below. (5) In a more intellectual sense the word is used of the occult wisdom of the sage in Dn 2^{22} $5^{11.14}$.

iii. By far the most important uses of the word are those connected more definitely with theology. That the Hebrews, like other Sem. peoples, originally worshipped the sun and moon may perhaps be considered probable, but cannot be proved from OT. In the earliest historical records they appear, on the contrary, as believing in an intensely personal God, as in Gn 3^{8} 8^{21}, Ex 4^{24}. At the same time the idea of God was frequently associated with light. How far such conceptions of the Deity were the expression of definite theological belief, how far they were merely the language of poetic metaphor, cannot always be determined with anything like certainty. In all probability the one passed into the other by imperceptible gradations, the thought of an earlier becoming gradually the poetry of a later age. (1) In Ex 24^{10} the place under God's feet was like 'a paved work of sapphire stone, and as it were the very heaven for clearness.' In Ezk 1^{13} the heavenly beings who bear the throne of J″ are 'like burning coals of fire,' and in 1^{28} 'the appearance of the likeness of the glory of J″' is like 'the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain.' In Ps 104^{2} He is described as at the Creation covering Himself 'with light as with a garment,' and in 1 Ti 6^{16} as dwelling 'in light unapproachable.' In Is 60^{1-5} the presence of J″ when He comes to visit His people is described as a glorious sunrise in contrast to the darkness which covered the earth as a whole; and in $60^{19.20}$ His perpetual presence is as a sun which never sets, so that His people have no need of the sun and moon, cf. Rev 21^{23} 22^{5}. (2) In other passages God is described as Himself Light. In Is 10^{17} He is called the 'light of Israel,' the main thought of the passage being that He who is properly the glory of Israel becomes a consuming fire burning up the ungodly, cf. Hos 6^{5} (RVm). In Is 51^{4}, on the contrary, God's judgment of Israel, in the sense of His merciful acts of justice, is a beacon light to the Gentiles, cf. 60^{3}. In the words 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1^{5}), the intention is to express the 'awful purity' of God, which makes it impossible to have fellowship with God and walk in darkness. (3) In NT the word 'light' is frequently applied to Christ, a usage suggested by such passages as Is $9^{1.2}$, as in Lk 2^{32}, Jn $1^{4.5.9}$ 3^{19} 9^{5} 12^{46}, especially (a) with the idea of imparting light, in the sense of spiritual and moral knowledge, to others, as in Jn 1^{9} 3^{19-21}. (b) As a source of safety to Himself (Jn $11^{9.10}$) and others (8^{12} $12^{35.36}$), the light making it possible to walk in what would be otherwise darkness, and therefore dangerous. (c) On the analogy of ii. (1) it is associated with spiritual life, as in Jn 1^{4} 8^{12}; cf. Eph 5^{14} 'Awake . . . and Christ shall give thee light.' (d) Although St. John speaks both of the Father (1 Jn 1^{5}) and of the Son as Light, there is nothing to show that he himself conceived of Light as suggesting the relation of the Son to the Father; on the contrary, Jn $1^{1.18}$ would seem to imply a leaning towards a more anthropomorphic conception of the Divine Persons. But a step in the direction of the Nicene conception of 'Light out of Light' had already been made by the writer of the Wisdom of Solomon, who speaks of wisdom as an ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς ἀϊδίου, καὶ εἴσοπτρον ἀκηλίδωτον τῆς τ. θεοῦ ἐνεργείας, 'An effulgence of everlasting Light, and an unspotted mirror of the energy of God' (Wis 7^{26}). The writer of the Ep. to the Heb. boldly applies this thought to Christ, whom he calls the ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ (θεοῦ), 'the effulgence of (God's) glory, and the impress of his substance' (He 1^{3}), and thus introduces the familiar thought of Catholic theology, made all the more natural and easy by the language of St. John. (4) The word was applied also in a less degree to others: as John the Baptist, who lighted up the way to Christ (Jn $1^{7.8}$ 5^{35}), and St. Paul, who carried out Christ's work among the Gentiles (cf. Lk 2^{32} with Ac 13^{47}).

It is needless, perhaps, to add that the ideas of light derived from the Bible have in all ages been reflected in the prayers and hymns, as well as in the creeds, of Christendom. We have familiar illustrations of them in the collect 'Lighten our darkness,' and the hymn 'Lead, kindly light.'

F. H. WOODS.

LIGHT, LIGHTNESS.—The adj. 'light,' the opposite of 'heavy,' was formerly used as we now use easy. Thus in Lord Berner's Froissart, xxiii., 'who gave light credence to them'; Hall's Works, ii. 94, 'the God of mercy is light of hearing, yet He loves a loud and vehement solicitation, not to make Himselfe inclinable to graunt, but to make us capable to receive blessings.' This passed into the meaning of careless, which we find, for example, in Tindale's Pent. 'Prologe,' p. 12, 'Then marke the grevous fall of Adam and of us all in him, thorow the lightregardinge of the commaundement of god.' From which the step to worthless was short. This is the meaning of the word in AV: Nu 21^{5} 'our soul loatheth this light bread' (נַפְשֵׁנוּ קָצָה בַּלֶּחֶם הַקְּלֹקֵל, LXX ἡ δὲ ψυχὴ ἡμῶν προσώχθισεν ἐν τῷ ἄρτῳ τῷ διακένῳ [τούτῳ], Vulg. 'anima nostra jam nauseat super cibo isto levissimo,' Wyc. 'oure soule now wlatith upon this moost light meet,' Tind. 'oure soules lothe this lyghte bred,' Matt. [Rog.] 'oure soules lothe thys lyghte breade' with marg. 'that is so litle worth,' RVm 'this vile bread'); Jg 9^{4} 'Abimelech hired vain and light persons, which followed him' (אֲנָשִׁים רֵיקִים וּפֹחֲזִים; LXX ἄνδρας κενοὺς καὶ δειλούς [A θαμβουμένους]; Vulg. 'viros inopes et vagos,' Wyc. 'nedi men and vagaunt'; Cov. 'men that were vagabundes and of light condicions'; Gen. 'vaine and light fellowes,' so RV); Zeph 3^{4} 'Her prophets are light and treacherous persons' (פֹּחֲזִים אַנְשֵׁי בֹּגְדוֹת; Cov. 'light personnes and unfaithfull men'). In Sir 7^{26} the meaning is more definite and more disgraceful, 'Hast thou a wife after thy mind? forsake her not: but give not thyself over to a light woman,' i.e. 'wanton': the Gr. is μισουμένῃ, AVm and RV 'hateful,' RVm 'hated': 'light' here is peculiar to AV, earlier VSS having 'hateful,' and is rather a paraphrase than a translation. For its meaning cf. Shaks. Meas. V. i. 280, 'Women are light at midnight.' Shaks. often uses the word in a double sense, as Merch. of Ven. II. vi. 42, 'A light wife doth make a heavy husband.'

* See under art. LANTERN.

Lightminded occurs in Sir 19^{4} 'He that is hasty to give credit is lightminded' (κοῦφος καρδίᾳ; Vulg. 'levis corde est,' whence Erasmus, Of the Commune Crede, fol. 32, 'And a certayne wise man of the Hebrues doth name those persones leves corde, lyghte mynded whiche doo easilye and soon geve credence').

The adv. lightly is used in AV with the various meanings of the adj. (1) Quickly or easily: Gn 26^{10} 'one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife' (כִּמְעַט, LXX μικροῦ, Gen. 'had almost lien'); Is 9^{1} 'at the first he lightly afflicted the land . . . and afterward did more grievously afflict her' (הֵקַל, RV 'he brought into contempt'); Jer 4^{24} 'I beheld the mountains, and, lo, they trembled, and all the hills moved lightly' (הִתְקַלְקָלוּ, RV 'moved to and fro,' RVm as AV); Mk 9^{39} 'for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me' (ταχύ, Vulg. 'cito,' Wyc. 'soone,' Tind. 'lightlyge,' RV 'quickly'). Cf. Tind. Expos. p. 61, 'there is none so great an enemy to thee in this world, but thou shalt lightly love him, if thou look well on the love that God showed thee in Christ'; Rhem. NT on Jn 4^{20} 'Afterward the said Schismatikes (which is lightly the end of al Schismes) revolted quite from the Jewes religion, and dedicated their temple in Garizim to Iupiter Olympius, as Calvin's supper and his bread and wine is like at length to come to the sacrifice of Ceres and Bacchus'; and Malory, Morte d'Arthur, iii. 336, 'But now goe againe lightly, for thy long tarying putteth me in jeopardie of my life.' (2) Poorly, worthlessly, always with 'esteem,' Dt 32^{15}, 1 S 2^{30} 18^{23}.

Lightness is frivolity, passing into wantonness. Jer 3^{9} 'And it came to pass, through the lightness of her whoredom, that the land was polluted'; 23^{32} 'that . . . cause my people to err by their lies, and by their lightness' (RV 'vain boasting'); 2 Co 1^{17} 'did I use lightness?' (ἐλαφρίᾳ, RV 'fickleness'), cf. Jer 2^{5} Cov. 'What unfaithfulnesse founde youre fathers in me, that they wente so farre awaye fro me, fallinge to lightnesse, and being so vayne?'

The verb to lighten means either (1) to make light, unburden, 1 S 6^{5} 'peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you'; Jon 1^{5}, Ac 27$^{18.\ 38}$ spoken of ships; or (2) to give light, enlighten, as Ezr 9^{8} 'that our God may lighten our eyes'; Ps 13^{3} 'lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death,' Bar 1^{12} 'And the Lord will give us strength, and lighten our eyes' (φωτίσει). Cf. Is 35^{5} Cov. 'Then shal the eyes of the blinde be lightned'; Bunyan, Holy Warre, p. 116, 'Emmanuel also expounded unto them some of those Riddles himself; but, oh! how they were lightened!'

The phrase to light on or upon means always to come down upon, to hit upon: Gn 28^{11}, Dt 19^{5}, Ru 2^{3}, 2 S 17^{12}, 2 K 10^{15}, Mt 3^{16}, Rev 7^{16} 'neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat' (πέσῃ ἐπ' αὐτούς, RV 'strike upon them'). Cf. Mt 10^{29} Tind. 'Are not two sparrowes solde for a farthinge? And none of them dothe lyght on the grounde with out youre father.' J. HASTINGS.

LIGHTNING is a well-known phenomenon accompanying thunderstorms. It consists of brief, vivid flashes, which are caused by electric discharges passing from one cloud to another, or from a cloud to the earth. In the latter case great damage is usually produced at the point where the discharge strikes the earth. Trees and houses are often shattered, holes made in the ground, and life in the vicinity destroyed.

In EV of OT 'lightning' is usually the rendering of בָּרָק; but as this word sometimes refers to the physical phenomenon and sometimes to other appearances resembling it, it is not always literally translated. LXX usually renders it by ἀστραπή, but in Nah 3^{3} ἐξαστράπτειν is used, in Ezk 21$^{10.\ 15}$ στίλβωσις, in Ezk 21^{28} στίλβειν, in Job 20^{25} ἄστρον (a doubtful reading—ἄστρα, A ἄνδρα), and in Job 38^{35} κεραυνός. In AV בָּרָק is rendered 'glitter' or 'glittering' Dt 32^{41}, Job 20^{25}, Ezk 21$^{10.\ 28}$, Nah 3^{3}, Hab 3^{11}, and 'bright' Ezk 21^{15}. The only places in RV where בָּרָק is not translated 'lightning' are Dt 32^{41} ('glittering' sword), Job 20^{25} ('glittering' point), Nah 3^{3}, Hab 3^{11} ('glittering' spear). The verb בָּרַק occurs once with the cognate noun Ps 144^{6}.

'Lightning' in EV stands once (Job 37^{3}) for אוֹר ('light,' LXX φῶς), and once (Ex 20^{18}) for לַפִּיד ('torch,' LXX λαμπάς). In Ezk 1^{14} the Heb. is בָּזָק, which is possibly a corruption of בָּרָק (Cornill, Smend). Here LXX (A) has βεζέκ, and so Theod.; Symm. has ἀκτὶς ἀστραπῆς, and Aq. ἀπόῤῥοια ἡ ἀστραπή. In two passages (Job 28^{26} 38^{25}, also RV Zec 10^{1}) 'lightning' is the equivalent of חָזִיז, a word the meaning of which is uncertain, though it is undoubtedly connected with a thunderstorm. Gesenius-Buhl renders it by Gewitterwolke, LXX by τίναγμα in Job 28^{26}, κυδοιμός in Job 38^{25}, and φαντασία in Zec 10^{1}, where AV has 'bright clouds.'

ἐξαστράπτειν occurs in LXX as a rendering of other Heb. words, Ezk 1$^{4.\ 7}$, Dn 10^{6}.

In Apocr. and NT 'lightning' always stands for ἀστραπή or ἀστράπτειν. These words, however, like בָּרָק, do not always refer to physical lightning, and are not translated quite uniformly. Thus in Wis 11^{18} ἀστράπτοντες is 'shooting' (AV) or 'flashing' (RV) sparkles, in Lk 24^{4} ἀστράπτουσα is 'shining' (AV) or 'dazzling' (RV), and in Lk 11^{36} ἀστραπή is 'bright shining.'

Lightning is mentioned in connexion with thunderstorms, mostly in poetic descriptions, 2 S 22^{15}, Ps 18^{14} 97^{4} 135^{7}, Jer 10^{13} 51^{16}. Its association with thunder is the basis of a comparison in Sir 32^{10}. The Epistle of Jer (v.^{61}) refers to its beauty, and in the LXX Add. to Dn (3^{73}, Song of Three ^{51}) it is summoned along with the rest of nature to praise God. God is generally represented as sending it, and the lack of the power to do so is one proof of the weakness of man (Job 38^{35}). Lightning is associated with theophanies as at Sinai (Ex 19^{16} 20^{18}), in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1$^{13.\ 14}$), and in various stages of the Apocalypse (Rev 4^{5} 8^{5} 11^{19} 16^{18}). It is regarded as an instrument of God's judgment in Ps 144^{6}, Sir 43^{13}. In Zec 9^{14} God's 'arrows' of destruction are compared to lightning, which seems also to be spoken of as His 'sword' in Dt 32^{41}, and as His 'spear' in Hab 3^{11}. The glitter of weapons is frequently described as 'lightning' in Job 20^{25}, Ezk 21$^{10.\ 15.\ 28}$, Nah 3^{3}. Either the speed or the flashing of chariots is compared to lightning in Nah 2^{4}. Lightning is a figure for brightness of countenance Dn 10^{6}, Mt 28^{3}, and of raiment Lk 24^{4}, for the suddenness of the Second Advent Mt 24^{27}, Lk 17^{24}, and for the swift completeness of Satan's overthrow Lk 10^{18}.

In some passages 'fire' evidently refers to lightning, as when 'fire and hail' are mentioned together (Ex 9^{23}, Ps 105^{32} 148^{8}), and when 'fire from heaven' is spoken of either as an agency of destruction (2 K $1^{10. 12. 14}$, Job 1^{16}) or as a token of God's acceptance of a sacrifice (1 K 18^{38}, 1 Ch 21^{26}). See FIRE, THUNDER. JAMES PATRICK.

LIGN-ALOES.—See ALOES.

LIGURE (לֶשֶׁם leshem; λιγύριον; ligurius, ligyrius).—In Ex 28^{19} 39^{12}, the only places where leshem occurs, AV accepts the transliteration of the Vulg. ligurius, first introduced by Wyclif (1380 'ligyre,' 1388 'ligurie'). It is one of the stones in the third row of the high priest's breastplate (see BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST, vol. i. p. 319). The Gen. Bible gives 'turkeis'; RV 'jacinth.' See JACINTH and STONES (PRECIOUS).

LIKE, LIKING.—The adj. 'like' is used in AV for modern 'likely,' in Jer 38^{9} 'he is like to die for hunger in the place where he is,' and Jon 1^{4} 'the ship was like to be broken.' Cf. Bacon, Essays, p. 48, 'A Christian boy in Constantinople had like to have been stoned, for gagging, in a waggishnesse, a long Billed Fowle'; and Rutherford, Letters, No. xxi. 'It is like the bridegroom will be taken from us, and then we shall mourn.' The obsol. expression 'like as' is common. Thus Jer 23^{29} 'Is not my word like as a fire?' Wis 18^{11} 'Like as the king, so suffered the common person.' So are the expressions 'like to' or 'like unto,' as 2 K 17^{14} 'They . . . hardened their necks, like to the neck of their fathers'; Ex 15^{11} 'who is like unto thee, O LORD, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?' Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Paraphrase, vol. ii. fol. 278, 'He once purged us frely from al synne, to make us lyke manered unto himselfe, whiche neyther any law nor any mortal man could be hable to do.' 'Like' is often found with the meaning of equivalent; modern usage would be content with the less expressive 'same,' as Ex 30^{34} 'of each shall there be a like weight' (Tind. 'of etch like moch'); Wis 7^{6} 'all men have one entrance into life, and the like going out'; Ac 14^{15} 'men of like passions with you'; 19^{25} 'the workmen of like occupation'; 1 P 3^{21} 'The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us.' Cf. Preface to AV, 'If we will descend to latter times, we shall finde many the like examples of such kind, or rather unkind acceptance.'

As a subst. 'like' is now only provincial; in AV it occurs a few times: (1) the like, 1 K 10^{20} ‖ 2 Ch 9^{19} 'There was not the like made in any kingdom' (כֵּן, LXX οὕτως); 2 Ch 1^{12} 'neither shall there any after thee have the like' (כֵּן); Ezk 5^{9} 'I will not do any more the like' (כָּמֹוהוּ, LXX ὅμοια); 18^{10} 'If he beget a son that is a robber, a shedder of blood, and that doeth the like to any one of these things' (אָח; RV 'that doeth any one of these things,' RVm 'that doeth to a brother any of these things'; see Davidson's note); 45^{25}, Jl 2^{2} 'there hath not been ever the like' (כָּמֹהוּ); Wis 16^{1} 'Therefore by the like were they punished worthily' (δι' ὁμοίων); Sir 7^{12} (τὸ ὅμοιον): (2) his like, Job 41^{33} 'Upon earth there is not his like' (מָשְׁלוֹ, LXX ὅμοιον αὐτῷ); Sir 13^{15} 'Every beast loveth his like' (τὸ ὅμοιον αὐτῷ): (3) their like, Sir 27^{9} 'The birds will resort unto their like' (τὰ ὅμοια αὐτοῖς): (4) such like, Ezk 18^{14} (כָּהֵן); Gal 5^{21} (τὰ ὅμοια τούτοις). Cf. Mk 2^{12} Rhem. 'al marveled, and glorified God, saying, That we never saw the like'; Shaks. Jul. Cæs. I. ii. 315—

> That noble minds keep ever with their likes.'

The verb 'to like' is both trans. and intrans. The trans. verb means either to 'be agreeable to,' 'please'; so Sir 15^{17} 'Before man is life and death; and whether him liketh shall be given him' (ὃ ἐὰν εὐδοκήσῃ; RV 'whichsoever he liketh'); cf. Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 4, 'For so it hath pleased god and hath lyked him to geve his benefites and gyftes to one man, by another man'; fol. 38 'The lorde hethe made all thynges, what so ever it hath liked hym, in heven and in earthe'; Pr. Bk. 'Of Ceremonies,' 'Some be so new-fangled, that they would innovate all things, and so despise the old, that nothing can like them, but that is new': or else it means to 'be pleased with,' 'approve of,' so 1 Ch 28^{4} 'among the sons of my father he liked me to make me king over all Israel' (בִּי רָצָה, RV 'he took pleasure in me'). Usually this trans. verb is used impersonally, Dt 23^{16} 'where it liketh him best' (בַּטּוֹב לוֹ, LXX οὗ ἐὰν ἀρέσῃ αὐτῷ); Est 8^{8} 'as it liketh you' (כַּטּוֹב בְּעֵינֵיכֶם); Am 4^{5} 'for this liketh you, O ye children of Israel' (כִּי כֵן אֲהַבְתֶּם, LXX ὅτι ταῦτα ἠγάπησαν οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰσραήλ); Sir 33^{13} 'As the clay is in the potter's hand, to fashion it at his pleasure; so man is in the hand of him that made him, to render to them as liketh him best.' Cf. Gn 16^{6} Wyc. (1388) 'Lo! thi servauntesse is in thin hond; use thou hir as it likith'; Hall, Works, ii. 45, 'It likes thee well, that the Kingdom of heaven should suffer violence.'

The intrans. verb occurs twice, Dt 25^{7} 'And if the man like not to take his brother's wife' (לֹא יַחְפֹּץ); and Ro 1^{28} 'And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge' (οὐκ ἐδοκίμασαν, RV 'they refused').

In 1 Es 4^{39} is found the obsolete form 'like of,' 'all men do well like of her works' (πάντες εὐδοκοῦσι τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτῆς), which is retained in RV. So in Preface to AV, 'Solomon was greater than David. . . . But was that his magnificence liked of by all? We doubt of it'; Melvill's Diary, p. 362, 'The King had determined to bring ham the Papist Lords again, and lyked of nan that wald nocht wag as the bus waggit'; Defoe, Crusoe, p. 274, 'Upon the Captain's coming to me, I told him my Project for seizing the Ship, which he lik'd of wonderfully well.'

The verb to liken is of frequent occurrence, and means to compare, as Is 40^{18} 'To whom then will ye liken God?' Cf. Tindale, Works, i. 107, 'On this wise Paul also (Ro 5) likeneth Adam and Christ together, saying that Adam was a figure of Christ.'

For likeness see IMAGE.

Likewise is sometimes a mere conj., also, as Dt 12^{30} 'even so will I do likewise' (גַּם, LXX ποιήσω κἀγώ), especially in NT as tr. of καί. But more frequently it is an adverb, in the same way; thus, Jg 7^{17} 'Look on me, and do likewise' (כֵּן); Est 4^{16} 'I also and my maidens will fast likewise' (כֵּן); Lk 22^{20} 'Likewise also the cup after supper' (ὡσαύτως); Rev 8^{12} (ὁμοίως). In Mt 21^{24} we have the expression 'in like wise,' but the meaning is simply also, 'I in like wise will tell you by what authority I do these things' (κἀγώ, RV 'I likewise'). Cf. Jn 5^{21} Tind. 'For lykwyse as the father rayseth up the deed'; and Lever, Sermons, p. 108, 'Excepte ye spedelye repente and amende, ye shall everye one be lykewyse served.'

The subst. liking was at one time in use in the sense of outward appearance, and then such an adj. as 'good' or 'ill' qualified it. It occurs once in AV, Job 39^{4} 'Their young ones are in good liking' (יַחְלְמוּ). In the same sense 'liking' is used as an adj. in Dn 1^{10} 'why should he see your faces worse liking (זֹעֲפִים) than the children which are of your sort?' Wyclif (1388) uses the subst. in Gn 2^{10} in the sense of delight, 'And a ryver yede out fro the place of likyng to moyste paradis' (1380, 'the place of delice'). For the adj. cf. Ps 92^{13} Pr. Bk. 'They also shall bring forth more fruit in their age, and shall be fat and well-liking' (in 1539, 'well lykenge').[*]

LIKHI (לִקְחִי, B Λακεείμ, A Λακειά).—The eponym of a Manassite family, 1 Ch 7^{19}. See GENEALOGY, VII.^{a} 5.

LILITH (לִילִית; LXX ὀνοκένταυροι; Symm. λάμια [?λαμία]; Vulg. lamia).—Is 34^{14} RVm (only); AV 'screech owl'; AVm and RV 'night monster'; Cheyne 'night fairy' (in PB 'Lilith').' The Heb. word occurs in a description of the scene of desolation among Edom's ruined fortresses, where 'the wild beasts of the desert (צִיִּים) meet with the wolves (אִיִּים), and the satyr (שָׂעִיר) cries to his fellow, and Lilith takes up her abode.' The reference is not to an animal, but to a female demon of popular superstition, analogous to the 'alûkah or vampire of Pr 30^{15}. The Jewish belief in Lilith probably grew up during the Exile; the name was unquestionably borrowed from Babylonia (cf. the Assyr. lil and lilît). Lilith was a demon (שֵׁדָה) regarded by the Jews as specially hostile to children, although grown-up persons were also in danger from her (cf. the Ἔμπουσα of the Greeks, the Strix and Lamia of the Romans, and the ghûls of the Arabs).

The name Lilith is generally derived from the root meaning 'night' (Bab.-Semitic lilâtu, Eth. lêlît, Heb. לַיִל), night being the special season of this demon's power and activity. Baudissin, however (op. cit. below), doubts whether this derivation be correct, although it may have been assumed as the basis of some later Jewish conceptions. He quotes Jensen to the effect that the Sumerian lila (=Assyr. lilû) means 'wind' (cf. Del. Assyr. HWB, s.v. 'lilû'), and that 'the handmaid of Lila' is brought into relation to 'the house of the wind.' Baudissin suggests that even in Zec 5^9 there may be a thought of Lilith in the prophet's mind, when he describes the two women with stork-like wings in which was the wind (רוּחַ).

The belief in Lilith existed among the Jews of Mesopotamia, where a species of Lilith-worship prevailed as late as the 7th cent. A.D. In the Rabbinical literature Lilith figures largely (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s.v.). She was said to have been the first wife of Adam, and to have flown away from him and become a demon. The Targ. on Job 1^{15} apparently identifies the queen of Sheba with Lilith (see Grätz's Monatschrift, 1870, pp. 187 ff., cited by Cheyne in commenting on Is 34^{14}).

LILY.—There are three questions to be settled in reference to the lily: (1) What was meant by שׁוּשַׁן shûshan, שׁוֹשָׁן shôshan, and שׁוֹשַׁנָּה shôshannāh? (2) Are shûshan and shôshannāh the same as κρίνον (Mt $6^{28. 29}$)? (3) What is meant by 'lilies of the field'?

(1) The word shûshan or shôshan is still preserved in sûsan or sôsan, a word of Persian origin, but adopted in this form into the Arabic. It is possible that it entered the Heb. from the same source. The capital of Persia was called in Heb. Shushan (Neh 1^1, Est 2^8 etc., Dn 8^2). Athenodorus (xii. 513) says that this name was derived from the abundance of the lilies (shûshānîm) in its neighbourhood. Sûsan in Arab. is a general term for lily-like flowers, as the lily, iris, pancratium, gladiolus, etc., but more particularly the iris. It is as general as the English term lily, which is applied to flowers of the genera Lilium, Gladiolus, Convallaria, Hemerocallis, of the botanical order Liliaceæ, and to Nymphæa, Nuphar, Funkia, etc., not of that order. The Heb. shûshan must be taken in the same general sense. This makes it easy to explain all the references to the flower in the OT. Some of the lilies grow in 'the valleys' (Ca 2^1, not our 'lily of the valley,' Convallaria, which does not grow in the East), such as several species of Iris; others 'among thorns' (Ca 2^2), as other species of Iris; others in pastures, as still other species of Iris and Gladiolus (2^1 4^5 6^3). Its flowers were typical of luxuriance (Hos 14^5), as are those of all the Irises, Gladioli, and Pancratia. The comparison of lips to lilies (Ca 5^{13}) may refer to fragrance, not to colour. The allusion to lilies as features of architectural ornament doubtless refers to the recurved leaves of various flowers of the lily type, imitations of which were wrought in stone for capitals of columns (1 K 7^{19}), and bronze for the lip of the molten laver (2 Ch 4^5), as they have been in similar works of art in other lands, from ancient times to our day. The meaning of the term shōshannîm in the title of Pss 45. 69 (cf. Shûshan-'ēdûth. Ps 60, and Shôshannîm-'ēdûth, 80) is obscure. See PSALMS.

(2) Is shûshan the same as κρίνον (Mt $6^{28. 29}$)? The Chaldee Targum and most of the Rabbis render it by 'rose.' Kimchi and ben-Melech render it in one place (1 K 7^{19}) 'violet.' The LXX, however, tr. it always by κρίνον. This is probably correct for several reasons. (a) Wherever there are not urgent reasons to the contrary, a LXX tr. has the preference. (b) Κρίνον has in Greek the same general application to lily-like plants as shûshan in Hebrew and lily in English. (c) There is no reason for translating shûshan differently in different places, as in the above mentioned authorities and in the Judæo-Spanish VS, which tr. shûshan in Ca by 'rose,' and in Hos by 'lirio'=Lilium candidum. Admitting, then, the correctness of the LXX tr. κρίνον, we may assume that Mt used this Greek word to express the Aramaic word used by our Saviour, which was doubtless a modification of shûshan.

(3) What is meant by 'lilies of the field'? It is plain that our Saviour spoke in a way that His hearers would understand. Therefore (a) there could not have been included in His allusion any plant unknown to His audience. This would exclude Lilium Chalcedonicum, L., and Lilium Martagon, L., which have been assumed by some as the species intended, on account of their beauty, but neither of which is found in Palestine. Lilium candidum, L., is also not a plant of Palestine, and being white would not suit the comparison with Solomon's royal garments. Furthermore, if this species had been intended, λείριον=white lily, would probably have been used, instead of κρίνον, which is general. (b) None of the water lilies could have been intended, as the lilies were 'of the field.' (c) It is not likely that they were anemones or poppies or artichokes. All these flowers had their own names, and would not have been suggested to the popular mind by the term lily. (d) It must therefore have been some plant of the modern order Liliaceæ, Iridaceæ, or Amaryllidaceæ. Any of these would have been called κρίνον, and most would now be called popularly lilies in English. (e) It was not only a lily-like plant of the field, but had a stem, which, when dried, would be useful as fuel (Mt 6^{30}). This would exclude the crocuses and colchicums, Anemone Coronaria, L. (which, however, has the support of Tristram), and other stemless plants. (f) It was a flower of rich colours. The plants which realize all these conditions are the various species of Gladiolus, which are indigenous in Palestine, G. Illyricus, Koch, G. segetum, Gawl, G. atroviolaceus, Boiss., and Ixiolirion montanum, Lab. All these grow among the grain, often overtopping it, and illuminating the broad fields with their various shades of pinkish purple to deep violet-purple and blue, truly royal colours. Any one who has stood among the wheat fields of Galilee, and seen the beautiful racemes of these flowers, peering up in every direction above the standing corn, will see at once the appropriateness of our Saviour's allusion. They all have a reedy stem, which, when dry, would make such fuel as is used in the ovens (Arab. tannûr). These stems are constantly plucked up with the other wild plants from among the wheat, to feed cattle or to burn. The beautiful Irises, I. Sari, Schott, I. Palestina, Baker, I. Lorteti, Barb., and I. Helenæ, Barb., have gorgeous flowers, and would suit our Saviour's comparison even better than the above. But they are plants of pasture grounds and swamps, seldom found in grain fields. If, however, we understand by 'lilies of the field' simply wild lilies, these would also be included in the expression. Our Saviour's comparison would then be like a 'composite photograph,' a reference to all the splendid colours and beautiful shapes of the numerous wild plants comprehended under the name lily. This seems to us the most simple and natural interpretation, and meets every requirement of the passage.

[*] In a note on this passage in his edition of the Psalter of 1539 (p. 321), Earle says, 'The old verb lician was first impersonal, and in that condition it produced this adjective, and the substantive liking as in the sense of looking well and in good condition, as in Shaks. I Henry IV. III. iii. 6—"I'll repent . . . while I am in some liking." When it became personal and transitive, it produced liking=approval, as in The Epistle Dedicatorie (1611), "who runne their owne wayes, and give liking unto nothing but what is framed by themselves, and hammered on their Anville."' From the last came the modern meaning, of which there is an example in AV, Wis 16^{21} 'to every man's liking' (πρὸς ὅ τις ἐβούλετο, Vulg. ad quod quisquam volebat, RV 'according to every man's choice').

LIME (שִׂיד, κονία) is the commonest of the so-called 'alkaline earths,' its basis being the metal calcium. The various forms of limestone, some of which are very abundant in Palestine, are composed of carbonate of lime. When this is strongly heated, it is converted into oxide of lime or 'quicklime,' and becomes soft and crumbling. Quicklime combines readily and even violently with water to form 'slaked lime,' which is one of the chief ingredients of mortar (wh. see). As the mortar 'sets,' the slaked lime absorbs carbonic acid gas from the air, and is reconverted slowly into carbonate of lime.

Lime is mentioned only twice in EV. In Is 33^{12} it is predicted that the Assyrian oppressor shall be 'as the burnings of lime' (מִשְׂרְפוֹת שִׂיד)—a figure for destruction. (Similarly in Is 27^{9} the stones of idolatrous altars are to be 'as chalkstones [אַבְנֵי־גִר, LXX κονία λεπτή] that are beaten in sunder,' probably after being 'burnt.' See CHALK-STONES). In Am 2^{1} the Moabites are denounced because they 'burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime' (see Driver's note). Phosphate of lime is the chief mineral constituent of bones, and is unchanged by burning. Both in their appearance and in their composition, therefore, bone ashes have something in common with calcined limestone, and are naturally described by the same term. Besides these two passages, שִׂיד occurs in Dt $27^{2.4}$ both as noun and as verb, and is translated 'plaister' (wh. see).

In Mt 23^{27} our Lord, in denouncing the scribes and Pharisees for their hypocrisy, compares them to τάφοι κεκονιαμένοι. It was the custom of the Jews to whiten the outside of their tombs with lime every year on the 15th of Adar, the object being to make the tombs conspicuous, that passers-by might avoid defilement (see Meyer, Holtzmann, in loc.). In our Lord's saying, the whiteness is viewed chiefly as a deceptive outward embellishment, contrasting with the corruption within. Similarly in Ac 23^{3} St. Paul calls Ananias the high priest τοῖχος κεκονιαμένος.

James Patrick.

LIMIT.—The subst. occurs only in Ezk 43^{12} 'Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof shall be most holy,' where it means a region or space within certain limits or bounds (Heb. גְּבוּל, LXX τὰ ὅρια: the Heb. word is common in this sense, but it is usually rendered by 'border' or 'coast': Wyc. [1388] has 'coostes' here, [1382] 'eendis'; Cov. 'corners'; Geneva gives 'limits'). For the Eng. word cf. Shaks. I Henry IV. III. i. 73—

> 'The archdeacon hath divided it
> Into three limits very equally.'

The verb occurs twice: In Ps 78^{41} it means to set limits to, restrict, 'they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel' (הִתְווּ, LXX παρώξυναν, RV 'provoked,' RVm 'limited').

The tr. 'limited' comes from the Gen. Bible, which explains its meaning in the marg., 'As thei all do that measure the power of God by their capacitie.' But it is usually taken in another sense: thus in JQR iv. 441, Dr. Friedländer says, 'My conception of God is based on the teaching of the Scriptures, God is the Creator and the Ruler of the Universe, and by His decree phenomena appear and events occur which are contrary to human expectation, i.e. miracles are wrought by Him. According to the idea of Mr. Montefiore, the Divine Being is bound to act according to certain laws established by human reason. This is by no means a new theory. Asaph in Ps 78^{41}, speaking of the Israelites in the wilderness, says, Yea, they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel.' The translation is due to the fact that the same Heb. form occurs in Ezk 9^{4} along with the word tâw (which is the name of the last letter of the Heb. alphabet, and was originally in the shape of a cross), where it is trd 'set a mark.' But most follow the LXX παρώξυναν, Syr. ܐܡܪܘ, Vulg. exacerbaverunt, and Jerome concitaverunt, and translate 'grieved,' or as RV 'provoked,' Kautzsch kränkten.*

The Amer. RV introduces 'limit' in this sense into Job 15^{8}. Cf. Adams, Works, i. 26, 'being an infinite and illimited God.'

The other occurrence of the verb is He 4^{7} 'Again, he limiteth a certain day,' where the meaning is 'fix as a limit' (ὁρίζει, RV 'defineth'). So Berners' Froissart, xxiv. 'It was not long after but that the king came to his palace of Westminster and all his council was commanded to be there at a certain day limited'; Bradford, Plym. Plant. p. 82, 'Their time limited them being expired, they returned to the ship.'

LINE.—1. The word most freq. translated 'line' in AV is קָו ḳâw or קַו ḳaw. The ḳaw is a marking off or measuring line, as it is fully defined in Jer 31^{39}, but is usually called simply the 'line.' It is especially the builder's measuring line, as Zec 1^{16} 'I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies: my house shall be built in it, saith the Lord of hosts, and a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem'; and so it comes to be used of the line that marks off the part that is to be taken down and destroyed, as 2 K 21^{13} 'And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab,'

* Burgess (Notes on Heb. Pss) adopts the tr. 'set a mark,' and has the interesting suggestion that the Israelites proposed to put God to the test: if He provides flesh in the wilderness, then we shall acknowledge Him; somewhat after the manner of Caliban—'That's a brave god, and bears celestial liquor; I will kneel to him.'

i.e. the line that marked them off for their destruction; Is 28^{17} 'Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet' (RV 'And I will make judgement the line'); Is 34^{11} 'the line of confusion.' Then the word comes into use metaphorically for whatever goes by line or measurement, a rule of life: thus in Is 28^{10} the drunkards of Ephraim mock Isaiah's teaching as 'precept upon precept, precept upon precept, line upon line, line upon line, here a little, and there a little,' showing by their use of a series of monosyllables (ẓaw la-ẓaw, ẓaw la-ẓaw, ḳaw la-ḳaw, ḳaw la-ḳaw, zĕ'êr shām, zĕ'êr shām) both their drunkenness and their disgust. For the Eng. word here cf. Archbp. Hamilton's Catechism (Mitchell's ed. fol. v), 'For as ane biggare [=builder] can nocht make ane evin up wal without direction of his lyne, a mason can nocht heu ane evin aislair staine without directioun of his rewill, ane skyppar can nocht gyde his schip to gud hevin without direction of his compas, sa a man or a woman can nocht ordour or gyd his lyif evin and strecht to the plesour of GOD without direction of his commandis.'

The only passage of difficulty is Ps 19^{4} 'Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.' AVm suggests as alternative translations 'their rule' or 'direction'; RV accepts the tr. of AV (which comes from the Gen.) without margin. The same verb is found with the measuring line in Ezk 47^{3}, and perhaps the majority of mod. expositors accept this tr., the meaning then being that the heavens send out their line to mark off and take possession of the whole earth, an idea suggested by the line of the horizon running round the earth. So Del., Per., De Witt, Kirkp., Kautzsch. But the oldest translators thought of the line as perhaps a bowstring that gives forth a sound. So LXX φθόγγος, Symm. ἦχος, Jer. and Vulg. sonus, Wyc. 'soun,' Cov. 'sounde,' Dou. 'sound,' Segond retentissement, King 'strain.' Practically the same meaning is got by Cheyne and Wellh. in another way. They read קוֹלָם for קַוָּם, and trans. 'their voice.' They are not influenced, as some of the older expositors perhaps were, by Ro 10^{18}, where St. Paul quotes the LXX and applies the words to the world-wide proclamation of the gospel.

The only places in AV where ḳaw is not tr^{d} 'line' are Is 44^{13} '[carpenter's] rule,' where, however, RV gives 'line'; and $18^{2.7}$, where the Heb. גּוֹי קַו־קָו is translated in AV 'a nation meted out' (lit. as AVm 'a nation of line line'); the context demands rather the active meaning 'that meteth out,' as RV (which, however, retains AV in marg.). Cheyne (Expos. 3rd ser. vi. 455) criticizes AV as impossible and RV as barely possible. His own rendering is 'the strong strong nation' (in SBOT 'a nation of sinewy strength'), which is got by changing the MT into קַוְקַו, a subst. formed after Arab. ḳuwwa, 'strength'; and with that Skinner agrees. Ges. (Thes. s.v.) had suggested a distinct subst. קַו, and tr^{d} 'gens robustissima, pr. roboris roboris,' after the Arab.; Buhl in the latest ed. (1899) of the Handwörterbuch adopts קַוְקַו sehnige Kraft with some hesitation.

2. For חֶבֶל, see CORD. In Ps 16^{6} 'The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places,' the reference is to the portion marked off by the line or measuring cord. In Jos 17^{5} the word is tr. 'portions,' 'And there fell ten portions to Manasseh' (RV 'parts,' RVm 'lines'). 3. חוּט is tr. 'line' only in 1 K 7^{15}, 'a line of twelve cubits did compass either of them [the pillars] about.' See BAND. 4. For פְּתִיל (only Ezk 40^{3}) see LACE. 5. תִּקְוָה Jos $2^{18.21}$ the line of scarlet thread which Rahab bound in the window. It is Coverdale's word here, who has 'excepte thou knyttest in the wyndowe the lyne of this rose-coloured rope' . . . 'And she knyt the rose coloured lyne in the wyndowe.' 6. שֶׂרֶד, in Is 44^{13} sered, is in AV mistranslated 'line,' RV gives 'pencil,' RVm 'red ochre.' See PENCIL.

In NT we have only 2 Co 10^{16} 'not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand' (ἐν ἀλλοτρίῳ κανόνι, AVm 'rule,' RV 'in another's province,' RVm 'Or limit, Gr. measuring rod'). The AV tr. is from the Gen. Bible, which explains it by saying, 'God gave the whole worlde to the Apostles to preache in, so that Paul here meaneth by the line his porcion of the countre is where he preached.' J. HASTINGS.

LINEAGE.—Lk 2^{4} only, 'he was of the house and lineage of David' (ἐξ οἴκου καὶ πατριᾶς, RV 'of the house and family'). Spenser uses the word in the same sense, FQ I. i. 5—

> 'So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
> She was in life and every vertuous lore,
> And by descent from royall lynage came.'

Cf. also Nut-Brown Maid (in Skeat's Specimens, p. 107)—

> 'Ye shal not nede further to drede, I wyl not disparage
> You, god defende, sith ye descende of so grete a lynage.'

Wyclif uses the word in the wider sense of kindred or tribe, as Ps 72^{17} 'And all the lynagis of earthe schulen be blessid in hym'; $78^{67.68}$ 'he chees not the lynage of Effraym. But he chees the lynage of Juda'; Rev 5^{5} 'a lioun of the lynage of Juda.' J. HASTINGS.

LINEN.—The manufacture of linen is an extremely ancient art. The Egyptians attained proficiency in it at a very early time. To them Pliny ascribes the invention of weaving (vii. 56), and the honour is given by Athenæus to Pathymias the Egyptian (lib. ii.). Linen-weaving became a profitable calling, providing occupation for large numbers. Strabo (xvii. 41, p. 813) says that Panopolis, or Chemmis, was inhabited by linen-weavers. Judging by the representations that have been preserved, the implements used must have been comparatively rude; but cloth of very fine quality was produced with them. So delicate indeed were certain fabrics that they were described as 'woven air.' Specimens of Egyptian work in the form of corselets are mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 182, iii. 47), one dedicated by Amasis to Minerva in Lindus, the other sent by him to the Lacedæmonians, 'made of linen, with many figures of animals inwrought and adorned with gold and cotton wool'; and he notes that 'each thread, though very fine, contained 360 threads all distinct.' Egyptian fine linen, yarn, and embroidered work were widely prized, and reckoned superior to those of any other country. Four qualities of Egyptian linen are specified by Pliny (xix. c. 1), viz. Tanitic, Pelusiac, Butine, and Tentyritic. A large export trade was carried on to Arabia and India.

The Egyptian priests wore linen clothes, and according to Herodotus (ii. 37) were not allowed to wear anything else. But Pliny (xix. 8) says that although they used linen they preferred cotton robes; and the Rosetta Stone mentions 'cotton garments' provided for the use of the temples. It is most probable that the undergarments were always of linen, while robes of cotton worn over them would have to be left outside the temples. Linen was regarded as fresh and cool in a hot climate, with a tendency to keep the body clean. This, with the religious prejudice requiring linen only to be worn in the temples, may account for the belief that the priests were prohibited from ever wearing anything else. When the worship of Isis was introduced into Greece and Rome (Plut. de Is. v. 3) the same customs as to priestly dress were adopted (Wilk. Anc. Egyp. iii. 117).

Great quantities of linen were employed in wrapping the mummies of the dead (Herod. ii. 86). The bandages used for this purpose were invariably of linen. This has been demonstrated by a series of careful microscopic examinations well described by Wilkinson (Anc. Egyp. iii. 115, 116). Wool was never used in this way, because of a belief that it tended to breed worms which would destroy the body. The poor might wear cotton garments in life, provided their mummies were wrapped in linen after death. Linen was used for both men and animals, and sometimes the bandages were as much as 1000 yards in length (Wilk. ib. iii. 484).

The influence of Egypt on Israel is seen perhaps in the prominence given to linen in the furniture of the tabernacle and in the dress of the priests. The trade with Egypt was maintained (Pr 7^{16}), and the material was highly prized by the neighbouring Tyrians (Ezk 27^{7}). Flax was early cultivated in Palestine (Jos 2^{6}), but the native industry in linen, as in other woven stuffs, was chiefly confined to the women of the household. The finer kinds were brought from abroad.

The terms used for 'linen' in Scripture are—

1. 2. שֵׁשׁ, בַּד. As a mark of distinction Pharaoh clothed Joseph in linen garments (שֵׁשׁ), from which we may infer that linen formed part of the ordinary dress of royal, or at least eminent persons (Gn 41^{42}). Shēsh corresponds in form with the Arab shâsh, a fine muslin, made of cotton, and much used to guard against mosquitoes and sand-flies. Linen is, however, here intended. Shēsh is sometimes used as the equivalent of bad (בַּד), about which there is no doubt (cf. Ex $28^{5.\,42}$ 39^{28}, Lv 16^{4}). Shēsh appears to be the more general term. It is used for the offerings brought by the people (Ex 25^{4}); the materials used in the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex $26^{1\text{ etc.}}$ $27^{9\text{ etc.}}$ 35. 36. 38); the finery of women (Pr 31^{22}, AV 'silk,' Ezk $16^{10.\,13}$) and the cloth of sails (Ezk 27^{7}), as well as for the various garments of the priests (Ex $28^{5\text{ etc.}}$ $39^{2.\,5\text{ etc.}}$). In Ezk 16^{13} we have the peculiar form שֶׁשִׁי; this is probably due to proximity to the similarly sounding מֶשִׁי.

בַּד is used exclusively of articles of dress, and principally of the holy garments of the priests (Ex 28^{42} 39^{28}, Lv 6^{10} $16^{4\text{ etc.}}$). In 1 S 22^{18} the priests are designated as persons that wear a linen (bad) ephod. Samuel, as a child, engaged in religious service, was girded with a linen ephod (1 S 2^{18}). David in his dance before the Lord was similarly girded (2 S 6^{14}, 1 Ch 15^{27}). The man wearing linen garments is chosen for special work (Ezk $9^{2.\,3.\,11}$ $10^{2.\,6.\,7}$); and the great figure in the vision by the river Hiddekel wears similar attire (Dn 10^{5} $12^{6.\,7}$). It appears therefore that bad is restricted to uses that are of a religious character.

The distinction between shēsh and bad cannot be indicated with certainty. In the phrase 'bad of fine twined shēsh' (Ex 39^{28}), the latter term evidently means the thread of which the cloth is woven. This suggests that while bad is used only for the cloth, shēsh is applied indifferently, now to the thread and now to the woven stuff. Abarbanel (on Ex 25) says that bad was a single thread, and shēsh (Heb. = 6) was formed by twisting together six single threads. But this seems in contradiction to the above.

3. בּוּץ, LXX βύσσος, is from the root בּוּץ, to be white, still heard in the Arab bûṣ used for native linen. Of Aramæan origin, it was used specially for the Syrian byssus (Gesenius). In Ezk 27^{16} it is distinguished from Egyptian shēsh (cf. v.^{7}), but elsewhere the distinction is ignored (cf. 2 Ch 3^{14}, Ex 26^{31}). Targum Onkelos gives bûẓ as the equivalent of shēsh. Bûẓ is the name given to linen, in which the house of Ashbea attained eminence as workers (1 Ch 4^{21}, cf. 2 Ch 2^{14}), of which David's robe was made (1 Ch 15^{27}), of which the veil of the temple was woven (2 Ch 3^{14}), and with which the Levite singers in the temple were clothed (2 Ch 5^{12}). Of this were also the cords which fastened the hangings in the king's gardens at Shushan the palace (Est 1^{6}). Mordecai's dress when he went out from the king was of fine linen (bûẓ) and purple (Est 8^{15}, cf. Lk 16^{19}). The Syrian trade with Tyre included 'purple and embroidered work and bûẓ' (Ezk 27^{16}). Josephus takes byssus as the equivalent of both shēsh and bad, describing the offerings of the Israelites in the wilderness for the tabernacle as byssus of flax (Ant. vi. 1), the hangings for the tabernacle as sindon of byssus (ib. 2), and the priests' drawers and vestments as byssus. The vestment, he says, was called chethone (כְּתֹנֶת), which denotes linen (ib. VII. i. 2). This corresponds closely with the Arab kittân, the common name for linen stuffs. The presumption of the mystic Babylon is shown by her arraying herself in fine linen (byssus), the fitting dress of the Lamb's wife, since it symbolizes 'the righteousness of the saints' (Rev 18^{16} 19^{8}). Such raiment also is congruous with the character of those who follow him who is called the Faithful and True (ib. 19^{14}).

4. פִּשְׁתָּה (or פֵּשֶׁת) is a general term; applied to the plant (Jos 2^{6}), to the raw material (Jg 15^{14}, Pr 31^{13}), to heckled flax (Is 19^{9}), to threads in a mixed web (Dt 22^{11}), to cloth (Lv $13^{47\text{ etc.}}$), to the prophet's girdle (Jer 13^{1}), to a measuring-line (Ezk 40^{3}), and to the sacred garments of the priests (Ezk $44^{17.\,18}$). See FLAX.

5. סָדִין, an article of fine stuff, of domestic manufacture (Pr 31^{24}), and highly esteemed as a luxury (Is 3^{23}). The סְדִינִים of Samson's challenge to the Philistines (Jg $14^{12.\,13}$) were wrappers 'worn as an outer garment,' or 'as a night wrapper on the naked body.' They were sometimes used as curtains (Mishna, Joma iii. 4), and also as shrouds (Talm. Jerus., Kilaim ix. fol. 32^{b}). For these purposes sheets of considerable size would be necessary (Moore, Judges, in loc.). With this the Greek σινδών corresponds. It is the linen cloth or dress in which the young man wrapped himself (Mk 14^{51}), and again it is a winding-sheet (Mt 27^{59}, Mk 15^{46}, Lk 23^{53}).

6. אֵטוּן (AV 'fine linen,' RV 'yarn,' Pr 7^{16}), by a Syriacism for אֱטוּן from an unused root אָטַן 'to bind together' (Gesenius). With this may be compared the Arab 'uṣun, 'tent ropes.' The fine thread or yarn of Egypt was most probably linen. That the ornamentation of coverings or tapestry for which it was used is here intended, is supported by the renderings of LXX and the Vulgate, which are ἀμφίταποι and pictæ tapetes respectively.

7. ὀθόνη (Ac 10^{11} 11^{5}) is the sheet let down from heaven in St. Peter's vision; while ὀθόνια (Jn 19^{40} $20^{5.\,6.\,7}$) are the strips of cloth with which the body was bound, after being wrapped in the σινδών.

8. A coarse cloth made of unbleached flax, ὠμόλινον, was worn by the poorer classes (Sir 40^{4}).

A combination of animal and vegetable products in dress was prohibited to the Israelites. A kind of cloth was sometimes made of which the woof was cotton and the warp linen (Julius Pollux, Onom. vii. 17. Quoted by Wilk. Anc. Egyp. iii. 118). Such may have been שַׁעַטְנֵז (LXX κίβδηλον), a word of obscure origin, but denoting a mixed stuff of wool and linen (Lv 19^{19}, cf. Dt 22^{11}).

Linen Yarn.—מִקְוֵה, מִקְוֵא (1 K 10^{28}, 2 Ch 1^{16}). For mikweh Buxtorf gives netum filatim quod in Ægypto magni usus et pretii. He notes, however, that on 1 K 10^{28} R. Sal. ibi accipit מִקְוֵה pro אסיפה, collectione, congregatione vectigalis. RV renders in each case 'drove.' Perhaps the text is corrupt. LXX B has for מִקְוֵה ἐκ Θεκοῦε, 'from Tekoa,' Luc. ἐκ Κωά, Vulg. de Coa. Winckler (Alttest. Untersuch. 168 ff., cf. Altorient. Forsch. i. 28), followed by Hommel and others, finds here a reference to Kuë (i.e. Cilicia).

LINUS (Λῖνος).—One of the Christians who joined with Eubulus, Pudens, and Claudia in a salutation at the end of 2 Ti. This Epistle was written from Rome, and it is generally allowed that this Linus is identical with one of the first bishops of Rome. The identification goes back to Irenæus (c. Hær. III. iii. 3). It is considered that he was, if we omit St. Peter's name, the first bishop of Rome, though Tertullian (de Præscr. 32) implies that Clement was the first. Nothing is really known of his life and episcopate, which Eus. (HE iii. 13) says lasted twelve years. Many questions have been raised about him: for instance, as to whether he was bishop before St. Peter's death or not, and whether he may not have been contemporary with Clement, and have exercised his office as bishop of the Gentile Christians only, whilst perhaps Clement was bishop of the Jewish Christians. The date of his episcopate has been variously given, the extreme limits being A.D. 56–67 and A.D. 68–80. Harnack, in his latest work, dates the episcopate of Linus A.D. 64–76. It is asserted in the Greek Menæa that he was one of the Seventy. Various works are ascribed to him, but without foundation: (1) the acts of St. Peter and St. Paul; (2) an account of St. Peter's controversy with Simon Magus; and (3) certain decrees in which he ordered women to appear in church with covered heads. He is commemorated in the Roman Service books on Sept. 23, where the following account is given of him:—

> 'The pontiff Linus, who was born at Volterra, in Etruria, was the first ruler of the Church after Peter. His faith and holiness were so great that he not only cast out devils, but also restored the dead to life. He wrote the history of St. Peter, and in particular of his opposition to Simon Magus. He ordered that no women should appear in church unveiled. He was beheaded, because of his adherence to the Christian faith, by the order of Saturninus, whose daughter he had set free from demoniacal possession. He was buried in the Vatican, near the Prince of the Apostles, on Sept. 23. He was bishop for eleven years, two months, and twenty-three days, during which he consecrated or ordained (on two occasions in December) fifteen bishops and eighteen priests' (Brev. Rom.).

LION.—1. The generic name for lion is אֲרִי 'ărî or אַרְיֵה 'aryēh, pl. אֲרָיִים 'ărāyîm and אֲרָיוֹת 'ărāyôth. This word is used literally (Jg 14$^{5.8}$ etc.), of figures (1 K 7^{29} etc.), in comparison (Gn 49^{9}, Nu 23^{24} etc.), metaphorically (Gn 49^{9}, Nah 2^{12} etc.). 2. כְּפִיר kĕphîr, is the young lion (Jg 14^{5} etc.). 3. גּוּר gûr, גּוֹר gôr, signifies whelp or cub in general. It is applied to the young of תַּנִּין tannîn (La 4^{3}, AV 'sea monsters,' RV 'jackals'; preferably, in our opinion, wolves. See DRAGON, 4). It is usually applied to lions' cubs (Gn 49^{9}, Ezk 19$^{2.3}$ etc. In the latter passage the distinction between gûr and kĕphîr is clearly brought out). It is used metaphorically, for the Babylonians (Jer 51^{38}) and the Assyrians (Nah 2$^{11.12}$), for Judah (Gn 49^{9}), for Dan (Dt 33^{22}), and for the Israelites (Ezk 19^{2} etc.). 4. לָבִיא lābî' and לְבִיָּא lĕbîyyāh, cognate with the Arab. labwah, labuäh, labiah, or labaäh. They are poetic forms in Heb. (Gn 49^{9} etc.). The masculine ending is paralleled by 'āthôn=she-ass, rāḥēl=ewe, and 'ēz=she-goat. There are numerous parallels in the Arab. 5. לַיִשׁ layîsh, is a poetical word for the lion, possibly derived from the idea of his courage and strength (Is 30^{6} etc.). Its Arab. equivalent is laith, evidently the same as the Aram. לֵיתּ and the Greek λῖς (Hom. Il. xi. 239, xv. 275). 6. שַׁחַל shaḥal, is another poetical epithet of the lion, derived from his roaring (Job 4^{10} etc.). 7. בְּנֵי־שַׁחַץ bĕné-shaḥaẓ, is tr. 'lion's whelps' (Job 28^{8}, RV 'proud beasts,' m. 'sons of pride'). The same word is tr^{d} (RV Job 41^{34}) 'sons [AV 'children'] of pride.' Undoubtedly this is the correct tr., being figurative for the more noble beasts of prey. In the first passage, after the general expression 'sons of pride,' comes the specification of the lion as one of the noble beasts. There are about four hundred words in Arab. for the lion. Most of them are attributives. It is very common to give the name Asad='lion' to boys, as a prophecy of their prowess. This name and that of other strong animals, as the leopard and the wolf, are given to some boys, born after the death of an older brother, in the hope that the strength of the animal will inhere in him, and so his life may be preserved. As there is abundant evidence that lions were common in Greece as late as the times of Xerxes, so we learn from the OT that they were numerous in Palestine in ancient times. They made their dens in the thickets (Jer 4^{7} etc.), forests (Jer 5^{6} etc.), mountains (Ca 4^{8}, Ezk 19^{9}). The 'swelling of the Jordan,' i.e. the fringe of thickets between its upper and lower banks, was among the favourite haunts of the lion (Jer 49^{19} 50^{44}, Zec 11^{3}). Reland (Pal. i. 274) says that they were found here as late as the end of the 12th cent. They are met with even now in Mesopotamia. The lion of Palestine was probably the one described by Pliny (viii. 18); 'the body is shorter and more compact, and the mane more crisp and curly.' This sort is the same as that found in Persia and Mesopotamia, and figured on the Assyrian monuments. Layard, however, says that he has seen lions in Mesopotamia with long black manes (Nin. and Bab. 487). It would seem that the lions of Palestine were less formidable beasts than those of Africa, as shepherds sometimes attacked them single-handed (1 S 17$^{34-36}$). Samson rent one in twain (Jg 14^{8}). Amos says, 'as the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of an ear' (3^{12}). Lions were sometimes sent as a scourge to the people (2 K 17^{25} etc.). They often attacked and devoured men (1 K 13^{24} etc.; cf. Ps 22^{17} (?), where Aquila is now known to have read כָּאֲרִי). They were hunted by driving them with loud shouts into pits or nets (Is 31^{4}, Ezk 19$^{4.8}$). The passage telling of the exploit of Benaiah (2 S 23^{20}) reads הִכָּה אֵת־שְׁנֵי אֲרִאֵל מוֹאָב. AV text tr. 'slew two lionlike men (m. 'lions of God,' RV [supplying בְּנֵי, after LXX] 'the two sons of Ariel') of Moab.' We read also that 'he slew a lion in the midst of a pit in time of snow.' Oriental monarchs had pits of lions (Dn 6^{7}), the animals being used as executioners, but not for combats with other animals or with gladiators, as among the Romans.

The qualities of the lion alluded to in Scripture are (1) his royal power and strength (Gn 49^{9}, Pr 30^{30}). In this respect he was the type of Christ, 'the Lion of the Tribe of Judah' (Rev 5^{5}). Lions were sculptured on the temple and king's house (1 K 7$^{29-36}$ 10$^{19.20}$). The castle of 'Irakel-Amîr in Gilead has lions carved on its face. (2) His courage (Pr 28^{1} etc.). (3) His cruelty (Ps 22^{13} etc.), compared with the malignity of Satan (1 P 5^{8}).

Four words express the voice of the lion. 1. שָׁאַג shā'ag (Jg 14^{5} etc.), the true roar of the roaming lion seeking its prey (1 P 5^{8}). This is also used of the thunder (Job 37^{4}). 2. נָהַם nāham, the savage yell with which he lays hold of his victim (Is 5^{29}).* 3. הָגָה hāgāh, the angry growl, when an attempt is made to dispossess him of his prey (Is 31^{4}). 4. נָעַר nā'ar, the imperfect roar or growl of the whelps (Jer 51^{38}). This term is used in Syriac to express the braying of asses and the gurgling of camels.

There are six words employed to denote the attitudes and movements of the lion. 1. רָבַץ rābaẓ = Arab. rabaḍ, signifies to crouch (Ezk 19²), awaiting his victim. So sin is represented as lying (רֹבֵץ) at the door, i.e. crouching (as in RV) as a wild beast, ready to spring (Gn 4⁷). 2. 3. 4. In Job 38⁴⁰ it is said כִּי־יָשֹׁחוּ בַמְּעוֹנוֹת יֵשְׁבוּ בַסֻּכָּה לְמוֹ־אָרֶב. The three roots שָׁחַח shāḥah, יָשַׁב yāshab, and אָרַב 'ārab, may all indicate the same act, the ambush of a beast of prey. But as wathab, which is the Arab. cognate of yāshab, means to spring, as well as to crouch or sit, perhaps the passage may refer to a habit of the lion, which is to crouch, then to spring, and, if he fails to reach his prey by one or two bounds, to crouch again. Yāshōḥû would express the lying in covert, yēshĕbû the spring, and 'āreb the disappointed crouch, awaiting another victim. 5. רָמַשׂ rāmas expresses the prowling (lit. creeping: see CREEPING THINGS) of wild beasts in search of their prey (Ps 104²⁰). 6. זִנֵּק zinnēḳ expresses the fatal leap by which the lion bears down his victim (Dt 33²² only). G. E. POST.

* W. R. Smith (Prophets^{1}, 129, 243) reckons shā'ag the roar at the moment of the spring, nāham the growl with which the lion devours his prey.

LIP (שָׂפָה, χεῖλος).—In addition to its literal sense, the word שָׂפָה means 'language' (Gn 11¹, Ps 81⁵), 'bank,' 'shore,' 'edge,' 'side,' etc. (Gn 41³, Ex 2³ 14³⁰ etc.). In the Bible, the 'opening of the lips' is so constantly used as the equivalent of speech that the lips come to be regarded as an originating independent centre of life and conduct. Thus we have the 'lip of truth' Pr 12¹⁹, 'lying lips' Ps 31¹⁸, 'burning lips' Pr 26²³; and this figurative use of 'lips' is associated with other figures belonging to ceremonial and sacrifices, such as 'uncircumcised lips' Ex 6¹²· ³⁰, 'unclean lips' Is 6⁵, 'calves of the lips' Hos 14². For 'fruit of the lips' see FRUIT.

Orientalisms.—In the intolerable and incurable sorrow referred to in Ezk 24¹⁷· ²², the lips are not to be covered as in the time of ordinary bereavement. The word trᵈ 'lips' here means the moustache and beard, that is, the lower part of the face. It is still the Oriental custom in the house of mourning for the bereaved father or husband to put the hand or part of the head-dress or cloak over the mouth, to indicate that he is stricken of God, and has not a word to say.* Also after telling about some hard experience of sickness and privation in the family, often brought on by dirt and indolence, it is customary to lay the hand on the mouth and look up, as much as to say, 'God's will be done' (cf. Ps 39⁷, Is 47⁵, Mic 3⁷).

'Grace is poured into thy lips' (Ps 45²). This is illustrated by the Oriental way of drinking water from the mouth or short spout of the hand-jar without touching it with the lips. The head is thrown back, and the jar held from 6 in. to a foot above the face, while the water is poured gently into the open mouth and swallowed in a continuous stream.

'This people with their lips do honour me' (Is 29¹³, Mt 15⁸). In addition to the ordinary meaning of empty words, there may be a reference to the Jewish custom of putting the tassel of the ṭallith to the lips during worship as a sign that the law is accepted, not merely as a duty of obedience, but as an enthusiastic preference of the heart. Putting the hand to the lips was also an act in astral worship (Job 31²⁷), and is seen in the ordinary form of Oriental salutations.

LIST.—To 'list' (from Anglo-Sax. lust = pleasure) is to desire, to choose. The earliest use was impers., as Piers Plowman, 165—'With posternes in pryvytie to pasen when hem liste'; so Mt 20¹⁵ Tind. 'Ys it not lawfull for me to do as me listeth with myne awne?' and Tind. Works, i. 106, 'For where riches are, there goeth it after the common proverb, He that hath money hath what him listeth.' The word is used once in AV as tr. of βούλομαι (Ja 3⁴), and thrice of θέλω (Mt 17¹², Mk 9¹³, Jn 3⁸), always personally. Cf. Fuller, Holy State, 'The Good Wife,' 'Her children, though many in number, are none in noyse, steering them with a look whither she listeth'; and Knox, Hist. 374, 'You forget your selfe (said one) you are not in the Pulpit. I am in the place (said the other) where I am commanded in my conscience to speake the truth: and therefore the truth I speak, impugne it who so lists.' The subst. was also in common use till later than 1611. North, Plutarch, p. 876 ('Cicero'), has 'He would ever be fleering and gibing at those that tooke Pompeys part, though he had no list himselfe to be merrie'; and often in Bunyan, as HW, p. 154, 'for your Cordial I have no list thereto.' The word still survives in listless. J. HASTINGS.

LITTER (צָב Nu 7³, pl. צַבִּים Is 66²⁰ [all]).*—This was probably a wooden construction resembling a small ambulance waggon, having, instead of wheels, two shafts projecting at each end, between which a mule was yoked before and behind. The frame was furnished with a mattress and pillows, and four posts at the corners supported an awning with a movable screen around the sides, for protection against the sun and dust. Solomon's chariot (RV 'palanquin'), Ca 3⁹ (אַפִּרְיוֹן 'appiryōn, perhaps the Gr. φορεῖον; see Driver, *LOT*⁶ 449), would be of the same form, but with silver pillars supporting the awning of silk or fine linen. The Arabs use a word of Persian origin, takht-rawân, meaning a movable bed or couch for the journey. See HORSE-LITTER.

LIVELY.—1. The mod. meaning full of life, brisk, is found in Ex 1¹⁹, Ps 38¹⁹, Wis 7²². Cf. Adams on 2 P 1⁴ 'Paul calls it [sin] an old man—Put off the old man, Eph 4²²—above 5000 years old, and yet it is not only alive, but lively and lusty to this day'; and Rhem. NT, p. 215, 'Tertullian also reporteth, that at Rome being cast into a barrel of hote boiling oile he came forth more pure and fresher or livelier, then he went in.' 2. But 'lively' once was a synonym for 'living.' In 1 P 2⁴ Christ is described as 'a living stone,' and in the next verse the translators of AV speak of Christians as 'lively stones,' the Gr. being the same, carrying out their rule to introduce variety into the language. The occurrences of 'lively' = living in AV are Ac 7³⁸ 'the lively oracles,' 1 P 1³ 'a lively hope,' 2⁵ 'lively stones.' The Greek is always the pres. ptcp. of ζάω to live, and RV gives always 'living.' Cf. Ja 1²³ Gen. (1557), 'he is like unto a man, that beholdeth his lyvely face in a glasse' (changed in 1560 to 'his natural face'); He 4¹² Rhem. 'The word of God is lively and forcible, and more persing than any two-edged sword'; XXXIX Articles, 1571, Art. xii. 'Albeit that good workes, which are the fruites of fayth, and folowe after iustification, can not put away our sinnes, and endure the severitie of God's iudgement: yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christe, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively fayth, in so muche that by them, a lively fayth may be as evidently knowen, as a tree discerned by the fruit.' So Knox speaks of Christ as 'the lively bread' (Works, iii. 73, 266), and as 'the fountain of lively water' (iii. 441). Still more clearly, Judgement of Synode at Dort, p. 38, 'as for the will, hee infuseth new qualities into it, and maketh it of a dead heart lively, and of an evill good, of a nilling willing, of a stubborne buxome.' Fuller has a surprising example in Holy Warre, iii. 19—'About the year 1160, Peter Waldo, a merchant of Lyons, rich in substance and learning (for a lay man), was walking and talking with his friends, when one of them suddenly fell down dead, which lively spectacle of man's mortality so impressed the soul of this Waldo, that instantly he resolved on a strict reformation of his life.'

* Schwally (Leben nach dem Tode, p. 16) thinks that the covering of the beard in mourning was originally a milder substitute for cutting it off.

* The etymology of the word צָב, which is found also in the Targ., is uncertain. Six עֶגְלֹת צָב (EV 'covered waggons') formed part of the offering of the 'princes' (Nu 7³). צַבִּים are named as one of the means of conveyance by which the dispersed Israelites are to be brought back (Is 66²⁰). In the first passage LXX has ἁμάξας λαμπηνικάς, Vulg. plaustra tecta; in the second, LXX ἐν λαμπήναις, Vulg. in lecticis. Kautzsch translates in Nu by überdeckte Wagen (Siegfried-Stade, Kutschwagen), and in Is by Sänfte (so also Siegfried-Stade).

LIVER (כָּבֵד kābēd, prob. 'the heavy organ of the body par excellence,' see Gesenius, Thes. s.v.; LXX ἧπαρ).—1. In the case of every animal offered in sacrifice a special sacredness attached to certain fatty parts of the viscera, among which we find, in eleven passages of the Priests' Code, 'the yôthereth (יוֹתֶרֶת, EV 'caul') of (מִן) the liver' or 'which is upon (עַל) the liver' (Ex $29^{13.\ 22}$, Lv $3^{4.\ 10.\ 15}$ 4^{9} etc.). The evident sense of the words prevents us from following the LXX and Josephus (Ant. III. ix. 2 [ed. Niese, 228], σὺν τῷ λοβῷ τοῦ ἥπατος) in regarding the yôthereth as one of the lobes of the liver itself. Etymologically the word denotes 'that which remains over,' 'excess,' hence excrescence or appendage (cf. Kautzsch-Socin's rendering Anhängsel). It most probably, therefore, is the technical name for 'the fatty mass at the opening of the liver, which reaches to the kidneys and becomes visible upon the removal of the "lesser omentum" or membrane extending from the fissures of the liver to the curve of the stomach' (Driver and White's Leviticus, p. 65, in Haupt's 'Polychrome Bible'; see also illustr. facing p. 4, and cf. the technical exposition by Professor Reichert in Dillmann, apud Lv 3^{4}). This peculiar sanctity of the visceral fat is to be explained by the fact that the liver and kidneys, with the fat surrounding them, were regarded by the Semitic races as being, with the blood, the seat of life (for fuller exposition and reff. see art. KIDNEYS, and W. R. Smith, RS^{2} 379 f.). Hence to have an arrow pierce the liver (Pr 7^{23}) or the reins (Job 16^{13}), is to receive one's death-wound.

2. Like the kidneys, the liver was also regarded as an important seat of emotion (cf. Assyr. kabittu, 'liver,' 'disposition,' 'feeling.' Muss-Arnolt, Assyr. Dict.). Hence a Hebrew poet could thus express the bitterness of his sorrow: 'Mine eyes do fail with tears, my bowels are troubled, my liver (כְּבֵדִי)[*] is poured upon the earth; for the destruction of the daughter of my people' (La 2^{11}).

3. The prophet Ezekiel represents Nebuchadnezzar as standing 'at the parting of the ways' that led to Jerusalem and to 'Rabbah of the children of Ammon,' and having recourse to three forms of divination: 'He shook the arrows to and fro (so RV improving on AV), he consulted the teraphim, he looked in the liver' (Ezk $21^{21\ [\text{Heb. } 26]}$).[†] The last-named, the inspection of the liver of the sacrificial victims, was a mode of divination much affected by the Chaldæan seers—by whom a complete set of rules of interpretation was drawn up (see Lenormant, La Divination, etc., chez les Chaldéens)—as also by the Greeks of the post-Homeric age (Gardner and Jevons, Manual of Greek Antiqs. p. 259) and the Etrurians, from whom the practice passed to the Romans (cf. art. DIVINATION in this Dictionary, vol. i. p. 621^{b}). Another magical use of the liver (in this case that of a fish) is found in the well-known incident in the story of Tobit ($6^{4\text{ff.}}$ 8^{2}).

LIVING.—In NT βίος means either[*] (1) this present existence, when AV and RV translate by 'life,' or else (2) the means by which this present existence is sustained, when, with one exception, AV and RV translate by 'living.' Thus (1) Lk 8^{14} 'pleasures of this life'; 1 Ti 2^{2} 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life' (RV 'a tranquil and quiet life'); 2 Ti 2^{4} 'the affairs of this life'; and 1 Jn 2^{16} 'the pride of life' (RV 'the vainglory of life'). (2) Mk 12^{44} (‖ Lk 21^{4}) 'she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living'; Lk 8^{43} 'which had spent all her living upon physicians'; 15^{12} 'he divided unto them his living'; 15^{30} 'which hath devoured thy living with harlots.' The exception is 1 Jn 3^{17} 'whoso hath this world's good' (τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου, RV 'the world's goods'): see GOOD, vol. ii. p. 229^{a}. Once the subst. 'living' occurs in the Apocr., when it is the tr. of ζωή, Sir 4^{1} 'Defraud not the poor of his living' (τὴν ζωὴν τοῦ πτωχοῦ μὴ ἀποστερήσῃς).

For 'living' in the sense of 'livelihood' cf. Pr. Bk. Catechism, 'My duty toward my neighbour is . . . to learn and labour truly to get mine own living'; and Shaks. As You Like It, II. iii. 33—

> 'What! wouldst thou have me go and beg my food,
> Or with a base and boisterous sword enforce
> A thievish living on the common road?'

LIVING CREATURE.—The translation (AV and RV) of חַיָּה ḥayyah, in Ezk[†] (chs. 1. 3. 10) and of ζῷον (the LXX equivalent in Ezk) in Rev (chs. 4. 5. 6. 7. 14. 15. 19) according to RV (AV 'beast'). Ḥayyah is in LXX most commonly rendered by θηρίον, with emphasis on the wild or the bestial; when it is rendered by ζῷον (never in LXX used of man) the emphasis is on life, but not reasoning life, see ἄλογα, Wis 11^{15}: it is thus, like animal, contrasted with man. In NT the same distinctions obtain: Rev 6^{8} 'to kill . . . by means of the beasts' (θηρίων); 13^{1} 'the beast' (θηρίον); He 13^{11} the sacrificial ζῷα, and 2 P 2^{12} (Jude ^{10}) τὰ ἄλογα ζῷα, the unreasoning living creatures.

The ḥayyah of Ezk and the ζῷον of Rev are of that composite creature form known as cherubic (Ezk 10^{20}), partly human, partly animal, and always with wings. (See the representations of cherubic forms in Riehm's Handwörterbuch, i. 267, including a hypothetical construction of the Ezekiel cherub-chariot; see also the figures given at the end of the article 'Cherubim' in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopædia). Such forms were 'deeply rooted in ancient religious symbolism,' and belong to the 'common cycle of Oriental tradition.' They were conceived as symbols of the divine attributes rather than as representations of actual beings. The idea seems to have been a combination of the intellect of man with the physical force and alertness of the animal for the purpose of bearing up or attending upon deity or guarding what was sacred. (See CHERUBIM). The winged human-headed bulls of the Assyrian monuments may be regarded as the staple of these composite formations; but, whether or not the 'apparent correspondences in non-Semitic mythologies are perhaps deceptive' (Cheyne), it is difficult to class in an entirely different category the sphinxes of Egypt and of Greece and the gryphons of Teutonic fable.

[*] But the Gr. and Syr. Versions read כְּבֹדִי 'my glory' = 'my soul' (cf. Ps 16^{9} etc.). Conversely the LXX read כְּבֵדַי τὰ ἥπατά μου for כְּבֹדִי in Gn 49^{6}. They also make David's wife put a goat's liver (reading כָּבֵד for כְּבִיר of MT) in his bed in the incident recorded in 1 S $19^{13\text{ff.}}$!

[†] On this passage see, further, Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heidentums^{2}, 133 f., and W. R. Smith, Journ. of Philol. xiii. 278. Wellh. maintains that there are not three forms of divination referred to, the meaning of the passage being simply that the king casts lots before the image of a god and couples with this an act of sacrifice. But why the special allusion to the liver? Cf. Bertholet and Davidson, ad loc.

[*] Omitting with edd. 1 P 4^{3}.

[†] On 'living creature' as the tr^{n} of נֶפֶשׁ הַחַיָּה etc., see art. CREATURE, ad init.

While the representations of the nature and functions of the 'living creatures' in Ezk and Rev are closely allied, there are marked differences. In Ezk the four creatures have each four heads, looking four different ways, the face of a man being in front, and the faces of animals on the three remaining sides: in Rev three creatures out of the four are like animals, and only one has the face of a man (4^{7}). In both (whether μόσχος must be a calf or may be an ox) the animals are the same, and in both therefore we have the intelligence of the man, the sovereignty of the lion, the strength of the ox, and the swiftness of the eagle. (Cf. Schultz, OT Theology, ii. 236). In Ezk each has four wings, in Rev six wings. In Ezk 1 the wheel accompanying each creature and containing its spirit has its felloes full of eyes (1^{18}): in Rev the creatures themselves are full of eyes (as apparently in Ezk 10^{12}, where the wheels and the bodies are confused). In Ezk their function is that of unitedly bearing in one direction or another the firmament and, above that, the throne, with the manifestation of Jehovah upon it: in Rev the throne is immovable, and the function of the four living creatures is that of choregi leading and concluding the various portions of the unceasing hymn of adoration (4^{9} 5$^{9.\,14}$); their position being somewhat enigmatically described as ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ θρόνου καὶ κύκλῳ τοῦ θρόνου (4^{6}), 'in the midst of the throne and around the throne,' the first part of which may possibly mean that they supported the throne on each of its sides, or may be some original confusion or early corruption due to the retention or insertion of the simple καὶ ἐν τῷ μέσῳ of Ezk 1^{5}.

The symbolic, imaginary, and variable (cf. Ezk 41^{18} two faces) figures of Ezk became, by easy transference, before the date of the Book of Enoch, simply an order of angels, as did the wheels likewise. In that book we read (61^{10}) of the 'host of God, the Cherubim, Seraphim (perhaps = princes), and Ophanim (wheels), and all the angels of power,' etc. At ch. 40 we are introduced to 'four presences' (i.e. four angels of the Presence), different from (i.e. higher than) those that sleep not (i.e. those that unceasingly bless the Lord of spirits, saying 'Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of spirits: He filleth the earth with spirits'): and these four presences, 'angels of the Lord of spirits,' are Michael, the merciful; Raphael, the healer; Gabriel, the mighty; and Phanuel, the spirit of repentance and hope: these 'gave glory before the Lord of glory.' The function of the seraphs, each with six wings, in Is 6^{2}, is similar: 'One cried to another, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory.'

We can now see the syncretic character of the nature and functions of the 'living creatures' in Rev. We can see how the composite, symbolic creature-forms of the throne-bearers in Ezk—of which storm and lightning clouds had probably been the prototype—had been assimilated in nature and in function to the seraphs of Isaiah, and to the four angelic 'presences' and 'voices' of Enoch, and had thus finally taken up their position as the highest angels, standing immediately before the throne, and leading the heavenly choir. And so we can understand how, in the later Psalms, He who is said to be 'enthroned upon the cherubim' (Ps 80^{1} 99^{1}) can also be spoken of (22^{3}) as 'enthroned upon the praises of Israel.' If we take note of the diversifications in the symbol as displayed in the history of its use (even by one and the same writer), we shall not be hasty to define rigidly the ideas its several attributes embody. The notion that the living creatures in Rev 4$^{6\text{ff.}}$ represent 'the quintessence of creation' will scarcely be maintained in face of the fact that in 5^{13} creation is viewed as something quite distinct from them. But if we regard them as standing for the noblest of God's creatures, the most honoured and efficient of His servants, the most devout and constant of His worshippers, then the numerical symbol of all pervasiveness, the human and animal symbols of intelligence, of sovereignty, of strength, and of swiftness, the eyes-symbol of ubiquitous watchfulness and penetration, and the sanctus-symbol of unceasing praise and adoration, will all readily and easily fall into their proper place. For early Christian interpretations see Zahn, Forsch. ii. 257 ff.; Swete, St. Mark, xxxi ff.

J. MASSIE.

LIZARD (לְטָאָה lĕṭâ'āh, καλαβώτης, stellio).—The word lizard occurs but once in AV (Lv 11^{30}). It is one of the following six names of unclean animals (Lv 11$^{29.\,30}$), which we give with their Heb. originals and AV and RV equivalents:—

			AV	RV
1.	צָב	ẓāb	tortoise	great lizard.	See CHAMELEON.
2.	אֲנָקָה	'ănâḳâh	ferret	gecko.	,, GECKO.
3.	כֹּחַ	kōăḥ	chameleon	land crocodile.	,, CHAMELEON.
4.	לְטָאָה	lĕṭâ'āh	lizard	lizard.
5.	חֹמֶט	ḥōmeṭ	snail	sand lizard.	,, SNAIL.
6.	תִּנְשֶׁמֶת	tinshemeth	mole	chameleon.	,, CHAMELEON.

It will be seen from this list that the RV regards all these creatures as lizards. In our opinion, 1, 3, 4 are pretty certainly lizards, 2 probably so, 5 dubious, and 6 perhaps the mole-rat, but possibly the chameleon. RVm says of 2, 3, 4, 5, 'words of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting four kinds of lizards.' What species of lizard is intended by lĕṭâ'āh we have no means of determining. The commonest species are Lacerta viridis, L., the green lizard; Lacerta agilis, L., the sand lizard (RV equivalent of AV snail, Heb. ḥômeṭ); Zootica muralis, Laur.; Ophiops elegans, Menetr.; Gongylus ocellatus, Forsk.

In Pr 30^{28}, where AV has 'the spider taketh hold with her hands,' RV gives 'the lizard taketh,' etc., RVm 'the lizard thou canst seize with thy hands.' The Heb. word is שְׂמָמִית. The trⁿ 'lizard' is supported by the LXX καλαβώτης, Vulg. stellio, and is adopted by Reuss, Kamphausen, etc., although Delitzsch and some others still defend 'spider.' See further, Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 1084.

LO-AMMI (לֹא־עַמִּי 'not my people,' LXX οὐ λαός μου).—The second son and third child of Gomer, the wife of the prophet Hosea. Whether or not we infer from Hos 1$^{2\text{f.}}$ that Lo-ammi was the offspring of an unlawful union, he was recognized by Hosea as his child, and from him received his name. He was born three or four years after his sister Lo-ruhamah, as we may infer from the reference to the weaning of the latter (Hos 1^{8}), and the fact that weaning took place at two or three years from birth (2 Mac 7^{27}, cf. Gn 21^{8}, 1 S 1^{23}). The detail is of importance against the purely allegorical interpretation of the chapter, since it is to the point only in a narrative of fact. The name is symbolical, embodying Hosea's conviction that Israel had forfeited its claim to J''s protection: 'call his name Lo-ammi; for ye (the Israelites) are lō-'ammî' (i.e. 'not my people,' cf. Hos 1^{11} RV), Hos 1^{9}. For symbolical names given to other actual children, cf. MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, SHEAR-JASHUB. Nothing further is known of the person Lo-ammi. The name occurs again in Hos 2^{23} [Heb. ^{25}] RVm, and also in the Hebrew in

2^{1} [Eng. 1^{10}]; but in both these cases the name or phrase refers to the people of Israel. Thus 2^{1} [Eng. 1^{10}] may be translated, ‘And instead of that which was said to them, Ye are Lo-ammi (i.e. ‘not my people’), it shall be said unto them (ye are) sons of the living God’; and similarly 2^{25} [Eng. 2^{23}] ‘And I will say unto Lo-ammi, Thou art Ammi (i.e. ‘my people’).’ Both these passages in which the name of Hosea’s son is actually applied to the people of Israel have been regarded by certain writers as later additions to the Bk. of Hosea; on 1^{10}–2^{1} [Heb. 2^{1-3}] cf. Wellh., Nowack, ad loc., and Cheyne in W. R. Smith’s Prophets^{2}, p. xviii; and on 2^{18-23} [Heb. 2^{20-25}] Nowack, ad loc. Zec 13^{9} is an interesting and suggestive parallel passage.

LOCUST.—The following words in the Heb. refer to various species of the Orthoptera, viz.:—

1. אַרְבֶּה ’arbeh. This is usually the generic name for locusts, and the one most frequently used in the OT (Ex 10^{4-15} etc.). It is probably derived from רָבָה râbâh, signifying to multiply, and is highly descriptive of the fecundity of these insects. It is limited by the description (Lv 11^{21}), which makes it one of the ‘flying creeping things that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth.’ It shares these characteristics with the סָלְעָם sol‘âm, bald locust, חַרְגֹּל ḥargôl, AV beetle (impossible, as the beetle does not leap; it may be, as in RV, ‘cricket’), and חָגָב ḥâgâb, grasshopper. In four places only AV tr. it ‘grasshopper’ (Jg 6^{5} 7^{12}, Job 39^{20}, Jer 46^{23}). In all these RV has ‘locust.’ Wherever ’arbeh is used, reference is made either to its numbers or its destructiveness. It is evident that the word refers to the migratory species, which are such a terrible plague in the East. The two which do the greatest damage are Œdipoda migratoria and Acridium peregrinum. These species are endemic in the deserts south-east and south of Palestine, and at irregular intervals spread northward and eastward.

2. סָלְעָם sol‘âm, ἀττάκης, attacus (Lv 11^{22}). This is one of the edible leapers defined in the previous verse. The obsolete root signifies to swallow or devour. The Talmud, which is the authority for the EV bald locust, says that it has a smooth head. Tristram suggests the species of Truxalis, which are common in Palestine.

3. חַרְגֹּל ḥargôl, perhaps ‘galloper,’ ὀφιομάχης, ophiomachus (Lv 11^{22}), tr. AV ‘beetle’ [quite inedible], RV ‘cricket,’ is another of the edible species, distinguishable from the others in the list. But, as there is no hint of the qualities of this kind, we must be content to confess our ignorance. The LXX guess of a serpent killer has no foundation.

4. חָגָב ḥâgâb, perh. ‘concealer (sc. of the sun),’ ἀκρίς, locusta. It is evidently one of the devouring species, and is tr. in one place AV and RV ‘locust’ (2 Ch 7^{13}), while in the others (Lv 11^{22}, Nu 13^{33}, Ec 12^{5}, Is 40^{22}) it is translated ‘grasshopper.’ What species it is we have no means of knowing. Its occurrence in the list with ’arbeh, sol‘âm, and ḥargôl makes it sure that it was known to the Israelites, and distinguishable from the other edible insects mentioned.

5. צְלָצַל (pausal form) ẓĕlâẓal (Dt 28^{42}), is tr. by the LXX ἐρυσίβη, and Vulg. rubigo = blight or mildew. But it is much more probable that this is a word referring to the whizzing, whirring, or rushing of the wings of the locusts (cf. Is 18^{1}), or the stridulation (of legs against sheath of wing).

6. [גֵּב] gêb, only in pl. גֵּבִים (Is 33^{4}); גֹּבַי gôbai (Am 7^{1}, AV ‘grasshoppers,’ m. ‘green worms,’ RV ‘locusts’); גּוֹב gôb, גּוֹבַי gôbai (Nah 3^{17}), AV ‘great grasshoppers,’ RV ‘swarms of grasshoppers.’ The LXX tr. all these ἀκρίς. Some have supposed (see Driver on Am 7^{1}) this word to refer to the larval state of the locust, but there is no certain proof of it.

7. גָּזָם gāzām, ‘lopper’ or ‘shearer.’ The two lists of four devourers (Jl 1^{4} 2^{25}) have perplexed commentators. ’Arbeh, which is second in the first list and first in the second, is, as seen above, the most generic name for locust. In the first list it is said that that which the gāzām, ‘palmerworm,’ hath left hath the ’arbeh, ‘locust,’ eaten; that which the ’arbeh hath left hath the yeleḳ, ‘cankerworm,’ eaten; and that which the yeleḳ hath left hath the ḥāṣîl, ‘caterpillar,’ eaten. In the second list it is said, ‘I will restore to you the years which the ’arbeh hath eaten, the yeleḳ, and the ḥāṣîl, and the gāzām.’ This discrepancy in the order in lists found in successive passages of the same author, creates an insuperable difficulty in determining with certainty the destroyers intended. The attempt to identify them as successive steps in the development of the locust is defeated by the want of accord between the two passages. (See PALMERWORM).

8. יֶלֶק yeleḳ, prob. ‘lopper,’ ἀκρίς, βροῦχος, bruchus, cankerworm, caterpillar. The expression (Nah $3^{15.16}$), ‘the sword shall devour thee like the yeleḳ; make thyself many as the yeleḳ; make thyself many as the ’arbeh . . . the yeleḳ spoileth (m. spreadeth himself) and flieth away,’ has been supposed to imply that the yeleḳ is the larval stage of the locust up to the time of the evolution of its wings. But as it is said that the yeleḳ flies away, the passage is not decisive. The yeleḳ is spoken of as coming after the ’arbeh (Ps 105^{34}), before and after (Jl 1^{4} 2^{25}). In the passage in Ps, AV has ‘caterpillar,’ RV ‘cankerworm.’ In Joel both VSS have ‘cankerworm.’ In Jer $51^{14.27}$ AV has ‘caterpillars,’ RV ‘cankerworm.’ In the latter verse the creature is said to be ‘rough.’

9. חָסִיל ḥāṣîl, ‘finisher,’ ἀκρίς, βροῦχος, ἐρυσίβη, rubigo, ærugo, caterpillar. This discrepancy of tr. in the VSS makes the meaning of this word uncertain. It occurs after ’arbeh (1 K 8^{37}, 2 Ch 6^{28}), before it (Ps 78^{46}, Is 33^{4}), after yeleḳ (Jl 1^{4} 2^{25}). In all the passages the context seems to point to the destroying locust in some of its forms.

The destructiveness of locusts is often referred to in Scripture. It is compared with that of a mighty army (Jl 2^{2-9}). They are perhaps the most terrible of all the scourges of Bible lands. Their swarms fill the air, darkening the sky, and the noise of their wings resembles the pattering of a heavy rain. They fly with great rapidity, and towards nightfall they light wherever they may happen to be; and such are their numbers that they often break the branches of the trees to which they cling. The flying locust eats comparatively little, but will not disdain any green thing that may be in his way. But as the swarm invariably resumes its flight as soon as the sun has warmed it a little (Nah 3^{17}), and does not return, it has not time to destroy all the vegetation. Often a swarm comes and goes away without having done much harm. But such of the females as are ready to lay their eggs begin as soon as they alight to moisten the spot of earth with a secretion from their tails, and excavate in the softened soil holes in which they deposit the ovisac, which often contains as many as a hundred eggs. The next morning the swarm flies away, and at night other females deposit their eggs at their new resting-places. It is the larvæ of these eggs which work the devastation which makes the locust so great a scourge. When a swarm of locusts appears, the first care of the owners of lands and gardens is to prevent them from alighting on their grounds. For this purpose they beat pans, and shout, and fire guns, and make all manner of noise. The locusts, which are easily frightened, may thus be compelled to seek another resting-place. But finally the vast swarm alights. The people then pour out into the fields and gardens, and catch as many as possible, and place them in sacks, in which they are either pounded to death or drowned. The same hunt is repeated the next morning, before the sun is up, while the locusts, chilled by the night air, and weighted with the dew, are still unable to fly (Nah 3^{17}). As soon as they are gone the search for their eggs begins. The government either enforces a per capita contribution of these eggs, or offers a price for them by weight. With all the exertions of many hundreds of persons, however, vast numbers of the eggs escape their search, and in about fifteen to twenty days hatch out. The black larvæ now spread like a pall over the land, eating every green thing, even stripping the bark off the trees. As they cannot fly, they convert the district around which they were hatched into a desert, until, after a month to forty days, their wings are grown, and they fly away to begin in other places their round of devastation. The Arab. name for them is jerâd, from a root signifying to strip. The march of these destroyers is arrested in various ways. The people dig trenches in their pathway, and, when these are full of the creatures, turn back the earth and bury them, or turn water into the trenches and drown them. They often kindle fires in their pathway, and drive them into the flames. Besides the damage done by locusts in their various stages of development in devouring vegetation, they choke the wells and streams, which are often filled by their innumerable carcases, and so defiled that their waters are no longer drinkable. When driven by strong winds into the sea or rivers, their bodies are piled in prodigious heaps along the shore or bank, and breed pestilence by their intolerable effluvia.

Locusts are unable to fly against the wind. Their wings become entangled, and they are 'tossed up and down' (Ps 109^{23}), and fall to the ground. They are certainly used as food, and were doubtless part of the diet of John the Baptist (Mt 3^{4}). The writer has seen them toasted and eaten. The Arabs stew them with clarified butter, after tearing off the head, legs, and wings. They are said to be dried and ground to meal in some places.

Locusts are mentioned once in the NT (Rev 9^{3-11}) as monsters, in the likeness of war horses, with hair like women, teeth like lions, breastplates like iron, tails with stings like scorpions, their king being Abaddon or Apollyon, the angel of the abyss.

See on the whole subject of this article the elaborate 'Excursus on Locusts' in Driver's Joel and Amos, 82 ff., and the literature there cited.

LOD, LYDDA (לֹד; LXX Λόδ in 1 Ch 8^{12} [A; B om.], Ezr 2^{33}, Neh 7^{37}; Λύδδα in Neh 11^{35} [AB$\aleph^*$ om.], 1 Mac 11^{34}; NT Λύδδα) is identified as the Arabic Ludd, a village in the plain of Sharon about 10 miles S.E. of Joppa on the way to Jerusalem. From a distance its appearance is pleasant and picturesque, occupying a fertile hollow in the great undulating plain, surrounded by gardens of olive and various fruit trees, and situated near a valley that leads into the river 'Aujeh. The village itself is very dilapidated, a haunt of dirt diseases, the effect of modern squalor being intensified by the presence of noble ruins testifying to former prosperity.

1. Bible references.—Lod is alluded to in 1 Ch 8^{12} as having been built along with Ono by Shemed of the tribe of Benjamin. The inhabitants of these villages shared in the tribulations of the Babylonian captivity, and a considerable number of them returned under Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah (Ezr 2^{33}, Neh 7^{37} 11^{35}).

The most interesting allusion to Lydda is in the NT, where it is recorded that St. Peter visited the saints there, and healed Æneas, and when there received the urgent request to go to Joppa on behalf of Dorcas (Ac 9^{32-38}).

2. General history.—Besides being close to the road from Joppa leading eastward to Jerusalem, Lydda was also on the great caravan route between Babylon and Egypt. Camels laden with rich merchandise from Baghdad, Aleppo, Damascus, and the region beyond Galilee, and protected by armed attendants, were constantly defiling through Shechem, resting at Lydda and Ono, and passing on through Gaza to Egypt. Joseph would be taken by the Ishmaelites along this route. The manufacture and repair of such requisites for the journey as sacks, saddles, and strappings, would create the skilled labour in cloth, leather, wood, and metal that made the neighbouring Ono 'the valley of craftsmen' (Neh 11^{35}). During the Jewish wars of independence, the frequent sieges, change of ownership, and general lawlessness of Jaffa would encourage the transit of goods by land until, under more settled government, commerce naturally chose the cheaper mode of conveyance by sea. In this way, by a peaceful necessity of trade, apart from the devastations of war, Lydda, like Aleppo and other towns of the caravan route, fell into insignificance and silent decay.

3. Non-biblical references.—Lydda is mentioned by Josephus as one of the eleven toparchies or chief sections of the kingdom of Judæa over which Jerusalem presided (BJ III. iii. 5). Along with Aphærema and Ramathaim it was taken from Samaria and restored to Jerusalem by Demetrius Nikator, B.C. 152 (1 Mac 10^{30} 11^{34}; Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 9). Its inhabitants were wantonly sold into slavery by Cassius, and restored to freedom by Antony (Jos. Ant. XIV. xi. 2, xii. 2–5). Cestius Gallus, who inflicted such loss upon Joppa, also burnt Lydda and killed about fifty of its inhabitants, the majority being absent attending the Feast of Tabernacles at Jerusalem (Jos. BJ II. xix. 1). Soon afterwards it was rebuilt, and was a town of considerable wealth and importance when it surrendered to Vespasian on his way to the siege of Jerusalem (Jos. BJ IV. viii. 1). About this period Lydda was famous as a seat of Rabbinical learning. In the early Christian centuries it was of sufficient importance to be made the seat of a bishop. Its bishop took part in the Council of Nicæa, and, later on, Pelagius appeared before an ecclesiastical assembly there on a charge of heresy, and, amid considerable tumult, was acquitted.

Lydda and St. George.—The celebrated St. George, called by the Moslems el-Khudr, 'the ever-green or undying,' was born at Lydda in the 3rd cent., and is said to have died there. The beautiful cathedral church of St. George was built over his reputed tomb. On account of its fortress-like appearance, it was destroyed by the Moslems when they invaded the land. After being rebuilt with much magnificence by the Crusaders, it was demolished by Saladin in 1191, after the disaster of Ḳurn Ḥattin, where a disorderly rabble, bearing the name and mission of the Cross, was annihilated on the reputed Mount of Beatitudes.

After so many years of conflict, the church now enjoys a truce of dilapidation, with a mosque in one end of the ruin and a Greek church in the other.

From the 2nd cent. onwards Lydda was called Diospolis, but the old name was never quite superseded, and in the Arabic Ludd survives to the present day.

LODDEUS (B Λααδαῖος v.^{44}, Λοδαῖος v.^{45}, A Δολδαῖος; AV Saddeus, Daddeus; 1 Es $8^{45.46}$ [$^{44.45}$ LXX]).—The 'captain in the place of the treasury' (or 'at the place Casiphia,' Ezr 8^{17}), to whom Ezra sent, while encamped on the river Theras, for Levites to accompany him on the return. He is called Iddo in Ezr 8^{17}. The form Λοδαῖος appears to have arisen from repeating the ל in אֶל־אִדּוֹ 'to Iddo.' H. St. J. Thackeray.

LO-DEBAR (in 2 S $9^{4.5}$ לוֹ דְבָר, B Λαδαβάρ, A Λαβαδαρί; in 17^{27} לֹא דְבָר, BA Λωδαβάρ, Luc. Λαδαβάρ).—A place in Gilead, near to, and apparently east from, Mahanaim. It was the retreat of Mephibosheth till he was summoned to court by David, 2 S $9^{4.5}$. It is mentioned also upon the occasion of David's flight to the east of the Jordan, 17^{27}. The site has not been recovered.

Wellhausen and Nowack (in their Comm. ad loc.) and Buhl (GAP 71), following Grätz, find the proper name Lo-debar also in Am 6^{13}, where EVV (followed by Driver) read and tr. לֹא דָבָר 'a thing of nought.' Lo-debar is perhaps intended in the לִדְבִר of Jos 13^{26}. See Debir, No. 2. J. A. Selbie.

LODGE.—To lodge is in AV nearly always to spend the night, as Jos 8^9 'Joshua lodged that night among the people'; Ru 1^{16} 'where thou lodgest, I will lodge'; Job 31^{32} 'the stranger did not lodge in the street: but I opened my doors to the traveller'; Zeph 2^{14} 'both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it.' In OT that is always the meaning. The verb is some part of לוּן or לִין, except in Jos 2^1 'And they went, and came into an harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there' (וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ־שָׁמָּה, RV 'and lay there'); and 4^8 'the place where they lodged,' Heb. מָלוֹן, elsewhere translated 'lodging' (2 K 19^{23}, Is 10^{29}), 'lodging place' (Jos 4^3, Jer 9^2), 'inn,' with RV 'lodging place' (Gn 42^{27} 43^{21}, Ex 4^{24}). In Apocr. and NT we find 'lodge' as the tr. of (1) αὐλίζομαι, To $6^{1.10}$ 9^6, Sir 14^{26}, Mt 21^{17}; (2) καταλύω, Sir $14^{24.25}$, Lk 9^{12}; (3) κοιμάομαι, 1 Mac 11^6; (4) κατασκηνόω, Mt 13^{32}, Mk 4^{32}, Lk 13^{19}. In all these places the meaning of 'lodge' is 'spend the night.' But we also find ξενίζω so translated in Ac $10^{6.18.23.32}$ 21^{16} 28^7, and ἐπιξενόομαι in Sir 29^{27}, and then the meaning is, if trans., 'receive as a guest,' 'entertain,' or if intrans. 'be entertained,' 'be a guest.' Thus the only meanings that the verb to lodge has in AV and RV are (1) pass the night in a place, and (2) entertain one or be entertained by one as a guest. For the meaning 'pass the night' see Shaks. II Henry VI. I. i. 80—

> 'Did he so often lodge in open field,
> In winter's cold, and summer's parching heat,
> To conquer France, his true inheritance?'

Rom. and Jul. II. iii. 36—

> 'And where care lodges, sleep will never lie.'

Macbeth, II. ii. 26—

> 'There are two lodged together.
> One cried, "God bless us!" and "Amen" the other.'

And for the sense of 'entertain' or 'be entertained,' He 13^2 Tind. 'Be not forgetfull to lodge straungers'; Taming of Shrew, IV. ii. 107—

> 'And in my house you shall be friendly lodged.'

Lodge as a subst. occurs but twice: (1) Is 1^8 'And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (מְלוּנָה found elsewhere only Is 24^{20}, AV 'cottage,' RV 'hut'; it is the watch-tower [Mt 21^{33}, Mk 12^1] or hut in which the caretaker of the vineyard dwells while the crop is ripening until it is gathered in: see Wetzstein in Delitzsch's Job, ii. 74 f., and art. Booth, with illustration under Cucumber); (2) Jth 3^3 'Behold, our houses, and all our places, and all our fields of wheat, and flocks, and herds, and all the lodges of our tents, lie before thy face' (αἱ μάνδραι τῶν σκηνῶν ἡμῶν; RV 'the sheepcotes of our tents,' as AV in 2^{26} for the same word; 'lodges' is from the Geneva Bible, which has 'lodge' also in 2^{26}).

Lodging or lodging place is found in both meanings belonging to the verb lodge: (1) a place to spend the night in, as Jer 9^2 'Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men' (מָלוֹן); Sir 14^{25} 'He shall lodge in a lodging where good things are' (κατάλυμα); (2) a place of entertainment, only Ac 28^{23} and Philem ^{22} (ξενία).
J. Hastings.

LOFT (from the Scand., but the same as Anglo-Saxon lyft, the sky) is used twice in AV. In 1 K 17^{19} it means an upper room in a house, 'And he took him out of her bosom, and carried him up into a loft, where he abode, and laid him upon his own bed' (אֶל־הָעֲלִיָּה, RV 'into the chamber'). Elsewhere עֲלִיָּה is tr. 'chamber,' 'upper chamber,' 'parlour,' etc. (but see Moore on Jg 3^{30}). LXX has ὑπερῷον, its usual word for עֲלִיָּה; Vulg. cœnaculum, whence Wyc. 1382, 'sowping place,' i.e. supper room, but 1388 'soter,' i.e. upper room; Dou. 'upper chamber'; 'loft' is the Bishops' word. In Ac 20^9 it means one of the storeys of a house, 'Eutychus . . . fell down from the third loft' (ἀπὸ τοῦ τριστέγου, RV 'from the third storey'; Vulg. de tertio cænaculo; Wyc. 'from the third stage or souping place'; Tind. 'from the thyrde lofte,' followed by the rest of the versions). Cf. Gn 6^{16} Tind. 'And the dore of the areke shalt thou sette in the syde of it: and thou shalt make it with three loftes one above an other.' In Scots a 'lofted' house was a house of more than one storey. Jamieson quotes from Scott, Waverley, i. 298, 'Ian nan Chaistel's mansion, a high rude-looking square tower, with the addition of a lofted house, that is, a building of two stories.' J. Hastings.

LOFTINESS.—The adj. 'lofty' is used literally as in Is 57^7 'upon a lofty and high mountain'; and also metaphorically when it means 'haughty,' as Is 2^{11} 'The lofty looks of man shall be humbled'; so the adv. which occurs only in Ps 73^8 'They speak loftily' (מִמָּרוֹם, RVm 'from on high'). Loftiness is only metaphorical, haughtiness, Is 2^{17} 'the loftiness of man shall be bowed down' (גַּבְהוּת הָאָדָם), and Jer 48^{29} 'his loftiness' (גָּבְהוֹ). Cf. Shaks. Love's Labour's Lost, v. i. 11—'His humour is lofty, his discourse peremptory'; Sandys, Sermons, 107, 'Another exposition is, to make this a proper mean to keep and conserve unity, rather than a way only to diminish loftiness and pride.' J. Hastings.

LOG.—See Weights and Measures.

LOGOS (ὁ λόγος) signified in classical Greek both Word (verbum, sermo, oratio) and Reason (ratio), but in biblical Greek is used only in the former sense, except in a few passages where it means 'account' (e.g. Mt 18^{23}, Ro 14^{12}, Ac 20^{24}), and a few brief phrases in which the sense of 'reason' more plainly appears (Ac 10^{29} τίνι λόγῳ, 'for what reason'; 18^{14} 'reason would' κατὰ λόγον; 2 Mac 4^{36}, 3 Mac 7^8 παρὰ λόγον). By the LXX it is used to tr. דָּבָר (word) and its poetic synonyms אֹמֶר and מִלָּה. In NT it signifies a verbal utterance, then discourse, speech, instruction, narrative, and, when applied to God, either a specific divine utterance, or revelation in general, or the Scriptures as the communication of God's mind and will. Finally, it is employed by St. John to denominate the Son of God, both before and after His incarnation. This latter use gives the doctrine of the Logos which the present article is to describe.

St. John's peculiar use of Logos is found six times, namely, Gospel 1^{1} (three times) and ^{14}, where we read simply 'the Word,' 1 Jn 1^{1} 'the Word of life,' Rev 19^{13} 'the Word of God.' [1 Jn 5^{7} of TR and AV is spurious]. In Rev 19^{13} the term is applied to the conquering Christ, since His progress is the triumph of the divine revelation, of which He is both agent and substance. The title naturally associates itself with the author's Logos doctrine, either exhibiting an approach to it or an application of it, according to the dates we assign to the Gospel and the Apoc.; for in the Gospel the Logos is identified with the historical Christ (1^{14}), and in the Apoc. Christ is affirmed to be the divine agent of revelation and redemption (e.g. 1$^{5.\ 6.\ 17}$ 5^{6} 21^{23} 22^{13}). The reference of 1 Jn 1^{1} to the personal Logos is disputed (e.g. Westcott, Comm.); but the verbs used, the parallelism with the prologue of the Gospel, and the clear reference of v.^{2} to the incarnation, indicate that here also Logos means the personal Word (so Haupt, Schmid, Weiss, etc.), although the subject of the Epistle is not the person of the Logos, but the life which He possesses and has manifested. It is, however, from the prologue of the Gospel that we must derive St. John's doctrine of the Logos. Yet the prologue is illuminated by many passages of both the Gospel and the first Ep.; for, though with historical fidelity St. John does not impute to Christ his own Logos terminology, the latter was evidently meant to be supported by Christ's self-testimony which the Gospel records and the Epistle implies. Nowhere else in NT is the term Logos certainly applied to Christ. He 4^{12} has often been so understood, while others (e.g. Köstlin, Bleek, Delitzsch) see in it, at least, an approach to the Johannean usage;* but the context and adjectives used have led most commentators to refer the phrase to revelation, written or unwritten. Neither should 1 P 1^{23} nor 2 P 3^{5} be understood of the personal Logos.

We shall first state St. John's doctrine, and then discuss the reason for his peculiar terminology.

I. St. John's Doctrine is that Jesus Christ is the real incarnation of an eternally divine person (elsewhere called by him 'the only-begotten Son' of God, Jn 1$^{14.\ 18}$ 3$^{16.\ 18}$, 1 Jn 4^{9}; a term which declares His Sonship to be unique; in Jn 1^{18} Tregelles and WH with much force prefer the reading 'only-begotten God'), who has ever been the medium through whom God (called ὁ θεός in antithesis to the Logos, and 'Father' in antithesis to the 'Son') has exercised His activity in relation to the finite universe, and who, as the perfect manifestation of God's nature and will, is called the Word (Logos). In vv.$^{1.\ 2}$ of the prologue the relation of the Logos to God is stated. 'In the beginning' of all finite, temporal existence—a phrase suggested doubtless by Gn 1^{1}—the Logos was. He belongs, therefore, to the superfinite category of being, and is an eternal person. His existence is then more specifically defined as to both His personality and essential Deity. 'The Logos was with (πρός, towards) God (τὸν θεόν),' i.e. eternally in relation to God, and, therefore, a distinct personality from ὁ θεός, but in intimate communion with Him (πρός). 'The Logos was God (θεός),' i.e. in His essential nature He was Deity. The formality of these condensed statements, as well as the emphatic repetition, 'the same was in the beginning with God,' forbid the idea that they are not to be taken literally (against Beyschlag, Bib. Theol. of NT). In vv.$^{3-5}$ the activity of the Logos in relation to the universe is stated. 'All things were made (came into existence, ἐγένετο) through him, and without him was not anything made that hath been made'; a phrase which describes the Logos as the medium of the entire creative activity of God, and which excludes, at least by implication, the notion that creation was the formation of the cosmos from existing matter.* 'In' the Logos, moreover, 'was life,' i.e. He possessed the divine fulness of physical, rational, and ethical energy, with the implication that all the manifestations of life in the universe are due to His activity† (cf. Col 1^{17}. Note here also 1 Jn 1$^{1-3}$). Hence to men, endowed with intelligence, the life possessed by the Logos and manifested in creation was originally the illuminating truth ('the light') by which they apprehended God and duty; but when man became immersed in darkness (by sin), the divine light, though still continuing to shine, was not comprehended. This divine person crowned His manifestation of God by becoming flesh,—an expression which includes the reality and totality of Christ's human nature, the identity of His personality with that of the divine Logos, and, when taken with the context, the voluntariness of the incarnation,—and in the flesh manifested to His disciples, like the Shechinah in the tabernacle, His glory, such as became God's 'only-begotten One,' being 'full of grace and truth.' Attested by the Baptist (vv.$^{6-9.\ 15}$) and the apostles (vv.$^{14.\ 16}$), He surpassed the earlier revelation through Moses (vv.$^{16.\ 17}$), though after, as before, His incarnation He was rejected by the world, and even by the Jews (v.^{11}), and was received only by the true children of God (vv.$^{12.\ 13}$). He, however, is the only, but perfect, medium through whom God is known (v.^{18}).

From this summary it appears (1) that ὁ λόγος is not equivalent to ὁ λέγων, 'he who speaks,' as if the term were used because Christ was the teacher of whom St. John wrote; nor to ὁ λεγόμενος, 'the promised one'; but is a designation of the divine Son in His everlasting function of revealer of God. (2) That Logos means 'Word,' not 'Reason,' since it represents Him as the personal manifestation, not of a part of the Divine Nature, but of the whole of Deity (cf. 14$^{9.\ 10}$). (3) That the purpose of the prologue was to summarily express the teaching of the gospel (see 20^{31}) by representing Jesus as the real incarnation of God (cf. 1 Jn 5$^{20.\ 21}$), His spoken message (Christianity) as the expression of His inmost and eternal nature, and His historical activity in the flesh as the crown of all other manifestations of God, since these were mediated by the same divine person. For this purpose the term Word was an appropriate means of describing the Son as the perfect medium of God's self-revelation.

II. St. John's Terminology.—In discussing the historical origin of St. John's teaching, it is fair to distinguish between the source of the doctrine and of the phraseology in which he clothed it. Writers who regard the doctrine as an offshoot of the Alexandrian philosophy (see, e.g., among more recent writers, Holtzmann, Einleit. in das N.T. p. 430, and, still more uncompromisingly, Réville, La Doct. du Logos dans le quat. Évang. et dans les œuvres de Philon) fail to do justice to the testimony of the Fourth Gospel itself, to the teaching concerning Christ's person found in earlier apostolic literature, and to the profound differences between Philo's doctrine and St. John's. Thus the Fourth Gospel itself indicates that the historical personality and teaching of Jesus was the primary source from which the writer drew his belief in the Lord's divinity and mediatorial function (see, e.g., Jn 1^{30} $3^{13-21. 35. 36}$ 5^{19-30} $6^{57. 62}$ $7^{28. 29}$ $8^{14. 23. 38. 42. 54. 58}$ 10^{29-38} 12^{44-50} 14^{6-11} $16^{15. 28}$ $17^{2. 5. 8. 21}$ 18^{37} $20^{28. 30. 31}$). As the author appeals to historical testimony (e.g. 1^{14} 2^{11} 14^{26} $20^{30. 31}$) for his narrative, so the prologue cannot be separated from the narrative which follows it, but, while evincing the writer's reflection upon the nature of Christ, evidently appeals to Christ Himself for proof of the doctrine. Moreover, St. Paul and the Ep. to the Heb. had already set forth the person of Christ in terms which include every element of St. John's doctrine, though in different phraseology (see esp. Col 1^{13-20} 2^{9}, Ph 2^{5-11}, He 1^{1-4}). The doctrine of Christ's eternal divine Sonship, and His function as revealer of God (note εἰκών, ἀπαύγασμα, etc.), was therefore, long before St. John wrote, an explicit belief of the Christians, so that there is no need to go beyond the sphere of apostolic testimony and teaching to account for the substance of his doctrine.

---

* Grimm (Clavis: followed by Thayer, Lex.) gives this as a solitary instance of the use of Logos in the sense of the divine mind or reason; but for this there is neither necessity in the context nor warrant in NT usages.

* Philo's phrase, λόγος δὲ ἐστιν εἰκὼν θεοῦ, δι' οὗ σύμπας ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο (de Monarch. c. 5), or κατεσκευάσθη (de Cherub. c. 35), is quite different from St. John's.

† Many MSS and the earliest Fathers and Versions punctuate, 'That which hath been made in him was life,' and WH prefer this; but the perfect would then seem to require 'is,' not 'was,' a reading not sufficiently supported (see Meyer, Comm. in loc.)

The difference between St. John and Philo will appear later. St. John's doctrine therefore is not to be regarded as a philosophical speculation, nor may it be rationalized into the idea that intelligence originated the universe, or that Christianity is the realization of God's eternal thought. It is rather the careful and complete statement, in peculiar and significant phraseology, of a belief which already existed in the apostolic Church, and which was based on Christ's own testimony as well as on later revelations and reflections.

But what led St. John to use his peculiar phraseology?

(a) Its source has been found by many in the OT and in post-canon. Jewish literature.

In Gn creation is attributed to the command or word of God, and this led to a quasi-personification of the divine word in later poetical descriptions of creation (Ps 33^{6}) and providence (Ps 107^{20} $147^{15. 18}$ 148^{8}). Still more emphatically was revelation called 'the word of the Lord,' and hence such phrases occur as 'the word of the Lord came,' or even 'the word which Isaiah saw' (Is 2^{1}, so Mic 1^{1}, Am 1^{1}), which tended to represent the divine utterance as a separate and continuous object, distinguishable from the spoken and written word. With this are to be joined the OT representations of 'the angel of J",' or 'of God,' or 'of the covenant' (Gn 16^{7-13} 21^{17} 18^{13} compared with ^{2} 22^{11} 24^{7} $31^{11. 13}$ $32^{24. 30}$ (Hos 12^{3-5}) 48^{16}, Ex 3^{2-6} 14^{19} $23^{20. 23}$ 32^{34}, Jos $5^{14. 15}$ with 6^{2}, Jg 2^{1} 5^{23} $6^{11. 21. 22}$, Zec 1^{12} 3^{1}, Mal 3^{1}), who appears now identical with and now distinguished from God; as well as the apparent personifications of the divine 'name' (Ex 23^{21}, 1 K 8^{29}, Is 30^{27}, Ps 54^{1}, Jer 10^{6}, and perhaps Dt $12^{5. 11. 21}$ etc.) and 'presence' (Ex 33^{14}, Dt 4^{37} [RV], Is 63^{9}) and 'glory' (Ex 33^{18} [cf. v.^{20}] 40^{34}, 1 K 8^{11}). Certainly, some of these passages represent J" as revealing Himself through a special personal organ, whether that be identified with a divine person or regarded as a created agent employed by such (see Oehler, OT Theol. § 60). That Heb. thought tended to conceive of the medium of revelation as personal is also shown by the description of 'wisdom' (חָכְמָה) in some of the later books (Job 28^{12-28}, and especially Pr 8^{22-31}), though it is doubtful if the language amounts to more than poetical personification. Heb. belief in a living God, in immediate relation to the world and to Israel, certainly called for no intermediate being in the interest of philosophy, and the approaches made in OT toward the idea of a second divine person appear chiefly in the special theophanies and other manifestations of God recorded in the history; yet the description of 'wisdom,' even in the canon. books, may fairly be regarded as constituting a phase in the development of the idea. The post-canon. writings carry the tendency further. In Sir (1. 24) wisdom is still more boldly personified and described as premundane, though created, and manifested in the world, especially in Israel and in the law. Other expressions, however ($24^{14. 23}$), show that the description is still partly poetical. The 'Wisdom of Solomon' approaches more nearly to attributing hypostatical existence to wisdom (see 7^{25-27} 'For she is a breath of the power of God and a pure effluence from the glory of the Almighty: therefore no defiled thing falls into her. For she is an outshining of the eternal light (ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς ἀϊδίου), and an unspotted mirror of the efficiency of God and image (εἰκών) of His goodness,' etc., 8^{3-5} $9^{4. 9-11}$), and also speaks of God's Word (Logos) as His agent in creation (9^{1} 'who didst make all things ἐν λόγῳ σου') and in judgment (18^{15} 'Thine almighty word leaped down from heaven from thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war in a land devoted to destruction, bearing thine unfeigned commandment as a sharp sword'). The influence of Alexandrianism on this book is probable, and its conceptions move in a different direction from St. John's; but in the Targums a similar tendency appears in phraseology more akin to the apostle's. This is shown in their frequent use of 'Word' מֵימְרָא in connexion with the name of God to express His agency (e.g. Onkelos, Gn 3^{8} וּשְׁמַעוּ יָת קָל מֵימְרָא־דַיְיָ אֱלֹהִים מְהַלֵּךְ בְּגִנְּתָא 'They heard the voice of the Word of the Lord God walking in the garden'); Targum on Ps 2^{4} מֵימְרָא דַיְיָ יְדַחֵךְ לְהוֹן ('The Word of the Lord shall have them in derision'). Other like expressions are also used,—דִּבּוּרָא דַיְיָ, יְקָרָא דַיְיָ, שְׁכִנְתָּא דַיְיָ,—the last of which was commonly applied to the visible presence of J" in the tabernacle (e.g. Onkelos, Ex 25^{8} 'I will make my Shechinah to dwell among them'). The Targums do not appear to have applied these epithets to the Messiah, though the application did not lie far distant (e.g. Jerus. Targ. explains Gn 49^{18} of deliverance, 'not through Samson or Gideon, but of the redemption through thy Word'). Their usage perhaps arose from an unwillingness, which the canon. writers did not feel, to bring the holy God into immediate contact with men, and, therefore, easily allied itself with the felt need of a Mediator; while the terms employed lent themselves more readily to Johannean doctrine than those of the Wisdom literature did.*

Thus Heb. thought tended to represent God's self-manifestation as mediated by an agent, more or less conceived as personal and yet blending with the divine personality itself. Of the descriptive terms used, one of the commonest, and the one which seemed to rest directly on biblical language, was the 'Word'; and many consider this the probable source of St. John's phraseology. In favour of this may be urged the fact that St. John was a Pal. Jew; that his familiarity with current Jewish religious ideas is abundantly shown in his Gospel; that in Rev 19^{13} the title 'the word of God' is certainly drawn from Jewish, not Alex., habits of thought; that his writings evince loyalty to OT teaching (cf. Jn 1^{17} $3^{10. 14}$ $4^{22. 38}$ $5^{39. 46}$ 10^{35} 12^{38-40} $19^{36. 37}$); and that some expressions in the Gospel indicate his belief that Jesus was the full realization of the typical divine manifestations recorded in Heb. history (1^{14} ἐσκήνωσεν, δόξαν, $^{29. 51}$ 2^{19} 3^{14} $6^{32. 33. 48-50}$ 8^{58}, perhaps $10^{35. 36}$, 12^{41}). The description also of revelation as the word of God, common to Jews and Christians (cf. Jn 10^{35}), together with St. John's view of Christ as the living embodiment of the Truth (cf. 1^{16} 6^{48} 8^{12} 11^{25} 14^{6}, 1 Jn 1^{1-3} etc.), would furnish additional reason for the application of this current term to Him whom he wished to set forth as the personal divine organ through whom God ever has revealed Himself.

(b) The other source from which St. John might have derived his phraseology was the Alexandrian philosophy, chiefly represented by Philo. Since the time of Heraclitus, a Logos doctrine had been developing in Greek thought for the purpose of explaining how Deity came into relation with the world. By the Logos, however, in this connexion, the Greeks meant reason. With Heraclitus the Logos was merely the universal law in accordance with which the evolution of the universe from primordial fire proceeds. When later thinkers had risen to a clear distinction of mind from matter, and had perceived its formative and pervasive presence in nature, the Logos came to denote the distinctively rational principle manifested in the cosmos. Plato, indeed, commonly employed for this the term νοῦς; but he occasionally used λόγος as descriptive of the divine force from which the world has arisen (e.g. Tim. 38 C), and his doctrine of 'ideas' prepared the way for Philo. It was, however, the Stoics who formally developed the Logos idea. Interested mainly in the ethical problems of life, yet reverting to the earlier monism, they saw in the universe a rational principle (the Logos), in one aspect divine and in another finite, at once the divine reason and governor of the cosmos and, as the 'seminal Logos,' distributed in the rational germs from which all separate realities emerge. Finally, in the Jewish philosophy of Alexandria, Judaism united with Platonism and Stoicism for the purpose of showing that the OT taught the true philosophy, and expounded the Scriptures in this interest by allegorical interpretations. Philo adopted, after others, the term Logos, probably because it was familiar to both Judaism and Hellenism, to denote the total manifestation of divine powers and ideas in the universe. God is abstract being, without qualities, but from Him has proceeded the Logos, His rational thought, which first existed, as the ideal world, in the divine mind, and then formed and inhabited the actual cosmos. The Logos is thus the former of the world out of amorphous matter, and the one through whom God may be rationally known. Eternally in God, it has been implanted and made active in the world, and has especially disclosed itself to the Hebrews and in the Scriptures; and Philo describes the Logos in terms which often bear striking resemblance to NT descriptions of Christ.* The influence of this or similar speculation must have been felt among the Christians, and especially in Asia Minor; for the tendency to unite Christianity with philosophy appears as early as the Epistle to the Colossians, and is combated in St. John's first Epistle; Cerinthus, John's contemporary, was probably affected by the Alex. philosophy itself (see Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 396); and from the middle of the 2nd cent. the influence of Philo can be clearly traced within the Church. Hence it is not improbable that St. John's phraseology was partly determined by the prevalence of this philosophic use of the term.

* In the Book of Enoch the term 'Word' also occurs, and once (90^{38}) is applied to Messiah; but most critics, after Dillm., consider this latter passage a gloss.

Yet it is clear that Alexandrian philosophy did not enter constructively into St. John's doctrine. Philo's conception of the Logos was radically different from St. John's, as was the philosophy which underlay it. His Logos was the divine Reason, only attaining existence objective to God for the purpose of creation. It cannot be regarded as really personal, though constantly personified, and, if identical with divine thought, was in another aspect identical with the rationality possessed by creation, being the totality of the many logoi (ideas) that exist in the world. God, moreover, according to Philo, may be known, by ecstatic intuition, more immediately than through the Logos, and Philo's notion of the whole relation of God and the world was dominated by his abstract conception of Deity and the impossibility of the latter's contact with matter. Philo's Logos, moreover, was not identified with Messiah, nor was there a place in his philosophy for an incarnation, nor in his theology for redemption in the biblical sense.

It is, therefore, perhaps the most probable view that St. John adopted his Logos phraseology because, in both Jewish and Gentile circles, the term was familiar. It was a leading term by which religious thought was striving to express the idea, though with much misconception, of an all-comprehensive, all-wise, and directly active revelation of God to the world. Its current uses, among the Jews, rested ultimately on biblical language, and suggested an intimate relation, amounting in some aspects to identity, between the substance and the agent of revelation, as well as between the latter and God Himself. It was, moreover, among Christians as well as Jews, the constant phrase for revelation itself, whether oral or written. Hence, as employed by St. John, it formed a synthesis of several elements of truth. It set forth the Divine Christ as sustaining a central and vital relation to Christianity; the latter being, on the one hand, the didactic statement of the significance for men of His person and mission, and, on the other hand, the participation of the life with God which He possessed and mediated for believers. As Christianity is the revealed Word of God, so He, out of whose being and mission it has emerged (cf. 1 Jn 1^{1-4}), may be called emphatically the Word of God. The term further set forth Christianity as the final and perfect revelation of God to His creatures, since it represents it as the highest manifestation of the same Divine Person who has ever been the medium through whom God has been manifested in the creation and maintenance of the universe. Finally, this term, thus applied to the Divine Son in the whole series of His activities, represented Him as the immediate expression and vehicle of God's mind and will, while the careful statements of the prologue prevent the term from obscuring the Son's essential deity and eternal personality, as well as His true humanity after the incarnation. St. John's doctrine of the Logos therefore may be said to sum up the biblical teaching concerning the person of Christ, and, in doing so, to represent Christianity itself as the final, absolute, and universal religion.

Among post-apost. Christian writers the doctrine of the Logos is prominent, but was often affected by philosophical speculation. Gnosticism was an effort to unite Christianity with philosophy, and indicates a direction which post-apostolic thought and controversy largely took. In the Gnostic systems, however, the Logos terminology is not conspicuous. But, beginning with Justin Martyr, it is constantly met with in the writings of the Church Fathers. In Justin the biblical idea of God struggled with that of Absolute Being, and the Logos, represented as begotten by the Father before creation, unites the biblical conception of Word with the Hellenic one of Reason; a result which further tended to obscure the apostolic doctrine of salvation. In Theophilus of Antioch also the procession of the Logos from God appears as dependent on the Father's will, though his eternal relation to the latter is expressed more clearly than by Justin. With Tatian the Logos was the eternal world-principle, ideal in God and hypostatized at creation. In Athenagoras there appears a firmer grasp of the biblical doctrine which, at the close of the 2nd cent., was still more adequately expounded by Irenæus. The doctrine of the Logos in the post-apost. age was the natural meeting-point of Christianity with the best elements in the old religions. It seemed to many to furnish proof that the new religion was in reality the full expression of truths taught by philosophy. Hence its prominence in the apologists. But it was also easy for them to lose the biblical conception of Word in the Hellenic one of Reason; so that the doctrine became also a point of divergence between different schemes of theology according to the view taken of the term. The subsequent history of the doctrine lies beyond the limits of this article.

LOIS (Λωΐς, apparently a Greek name, akin to λῴων, λῷστος; 'die Liebe, Angenehme' [Pape, Handwörterbuch der griech. Eigennamen], but not found elsewhere except as the name of an island off the Thessalian coast—Steph. Byz. s.v.).—The grandmother of Timothy, and probably mother of Eunice (2 Ti 1^{5}). She was a lady of Lystra (but see Blass on Ac 16^{1}), probably, as the Greek names of all the family suggest, Hellenistic by birth, but a devout and sincere Jewess of 'unfeigned faith,' who trained her family in the Jewish scriptures (2 Ti 3^{15}), and was probably converted to Christianity on St. Paul's first visit to Lystra.

LONGSUFFERING.—This fine word is both an adj. and a substantive. As an adj. it is thrice used of God in OT (Ex 34^{6}, Nu 14^{18}, Ps 86^{15}) as the translation of אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם, elsewhere translated 'slow to anger,' and so translated in these passages by RV. In Apocr. the adj. occurs thrice again of God as tr. of μακρόθυμος (Wis 15^{1}, Sir 2^{11} 5^{4}). And in NT it occurs once, 2 P 3^{9} 'The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to us-ward' (μακροθυμεῖ). The adj. μακρόθυμος does not occur in NT, and the adv. μακροθύμως only once, Ac 26^{3}, where it is rendered 'patiently'; but the verb μακροθυμέω occurs often. In 1 Th 5^{14} for AV 'be patient toward all men' (μακροθυμεῖτε πρὸς πάντας) RV prefers 'be longsuffering toward all'; in Lk 18^{7} for AV 'though he bear long with them' (καὶ μακροθυμῶν [edd. μακροθυμεῖ] ἐπ' αὐτοῖς) RV gives 'and he is longsuffering over them' (Amer. RV 'and yet he is,' etc.).

The subst. is found but once in OT, Jer 15^{15} 'take me not away in thy longsuffering' (לְאֶרֶךְ אַפְּךָ, LXX εἰς μακροθυμίαν; Vulg. in patientia tua, whence Wyc. 'in thi pacience'; Cov. 'in thy longe wrath'; Gen. 'in the continuance of thine angre'; Bish. 'in the time of thine anger.' Cheyne interprets, 'suffer not my persecutors to destroy me through the longsuffering which thou displayest towards them'; so Streane; but Orelli translates, 'According to thy longsuffering, carry me not away'). In NT 'longsuffering' is the tr. of μακροθυμία in all its occurrences except two (viz. He 6^{12} and Ja 5^{10}, where AV and RV have 'patience'). The Gr. word is the opposite of ὀξυθυμία = 'quick temper,' 'irascibility': it is distinguished from ὑπομονή, μακ. being the temper which does not hastily avenge a wrong, ὑπ. the temper which does not easily succumb under suffering. See Lightfoot on Col 1^{11} and Ro 2^{4} (in Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, p. 259), Sanday-Headlam on Ro 2^{4}, Abbott on Eph 4^{2} and Col 1^{11}, and Trench, NT Synonyms, 188, 359. In his 'Prologe' to Exodus, Tindale says, 'Marke the longesoferinge and softe pacience of Moses and how he loveth the people and is ever betwene the wrath of god and them and is readye to lyve and dye with them and to be put out of the boke that god had written for their sakes (as Paule for his brothren Roma. ix.) and how he taketh his awne wronges pacientlie and never avengeth him silf.' Cf. also Tindale's tr. of Nu 14^{18} 'the Lorde is longe yer he be angrye, and full of mercy, and suffereth synne and trespace, and leaveth no man innocent.' See FORBEARANCE, vol. ii. p. 47.

J. HASTINGS.

LOOK.—The simple verb to look was formerly used in the sense of 'look for,' 'expect,' as Hall, Works, ii. 107, 'Little did Zacheus looke that Jesus would have cast up his eyes to him'; Rutherford, Letters, No. LI., 'Our Lord, that great Master of the feast, send us one hearty and heartsome supper, for I look it shall be the last.' There are three examples in AV, Is 5^{2} 'he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes'; Sir 20^{14} 'he looketh to receive many things for one' (RV 'his eyes are many instead of one'); Ac 28^{6} 'they looked when he should have swollen' (RV 'they expected that he would have swollen').

Driver in his Parallel Psalter (p. 448) draws attention to the specially biblical phrase look on or look upon. This has sometimes a good sense, sometimes a bad, but generally denotes satisfaction, and is occasionally paraphrased by 'see one's desire on.' Thus Ex 5^{21} 'The Lord look upon you, and judge'; Dt 26^{7} 'the Lord heard our voice, and looked on our affliction'; 2 S 9^{8} 'what is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?'; 1 Ch 12^{17} 'the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it'; 2 Ch 24^{22} 'The Lord look upon it, and require it'; Lk 1^{25} 'Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days when he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.' But 'look unto' in Dt 9^{27} 'look not unto the stubbornness of this people,' means 'regard'; cf. Lv 19$^{4.\,31}$, Dt 31$^{18.\,20}$ etc. Driver's examples (in all of which Heb. is ראה ב) are Ps 22^{17} 27^{4} ('gaze upon') ^{13} 37^{34} 50^{23} 54^{7} 59^{10} 91^{16} 92^{12} 106^{5} 112^{8} 118^{7} 128^{5}. The same phrase occurs in line 4 of Mesha's inscription, הִרְאַנִי בְּכָל־שֹׂנְאָי 'he made me to look upon [i.e. let me see my pleasure on] all my enemies.'

The phrase look upon is used occasionally in another sense, Gn 24^{16} 'the damsel was very fair to look upon'; 2 S 11^{2} 'the woman was very beautiful to look upon'; Rev 4^{3} 'he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone.' So to look on, Est 1^{11} 'she was fair to look on.' And to look to, 1 S 16^{12} 'Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to'; Ezk 23^{15} 'all of them princes to look to.'

To look to a person or thing in the sense of 'give attention to' it, is also occasionally found, Ex 10^{10} 'look to it; for evil is before you'; Pr 14^{15} 'the prudent man looketh well to his going,' so 31^{27}; Jer 39^{12} 'Take him, and look well to him, and do him no harm,' so 40^{4}; Ac 18^{15} 'But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it.' Cf. Cranmer, Works, i. 160, 'My chaplains and divers other learned men have reasoned with him, but no man can bring him in other opinion, but that he, like unto Esau, was created unto damnation; and hath divers times and sundry ways attempted to kill himself, but by diligent looking unto he hath hitherto been preserved.'

In 2 K 14$^{8.11}$ occurs the phrase 'to look one another in the face,' of which the meaning is apparently 'to join battle.' The Heb. phrase occurs nowhere else (though 2 K 23^{29} is very like it, 'he slew him at Megiddo, when he had seen him'), and the Eng. is a literal translation. But see Barnes in vol. ii. p. 513^{b}, and in Expos. Times, ix. 464, 521.

Look! as an exclamation, having no corresponding word in Heb. or Gr., is common in Coverdale: thus Ru 1$^{16.17}$ 'Loke where thou abydest, there wil I abide also . . . Loke where thou diest, there wil I dye.' One example of this 'graphic and picturesque pleonasm,' as Driver calls it, has been introduced by the AV translators (it does not seem to occur in any earlier version) at 1 Mac 4^{54} 'Look, at what time and what day the heathen had profaned it, even in that was it dedicated with songs, and citherns, and harps, and cymbals.' RV omits.

LOOKING-GLASS.—See GLASS, vol. ii. p. 181^{a}.

LOOPS (לֻלָאֹת, ἀγκύλαι).—Ex 26$^{4f.\ 10f.}$ 36$^{11f.\ 17}$ only. The term is used in connexion with the curtains of the Tabernacle, and the arrangement for coupling these together. Full details will be found under art. TABERNACLE.

LORD.—Both AV and RV print this word in three different ways, LORD, Lord, and lord. (1) LORD. This form represents יהוה, the proper name of the God of Israel. It is a substitution adopted by the Hebrews themselves, who shrank from pronouncing a name so sacred, and directed that אֲדֹנָי should be read instead, except in the cases where that word itself precedes the holy name, for which אֱלֹהִים was then substituted. When the vowel points were invented, those belonging to these words were respectively attached to the consonants יהוה.

When this feeling first asserted itself cannot be accurately ascertained. It prevailed before the date of LXX, where Κύριος always represents the divine name. The Jews justify the custom by an appeal to Lv 24^{16}, but this passage is rather an indication of the strength of the feeling than a justification of it. It was a grand opportunity missed when RV followed AV in this practice, especially in such passages as 1 K 18^{39}, where the whole meaning depends on the contrast of the names J″ and Baal. On the other hand, the gradual suppression of the proper name was an undoubted gain to religion. Had it, for instance, appeared in the NT, the spread of Christianity might have been seriously impeded.[*] The faith that is to embrace the world must have no special name for its God. J″, Molech, Chemosh were divinities of tribes or nations. The God of Christianity is universal, the God of the human race.

(2) Lord. This term in OT is used to translate —1. אֲדֹנָי when applied to the Divine Being. The word is in form a plur. majestatis (see e.g. Gn 39^{20}), with suffix of 1st person with ָי— instead of ַי—, presumably for the sake of distinction (meaning, therefore, properly, 'my Lord'). It is of infrequent use in the historical books, and in some cases it is uncertain whether it is a divine or a human appellative (Gn 18^{3} 19^{18}). The MT sometimes decides this by a note distinguishing between the word when 'holy' or only 'excellent,' sometimes by a variation in the pointing (נָ, נַ, or נְ). 'Lord' appears in combinations: O Lord my God (Ps 38^{15}), Lord God (Gn 15$^{2.8}$), the Lord God (Is 25^{8}). In the two latter 'God' is a substitute for the proper name. 2. אָדוֹן in its regular forms, when used of the Divine Being (Ex 23^{17}). This rule has not, however, been observed with strict uniformity. In Neh 3^{5} 8^{10} copies of 1611 printed LORD. 3. מָרֵא, an Aram. word (Dn 2^{47} 5^{23}). The same word is represented by 'lord' (Dn 4^{24}).

In NT, 'Lord' renders Κύριος when it refers directly to God or Christ, or appears in the vocative case. (This rule is more consistently followed in RV than in AV. Comp. them in Mk 2^{28}, Rev 17^{14}). It also renders δεσπότης five times, Lk 2^{29}, Ac 4^{24}, 2 P 2^{1}, Jude^{4}, Rev 6^{10}. In the last three of these RV prefers 'master.'

(3) lord. This form represents ten Heb. words. The most common of them all is אָדוֹן (Phœn. inscriptions often show אדן. The name Adonis is of Phœn. origin.), which is used to denote eminence or superiority in every domain of life, of kings (Jer 22^{18}), governors (Gn 42^{10}), prophets (1 K 18^{7}), fathers (Gn 31^{35}), masters (Gn 45^{9}). In the vocative it is especially frequent. Joseph is so addressed (Gn 42^{10}), Moses (Nu 11^{28}), Elijah (1 K 18^{7}), the theophanic angel (Jos 5^{14}), a captain (2 S 11^{11}), a priest (1 S 1^{15}). In Jg 5^{25} a bowl fit for lords is סֵפֶל אַדִּירִים. In Nu 21^{28} (cf. Is 16^{8}) 'the lords of the high places of Arnon' tr. the plural of בַּעַל, which generally appears as 'the Baalim.' Baal means 'master' or 'owner.' In Gn 27$^{29.37}$ 'lord' tr. גְּבִיר 'a strong man.'

Lords of the Philistines (Jos 13^{3} etc.) no doubt represents some title peculiar to that people. The Heb. is סְרָנִים (const. סַרְנֵי) 'axles,' always applied to the heads of the five chief cities, except in 1 S 18^{30}, where they are called שָׂרִים. In consequence of this, Ewald would connect סֶרֶן with שַׂר. But an Arab. word meaning 'axle' is also used as a designation of a chief, and, till a better origin of the name is found, this analogy cannot be disregarded (see Gesen. Thes. under סֶרֶן, and Keil on Jos 13^{3}). The LXX employ σατραπεία or ἄρχων, Vulg. satrapes or princeps.

In Jer 2^{31} 'we are lords' (AVm 'have dominion') tr. the verb רוּד. RV has 'we are broken loose.' The proper sense of the word is 'to roam at large' (see vol. ii. p. 527^{b} note *). In Ezr 8^{25} שַׂר is more properly by RV tr. 'prince.' In Dn 2^{10} the adjective רַב 'great' is tr. 'lord' (see RVm), and in the same book רַבְרְבָן, LXX μεγιστᾶνες. The word שָׁלִישׁ tr. 'lord' in 2 K 7$^{2.16.19}$ (τριστάτης), and Ezk 23^{23} (ἡγεμών, RV 'princes'), apparently means a captain of a chariot or of charioteers.

LORD OF HOSTS (יהוה צְבָאוֹת).—This divine title has been explained briefly under GOD (vol. ii. 203^{b}): the object of the present article is to mention a few further particulars respecting it. The usual form of the title is 'J″ of Hosts,'—sometimes with 'the Lord' (אֲדֹנָי Am 9^{5}[*], Is 3^{15} 10^{23} al., or הָאָדוֹן † Is 1^{24} 19^{4}) prefixed; there occur however, besides, the forms 'J″, the God of Hosts' (יהוה אלהי צבאות), Am 3^{13}[] 4^{13} 5$^{14.15.16}$ (followed by אֲדֹנָי) 6$^{8.14}$[], Hos 12$^{5\ (6)}$[], 2 S 5^{10}, 1 K 19$^{10.14}$, Jer 5^{14} 15^{16} 35^{17} 38^{17} 44^{7}, Ps 89$^{8\ (9)}$, and with the strange אלהים for אלהי—originally, no doubt (see Cheyne or Baethgen on Ps 59^{6}) a correction, made mechanically, for יהוה, which, however, afterwards regained its place beside it—Ps 59$^{5\ (6)}$ 80$^{4\ (5).\ 19\ (20)}$ 84$^{8\ (9)}$; 'the Lord J″, the God of Hosts,' Am 3^{13}[]; 'the God of Hosts' (without J″) Am 5^{27}, and, as before, with אלהים for אלהי, Ps 80$^{7\ (8).\ 14\ (15)}$. So far as usage is concerned, it is preeminently the prophetical title of God. It occurs with great frequency in the prophets * (except Ob, Joel, Jonah, Dn, and, somewhat remarkably, Ezk; three other prophets, however, use it once only, viz. Hos $12^{5\ (6)}$, Mic 4^{4}, Hab 2^{13}, and two only twice, Nah 2^{13} 3^{5}, Zeph $2^{9.\ 10}$); in the hist. books it is found only 1 S $1^{3.\ 11}$ 4^{4} 15^{2} 17^{45}, 2 S 5^{10} (=1 Ch 11^{9}) $6^{2.\ 18}$ $7^{8.\ 26}$ (=1 Ch $17^{7.\ 24}$) ^{27}, 1 K 18^{15} $19^{10.\ 14}$, 2 K 3^{14} 19^{31} (=Is 37^{32}), several of these occurrences being in the mouth of prophets: it occurs also in 8 Psalms (24^{10} $46^{7.\ 11}$ 48^{8} 59^{5} 69^{6} $80^{4.\ 7.\ 14.\ 19}$ $84^{1.\ 3.\ 8.\ 12}$ 89^{8}), but not in any other part of the Hagiographa (except 1 Ch 11. 17, from 2 S, just quoted).

[*] Neither AV nor RV of NT print LORD in quotations, preserving in this way the change made by the LXX.

[*] הצבאות (with the art.) in these passages.

The fuller and seemingly more original form, ‘J″, the God of hosts,’ used by Amos † and Hosea, might suggest—though the inference is not a necessary one—that the expression was in their days of comparatively recent origin. The origin of the title is matter of conjecture. צָבָא (‘host’) is used in Heb. in the sense of an army of men, as in the common expression ‘captain of the host’: the angels, and stars, were, however, also pictured by the Hebrews as constituting a ‘host,’ and are spoken of as the ‘HOST OF HEAVEN’ (which see). The title thus signifies ‘J″ of armies’; and the question is, What armies are intended? One opinion is that the armies are those of Israel—the supposition upon this view being that the title originally denoted J″ as a warrior, the triumphant leader of Israel's forces against its heathen foes (cf. Ex 15^{3}, Nu 21^{14} [the ‘Book of J″'s wars’], Jg 5^{23}, 1 S $17^{26.\ 36.\ 45}$ 18^{17} 25^{28}, 2 S 5^{24}, Ps 24^{8} 44^{9} 60^{10}, Dt 23^{14}, Is 13^{4} 31^{4} [where the word for ‘fight’ is cognate with that for ‘hosts’] 42^{13}); but, as it occurs in many passages where a distinctively martial sense would be inappropriate, and as, moreover, it is used often when God is represented as judging Israel, that the sense expressed by it was gradually enlarged under the influence of the other applications of the word ‘host’ just mentioned, so that it came to denote Him as the God who had also other ‘hosts,’ or agencies, at His command, and could employ, for instance, the armies of heaven (cf. Jg 5^{20}, 2 K 6^{17}) on His people's behalf, and even the powers and forces of nature in general. This is substantially the view of Herder (Geist der Ebr. Poesie, ed. 1825, ii. 81 f.); it has been developed most fully by Kautzsch in Herzog's Real-Encyk.^{2} s.v. ‘Zebaoth,’ and ZAW, 1886, p. 17 ff.; it is also that of G. A. Smith, XII Proph. i. 57 f., Riehm, HWB, s.v. ‘Zebaoth,’ and Dillm. AT Theol. 220 f. In support of it Kautzsch points to the association of the title, in the first passages in which it occurs in the hist. books, with the ark (1 S $1^{3.\ 11}$ [the ark was now at Shiloh, 4^{3}] 4^{4}, 2 S 6^{2}), the significance of which in time of war is very evident (Nu $10^{35\text{f.}}$, Jos $6^{4\text{ff.}}$, 1 S $4^{3\text{ff.}}$, 2 S 11^{11}). The larger ideas associated with the title afterwards are apparent from the solemnity and emphasis with which the prophets habitually use it (observe, e.g., the climax in Am 4^{13} 5^{27}, Jer 31^{35}, Is 48^{2} 54^{5}), and from such passages as Am 4^{13}, Is 51^{15} 54^{5}, Jer 10^{16} 31^{35}, where it is applied to J″ as Creator and Ruler of the world; these ideas, it may be noted, appear already in Hos and Am. Another opinion is that the armies intended were originally the hosts of angels. Thus Ewald (Hist. iii. 62, Lehre der Bibel von Gott, II. i. 339 f.), adopting this view, made the clever and original conjecture that the title may have arisen first on occasion of some victory under the Judges, when it seemed as if J″ descended (cf. Jg 5^{13}) with His celestial hosts to the help of the armies of Israel: ‘born’ thus ‘in the shout of victory,’ it fixed itself on the memory of the people, and implying, as it did, that J″ was the commander and organizer of the hosts of heaven (including stars as well as angels), it was suggestive of His omnipotence, and became in the prophets ‘the loftiest and most majestic title’ of Israel's God. Oehler, OT Theol. § 196 end, and Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 141, also think that the expression was used originally with reference to the hosts of angels. A third view is that of Smend (AT Rel.-gesch. 185 ff.), according to whom the title was used probably first by Amos, the ‘hosts’ intended by him being the forces and elements of nature (cf. $9^{2\text{ff.}}$). Such a sense is, however, too abstract to stand at the origin of the expression; nor is it borne out by the usage of צבא in independent passages (not even by Gn 2^{1}, Ps 103^{21}, cited by Smend).

Borchert, in SK, 1896, p. 619 ff., argues forcibly in support of the view that angels were originally denoted by the expression. He points out, as against the first view mentioned above, (1) that צבאות ‘hosts’ is hardly used of the armies of Israel except in three Psalms (44^{9} 60^{10}=108^{11}) of uncertain date, and in the late source P (Ex 6^{26} 7^{4} $12^{17.\ 41.\ 51}$, Nu $1^{3.\ 52}$ $2^{3.\ 9\text{ff.}}$ $10^{14\text{ff.}}$ 33^{1}),* where it forms part of the unhistorical conception of the nation at the Exodus as consisting of a vast organized army; (2) that the passages in which the title is brought into connexion with the ark are, relatively, few, and that the connexion itself is no specific or distinctive one; and (3) that the books which principally use the title ‘J″ of hosts’ do not speak of the ‘hosts’ of Israel (and conversely), and that, in general, it is very rarely used in a connexion which suggests them. On the other hand, passages such as Gn 28^{12}, 1 K 22^{19}, Is $6^{2\text{f.}}$, Ps 29^{1}, show that J″ was habitually pictured as attended by angels,—the objection that, where angels are intended, ‘host’ (not ‘hosts’) ‘of heaven’ is used, being met by the consideration that such beings are not necessarily conceived as a single definite host, but might, from their numbers, be with equal justice conceived as forming ‘hosts’: they attend Him naturally as King; the title thus gives expression to J″'s royal state (cf. Is 6^{5}, Jer 46^{18} 48^{15}, Ps 24^{10}), and consequently, without any change in the meaning of ‘hosts,’ such as is postulated in the other explanation, it is at once adapted to express those ideas of sovereign majesty and power which are undoubtedly associated with it by the prophets.

Upon the whole, this seems to be the most probable explanation of the title. Though other ‘armies’ might not be entirely excluded, the idea which would most naturally suggest itself, when the term was used absolutely in connexion with J″, would, it seems, be the armies of heaven. But, whatever uncertainty may rest on the origin of the expression, all agree that as used by the prophets it is J″'s most significant and sublimest title: it designates Him, namely, as One who is supreme over untold ‘hosts’ of spiritual or other agencies, whom He can employ to give effect to His purposes (Ps $103^{20.\ 21}$),—in a word, as the Omnipotent. It is accordingly in the LXX often † very appropriately represented by κύριος παντοκράτωρ, ‘Lord Omnipotent’—or, more exactly (in contrast to the more abstract παντοδύναμος), ‘Lord all-sovereign’ (see Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 21 ff.).‡ S. LORD'S DAY (ἡ Κυριακὴ ἡμέρα).—This term has from the very earliest times been applied in Greek and Latin Christian literature to the first day of the week in its religious aspect. The scope of this article is necessarily limited; we can here discuss only (i.) the term ‘Lord's Day’ itself, (ii.) The connexion of the Lord's Day with the Sabbath, (iii.) the origin of the institution, (iv.) the nature of Lord's Day worship in NT times.

* The isolated passages Dt 20^{9}, 1 K 2^{5}, 1 Ch 27^{3} (even if they are not to be explained, with Borchert, by Ges.-Kautzsch, § 124. 2*b*) do not detract from the force of the remark.

† 2 S and Minor Prophets (usually), Jer (12 times). Elsewhere κύριος Σαβαώθ is generally used (so Ro 9^{29}, Ja 5^{4}: see SABAOTH): in Ps, however, and occasionally also in other books, κύριος τῶν δυνάμεων (i.e. of forces, armies: see the use of δύναμις for צבא in Nu 1. 2. $10^{14\text{ff.}}$ passim, and in other similar passages).

A title borne by Nebo, ‘Overseer or ruler (paḳid) of the multitudes of heaven and earth’ (KAT^{2} 413, cited by Cheyne, Orig. of Psalter, 323, cf. Isaiah^{3}, i. p. 13; KIB iii. 2, 53 Delitzsch, Assyr. HWB 360 f.), is perhaps worth comparing.

i. The scriptural authority for the term 'Lord's Day' is Rev 1^{10} 'I was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day,' ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ. Few will agree with Eichhorn in referring this to Easter Day. The opinion of Wetstein and others, who interpret it of the day of Judgment, seems plausible, but is open to two formidable objections. (1) A writer so impregnated with OT phraseology as is the author of the Apocalypse would surely have used, in this sense, the familiar ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου (κυριακός is not in LXX). (2) Such a use of the term is quite unknown to the Greek Fathers. From the Didaché and Ignatius onwards they use ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα, or simply ἡ κυριακή, only in the sense of Sunday. Such an unbroken and unquestioned Church usage must be regarded as decisive on this point. To this may be added that as in v.^{9} Patmos gives the place of the vision, so here 'the Lord's Day' naturally seems to fix the time. It would, however, be a mistake to conclude that Rev 1^{10} is the origin of the term. It is merely the first extant example of its use (Didaché 14, Ignat. Ep. Magn. 9 are certainly later). The phrase might have arisen as early as A.D. 57, for in 1 Co 11^{20} we find κυριακὸν δεῖπνον. This is the first occurrence of κυριακός in extant Greek literature. The absolute use of Κύριος, which indicates an identification of Christ with the J″ of the OT, naturally led to the formation of a corresponding adjective. However, ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα was not yet in current use, for in this same Epistle (1 Co 16^2) St. Paul uses 'the first day of the week,' μία σαββάτου; and a little later, Ac 20^7, we find the similar ἡ μία τῶν σαββάτων, St. Luke with his usual historical accuracy using, doubtless, the phrase current at the time of which he was writing. Contrast the inexactness of the Gospel of Peter, where ἡ κυριακή is twice used of the actual day of Christ's resurrection, and betrays at once by the anachronism a 2nd cent. writer. At some time, then, between A.D. 57 and A.D. 96 the term 'Lord's Day' arose, and it was probably first used in Churches which had to contend with Judaism.

ii. It has been reckoned a pious opinion (Bramhall, Works, vol. v. pp. 41, 58) that the observance of the Lord's Day was one of 'the things concerning the kingdom of God' of which the risen Lord spoke during the forty days preceding the Ascension. This idea is probably due to the instinctive desire to base on a direct divine sanction an institution so universal and so binding on all Christians. But the assumption is quite unnecessary. Whether the first day of the week was 'blessed and hallowed' by Christ Himself with His own lips, or by the Church, His body, His visible representative, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in any case the Lord's Day was certainly sanctioned by inspired apostles, and thus confessedly stands on a level with ordination, and perhaps one or two other ordinances, as an institution as much beyond the power of the Church to alter or to abrogate as it would be for her to change the number of the Gospels.

The claim of the Lord's Day to this pre-eminence has been unfortunately prejudiced by controversies on its relation to the Sabbath. This question has been thought to be of much practical interest, especially by that large class of persons who think that they require guidance in details, and who feel that a general direction to keep a day holy is too vague, and leaves too much to their individual responsibility. On the one hand, those who incline to a severe observance of the day identify the Lord's Day with the Sabbath, regarding it as the same institution with a Christian reference added, the change of day being regarded as immaterial. They combine with this assumption a theory of scriptural Sabbath observance, for which there is but slender evidence from ancient or modern Jewish life. On the other hand, some of those who revolt from this rigidity feel constrained to justify themselves by a denial of any relation whatever between the two days; and then, in the default of any divinely ordained rules for its observance, they are in danger of not observing it at all. The truth will be found to lie midway between these two extremes. The Lord's Day is, and is not, the Sabbath, much as John the Baptist was, and was not, Elijah.

When Jesus uttered the cry, 'It is finished,' the Mosaic dispensation virtually passed away. His Resurrection, Ascension, and Outpouring of the Holy Spirit were successive affirmations of the great fact, and the destruction of the temple made it plain to all but the blindest. But in the meantime nothing is more striking than the tender way in which the apostles and Christians of Jewish birth were weaned from the old religion. The dead leaves of Judaism fell off gradually, they were not rudely torn off by man. The new facts, the new dogmas, the new ordinances first established themselves, and then little by little the incompatibility of the old and the new was realized, which necessarily issued in the casting out of the old. The old things of Judaism were made new in Christianity. This, however, was not accomplished by a deliberate substitution of one ordinance for another; but first the old ordinances were simply antiquated, and then experience matured under the influence of the Holy Spirit proved that the positive institutions of the new religion more than fulfilled those of the old. This was realized, first of all, in the case of the sacramental ordinances. Baptism was soon seen to be analogous to circumcision (Col 2^{11}), and also to the legal ablutions (He 10^{22}); while the Eucharist corresponded to the peace-offerings (1 Co $10^{16\text{-}21}$, He 13^{10}). But the realization of the fulfilment of the Sabbath in the Lord's Day does not find expression in the NT. This silence is especially marked in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In that Epistle the writer is addressing some who were in danger of relapsing into Judaism, who could scarcely bear to forego all the associations of the old religion, its antiquity, authority, splendour, variety. His design therefore is to adduce all that Christianity had analogous to the cherished rites of Judaism. The priesthood, sacrifice, the temple, the solemn services, are all shown to have their more than parallels in the gospel. But when he touches on the Sabbath, it is as a type of the state of salvation on which believers have entered, a Sabbath rest to be consummated in the world to come ($4^{3.\ 11}$). Hessey (Bampton Lectures, 1860) proves by copious quotations that up to the end of the 5th century, and even later, the two days were not considered to have any relation to each other. But a believer in the perpetual guidance of the Church by the Holy Spirit will scarcely accept this as conclusive that the Church of later ages was not right in seeing a close analogy between the Lord's Day and the Sabbath; an analogy expressed by the retention of the Fourth Commandment by all Christian Churches, as part of the Decalogue considered as a convenient summary of the Moral Law. Assuming that public worship is a moral duty, it is absolutely necessary that a day of rest from ordinary labours be set apart for that purpose, and for the cognate duties of religious instruction and special private devotion. As regards the proportion of our time which should be given to such duties, we may well follow the apostles in accepting unquestioningly that laid down in the Mosaic Law. This is the moral element in the Fourth Commandment. Experience has shown that the excessive multiplication of holy days regarded as in any degree co-ordinate with the Lord's Day is fatal to the maintenance of those objects for which the Lord's Day was designed. The antiquation of the Sabbath equally with circumcision, etc., was gradually realized as the sequence of events led up to it. The key to a right understanding of the revolution is found in the first description of the public worship of the apostolic Church: 'continuing steadfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread at home' (Ac 2[46]). To the customary Jewish devotions was added the one distinctive Christian service. The Church professed to be a divine development of Judaism (Ac 24[14] etc.). All that was eternally true in the Law is with us still, and that which was essentially transitory was tolerated until it became positively hurtful. At Jerusalem an inconsistent allegiance both to the old and the new was maintained probably until the destruction of the temple, but even there we early find traces of the antiquation of the Sabbath. Considering the prominence assigned to it in Pharisaic Judaism, there can be little doubt that it is one of 'the customs which Moses delivered,' the changing of which by Jesus of Nazareth was announced by St. Stephen (Ac 6[14], cf. 21[21]). The falsity of the witnesses lay in the malicious spirit which prompted the accusation rather than in the charge itself. Thirteen years later, Sabbath keeping is not one of the 'necessary things' enjoined on Gentiles by the apostolic council (Ac 15[29]). This decision amounted to an acknowledgment that the Sabbath as well as circumcision, etc., was no longer binding on Gentiles, though James, as we should expect, seems to contemplate the continuance of the ordinance for Jews (v.[21]). No valid objection can be drawn from the frequent references in Ac to the apostles preaching in synagogues, or in Jewish places of prayer, on the Sabbath day (13[14. 42. 44] 16[13] 17[2] 18[4]). Their mission was to the Jews first, and, apart from the natural desire on their own part to join in the only public worship available, common-sense would lead them to go where they could address large bodies of Jews assembled with minds disposed to receive religious truth. About A.D. 58 St. Paul in Gal 4[9. 10] reckons 'the observation of days' as one of the 'weak and beggarly rudiments.' Now, as we may gather from 1 Co 16[1. 2] that St. Paul had himself bidden the Galatians observe in a certain way the first day of the week, it is plain that he is not here condemning the principle of religious distinction of days; and the fact that in this Epistle he is combating Judaistic teachers forces us to the conclusion that the compulsory observance of a specially Jewish day, i.e. the Sabbath, is what is meant. On the other hand, in Ro 14[5. 6], written a little later, to a Church where the controversy may not have reached such a height, the regarding or not regarding of such days is a matter of indifference. Finally, in Col 2[16] the Sabbath is distinctly mentioned as one of the ordinances 'which are a shadow of things to come.'

iii. The necessary separation of Christians from Jews, in Jerusalem, for a part of public worship (Ac 2[46]), naturally led to a total separation elsewhere, as in successive cities the Jews rejected the gospel altogether (Ac 13[46] 14[2. 3. 23] 18[7] 19[9]). Besides these passages, assemblies consisting exclusively of Christians are implied wherever we find directions for the reading of apostolic epistles (Ac 15[30], 1 Th 5[27], 2 Th 3[14], Col 4[16], cf. He 10[25]). Assemblies of a whole Church, of course, imply fixed days for meeting. The antagonism already marked by different places for worship, coupled with the confessed antiquation of the Sabbath, would naturally find further expression in the observance of a holy day different from that of the Jews. The origin of the Lord's Day must not indeed be traced to mere opposition to Judaism, such as that naïvely confessed in the Didaché (8), 'Let not your fastings be with the hypocrites, for they fast on Monday and Thursday; but do ye keep your fast on Wednesday and Friday'; but this motive must have commended the observance of the first day of the week to a considerable number of Christians; and if the argument from silence could be pressed, —an argument especially precarious in the case of an ordinance presumably so much a matter of course,—it would be significant that the distinct notices of the Lord's Day in the NT are in connexion with Churches outside Palestine, i.e. Corinth, and by implication, Galatia (1 Co 16[1. 2]), Troas (Ac 20[6]), and Asia (Rev 1[4]), while Κυριακός seems to have been applied to a specially Christian service before it was applied to a specially Christian day. Be that as it may, the first day of the week was certainly selected because the Lord Himself had sanctified it by His resurrection (Mt 28[1], Mk 16[2. 19], Lk 24[1], Jn 20[1. 19]), and had further emphasized it by a second appearance to the disciples (Jn 20[26]), and again by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, which that year was also the first day of the week. We cannot cite as instances of the observance of this day the fact that on these three occasions the disciples were assembled together as if for a religious purpose. In those days of fear and excitement they would naturally come together every day. The Lord's Day is therefore, in an especial sense, the feast of life. The resurrection of Jesus Christ was not merely the raising to life of an individual man, but of human nature. On that first Lord's Day our nature entered on a new life: actually, as regards the first-fruits of it; potentially, as regards every Christian in succeeding ages. But besides the life of the individual members, there is also the life of the body, and this sprang into birth on the day of Pentecost. Thus, without having recourse to the more or less fanciful analogies of some of the Fathers, we may, on sure grounds, contrast the remembrance on the Sabbath of the repose of the Creator of the physical world with the commemoration on the Lord's Day of the beginning of the activity of the new spiritual creation.

iv. Much reflex light is thrown on the apostolic Lord's Day worship by the well-known passage (1 Apol. c. 67) where Justin Martyr, A.D. 150, describes the Sunday service. It consisted of the reading of the memoirs of the apostles and the writings of the prophets, followed by an exhortation on the lessons read, common prayer, the Eucharist, and a collection for the orphans, etc. This service was probably modelled on that of the synagogue, with the necessary additions, the chief being the Eucharist, as in Ac 2[46]. If the passage in Ac be rightly understood to mean a daily service, it must be noted that the daily Eucharist of the early Jerusalem Church belongs to the same order of things as its community of goods; an ideal which is practicable only under very special circumstances. It may reasonably be conjectured that experience which speedily led to the abandonment of the experiment in socialism, showed the wisdom of restricting the Eucharist to the Lord's Day. This use, which is distinctly expressed in Justin and Pliny ('stato die,' lib. x. epist. 97), is implied in Ac 20[7]. The Eucharist is especially connected with the Lord's Day, not only as the perpetual memorial of the great sin-offering (1 Co 11[26]), but also as a means of renewing in us the divine life communicated in the first instance by the power of Christ's resurrection, and as an anticipation of the consummation of this divine life at His coming (He 10[25], Mt 26[29], Mk 14[25], Lk 22^{18}). Justin does not mention the agape. It had probably been temporarily dropped in obedience to the law of Trajan against clubs (Ramsay, Ch. in the Roman Empire, p. 219). In 1 Co 11 the agape seems to precede the Eucharist, in Ac 20^{11} it follows (γευσάμενος, 'having made a meal'). This change in the order of service was possibly made by St. Paul himself (1 Co 11^{34}). In Ac, as in Justin, the sermon precedes the Eucharist. The preaching of Jesus necessitated the telling of His deeds and words either from personal knowledge or from the written accounts of eye-witnesses, and this must have been from the beginning; on the other hand, the reading of apostolic Epistles, at first occasional, could become constant only after the Canon was closed. The collection mentioned by Justin is founded on 1 Co 16^{2}, where EV 'lay by him in store' conceals the fact that it must have been made at the weekly meeting; otherwise, collections would have been necessary on St. Paul's arrival, the very thing he was anxious to avoid. παρ' ἑαυτῷ τιθέτω θησαυρίζων means 'let him assign a certain sum as he is disposed, and put it into the Church treasury.' In Corinth and elsewhere the exercise of extraordinary gifts formed part of the Sunday service (1 Co 14^{16}), but this soon died out. Contrast the brief list of charismata in Eph 4^{11} with that in 1 Co 12^{28}.

LORD'S PRAYER.—This prayer is so called, not because the Lord used it, which He could not do, for some of the petitions would be meaningless for Him (and cf. Jn 20^{17}), but because He taught it to His disciples and us. It is given us by two evangelists (Mt 6$^{9\text{-}13}$, Lk 11$^{2\text{-}5}$), in different forms, and in totally different connexions. The form given by St. Luke is not only much shorter, but differs somewhat in wording; and whereas St. Matthew represents Christ as giving this form of prayer spontaneously in the Sermon on the Mount, St. Luke places the delivery of the prayer after the close of the Galilæan ministry, and in answer to a request from one of His disciples, 'Lord, teach us to pray, even as John also taught his disciples.' But St. Luke gives no note either of time or place, probably because his source gave none. And it is quite possible that the incident which he here records took place very much earlier than the point in Christ's ministry at which he places it.

There can be no doubt that if the prayer was delivered only once, then it is St. Luke who has preserved the true historical occasion. His narrative has every appearance of originality, and one sees no motive for invention, whereas it is quite credible that St. Matthew, in recording Christ's injunctions about prayer, might emphasize and illustrate these by adding to them the form of prayer which He had enjoined. Accordingly, a large number of the best critics (Baumgarten-Crusius, Neander, de Wette, Ewald, Bleek, Holtzmann, Weiss, Godet, Oosterzee, etc.) regard the position of the prayer in Mt as unhistorical. But it must be remembered that there is no proof that the prayer was taught on one occasion only. The argument that, if the prayer was delivered in the Sermon on the Mount, then a disciple cannot afterwards have asked for a form of prayer; and that if he asked for one, then it cannot have been previously delivered, holds good only if we suppose that Christ's followers remained always the same. There is nothing to show that 'one of his disciples' (Lk 11^{1}) means one of the Twelve. Different groups of disciples might at different times require teaching as to a form of prayer; and at one time Christ might give such instruction unasked, at another because He was requested to do so. In either case it is remarkable that the prayer is not directly alluded to elsewhere in the Gospels (cf. Mk 14^{38}), nor in the Acts (cf. 2^{42}), nor in the Epistles (cf. Ro 12^{12}, Col 4^{2}). There may be indirect allusions to the last petition, Jn 17^{15}, 2 Th 3^{3}, and possibly 2 Ti 4^{18}. See Lightfoot on 2 Th 3^{3}.

But if we admit that the prayer was delivered only once, and that St. Luke gives the actual occasion, it by no means follows that he gives the original form of the prayer, as Meyer, Kamphausen, and others suppose. In one sense neither form is original, for the original would be in Aramaic; and it is quite evident that both Mt and Lk used a Gr. source, as the large amount of agreement in wording, and, above all, their common use of the unique word ἐπιούσιος, shows. Their versions cannot be independent tr$^{\text{ns}}$ of the same Aram. original. Much more probably they had the same Gr. original; and Mt, although he puts it in the wrong place, yet reproduces it more exactly. Of course, if the prayer was delivered more than once, then both forms may be original, in the sense that both represent in Greek a form which Christ used in His instructions. It is conceivable that one form was suitable for one group of disciples, another for the whole body of them.*

Accepting, however, the hypothesis that Mt more accurately gives us the original form, it may be asked whether the variations in Lk are due to himself or to the source which he used. There are good reasons for believing that some of them are due to himself. This is most apparent in the fourth petition. For δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον (Mt) Lk has δίδου ἡμῖν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν. Seeing that τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν occurs in NT in St. Luke's writings only (19^{47}, Ac 17^{11}), we may feel confident that it is he who has changed σήμερον into τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν rather than St. Matthew who has done the reverse. This change of σήμερον into τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν involved the change from the aorist to the present imperative; and thus 'Give us this day' became 'Continually give us day by day.' In Lk the petition is made more comprehensive. That the aorist rather than the present was the original form, is shown by the fact that in all the other petitions the aorist is used. Again, when we find ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλήματα in Mt, and ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰς ἁμαρτίας in Lk, we conjecture that it is Lk who has changed the expression in order to make the meaning clearer to Gentile readers. The insertion of παντί with ὀφείλοντι is also very characteristic of St. Luke, and certainly ὡς καὶ αὐτοὶ ἀφίομεν is more likely to be a modification of ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφήκαμεν than vice versâ; all the more so, as Lk is specially fond of the combination καὶ αὐτός, καὶ αὐτοί, κ.τ.λ.

The differences which are the result of the presence in Mt of clauses that are wanting in the best texts of Lk require more detailed discussion. These clauses are: (1) ἡμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, (2) γενηθήτω τὸ θέλημά σου ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, (3) ἀλλὰ ῥῦσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. Tisch., Treg., WH, RV, Alford, Weiss, Godet, Scrivener, Hammond, and many others, reject these passages as insertions in Lk from the text of Mt. 'If one of the Gospels contained the Lord's Prayer in a shorter form than the other, nothing was so likely as that a scribe in perfect innocence would supply what he considered an undoubted defect' (Scriv.

* F. H. Chase supposes that the disciples themselves adapted the prayer to special occasions, both altering and adding, and that ἐπιούσιος is one of the subsequent changes made for liturgical purposes (Texts and Studies, i. 3, Camb. 1891).

Introd. ii. p. 280). The evidence is not quite the same in all three cases, but in all it is conclusive against the clauses.

(1) For this clause entire we have ACDPXΓΔΛΠ and nine inferior uncials, nearly all cursives, b e f l g of Vet. Lat. (a c ff_2 i have sancte for noster), three Syriac Versions (Cur. Pesh. Harcl.), Boheiric, and Ethiopic. Against the whole clause, ℵB, 1, 22, 57, 130, 346, nearly all the chief MSS of the Vulg., and the recently discovered Sinaitic Syriac. Against all but ἡμῶν, L and one cursive, one early MS of the Vulg. and the Armenian. Origen expressly states that the words are wanting in Lk. Tertullian and Cyril of Alexandria support the omission.

(2) For the clause, ℵACD and many inferior uncials, nearly all cursives, most MSS of Vet. Lat. Syrr. (Pesh. Harcl.), Boh. Eth. Against it, BL, 1, 22, 130, 346; ff_2 of Vet. Lat., best MSS of Vulg. Syrr. (Cur. Sin.) and Arm. Orig. Tert. and Aug. give express testimony against, and are supported by Cyr. Alex.

(3) For the clause, ACD and many inferior uncials, nearly all cursives; Vet. Lat. Syrr. (Cur. Pesh. Harcl.) Boh. Eth. Against it, ℵ*BL, 1, 22, 57, and six other cursives, most MSS of Vulg. Syr-Sin. and Arm. Orig. Aug. and Cyr. Alex. give express testimony against, and are supported by Tert.

The evidence for the clauses may look imposing, but the explanation of it given by Scrivener is simple and adequate; whereas neither accident nor intention can explain the early and widespread omission of all three, if they were found in the original text of Lk. In such a case the temptation to insert would be at a maximum, the temptation to omit at a minimum. A scribe might insert the missing words almost mechanically, being so familiar with them.

Convinced, therefore, that the clauses are not genuine in Lk, we return to the question, What can have induced Lk to omit them, if he and Mt had the same Gr. version of the prayer? His verbal alterations in the fourth and fifth petitions are intelligible; but why should he, with his love of completeness, omit? He does sometimes abbreviate; but would he have abbreviated here? The difficulty of finding an adequate motive for his curtailing such words is in favour of the view that Christ Himself on one occasion gave this shorter form to some disciples. To suppose that Lk 'contented himself with words just sufficient to remind his hearers of the fuller form,' is quite inadequate. In that case he would have left out nearly the whole of the prayer. And to point out that the five petitions in Lk correspond to the five fingers, is grotesque.

The sources of the prayer have been often discussed, and rabbinical parallels to the different petitions have been pointed out by John Lightfoot, Schoettgen, Vitringa, Wetstein, and others. Tota haec oratio ex formulis Hebraeorum concinnata est tam apte, ut omnia contineat quæ a Deo peti possunt (Wetst. on Mt 6^9). But the parallels do not carry us very far. The use of 'Father' [אבינו שבשמים is a very common later Jewish title, Dalm. 151 ff.] to designate God, and the petition, 'Hallowed be thy name through our works,' are perhaps the strongest instances [cf. also ויתקדש שמיה and ימלוך מלכותיה of the Kaddish, Dalm. 305]. Others are similarities of wording rather than of meaning, and some of these are not at all close. And in most cases the date of the Jewish prayers in which these expressions occur is either late or uncertain; so that the borrowing, if there is any, is on the side of the Jews, or may be so. But no borrowing is needed to explain such a petition as 'Forgive us our sins' (Ex 32^{32}, 1 K $8^{34.36.39.50}$, Dn 9^{19}), which is perhaps as common in Jewish as in Christian prayers. Not that there is anything derogatory to Christ in supposing that He took the best Jewish aspirations and combined them in one prayer. He probably took the Messianic title 'Son of man' from the Bk. of Enoch, and applied it to Himself with a fulness of meaning unknown before. He might have done the same in the Lord's Prayer; but He does not appear to have done so. Indeed, the prayer is free from anything that can be called purely Jewish. (1) Its symmetry and progressive development of thought, and (2) its inexhaustible adaptability, are characteristics which do not harmonize well with the hypothesis that it is a compilation (Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, i. p. 536. Cf. Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, p. 138 ff.). Let us examine these characteristics.

(1) The Lord's Prayer is commonly regarded as consisting of seven petitions.* The frequent occurrence of the number seven in the Apoc. and elsewhere renders this arrangement attractive. But there are really only six; for 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one,' should be regarded as the negative and positive expression of one and the same petition.† These six are found to correspond to the Decalogue and the Two Great Commandments (Mt 22^{40}, Mk 12^{31}), in that the first half has reference to God, the second half to man. In the first three petitions we seek the glory of our heavenly Father; in the last three the advantage of ourselves and our fellow-men. But these two are closely connected. What is to God's glory benefits His children; and what is to the advantage of men glorifies their heavenly Father. Thus the first half shows the end which man must have in view—the accomplishment of God's glory, kingdom, and will; the second half shows the means—daily provision, forgiveness, and protection. And the parts correspond with one another in each triplet. The first petition is addressed to God as our Father, the second as our King, the third as our Master. It is to our Father that we look for sustenance; to our King for pardon; to our Master for guidance and guardianship. Moreover, the transition from heaven to earth is beautifully made in the third petition, which raises earth to heaven. And in each of the triplets we can observe progression. The hallowing of God's name leads to the coming of the kingdom; and when the kingdom is come God's will shall be fulfilled on earth as in heaven. In the second half we have first the obtaining of good, and then the removal of evil, past, present, and future. Or, if we take the six petitions consecutively, we shall find that they begin with the glories of heaven, pass on to life on earth, and end with the powers of hell.‡ Such exquisite proportion and development (of which only specimens have been given) are strong evidence that, if this marvellous prayer was constructed out of fragments of other prayers, it was composed in the spirit and power of Him who said, 'Behold, I make all things new' (Rev 21^5).

(2) We are not to suppose that the disciple who asked Christ to teach him and his fellows to pray had never prayed, and did not know how to do so. He had no doubt often performed this duty. But he had just witnessed Christ's devotions; and His manner showed him the difference between Christ's prayers and his own. There was a more excellent way than he knew, and he desired to learn it. Moreover, the Baptist had taught his disciples a distinctive form of prayer; and this suppliant thought that Jesus also should give a similar distinctive mark to His followers. As so often, Christ grants the substance rather than the letter of the request. Just as a Christian mystery is a divine secret revealed to all the world, so the distinctive

* So Augustine, Luther, Tholuck, Bleek, Hilgenfeld, Keil, Köstlin, Nösgen, Wordsworth, etc.

† This is Tertullian's view (de Orat. viii.). In his form of the prayer fiat voluntas tua in cælis et in terra preceded veniat regnum tuum. Origen, Chrysostom, Calvin, Keim, Weiss, and others, make six petitions. But an allusion to the Trinity is very doubtful. To make the second petition refer to the Son, and the third to the Spirit, is very forced and fanciful.

‡ All this is lost in Lk; and this is strong evidence that, if only one form is original, his form is not the original one.

prayer of a Christian is one which every human being who believes in God can use. There are no other limits to its unique adaptability. Any one, of any race or age or condition, who believes in God, can use the Lord's Prayer, and use it just in proportion to his belief. A peasant child can understand enough of it to make it the expression of his daily needs. The ripest scholar, philosopher, and saint cannot exhaust all its possibilities of meaning. In a few minutes it may be committed to memory; but it is the work of a lifetime to learn it by heart. A Christian's knowledge of the import of it grows with his spiritual experience.

The prayer is at once a form, a summary, and a pattern.

It is a form which every one can use, and be certain that in using it he is expressing his needs in a becoming manner. This advantage is possessed by forms of prayer which have been composed by saintly men, and which have been tested in use by generations of Christians. How much more, then, does it belong to a form prescribed by Christ Himself. Quæ enim potest esse spiritalis oratio quam quæ a Christo nobis data est . . . agnoscat pater filii sui verba, cum precem facimus (Cypr. de Domin. Orat. ii. iii.). Not that one form of words affects God more than another, so long as the language of the heart is according to His will; but that the form of words that we use reacts on our hearts, and if the words are unseemly our hearts may become less subdued. And in prayers that are to be used in common, the effect of the words upon others must be considered. In giving this prayer, Christ has both sanctioned the principle of forms of prayer and has also provided us with a form which is always safe.

The Lord's Prayer is also a summary of all other prayers. As Latimer says, 'Like as the law of love is the sum and abridgment of the other laws, so this prayer is the sum and abridgment of all other prayers.' It covers all earthly and spiritual needs and all heavenly aspirations. It is not meant to supersede all other forms of supplication. When Christ gave us this, He did not forbid others. But this one rightly accompanies all other prayers, either following them to sum them up and prevent grave omissions, or preceding them as a guide or model: præmissa legitima et ordinaria oratione quasi fundamento, accedentium desideriorum jus est superstruendi extrinsecus petitiones (Tert. de Orat.). It is breviarium totius evangelii (ib. i.).

For the prayer is also a pattern. It shows in what manner and spirit our other supplications are to be made. We may pray only for those things which tend to the glory of God and the good of man; and the glory of God comes first. The final end of prayer is not that our will should be done by Him, but that His will may be done in us. In the beautiful image used by Clement of Alexandria, 'Just as men at sea attached to an anchor by a taut rope, when they pull at the anchor, draw not it to themselves, but themselves to the anchor; so in the gnostic life those who (as they mean it) draw God to themselves are unawares bringing themselves towards God' (Strom. IV. xxiii. p. 633, ed. Potter).

A consideration of the petitions one by one belongs to commentaries and homiletics rather than to a dictionary; but some notice must here be taken of three details in the prayer, (a) the opening address, (b) the central word ἐπιούσιος, and (c) the last clause.

(a) The address Πάτερ ἡμῶν has no parallel in OT. There God is spoken of as the Father of the Jewish nation (Dt 32^6, Is 63^{16}, Jer $3^{4.19}$ 31^9, Mal 1^6 2^{10}); but He is nowhere called the Father of individuals. This step is taken in the Apocr. (Wis 2^{16} 14^3, Sir $23^{1.4}$ 51^{10}, To 13^4, 3 Mac 6^3). But it is only in NT that we are told that men have received the 'right to become children of God' (Jn 1^{12}, cf. Ro 8^{23}, Gal 4^5). Every Christian, and indeed every human being, is justified in regarding himself as the offspring of God (Ac $17^{28.29}$), and in addressing Him with reference to his fellow-men as 'Our Father.' The address is at once a claim to be heard, and to be heard for others as well as for oneself. Quid enim jam non det filiis petentibus, cum hoc ipsum ante dederit, ut filii essent (Aug.). See vol. ii. p. 618.

(b) It is not likely that we shall ever know with certainty either the origin or the exact meaning of the adjective ἐπιούσιος, the only adjective in the prayer. Nowhere in Gr. literature is the word found until the Gospels gave it currency. To derive it from ἐπεῖναι, ἐπών, or ἐπί and οὐσία, is precarious; for in that case we should expect ἐπούσιος, and not ἐπιούσιος.* Most ancient versions support the derivation from ἐπιέναι, by giving the epithet a temporal rather than a qualitative rendering; e.g. 'of to-morrow,' or 'for the coming day,' or 'that cometh,' or 'continual,' or 'daily.' Jerome changed quotidianum in Mt to supersubstantialem, but made no change in Lk; so that in the West there was a general belief that the two evangelists had used different words. It is possible, as Chase suggests, that there was no epithet in the Aram. original, and that its insertion comes from liturgical use. But that hypothesis, if true, is not decisive as to meaning, although it supports the temporal rather than the qualitative interpretation. For the temporal meaning see Grotius, Wetstein, Fritzsche, Meyer, and, above all, Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision of the NT, App. I. For other views see Suicer, Tholuck, Alford, Wordsworth, and, above all, M'Clellan, The NT, i. pp. 632–647. RV retains 'daily' in the text, and puts 'for the coming day' in the margin. The American Committee would add 'needful' in the margin. It is a strange phenomenon that the meaning of this unique word in the model prayer should, almost from the earliest times, have been doubtful. The Didaché, which has the earliest quotation of the prayer (viii.), throws no light on this point.

(c) Does ῥῦσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ mean 'Deliver us from (the) evil,' or 'Deliver us from the evil one'? Have we here τὸ πονηρόν, as in Lk 6^{45}, Ro 12^9; or ὁ πονηρός, as in Mt $13^{19.38}$, Eph 6^{16}, 1 Jn $2^{13.14}$ 3^{12} 5^{18}, and also probably Mt $5^{37.39}$, Jn 17^{15}, 2 Th 3^3, 1 Jn 5^{19}? The latter is almost certainly correct. (α) The references just given show that in NT itself there is abundant justification for this meaning. (β) The context suggests the masculine, 'Bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the tempter.' If evil in general, including pain and sorrow, were meant, we should have 'and deliver us from evil.' Some Fathers explain Luke's omission of the clause by saying that it is really contained in 'Bring us not into temptation.' (γ) Of the earliest versions, 'the Syr. and Sahidic point to the masculine,' the Lat. is as ambiguous as the Greek. (δ) The liturgies of St. James, of St. Mark, and of Addæus, which are each of them representatives of a group, all explicitly support the masculine. See Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western, pp. 47, 48, 188, 189, 279, 280. (ϵ) The Greek Fathers, who in such a matter have great weight, are unanimous for the masculine. (ζ) So also the earliest Latin Fathers, Tertullian and Cyprian. See Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision, App. II., from which these six heads are taken; also Lightfoot on 2 Th 3^3. Erasmus, Beza, Maldonatus, Fritzsche, Meyer, Ebrard, Wordsworth, support the masculine; Luther, Tholuck, Keil, Nösgen, Alford, M'Clellan, follow Augustine in accepting the neuter. Canon Cook's defence of this view in the Guardian, Sept. 1881, should be consulted.

* But this is not conclusive; for the word may have been coined in contrast to περιούσιος (Ex 19^5, Dt 7^6 14^2 26^{18}); and in that way the ι of the ἐπί might be retained contrary to usage (Jannaris, Tholuck).

That the doxology in St. Matthew is an interpolation due to liturgical use is admitted by all competent critics on the authority of ℵBDZ, five cursives, Latt. Boh. Orig. Tert. Cypr. Aug. Those authorities which contain it vary as to the wording, and as to the addition or omission of 'Amen'; while some have 'Amen' without the doxology. Even Wordsworth surrenders it, although 'with hesitation.' Perhaps its original source is the Heb. of 1 Ch 29^{11}; and not until Chrysostom does its wording become in general stereotyped. But as it is found in the Syr-Cur. and in the Sahidic, it must have been added to the Lord's Prayer in some places as early as the 2nd cent. Comp. 2 Ti 4^{18}, where we have an ascription of glory to Christ, which is erroneously supposed to favour the genuineness of the doxology in Mt 6^{13}.

From Tertullian (adv. Marcion. IV. xxvi.), from Gregory of Nyssa (de Orat. Dom. p. 60, ed. Krabinger), and from the cursive 604 (Hoskier, 1890), we see that in Lk some texts had a petition for the gift of the Spirit instead of either 'Thy kingdom come' or 'Hallowed be Thy name.' The fullest text of this petition reads thus: Ἐλθέτω τὸ πνεῦμά σου τὸ ἅγιον ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρισάτω ἡμᾶς. Comp. the ἐφ' ἡμᾶς in D, which has ἁγιασθήτω ὄνομά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, ἐλθέτω σου ἡ βασιλεία, sanctificetur nomen tuum super nos, veniat regnum tuum. Against all reasonable probability Keim holds this petition for the Spirit to be 'really original in Luke,' and points to 11^{13} as evidence (Jesus of Nazara, iii. p. 338 n.).

There is evidence also of an early Latin gloss on Ne nos inducas in temptationem which was sometimes admitted into the prayer. Both Cyprian (de Dom. Orat. xxv.) and Augustine (de Serm. Dom. ix. 30) have ne patiaris induci nos,—obviously in order to lessen the difficulty of supposing that God brings us into temptation. This difficulty produced another Latin gloss: ne inducas nos in temptationem quam ferre non possumus (Jerome, in Ezek. xlviii. 16). And these two glosses are sometimes found combined. Each of them is found in writers of different ages and countries, and of liturgies of different families; they must therefore be of early origin. Comp. Hilary, in Ps. cxviii.

I. Terminology.—A discussion of the language used in Scripture respecting the Lord's Supper is of necessity confined to the NT. But only once in NT is the Lord's Supper so called, Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον (1 Co xi. 20); for we may safely follow the consensus of ancient and modern commentators in interpreting this unique expression of the Eucharist (see, however, Maldonatus on Mt 26^{26}). The emphasis is on Κυριακόν: 'it is not (possible) to eat a Lord's Supper,' for the unseemly conduct turns it into ἰδιωτικὸν δεῖπνον (Chrys.). And we may possibly infer from the use of an adjective rather than a genitive that the name Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον was already in use when St. Paul wrote. Cf. Κυριακὴ ἡμέρα (Rev 1^{10}).

There are, however, other expressions in NT which certainly or possibly mean the Lord's Supper. 'The cup of blessing,' τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας (1 Co 10^{16}), i.e. the cup over which the blessing has been pronounced, unquestionably refers to the eucharistic cup, as the context shows. It is that ὃ εὐλογοῦμεν, which we consecrate by εὐλογία, by the expression in words of our εὐχαριστία. We might tr. 'the cup of thanksgiving over which we give thanks,' or 'which we give thanks for' (Crem. Lex. p. 767). But the use of εὐλογία rather than εὐχαριστία is evidence that the latter word has not yet gained its special meaning. The expression is borrowed from Judaism, being the name of the most sacred of the cups handed round at the paschal meal, of which cups it is commonly identified with the third (Edersh. Life and Times, ii. 511). Nor is there any doubt that ποτήριον Κυρίου (1 Co 10^{21}) and τράπεζα Κυρίου (1 Co 10^{21}, cf. Mal 1$^{7.\,12}$) refer to the eucharistic cup and the eucharistic table with the food thereon. Here we have the genitive and not an adjective; and the context shows that the dominant idea is union between the recipients and Christ, rather than union of the recipients with one another. About ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου and κλᾶν ἄρτον there is more doubt. In Scripture 'bread' is a common name for any food, and includes drink also. 'Eating bread' (Mk 3^{20}) and 'breaking bread' (Ac 2^{46}) may be the same as 'taking food' (Ac 9^{19} 27^{36}); but 'eating bread' is the common general term, whereas 'breaking bread' is rare (Jer 16^{7}, La 4^{4}; cf. Lv 2^{6}, Is 58^{7}, Xen. Anab. VII. iii. 22). St. Luke is the only writer who uses ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου (24^{35}, Ac 2^{42}). The former passage probably does not refer to the Eucharist; for the meal at Emmaus (Lk 24^{30}) most probably was not such. The context and the imperf. ἐπεδίδου are against it. Nowhere is the imperf. used of the distribution of the Eucharist (Mt 26^{26}, Mk 14^{22}, Lk 22^{19}, 1 Co 11^{23}); whereas it is used of the distribution of ordinary food, e.g. at the feeding of the 5000 (Mk 6^{41}, Lk 9^{16}) and of the 4000 (Mk 8^{6}, Mt 15^{36}). But in Ac 2^{42} the context favours the eucharistic interpretation, which the Lat. version of Cod. Bezæ, followed by Vulg., enforces with in communicatione fractionis panis (cf. Clem. Recog. vi. 15). The four elements of the common Christian life are given in two pairs; and the combination τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου καὶ ταῖς προσευχαῖς indicates that 'the breaking of the bread' means something more than an ordinary meal; and the context here and in 20$^{7.\,11}$ 27^{35} forbids us to interpret it of distributing food to the poor (Is 58^{7}). Yet even here the explanation must not be confined to the Eucharist. In Scripture there is no trace of the Eucharist being separated from the joint evening meal or ἀγάπη; and 'the breaking of the bread' covers the whole. We must not lose sight of the family character of the life of the first Christians. 'The breaking of the bread' took place in their own homes; 'the prayers' may refer to their constant devotions in the temple (Lk 24^{53}, Ac 2^{46} 3^{1}). It is doubtful whether the Eucharist is included in κλῶντες κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον (Ac 2^{46}) * or in κλάσας ἤρξατο ἐσθίειν (27^{35}). The latter is specially improbable; and here the Western interpolation ἐπιδιδοὺς καὶ ἡμῖν was added to suggest a Eucharist, an interpretation which Tertullian adopts (de Orat. 24). On the other hand, both the Eucharist and the common meal are perhaps indicated in Ac $20^{7.11}$. The mention of the first day of the week points to religious observance: and γευσάμενος seems to refer to the common meal after the κλάσας τὸν ἄρτον in the Eucharistic rite. Only in 1 Co 14^{16} is it supposed that ἡ εὐχαριστία is used in the specific sense of Eucharist rather than in that of thanksgiving generally. Yet it is not probable that St. Paul is here deviating from his use of the word elsewhere (2 Co 4^{15} 9^{11}, Eph 5^{4}, Ph 4^{6}, Col 2^{7} 4^{2}, 1 Th 3^{9}, 1 Ti $4^{3.4}$, and in the plur. 2 Co 9^{12}, 1 Ti 2^{1}), which is also the common use both in NT (Ac 24^{3}, Rev 4^{9} 7^{12}) and in LXX (Wis 16^{28}, Sir 37^{11}, 2 Mac 2^{27}). The use of εὐχαριστεῖν in the next two verses ($^{17.18}$) shows that thanksgiving generally is meant. And this is confirmed by the use of εὐχαριστεῖν in Clem. Rom. Cor. 41. But the use of εὐχαριστία in the specific sense begins very early. We find it in the Ignatian Epistles (Philad. 4; Smyrn. 7) side by side with the general meaning (Eph. 13). The same double use is found in Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 64–66, Try. 116, 117). The specific sense is common in Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Cyprian. But it is remarkable that neither Justin, nor Cyprian (Ep. 63), nor Firmilian in his letter to Cyprian (Ep. 65), nor Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 19, 22, 23), say anything about either the εὐλογία or the κλάσις, both of which are so prominent in NT. Other terms which in course of time became names for the Lord's Supper are κοινωνία, τῶν μυστηρίων κοινωνία, προσφορά, λειτουργία, μυστήριον συνάξεως, μετάληψις ἁγιασμάτων, ἁγία μετάληψις, communio, communicatio, perceptio corporis et sanguinis, etc. Words which originally designated one part of the rite were used to express the whole.

* If Ac 2^{46} does not refer to the Eucharist, then the supposition that the Eucharist was celebrated daily in the earliest age has no foundation. Ac 20$^{7-11}$ points to Sunday as the usual day.

II. OT TYPES.—(a) We have the authority both of Christ and of St. Paul for regarding the manna as a type of the Eucharist. The great discourse on the Bread of Life, no doubt, covers all those means of grace by which Christ is imparted to believers. But a special reference to the Lord's Supper is clear from the words used about eating the flesh of the Son of Man and drinking His blood, and from the fact that just a year after this discourse Christ instituted the Eucharist. It is incredible that this momentous act in the work of redemption had not yet been thought of by Him when He spoke at Capernaum. The references to the manna in the discourse are frequent, and the correspondence between the language used (Jn $6^{51.53-58}$) and the accounts of the institution cannot be fortuitous. The πνευματικὸν βρῶμα of 1 Co 10^{3} refers to the manna regarded as supernatural food. The apostle takes this supernatural food as a type of the Eucharistic bread; and it is possible that the epithet πνευματικόν is selected with reference to the Eucharist rather than to the manna. The exact meaning of what is said about the πνευματικὸν πόμα is doubtful; but evidently the water supernaturally supplied to the Israelites is regarded by St. Paul as a type of the blood of Christ received in the Eucharistic cup.

(b) Patristic writers find types of the Lord's Supper in the gifts made by Melchizedek, in the shewbread, and in other offerings. With regard to Melchizedek, it is remarkable that the author of the Ep. to the Heb., who is the only NT writer who mentions him ($5^{6.10}$ 6^{20} 7^{1-17}), passes over the fact that Melchizedek 'brought forth bread and wine' (Gn 14^{18}). As we are immediately afterwards told that 'he was priest of God most High,' it is not surprising that patristic writers treat this bread and wine as a sacrifice offered by the priest-king, and as a type of the Eucharist: τὴν ἡγιασμένην τροφὴν εἰς τύπον εὐχαριστίας (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 25, p. 637, ed. Potter); imago sacrificii in pane et vino constituta (Cypr. Ep. 63). Jerome goes further, and says that this sacrifice of bread and wine was offered for Abraham (ad Matt. 22^{41}). See Westcott on He 7^{1}.

(c) It is obvious that, as the Lord's Supper commemorates the sacrifice made by Christ on the Cross, whatever was a type of that sacrifice may be called a type also of the rite which commemorates it; and, where the offering was bread, the inducement to treat it in this way would be the greater. Cyril of Jerusalem thus uses the shewbread (Catech. 22). In a similar manner Justin treats Is 33^{16} (Try. 70), and Irenæus treats Mal 1^{11} (IV. xvii. 5, 6) as a prediction of the Eucharist.

III. PARTIAL ANTICIPATIONS.—(a) Just as the chief type, viz. the manna, is indicated by Christ Himself, so also is the chief anticipatory rite, viz. the Passover. It appears to have been [but see JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. p. 634] while celebrating the paschal supper that He instituted the rite which was to supersede it, and be known as the Lord's Supper. And here a remarkable parallel with the institution of Christian baptism exists. The original rite for admission to Judaism was circumcision. This was supplemented by baptism, which in later times became the only rite of initiation applicable to both sexes. In the original ritual of the Passover, the lamb, unleavened bread, and bitter herbs were the essentials (Ex 12^{8}). The wine and the solemn 'cup of blessing' were later accessories. Just as in the one rite Christ abandoned the circumcision and retained the baptism, so in the other He abandoned the lamb and retained the wine. In both cases the rite was made unbloody and painless; and from the treasure-house were brought forth things new and old. There is a new departure; but also a clear connexion with the past; for Providence, even in its revolutions, is conservative.

(b) By speaking of 'my blood of the covenant,' or 'the new covenant in my blood,' Christ seems to have connected this new feast with those sacrificial feasts in which the worshippers, by partaking of the sacrifice, partook of the blessing which the sacrifice was to win. This was an idea with which the disciples were quite familiar. That there was any idea of a death-feast, or of an adoption-feast, is much less probable. We know little about death-feasts among the Jews. And although some Semitic peoples had rites in which the partaking of the tribal animal was supposed to put the blood of the tribe into the partaker's veins (W. R. Smith, RS pp. 317, 318), yet there is no trace of this idea in the Lord's Supper. It is by baptism that aliens are admitted to the Christian family.

IV. HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN RITE.—This can be conveniently treated under four heads: (a) the Institution, (b) the Recipients, (c) the Minister, (d) the Rite.

(a) The Institution, according to the universal testimony of Scripture and of tradition, dates from the act and command of Christ at 'the last supper,'—the last meal of which He partook before His death. An attempt has been made to show that He must have instituted the Eucharist earlier in His ministry: (1) because 'St. John in his sixth chapter represents our Lord as using Eucharistic language which would have been absolutely without meaning, if the Eucharist had not been already in common use'; and (2) because 'the two disciples journeying to Emmaus recognized our Lord in the Breaking of Bread (Lk $24^{30.35}$). They had not been present at the Last Supper. The rite, if it was really then instituted for the first time, would have had no significance for them' (Wright, Synopsis, p. xiii).

This is very unconvincing. (1) It was Christ's way, even with the disciples, to utter about future events words which they did not, and in some cases could not, understand at the time, but which they did understand when the events had taken place. He knew that the discourse on the Bread of Life would acquire fresh and fuller meaning when the rite which He intended to found was instituted. But it is an exaggeration to say that it was 'absolutely without meaning' and an 'insoluble enigma' until the Eucharist was instituted. Had it no meaning for the large majority of the audience, who, upon any hypothesis, did not know, and never would know, anything of the Eucharistic rite? (2) The two disciples at Emmaus may have been present when Christ broke bread and gave thanks at ordinary meals, or at the feeding of the 4000 and of the 5000. It was something in His way of doing this at Emmaus that enabled them to recognize Him at the supper there, which was probably not a Eucharist. We may safely follow the clear and strong evidence of the Synoptists and of St. Paul, that the Eucharist was instituted at the last supper. St. Paul's reference to it, τὸ Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, which is older than any of the Gospels, could hardly have been made in this form, if the Lord's Supper, on the night of His betrayal, had not been the time when it originated. See vol. ii. p. 636.

Of the institution we have four accounts; and it will be worth while to place them side by side in two pairs, to facilitate an estimate of their substantial agreement.* Brandt's assault on their trustworthiness has been answered by Schultzen, Das Abendmahl im NT, 1895, p. 67 ff. They are neither intrinsically incredible, nor inconsistent with other statements in the Gospels, nor contradicted by early evidence outside the NT.

Mt 26$^{26-29}$.

ἐσθιόντων δὲ αὐτῶν λαβὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἄρτον καὶ εὐλογήσας ἔκλασεν καὶ δοὺς τοῖς μαθηταῖς εἶπεν, Λάβετε φάγετε, τοῦτό ἐστιν τὸ σῶμά μου. καὶ λαβὼν ποτήριον καὶ εὐχαριστήσας ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς λέγων, Πίετε ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες, τοῦτο γάρ ἐστιν τὸ αἷμά μου τῆς διαθήκης τὸ περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχυννόμενον εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν· λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, οὐ μὴ πίω ἀπ' ἄρτι ἐκ τούτου τοῦ γενήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου ἕως τῆς ἡμέρας ἐκείνης ὅταν αὐτὸ πίνω μεθ' ὑμῶν καινὸν ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ πατρός μου.

Mk 14$^{22-25}$.

Lk 22$^{17-20}$.

I Co 11$^{23-25}$.

ἐγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου, ὃ καὶ παρέδωκα ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ᾗ παρεδίδετο ἔλαβεν ἄρτον καὶ εὐχαριστήσας ἔκλασεν καὶ εἶπεν Τοῦτό μού ἐστιν τὸ σῶμα τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν· τοῦτο ποιεῖτε εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. ὡσαύτως καὶ τὸ ποτήριον μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι, λέγων Τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἐμῷ αἵματι· τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, ὁσάκις ἐὰν πίνητε, εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν.

There is strong reason for believing that the latter part of the passage in the Third Gospel is not original, but a very early interpolation from I Co. D a d ff$_2$ i l omit from τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν to ἐκχυννόμενον, while b e Syr-Cur. omit and put vv.$^{17.\ 18}$ in the place of the omitted passage, so as to harmonize with Mt and Mk and relieve the difficulty of the two cups. Syr-Cur., like Syr-Sin., retains the whole of v.^{19}, b e only the first half. According to this arrangement the verses run $^{16.\ 19.\ 17.\ 18.\ 21.\ 22}$ etc. Syr-Sin. exhibits a more elaborate rearrangement with considerable changes of wording;—$^{16.\ 19.\ 20a.\ 17.\ 20b.\ 18.\ 21.\ 22}$ etc. In Internat. Crit. Comm. on St. Luke, pp. 567, 568, these attempts at avoiding difficulties by transposing parts of the text are shown in full. WH consider that there is 'no moral doubt that the words in question were absent from the original text in Lk' (ii. App. p. 64; see Introd. § 240). With this Brandt, Grafe, Grass, Haupt, Schürer, J. Weiss, and Wendt agree. Spitta rejects v.^{20} only, and accepts as original the whole of v.^{19}, the second half of which has the support of Syr-Cur., Syr-Sin., and Justin. Scrivener, Schultzen (op. cit. pp. 5-19), R. A. Hoffmann (Abendmahlsgedanken Jesu Christi, 1896, pp. 5-25), and others defend the genuineness of the whole passage. But in a discussion of the accounts of the institution the whole passage should be treated as at least doubtful. It does not support the Pauline account, if it is (as is probable) borrowed from it.

The primary account is that given by St. Paul. Those in Mt and Mk are virtually one and the same; an account written later than his and independent of it. Among the features which are found in both Mt and Mk but not in I Co are the change from εὐλογήσας of the bread to εὐχαριστήσας of the cup, the Λάβετε of the bread, the λαβὼν εὐχαριστήσας ἔδωκεν of the cup, their all drinking of it, the blood being 'shed for many,' and the declaration about not drinking of the fruit of the vine. This last, and εὐχαριστήσας of the cup, are common to Lk also. The features which are common to all four are the taking bread, giving thanks or blessing, breaking, the words 'This is my body,' and the mention of the cup.

In four points St. Paul differs from the Synoptists. (1) He gives no indication that the meal was a paschal one, and thus seems to agree with St. John: it is the new covenant, rather than the connexion with the old rite, which interests him (Baur, Ch. Hist. i. pp. 161, 162). But 1 Co 5^{7} must be remembered. (2) While Mt and Mk place the taking of the bread during the meal (ἐσθιόντων αὐτῶν), he places the taking of the cup after the supper (μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι). If both are right, there was a considerable interval between the distribution of the bread and the circulation of the cup. Lk gives no intimation. (3) While St. Paul has 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood,' Mt and Mk have 'This is my blood of the covenant,' where 'new' may have been dropped for the sake of closer resemblance with Ex 24^{8}. In any case, Rückert's proposal to take μου with διαθήκης—'the blood of my covenant,' and Bousset's to reject the words about the covenant, because Justin omits them, are inadmissible. (4) St. Paul gives twice, Mk and Mt not at all, and Lk probably not at all, the important charge, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. The explanation perhaps is, that the evangelists treat the repetition as a matter of course, and as involved in the word 'covenant,' which implies permanence: whereas, in order to convince the Corinthians of the enormity of their misconduct, it was necessary to point out that irreverence to either bread or cup was a violation of what Christ Himself had prescribed. It follows from this that the divine injunction to the Church to continue the Eucharistic celebration in memory of its Founder rests solely upon the testimony of St. Paul. Let us admit that this is so. We do not thereby render probable the hypothesis that Jesus gave no such charge. The apostle could not have invented such an injunction, if it had not been in harmony with Christian practice already established. And how could such a rite have been established without the authority of the Twelve, who knew well whether Christ had commanded it or not?

* The elements common to all four are in thick type; those common to the three Gospels are in spaced type. The text followed is that of Westcott and Hort.

Paulus was perhaps the first to deny that Christ said τοῦτο ποιεῖτε. But Briggs, P. Gardner,* Grafe, Immer, Jülicher, Mensinga, Pfleiderer, Spitta, Titius, and Wittichen are disposed to think that the earliest tradition, represented by Mk and Mt, knew nothing of an institution by Jesus, on the night of His betrayal, of a sacrament to be observed continually.† And the earliest Christian observance of the Lord's Supper as a permanent institution is explained by the hypothesis that Christ gave this command after His resurrection (Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels, p. 123).

In what sense is the tradition represented by Mk and Mt 'the earliest'? That given by St. Paul was written earlier, and is the earliest written record of any words of Christ. It had been previously communicated to the Corinthians. And St. Paul had derived it direct from the Lord Himself (1 Co 11^{23}). His words can mean no less. Had he merely been told by apostles, he would have had no stronger claim to be heard than hundreds of other Christians. The silence of Mt and Mk does not warrant us in contradicting such explicit testimony, which would be sufficient, even if it were unsupported, for the unvarying belief of the Church from the earliest ages, that it was on the night in which He was betrayed that Christ instituted the Eucharist and gave the command 'continue to do this (pres. imperat.) in remembrance of me.' The proposal to place the institution of the Eucharist as a permanent rite later than the last supper, is as unnecessary as the proposal to place it earlier. The Pauline account fully explains the connexion of the new rite with the Passover and the Passion. If the command, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, κ.τ.λ., was given on some other occasion, how did the new rite become so universally connected with these two facts? Any internal or doctrinal connexion between the Lord's Supper and the Passover is denied by Haupt, Hoffmann, Jülicher, Spitta, and others. Their reasons differ; but the fact that the Passover was celebrated only once a year, and the Lord's Supper frequently, is no argument. The Passover celebrated a deliverance effected with blood; and the Lord's Supper celebrated a deliverance effected with blood. This is a real and natural connexion.

But it is possible that there were sources for the conviction that Jesus gave this command on the night of His betrayal which were independent of St. Paul. Justin Martyr states that 'the apostles, in the memoirs produced by them which are called Gospels, related that Jesus, having taken bread and given thanks, thus commanded them and said, Do this for a remembrance of Me, this is My body; and that in like manner, having taken the cup and given thanks, He said, This is My blood; and distributed to them alone' (Apol. i. 66). Although Justin omits the reference to the covenant, yet he regards the τοῦτο ποιεῖτε as part of the evangelistic record.

(b) The Recipients of the Lord's Supper were required to 'prove themselves,' lest they should 'eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily,' and thus 'be guilty of (profaning) the body and the blood of the Lord. . . . For he that eateth and drinketh without rightly judging (διακρίνων) the body, eateth and drinketh judgment (κρίμα) to himself,'—a judgment which involves the gravest consequences, as the experience of many in Corinth proved. 'But if we were in the habit of rightly judging ourselves (διεκρίνομεν) we should not be judged (οὐκ ἂν ἐκρινόμεθα).' Throughout the passage (1 Co 11^{27-31}) the repeated contrast between διακρίνειν and κρίνειν is to be noted; also the use of κρινόμενοι and κατακριθῶμεν immediately afterwards.

No definition of ἀναξίως is given. The context shows that what is primarily meant is disorderly irreverence in receiving either the bread or the cup (ἤ, not καί). This external irreverence is proof of internal contempt. It could not occur, if the nature of the body were rightly judged; i.e. if the partaker devoutly realized that to which his eating and drinking referred, viz. the death of Christ: just as a loyal subject could not insult the king's effigy, if he knew that it was the king's. The context also shows that selfishness and greediness are included in ἀναξίως. Surfeiting at the common meal, while others are made to wait famished, renders a worthy partaking of the Lord's Supper impossible; for love of the brethren is indispensable. This irreverence and selfishness spring from a wrong estimate of one's own condition. Therefore a man must prove himself and acquire a right judgment as to his spiritual state. Reverence towards God, His Church, and His sacraments; charity towards the brethren; a humble estimate of self,—these are among the requirements for a worthy reception of the Lord's Supper. Fasting could not be required so long as the Eucharist was united with the agape, which it often followed, as at the last supper, although it sometimes preceded it.

(c) The Minister in the Eucharist is not determined by Scripture any more than the minister in baptism. The primary charge to continue the rite (1 Co $11^{24.\ 25}$) was made to the apostles, and, on the only occasion when the minister is named, the celebrant is the apostle St. Paul (Ac 20^{11}). Yet, assuming that 'the breaking of the bread,' which habitually took place among the first Christians (Ac 2^{42}), includes the Lord's Supper, we need not suppose that the celebrant was invariably one of the Twelve. But this much may be asserted with confidence. The NT tells us that from the first there was a distinction between clergy and laity, i.e. the Church had officers who discharged spiritual functions which were not discharged by ordinary Christians. This distinction appears in various writings from the earliest to the latest (1 Th $5^{12.\ 13}$, 1 Co 12^{28}, Eph 4^{11}, Ph 1^{1}, Past. Epp. passim, He 13^{17}, 3 Jn $^{9.\ 10}$), and is abundantly confirmed by evidence outside the NT which is almost if not quite contemporaneous with the last of these (Clem. Rom. and the Didaché). These witnesses do not define the functions of the ministers whom they name. But the clergy, whether missionary (as apostles, prophets, and evangelists) or stationary (as bishops or presbyters, and deacons), discharge spiritual duties. They deal with men's souls rather than their bodies; and they have to do with religious service. It is reasonable to suppose that one of the first things that was reserved to the clergy was the right of presiding at the Eucharist. This reservation is found clearly enough in the first half of the 2nd cent. (Ign. Smyrn. 8, cf. Trall. 2. 7, Philad. 7; Tert. de Bapt. 17; Apost. Const. ii. 27).

* Gardner argues, moreover, that the whole account in 1 Co $11^{23ff.}$ is the record of an ecstatic revelation experienced by St. Paul, and has no historical objective foundation. He supposes an influence to have been exerted on St. Paul during his stay at Corinth by the proximity of the Eleusinian mysteries.

† The view that Christ gave no command, but merely permission, to continue the ordinance, is found in Luther, who regards ὁσάκις ἐὰν πίνητε as making τοῦτο ποιεῖτε purely permissive (De capt. Bab. eccles. præludium, ed. Pfizer, p. 195). Strauss, Kaiser, and Stephani have urged that Jesus was too humble to give such a command, and have been answered by Hase (Gesch. Jesu, p. 691).

(d) The Rite is nowhere described in Scripture with so much detail as in the accounts of the institution; and the small amount of detail given there is strong evidence of the authenticity of the accounts. A fiction of a later age would have represented Christ as using the ceremonial which was customary in that age, as is seen clearly in the Apost. Const. ii. 57, viii. 12. The taking a loaf or cake, giving thanks, breaking and distributing, and then the taking a cup, giving thanks, and distributing, are the external acts of the Founder, accompanied by the words, 'This is my body,' 'This is my blood.' We know too little about the ritual of the Passover at this time to say how much, if any, of the new Eucharistic rite was part of the paschal meal. Later Jewish writers have described how the Passover was celebrated in their time, with four (and sometimes five) cups circulating at intervals, one of which may have been the Eucharistic cup.* But we do not know that this ritual was in existence in the time of Christ. And if it was, we do not know that Christ, in this highly exceptional celebration,—which anticipated (?) that year's Passover in order to supersede it for ever,—followed the existing ritual. In none of the reports is there any mention of the lamb, or of the 'passing over' of the destroying angel, or of a deliverance from bondage; whereas the idea of a covenant, which of necessity is a new covenant, is very conspicuous. It need not be doubted that 'my blood of the covenant' (Mt, Mk) is essentially identical with 'the new covenant in my blood' (1 Co). In either case the blood is treated as the vehicle of the covenant, which the disciples appropriate by partaking of the cup. And this idea of a covenant is not conspicuous in the ritual of the Passover.† The three fundamental acts seem to be, (1) the breaking and pouring, (2) the distribution to the disciples, (3) their eating and drinking; which represent (1) the death of Christ, (2) for the disciples' salvation, (3) which they must appropriate.

As regards subsequent Christian usage, we know that in the apostolic age the breaking of the bread was preserved (see above); and we may feel sure that most of the other external acts of the Lord were preserved also. Moreover, the Eucharist, which at the institution was part of the paschal supper, is in the apostolic age always part of the common meal or ἀγάπη (1 Co 11^{17}, Ac $20^{7.\ 11}$), a practice which continued down to the time of Ignatius (see Lightfoot on Smyrn. 8). But whether there was as yet any fixed form of words either for the thanksgiving or blessing, or to accompany the distribution, is uncertain. The differences in the four reports of Christ's words seem to show that exactness of wording was not regarded as essential. In the Didaché 9, 10 we find three forms of thanksgiving: one for the cup, one for the broken bread, and a third which apparently is to be used after both ἀγάπη and Eucharist are over (μετὰ τὸ ἐμπλησθῆναι). But it is expressly stated that 'the prophets' are not tied to these forms (τοῖς δὲ προφήταις ἐπιτρέπετε εὐχαριστεῖν ὅσα θέλουσιν). A similar feature is found in Justin Martyr, who states that the presiding minister (ὁ προεστώς), after general prayer is ended, and bread and wine mixed with water have been brought, offers prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability (ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ), to which the congregation respond with the Amen (Apol. i. 67). It would seem, then, that this is the second stage in the development of liturgies. First there was no form, but the minister used what words he pleased. He would, however, be influenced by the words of institution as well as by Jewish forms; and perhaps he commonly included the Lord's Prayer. Basil asks, 'Which of the saints has left us in writing the words of the invocation at the displaying (ἀνάδειξις) of the bread of the Eucharist and the cup of blessing? For we are not content with what the Apostle or the Gospel has recorded, but both in preface and conclusion we add other words' (de Spiritu, 27). And Gregory the Great seems to have believed that the apostles used the Lord's Prayer, and that only* (ix. Ep. 12; Migne, lxxvii. 956). But the meaning of the passage is not clear; and Gregory is very late authority for apostolic usage (Maskell, The Ancient Liturgy of the Ch. of England, 3rd ed. p. xviii). At the next stage forms were drawn up, but some ministers were allowed discretion as to the use of them. Finally, all ministers were restricted to prescribed forms. In NT we seem to be at the first stage. In the Didaché the omissions are remarkable, and power to supplement would seem to be almost necessary. Among the gifts for which thanks are given (ζωή, γνῶσις, πίστις, ἀθανασία, ζωὴ αἰώνιος) there is no mention of ἄφεσις ἁμαρτιῶν. And although these gifts come διὰ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ παιδός σου, there is no mention of the death of Christ.

Harnack's theory, that until the 3rd cent. the use of wine in the Eucharist was neither obligatory nor universal, has been opposed by Zahn (Brot und Wein im Abendmahl der alten Kirche, Erlangen, 1892) and Jülicher (Theolog. Abhandlungen, Freiburg, 1892, pp. 217–231), and need not be discussed here. Christ took the two simplest and most universal representatives of sustaining food, bread that strengtheneth man's heart, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and employed them as the universal representatives of spiritual food, of His body broken and His blood poured out. His loyal followers have from the first retained these.

V. THE DOCTRINE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.—There are few things more tragic in the history of Christ's Church than the fact that its central act of worship has for centuries been, and still continues to be, a subject for the keenest controversy, and that Christians have cruelly persecuted, and even put to cruel deaths, other Christians, for not holding doctrines respecting the Lord's Supper which cannot be proved, and which are possibly not true. The Sacrament of Love and of Life has been made an instrument of hate and of destruction, because men have insisted upon possessing knowledge which cannot be possessed, and upon explaining what cannot be explained. In the first centuries the Church was content to enjoy and to use without explaining, and it would be our wisdom to do the same.

1. The chief point of controversy has been the meaning of the 'is' in 'This is my body' (Mt, Mk, Lk, 1 Co) and 'This is my blood of the covenant' (Mt, Mk), or 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood' ([Lk] 1 Co). The suggestion that at the institution our Lord spoke in Aramaic, and that

---

* Those who assume that the disputed passage at Lk $22^{19.\ 20}$ is genuine, commonly regard the two cups (vv.$^{17.\ 20}$) as two of the four or five Jewish cups.

† But see Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, p. 208 ff.

* Orationem dominicam idcirco mox post precem dicimus, quia mos apostolorum fuit, ut ad ipsam solummodo orationem, oblationis hostiam consecrarent. Cf. Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. iv. 26; Migne, cv. 1210. What is the exact meaning of the ad?

in Aramaic the 'is' would not be expressed, renders no help. It is not quite certain that He spoke in Aramaic then, or that it was in Aramaic that He made the special revelation to St. Paul. But we may assume that He did so. Nevertheless, the 'is' must be supplied; and, as soon as it is there, inquiry will arise as to its meaning. Moreover, not in Aramaic, but in Greek, has Christ handed down these words of His to His Church. All four accounts have the ἐστιν of the bread; and, excepting the disputed words in Lk, all have the ἐστιν of the cup. The fact that Christ probably used a language in which the copula was not expressed is no good reason for giving the minimum of meaning to the ἐστιν, which is conspicuous in the Scriptures given to us by Him.

Perhaps the nearest approach to an explanation that can be found in Scripture is that given by St. Paul: 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not κοινωνία of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not κοινωνία of the body of Christ?' Here κοινωνία is more than 'a partaking of,' which would be μετοχή or μετάλημψις rather than κοινωνία. The latter is 'fellowship with.' Just as the bread is made up of many particles, gathered together in one loaf, so those who partake of the bread that is broken are gathered together in one body. 'The bread which we break is fellowship with the body of Christ.' [See COMMUNION]. What, then, is the meaning of the 'is'? Probably that common use of the copula which identifies cause and effect is part of the meaning (Hooker, Ec. Pol. V. lxvii. 5, 6). J. H. Newman once warned a friend who was visiting Rome for the first time, and in the summer, 'Beware of a chill in Rome. A chill is a fever; and a fever is a shattered constitution for life,' which meant that a chill causes a fever, and that a fever causes a shattered constitution. By the same usage St. Paul may mean that the cup, when drunk, is a cause of fellowship with Christ's blood, and the bread, when eaten, is a cause of fellowship with Christ's body; or (as in the words of institution) this bread is a cause of the body. 'The bread and wine after their benediction or consecration are not indeed changed in their nature, but become, in their use and in their effects, the very body and blood of Christ' (T. S. Evans on 1 Co 10^{16}). This meaning is in harmony with the context. The union with the Lord Himself, which those who partake of the Lord's Supper have, is compared with the union which those who partake of a sacrifice have with the deity to whom the altar is devoted;—in the case of the Israelites with God, of the heathen with demons. This idea, that to partake of a sacrifice is to devote one's self to the deity, lies at the root of the ancient idea of worship, whether Jewish or heathen; and St. Paul uses it as being readily understood. In this connexion the symbol is never a mere symbol, but a means of real union; and in the Lord's Supper the symbol is very significant. It is a means of union with Christ in that character which is indicated by the broken body and the shed blood; i.e. union with the crucified Redeemer (Pfleiderer, Paulinismus, ch. vi. p. 240, Eng. tr.).

Those who insist on the literal meaning of the 'is' as expressing identity, must be prepared to accept the literal meaning of the subject also; and this in the case of the cup produces great difficulty. 'This cup (not its contents) actually is (not is an instrument or a symbol of) the covenant.'

'The fellowship with the body of Christ' is twofold. It is fellowship of each recipient with Christ by faith, and of all recipients with one another in Christ by love. It is in Christ that the union of all mankind subsists. There is communion in a nature which is common to Him and to them; ὅτι εἷς ἄρτος, ἓν σῶμα οἱ πολλοί ἐσμεν, 'because one bread, one body, we the many are.' The act of eating and drinking together proclaims the union of Christians in Christ. And this union and communion is symbolized in the composite unity of the bread and of the wine. 'As this broken bread (κλάσμα), scattered upon the mountains and gathered together became one, so let Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy Kingdom' (Didaché, ix. 4).

A Bible Dictionary is not the place in which to discuss late developments of Eucharistic doctrine; but it may point out scriptural tests for judging some of these.

(1) Christ placed the new rite in close connexion with the Passover. Even if He had not done so, the apostles would inevitably have been influenced by Jewish ideas, and especially by paschal observances, in interpreting the new rite. This fact seems to exclude all doctrines which teach that the consecrated elements become or contain the physical body of Christ which was 'born of the Virgin,' with 'bones and nerves and all that pertains to the true idea of a body.'* To partake of the blood of an animal was abomination to a Jew. In the paschal ritual it was expressly provided that the blood should be separated from the flesh that was to be eaten. The idea of eating human flesh and drinking human blood would have inspired the apostles with unspeakable horror; and it is incredible that Christ can have intended to shock them with any such doctrine. He had warned them beforehand (Jn 6^{63}) against any such carnal notion—σωματικὴ ἔννοια (Athan. ad Serapion. iv. 19). (2) The words εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν exclude a corporal presence; for a memorial of what is bodily present would be meaningless. (3) St. Paul repeatedly calls the consecrated bread, not 'body' or 'flesh,' but 'bread' (1 Co 11^{26-28}). Can we believe that the celebrant now distributes more than Christ distributed then; or that what He held in His hands and distributed to His disciples was nothing less than His own Person, Body, Soul, and Godhead? (See Thirlwall, Charges, ii. p. 251; Schultzen, Das Abendmahl, p. 48.)

2. Another aspect of the Lord's Supper is pointed out by St. Paul; and again it is an explanation of the words of Christ. The Lord said, 'This do ye, for the remembrance of me,' to which the apostle adds, 'For (confirmatory) as often as ye eat this bread (bread thus blessed and broken) and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come' (ἄχρι οὗ ἔλθῃ without ἄν, because the coming is certain). As the Passover was for a memorial of the deliverance wrought by J", to be kept 'throughout your generations' (Ex 12^{14}), so the Eucharist is a memorial of the deliverance wrought by Christ's death, to be kept 'till he come.' Commemoration ceases when He who is commemorated returns. Meanwhile the Eucharist is the Church's consolation for the Lord's withdrawal from sight. It links the second Advent to the first by keeping both in mind. Like the dramatic actions of the Hebrew prophets, it illustrates, and emphasizes, and impresses on the memory a special proof of God's care for His people. It is Christ's last and supreme parable; a parable not merely told but acted by Himself. He sets forth His own death, and shows that those who would profit by it must make it their own by faith and love. As Chrysostom says, 'We do not then offer a different sacrifice, as the high priest formerly did, but always the same: or rather, we celebrate a memorial of a sacrifice' (on Hebrews, Hom. xvii. 3). This leads on to another aspect.

* Verum Christi Domini Corpus, illud idem, quod natum ex Virgine, in cælis sedat ad dexteram Patris, hoc Sacramento contineri (Catechismus Romanus, Pars II. cap. iv. Quæst. 22).

Hoc loco etiam explicandum est, non solum veri Christi Corpus, et quicquid ad veram corporis rationem pertinet, veluti, ossa et nervos, sed etiam totum Christum in hoc Sacramento contineri (ibid. Quæst. 27).

3. Christ's death was a sacrifice: and to proclaim His death, and appropriate His body and blood offered in that sacrifice, is to realize the sacrifice and to appropriate its effects. The ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν of the body (1 Co) and the ὑπὲρ or περὶ πολλῶν of the blood (Mk, Mt) point to this. And they mean much the same; for it is unreasonable to restrict ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν to the disciples then present. It was in our behalf that the body was broken and the blood shed. The sacrificial idea appears in He 13^{10}, where θυσιαστήριον probably refers indirectly to the Eucharist. But the altar on which Christ offered His sacrifice is the Cross; and the altar on which we offer is Christ Himself. The θυσιαστήριον is not the holy table. And it may be doubted if there is a sacrificial meaning in the double τοῦτο ποιεῖτε (1 Co $11^{24.\ 25}$). For (i.) in LXX the frequent Heb. words which mean 'offer' or 'sacrifice' are not translated by ποιεῖν, but by προσφέρειν, ἀναφέρειν, θύειν, θυσιάζειν, and the like. (ii.) The ordinary meaning of ποιεῖν in LXX, in NT, and elsewhere, is the natural meaning here. (iii.) The Gr. Fathers adopt this ordinary meaning and interpret, 'Perform this action.' (iv.) Syr-Sin. has, 'Thus do in remembrance of me.' (v.) The ancient liturgies do not use ποιεῖν or facere of the bread and wine, but προσφέρειν or offerre. (vi.) The sacrificial meaning might easily have been made clear by the use of προσφέρειν. Moreover, we have τοῦτο, not τοῦτον: not 'Do this bread,' but 'Do this thing.' (See Expositor, 3rd series, vii. p. 441; T. K. Abbott, Essays on the Texts of the OT and NT, 1891, p. 110; J. R. Milne, The Doctrine of the Eucharist, 1895, p. 19). The use of ποιεῖν here is exactly analogous to that in Ex 12^{28} of the Passover: ἐποίησαν οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰσραὴλ καθὰ ἐνετείλατο Κύριος τῷ Μωσῇ, οὕτως ἐποίησαν. Comp. πάντα ὅσα ἐλάλησεν Κύριος ποιήσομεν (Ex 24^{7}).

4. In the Lord's Supper we receive spiritual food, which continues and strengthens the spiritual life begun in baptism. The soul is nourished by the body and blood of Christ as the body is by the bread and wine. His flesh is meat indeed, and His blood drink indeed (Jn 6^{55}), and to partake of Him who is the Life (Jn 14^{6}) is to have eternal life (Jn $6^{50.\ 54.\ 58}$). Comp. Ign. Eph. 20, Rom. 7; Clem. Alex. Pæd. ii. 2; Cypr. de Dom. Orat. 18.

5. By Christ's example this rite includes an act of thanksgiving. In all four accounts we have εὐχαριστήσας either of the bread or of the cup; and Mt and Mk have a blessing or thanksgiving with both elements. The very early use of ἡ εὐχαριστία as a name for the whole service shows that it was regarded as the highest form of thanksgiving.

With regard to all Eucharistic controversy we may wish, with Hooker, 'that men would more give themselves to meditate with silence what we have by the sacrament, and less to dispute of the manner how.' There have been those who 'because they enjoyed not disputed,' and others who 'disputed not because they enjoyed' (Ec. Pol. v. lxvii. 3). Jam missa, quanto vicinior et similior primæ omnium missæ, quam Christus in cœna fecit, tanto Christianior (Luther).

LOT (לוֹט; Λωτ).—The son of Haran, the brother of Abraham, and consequently Abraham's nephew (Gn $11^{27.\ 31}$ [both P]). Particulars of his life are found in parts of Gn 11–14. 19: the circumstantial narrative belongs to J (except ch. 14, which comes from an independent source), P giving only a brief summary ($11^{27.\ 31\text{-}32}$ $12^{4b\text{-}5}$ $13^{6.\ 11b\text{-}12a}$ [to Plain] 19^{29}). Lot's father Haran died before the migration of Abraham into Canaan—according to J, in 'the land of his nativity' (i.e. Ḥaran in Mesopotamia), according to P, in 'Ur of the Kasdim'; and when Abraham left Ḥaran for Canaan, he took Lot with him (12^{4a} J; $12^{4b\text{-}5}$ P). Lot, it may be inferred, was with his uncle when he rested at Shechem, and again on the mountain between Bethel and Ai, as well as afterwards, when he journeyed through the Negeb, or 'South' of Judah ($12^{6.\ 8.\ 9}$). Whether, in the view of the narrator, Lot accompanied Abraham into Egypt ($12^{10\text{-}20}$), is less certain: the complete silence respecting him in the somewhat circumstantial narrative of $12^{10\text{-}20}$ is noticeable; and it is possible that the words 'and Lot with him' in 13^{1} are a gloss (see, further, Dillm. 226, 229). However that may be, Lot is with Abraham when he revisits the hill between Bethel and Ai, which now becomes the scene of Lot's memorable choice ($13^{1\text{-}13}$). Both Abraham and Lot, we are told, had numerous herds: the land 'was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together, for their substance was great' (P: cf. 36^{7}), i.e. it could not supply pasture for both of them; strifes arose between their respective herdmen (J), viz. about wells and watering-places (cf. 21^{25} $26^{20f.}$), which appear to Abraham to be unseemly between 'brethren,' i.e. relatives (cf. 14^{16} 24^{27} 29^{15}), and he proposed accordingly a separation. Though the elder, he generously offers his nephew the first choice: 'is not the whole land before thee? . . . if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou take the right hand, then I will go to the left.' The soil about Bethel is stony and bare; but a little to the S.E. there is 'a conspicuous hill; its topmost summit resting, as it were, on the rocky slopes below, and distinguished from them by the olive-grove which clusters over its broad surface above' (S. and P. 218); and here, it seems, the narrator must have pictured Lot and Abraham as standing. 'To the east there rises in the foreground the jagged range of the hills above Jericho; in the distance the dark wall of Moab; between them lies the wide valley of the Jordan, its course marked by the track of tropical forest growth [the 'pride of Jordan' of Jer 12^{5} 49^{19}=50^{44}, Zec 11^{3}] in which its rushing stream is enveloped; and down to this valley runs a long and deep ravine,' through which, it seems, parts of the plain across the river can be descried, with long lines of verdure fringing the numerous streams which descend from the mountains beyond into the Jordan: on the S. and W. appear the bleak hills of Judah. The 'Kikkār,'—the 'round,' or 'oval,' of Jordan, i.e. (cf. Buhl, Geogr. 112) the middle, broader part of the Jordan Valley beginning about 25 miles N. of the Dead Sea, and including (probably) the Dead Sea itself, and the small plain at its S. end,—though in parts the soil, once a sea-bottom, is desolate and barren, is in other parts extremely fertile, and produces an exuberant vegetation (see HGHL 483 f., 487, 489); and the writer, it seems, pictured it as having been yet more fertile, before Sodom and Gomorrah[*] had been destroyed—'well-watered everywhere,' like the garden of Eden, or the valley of the Nile. A region so blessed by nature proved to Lot an irresistible temptation: heedless of his uncle, heedless of the wickedness of its inhabitants—significantly emphasized by the narrator in v.^{13}—he made his choice; he left his uncle on the bare hills of Bethel, while he himself descended into the fertile valley, 'and moved his tent (ויאהל) as far as Sodom.' 'By thus voluntarily quitting Canaan, Lot resigns his claims to it, and the later territorial relations of Moab and Ammon [see below], and of Israel, are prefigured' (Dillm.).

The next incident in Lot's life which is mentioned is his rescue by his uncle after he had been taken captive by the expedition headed by Chedorlaomer (Gn 14). After the defeat of the king of Sodom and his allies in the 'Vale of Siddim,' Lot, who now 'dwelt in Sodom,' is, amongst others (v.^{16}), taken prisoner by the victorious kings from the East, and carried off by them. Abraham, who was now at Hebron, hears of what has happened, and immediately, with 318 followers, starts in pursuit. All through Canaan, as far as Dan, near the foot of Hermon, he follows the retreating hosts: there he surprises them by a night attack, pursues them as far as Hobah, probably some 80 miles N. of Damascus, recovers Lot and his possessions, and brings him back (it is implied) to Sodom (vv.$^{12-16}$).

The next time that we hear of Lot is in the familiar narrative of Gn 19. The two angels, whose mission it is to destroy the guilty cities of the 'Kikkār,' arrive at Sodom at even. Lot, sitting in the gateway of the city,—the common place of resort in the East, whether for conversation or business (cf. Ru 4^{1}),—rises up, with the same ready courtesy which Abraham had shown before (18$^{2-6}$), and which is still usual among the Arabs, to offer them hospitality: at first, wishing, it may be, to test his sincerity, they decline the invitation, but being pressed by him they yield, and are entertained by him sumptuously, at a 'feast' (משתה; cf. 21^{8} 26^{30} 29^{22}). Lot's hospitality on this occasion is alluded to (probably), in conjunction with that of Abraham (ch. 18), in the well-known words (He 13^{2}), which have passed into a proverb, 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers (τῆς φιλοξενίας μὴ ἐπιλανθάνεσθε); for some have thereby entertained angels unawares.' The character of the men of Sodom soon discloses itself (cf. Is 3^{9}); and Lot, obliged to act quickly in a trying situation, made the mistake of placing his duties as a host (which, as is well known, are regarded in the East as peculiarly sacred) above his duties as a father. 'The words of Lot ('I have two daughters,' etc.) have been much canvassed in all times. St. Chrysostom thought it virtuous in him not to spare his own daughters, rather than sacrifice the duties of hospitality, and expose his guests to the wickedness of the men of Sodom (Hom. xxiii. in Gen.). So St. Ambrose (de Abrah. i. 6), speaking as if a smaller sin were to be preferred to a greater. But St. Augustine justly observes, that we should open the way for sin to reign far and wide if we allowed ourselves to commit smaller sins, lest others should commit greater (Lib. contr. Mend. c. 9. See also Quæst. in Gen. 42). We see in all this conduct of Lot the same mixed character. He intended to do rightly, but did it timidly and imperfectly.' In fact, Lot 'brought his troubles upon himself by the home he had chosen. He was bound to defend his guests at the risk of his own life, but not by the sacrifice of his daughters' (Speaker's Comm. on v.^{8}). The profligate multitude, resenting Lot's interference, and the assumption of moral superiority which it implied, essay to lay hands upon him; and are only prevented from carrying out their purpose by the intervention of the two angels, who forcibly bring Lot into the house, and strike his would-be assailants with a dazzling (סַנְוֵרִים, only besides 2 K 6^{18}), preventing them from being able to find the door. The angels, satisfied now that even 'ten' righteous men (18^{32}) are not to be found in Sodom, urge Lot to quit betimes the doomed city, taking with him all those belonging to him. But his 'sons-in-law' mocked at his warnings; and even Lot himself, though hastened by the angels as soon as morning broke (v.^{15}), 'lingered' (v.^{16}), reluctant to leave his 'house' (v.^{3} etc.), and the city which he had made his home. But the angels are tender to his weakness, J″ being desirous to 'spare' him; they accordingly take hold of his hand, and lead him, together with his wife and daughters, outside the city. There they bid him escape for his life, neither looking behind him—whether to be tempted back, or to watch with curious eye the fate of the city—nor tarrying even for a moment in any part of the coveted (13^{10}) 'Kikkār': 'escape to the mountain,'—or 'mountainous country,' viz. of the later Moab (v.^{30} 14^{10}),—'lest thou be swept away' (v.^{17}). But the mountains are too distant for Lot's faith, or strength of purpose: fearing he will not be able to reach them in time, he asks to be allowed to take refuge in a city nearer at hand, which, being a 'little one,' might have been less guilty than the other cities, and more easily spared. His request is granted, and he escapes to Zoar. The aim of this part of the narrative is evidently to explain the origin of this name. Zoar is in all probability the Zōara, or Zoōr, of Josephus, and the Ẓughar of the Arab. geographers;[*] and this, as Wetzstein has shown (in Del. Gen.^{4} 564 ff.), lay in the plain at the S.E. extremity of the Dead Sea, now called the Ghôr eṣ-Ṣâfieh,[†] which, in striking contrast to the salt and marshy plain opposite (S.W. of the Sea), at the foot of the Jebel Usdum (see p. 152), is well-watered, and 'covered with shrubs and verdure, like the Plain of Jericho' (Grove in Smith, DB iii. 1182; HGHL 508 n.). Lot reached Zoar soon after sunrise (v.^{23}); and the destruction of the other cities of the 'Kikkār' then took place. His wife, disregarding the injunction of v.^{17}, looked back from behind him, and became 'a pillar of salt' (v.^{26}).[‡]

After these events, Lot, dreading lest, after all, a similar fate should overtake Zoar, 'went up' out of it into the 'mountain,' i.e., as in vv.$^{17.19}$, the hill-country on the E. of the Dead Sea; and dwelt there 'in a cave' (19^{30}), according to a custom which appears still to prevail in this neighbourhood.[§] The only other incident in his life which is mentioned is the story which now follows (19$^{31-38}$) of the origin of the nations of Moab and Ammon from his incestuous intercourse with his two daughters. Naturally, this narrative is not to be understood as a record of actual fact. The story is based in part upon a popular etymology of the two names; but this does not explain it entirely. There was much rivalry and hostility between Israel and its trans-Jordanic neighbours, Moab and Ammon; it is also, as Dillm. has remarked, a probable inference from the present narrative, that incestuous marriages, such as were viewed in

[*] On the difficult question of the site of these cities, see HGHL 505 ff., and App. 678. To the present writer, the arguments in favour of a site at the S. end of the Dead Sea appear to preponderate: cf. the note below on Zoar. It is not necessary to suppose that Lot saw the exact part of the Kikkār in which the cities were; in any case, the word 'all' in Gn 13^{10} must be an exaggeration.

Israel with abhorrence, were not uncommon among these two nations; and these feelings are reflected in the discreditable story of their origin, which the narrator has here preserved. 'It was the coarse humour of the people which put into words its aversion to Moab and Ammon by means of this narrative' (Dillm.).

The only other mention of Lot in the OT is in the expression 'children of Lot,' applied to Moab in Dt 2^{9}, and to the Ammonites in Dt 2^{19}; and to both peoples indiscriminately in Ps 83^{8}.

Lot is in character a strong contrast to Abraham. He is selfish, weak, and worldly: he thinks of himself before his uncle, and chooses, for the sake of luxury and ease, to dwell in the midst of temptation. Relatively, indeed, he was 'righteous' (2 P $2^{7.8}$); his personal character was without reproach; and he was deemed worthy by God of a special deliverance.[*] His 'righteous soul' was, moreover, 'vexed (ἐβασανίζετο) from day to day' by the 'lawless deeds' which he saw around him; but he had not strength of purpose to quit his evil surroundings, and even betrothed his daughters to natives of the sinful city. When ultimately he left Sodom, it was with manifest reluctance, and only after his daughters had become (if we may follow the representation of the narrator) depraved by contact with vice. He brought temptations, and also troubles, upon himself,—and the man who once was rich in 'flocks and herds and tents' (13^{5}) was, as the result of his own actions, stripped of his possessions, and reduced to living penuriously in a cave. Lot is one of the many τύποι ἡμῶν in the OT; and his history is a lesson of the danger of thinking too exclusively of worldly advantage and present ease.

The historical character of Lot must be judged by the same principles as that of ISHMAEL and JACOB (vol. ii. 533 f.): no doubt tribal relations and characteristics are, to a certain degree, reflected in him. Cf. Dillm. AT Theol. p. 79. On Jewish traditions about Lot, see the B'reshith Rabbā (tr. Wünsche), and the Pirḳê R. Eliezer, c. 25 (where his wife is called עדית Edith, and one of his daughters פלוטית Pelotith). In Fabricius, Cod. Pseudepigr. VT, i. 428–431, there is a Greek legend of a tree planted by him, which afterwards provided wood for the cross. Irenæus (iv. 31; 33. 9) interprets typically some of the incidents of his history. In the Qor'an, Lot is often alluded to as a preacher of righteousness to the people among whom he dwelt, Qor. 7^{78-82} 11^{72-84} $15^{58ff.}$ 21^{74-76} 22^{43} $26^{160-175}$ 27^{55-59} 29^{27-34} 54^{33-38}: in these passages (as well as elsewhere) the men of Sodom are called the 'people of Lot,' as the Dead Sea is still called by the Arabs Baḥr Lûṭ, the 'Sea of Lot.'

Lot's Wife.—Gn 19^{26} 'But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.' At the S.W. end of the Dead Sea is the singular formation called Jebel Usdum, 'the mountain of Sodom,' a range of cliffs, some 6 miles long and 600 ft. high, consisting of crystallized rock-salt—once part of the bed of the ancient Salt Sea—'covered with a capping of chalky limestone and gypsum. . . . It has a strangely dislocated, shattered look, and is all furrowed and worn into huge angular buttresses and ridges, from the face of which great fragments are occasionally detached by the action of the rains, and appear as "pillars of salt" advanced in front of the general mass. At the foot the ground is strewed with lumps and masses of salt.'[†] Such pillars, or pinnacles, of salt have been often noticed by travellers. Lieut. Lynch, for instance,[‡] describes one which was about 40 ft. high, cylindrical in form, and rested on a kind of oval pedestal, some 50 ft. above the level of the sea. It is probable that some such pillar, conspicuous in antiquity, gave rise to the story. Writers of a later age often felt satisfied that they could identify the pillar in question. In Wis 10^{7} mention is made of a στήλη ἁλός, near the Dead Sea, standing as a μνημεῖον ἀπιστούσης ψυχῆς. Josephus (Ant. I. xi. 4) says, ἱστόρησα δ' αὐτήν· ἔτι γὰρ καὶ νῦν διαμένει. Clem. Rom. (1 Cor. 11^{2}), Irenæus (Hær. iv. 31. 3), and the unknown author of a poem on Sodom (ap. Tertull., ed. Oehler, ii. 771 ff., l. 121 f.), speak of it, though not apparently from personal knowledge, as still remaining. Whether, however, the pillar referred to by all these writers is the same one, must remain uncertain; as Robinson (ii. 108) remarks, during the rainy season such pillars are constantly in the process of formation and destruction, so that it is doubtful how far any particular one would be permanent (cf. Grove in Smith, DB^{1} ii. 145^{a}).

Lot's wife 'looked back' with regretful longings for the possessions and enjoyments which she was leaving behind her, and so proved herself unworthy of the salvation offered to her. Our Lord (Lk 17^{32}) refers accordingly to the narrative about her, when inculcating indifference to all worldly interests, as the attitude with which the advent of the Son of man should be met. 'Note that Christ says, "Remember," not "Behold." Nothing that is in existence is appealed to, but only what has been told' (Plummer, ad loc., in the 'International Crit. Comm.'). S. R. DRIVER.

LOTAN (לוֹטָן, Λωτάν).—The eponym of a Horite clan, Gn $36^{20.22.29}$=1 Ch $1^{38.39}$. Ewald (Gesch.^{3} i. 448 [Eng. tr. i. 313]), followed by Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.), identifies with Lot, the father of Moab-Ammon, who appears in Gn 19^{30} as a חוֹרִי 'cave dweller.' See LOT.

LOTHASUBUS (Λωθάσουβος), 1 Es 9^{44}.—A corruption of HASHUM in Neh 8^{4}; וחשם was perhaps read לותשב.

LOTS (גּוֹרָל. In Est 3^{7} $9^{24.26}$ we have the problematic word פּוּר, the plur. of which is tr^{d} by LXX in 9^{26} φρουραί [see PURIM, FEAST OF]. The ordinary rendering in LXX for גּוֹרָל is κλῆρος, which is the NT term also).—The lot was employed in ancient Israel as a mode of deciding important issues in cases when they were not decided by other mechanical modes, or were not left to the expressed arbitrament of a priest, prophet, elder, judge (שׁוֹפֵט), or king. The use of lots was governed by the presupposition that divine influence controlled their employment, and that the result coincided with God's will. We have, in fact, here only one of a large cycle of modes of divination practised by Israel and other nations of antiquity. Some of these, as Urim and Thummim, were sanctioned by the Jewish Torah as legitimate (see art. URIM AND THUMMIM), and were at all events tolerated (as the use of the ephod) in pre-exilian Israel (see art. EPHOD, No. 2). Others, on the contrary, were regarded as illegitimate, as the pieces of stick (ῥαβδομαντία, Hos 4^{12}) or arrows (βελομαντία, Ezk 21^{26} [Heb.]). See Davidson on Ezk 21^{21} in Camb. Bible for Schools; and for the usage among ancient Arabs, Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heidentums^{2} p. 132. For Assyr. parallels see Lehmann, Aberglaube u. Zauberei, p. 40.

The religious aspect in the employment of lots is expressed in the phrase לִפְנֵי יהוה (Jos $18^{6.8}$), and still more explicitly in Pr 16^{33}—

> 'The lot is cast into the lap,
> But all its decision cometh from Jehovah.'

The verb used here for casting the lot is the Hiph. of טול. In Jos 18^{8} it is הִשְׁלִיךְ, in v.^{6} it is יָרָה. In Jl 3^{3}, Ob ^{11}, and Nah 3^{10} the verb יָדַד is employed, while in Jon 1^{7} and many other passages we have הִפִּיל. When the word for 'lot' stands as subject, the intransitive verb עָלָה (Lv 16^{9}) or יָצָא (Nu 33^{54}, Jos 19$^{1\text{ff.}}$) is employed. To take by lot is לָכַד.

The occasions on which decisions were determined by lot may be classified as follows :—

(1) In criminal cases, in order to discover the culprit. The earliest recorded instance is that of Achan (Jos 7^{14}). Next comes that of Jonathan (1 S 14^{42}). In Jon 1^{7} we read that the lot was used as a means of fixing on the guilty source of the continued stormy weather. This example is instructive, as it exhibits the common and identical tradition as existing among ancient Hebrews and the Phœnician sailors, as we may assume them to have been, who accompanied Jonah (cf. Josephus, BJ III. viii. 7).

(2) In appointing to office, e.g. to that of king (1 S 10$^{20\text{ff.}}$, where the choice of Saul as the first king of Israel is recorded). We have another example in the NT, when the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judas is supplied by the election by lot of Matthias (Ac 1^{26}). Similarly, priestly functions in the temple-worship were apportioned among the sixteen sons of Eleazar and eight sons of Ithamar (1 Ch 24$^{4.\,5}$; cf. Lk 1^{9}); so also in the service of song (1 Ch 25$^{8\text{ff.}}$) and in the delivery of wood for the altar (Neh 10^{35}; cf. 11^{1}).

(3) In the division of property. The most notable instance of this is in the assignment of territory among the tribes of Israel (Nu 26$^{55\text{ff.}}$ 33^{54} 34^{13} 36^{2}, Jos 13^{6} 14^{2} 16^{1} etc., Ps 105^{3}, Ac 13^{19}). Thus by a natural transition the land itself, when divided, came to be designated by this word גּוֹרָל (Jos 15^{1} 17$^{14\text{ff.}}$, Jg 1^{3}, Is 57^{6}). Hence we frequently find this term metaphorically applied to express the destiny which is awarded by God, whether favourable or the reverse (Ps 16^{5}, Is 17^{14} 34^{17}, Jer 13^{25}, Dn 12^{13}). The division of the booty taken in war, or of the property of prisoners or criminals, was often carried out by means of the lot (Jl 3^{3}, Nah 3^{10}, Ob^{11}, Ps 22^{18}, Mt 27^{35}, Jn 19^{24}).

(4) The lot was also employed on the great Day of Atonement in the selection of the he-goat for Jehovah and for Azazel respectively (Lv 16$^{7-10}$). See arts. Azazel and Atonement (Day of). According to the Mishna Tractate Joma (iii. 9) these lots were made at first of boxwood and afterwards of gold, and shaken in an urn.

We have no clear indications as to the actual nature of the lots used by ancient Israel. Probably they were small tablets of stone or wood, and were inscribed with the name of the person or tribe; or, in cases of criminal trial, they may have been of different colours, one (to express guilt) differing from all the others. Probably in many cases (as in the assignments of property) there was a second vessel containing lots inscribed with the name of the property (as land or slaves). But it is not necessary to suppose this. The name of the property might be called out and a lot containing the name of the tribe or person would be drawn from the vessel, or vice versâ. All this belongs to the uncertain realm of conjecture. We do know, however, that the lots were sometimes held in the fold of the outer garment (Pr 16^{33}).

Another point which is obscure is whether the function of deciding by lot was predominantly exercised by priests or not. From Neh 11^{1} we are led to infer that, unlike the use of the ephod and Urim and Thummim in pre-exilian times, the employment of the lot, in the times both before and after the Exile, was open equally to priests and laity.

Last of all, we have to consider the obscure derivation of the name of the feast of Purim from the supposed Persian word pûr, meaning 'lot' (Est 9$^{24.\,26}$; cf. 3^{7}). Lagarde has shown that no such Persian word exists. Pers. pâre = 'portion,' not 'lot.' Zimmern's combination of the name with the Babyl. puḫru, 'assembly' (ZATW, 1890, p. 158 ff.), is far more probable. Comp. the Mand. פוחרא, Syr. ܦܘܚܪܐ 'meal,' 'feast.' The interesting Babylonian parallels with the Esther narrative, suggested by him and by Jensen, will be found in Nowack's Heb. Archäol. ii. pp. 194–200, and in Wildeboer's 'Esther' in the Kurzer Hand-Commentar, p. 172 ff. See, further, Purim (Feast of).

LOVE (אַהֲבָה, ἀγάπη).—Love to God and love to man are primary principles of the NT religion. But Jesus declares that on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets (Mt 22^{40}; cf. 7^{12}, Mk 12$^{21-34}$). They are therefore primary principles of the OT religion as well. They are not, however, independent or co-ordinate, but are so related that the second springs from, or is conditioned by, the first. The love to man, in the biblical sense, springs from a heart renewed, and possessed with the love of God (1 Jn 4^{21}; cf. 2$^{7-11}$ 3^{10} 4$^{11.\,12}$); for only by such a heart will the view be taken of man's essential worth and dignity, of the true ends of his life, and of the possibilities of his recovery from sin, that makes love possible (cf. Lk 15^{10}); only in such a heart is the egoistic impulse conquered which leads us to regard other men as rivals to ourselves, to seek our own good in preference to theirs, to use them as means to our own ends, to treat them with indifference and neglect, or, if they come into collision with our interests, with envy, irritation, and resentment; only in such a heart is there the disposition and a sufficiently powerful motive, to a sustained, holy, spiritual, ungrudging, truly disinterested love to our fellow-men, even to those who have no claims upon us, or who may have injured us, or may be personally unworthy (Mt 5$^{43-48}$, Ro 12$^{19-21}$, 1 Jn 3$^{16.\,17}$ 4^{11}).* On the other hand, it is vain for us to profess to love God if we do not love our brethren (1 Jn 2$^{9-11}$ 3^{10} 4^{20}). But this love to God, again, which is the spring of love to man, has its source in the knowledge we have of the love which God has to us (1 Jn 4$^{7.\,19}$). It is the loving character of God as revealed in His words and acts to men (Ps 114^{1} etc.), peculiarly in His grace in Christ, culminating in the sacrifice of the Cross (Eph 5$^{1.\,2}$, 1 Jn 4$^{9.\,10}$ etc.), in conjunction with the love which Christ Himself has manifested to us (Jn 13^{34} 15^{12}, Gal 2^{20}, Eph 5^{25} etc.), which begets responsive love, and leads to the entire surrender of ourselves to the service of God, and of our fellow-men for God's sake. Alike in OT and in NT, love to God and love to man lead up as their last source to love in God Himself, and it is from this highest point of view, accordingly, that our proper study of the subject must begin.

i. Love of God.—(A) The OT Doctrine.—Love, generally, is that principle which leads one moral being to desire and delight in another, and reaches its highest form in that personal fellowship in which each lives in the life of the other, and finds his joy in imparting himself to the other, and in receiving back the outflow of that other's affection into himself. The quality and degree of love vary with the relation in which the persons loving and loved stand to each other, the highest examples of human love—those, therefore, which are peculiarly taken as the images of the divine in its tenderest relations (Is 54[5], Ezk 23, Hos 11[1]) —being the love of husband to wife, and of parent to child. Love, therefore, in God, is in general that principle which leads Him to desire and seek the good of all His moral creatures; to impart benefits to them in every scale and degree of blessing; to establish relations of fellowship with them, that He may bless them more fully; to recover and restore them when they have turned aside from their true end, and lost themselves through sin (Hos 13[9]); highest of all, to admit them to participation in His own holy, blessed life (1 Jn 1[3]), in which He and they become one, as the Father and Son are one (Jn 17[21]). As the central principle of the divine character—for 'God is love' (1 Jn 4[8])—every other attribute stands in relation and subordination to this, though they are not on this account (as by Ritschl and others) to be immediately identified with it. 'All the divine attributes are combined in love, as in their centre and vital principle. Wisdom is its intelligence; might its productivity; the entire natural creation and the entire revelation of righteousness in history are means by which it attains its teleological aims' (Martensen). (For an exhaustive examination of the idea of the divine love in its theological and ethical relations, see Dorner's System of Christian Ethics, pp. 58–96, 374–382).

* Trench accordingly remarks that ἀγάπη 'is a word born within the bosom of revealed religion. It occurs in the LXX, but there is no example of its use in any heathen writer whatever; the utmost they attained to here was φιλανθρωπία and φιλαδελφία, and the last, indeed, never in any sense but as the love between brethren in blood' (Trench, Synonyms, p. 42). It has, indeed, been argued by Deissmann (but his grounds are very weak) that ἀγάπη was a word in use in the Egyptian vernacular, from which it was adopted both by Jews and Christians. See Expos. Times, ix. (1898) pp. 272, 501, 567.

When, with this general conception of love as an attribute of God, we turn to the OT, we are apt to feel disappointment. Holiness is in the foreground; love seems in the background. The term 'love' (vb. אָהֵב, noun אַהֲבָה), used of God's love to His people, is not found, if Dt be late, till the time of the prophets. Hosea is the first who develops the idea (under the images of marriage and sonship, Hos 3[1] 11[1] 14[4]). In Dt, Is, Jer, etc., it occurs repeatedly (Dt 4[37] 7[13] 10[15] etc., Is 48[14] 63[9], Jer 31[3], Zeph 3[17]). Moreover, the love thus spoken of is a love only to the covenant people. 'The particular word love,' says Schultz, 'is hardly ever applied to God; and where it does occur in a late writer (Mal 1[2]), it denotes God's special covenant love for Israel; and the reverse side of this is, of course, hatred of the hostile peoples' (Alttest. Theol. p. 547). This first impression, however, regarding the OT religion, gives way to a different one on narrower inspection. As respects the mere word, we shall find that a quite analogous phenomenon meets us in the NT. Singular as it may appear, it is the case that the terms ἀγάπη and ἀγαπᾶν are never once applied to God in the Synoptic Gospels. The nearest approach is ἀγαπητός as a designation of the well-beloved Son (Mt 3[17] 12[18] etc.). The Synoptics are full of a Father who loves, yet the word is never once used. In the Acts the words ἀγάπη and ἀγαπᾶν never once occur as applied either to God or man. In the Gospel of St. John, apart from the (evangelist's) statement, 'God so loved the world' (Jn 3[16]), it is, as in the Synoptics, the Son who is primarily the object of the Father's love (Jn 3[35] 17[26]); and this love of the Father is extended to the disciples in union with Him (Jn 14[21] 17[23. 26]). But after the earthly manifestation of Christ had been summed up in His death and resurrection, and reflection had begun on the completed revelation, there was no difficulty in speaking of the love of God (Ro 5[5. 8] 8[35. 39], 2 Co 13[14], 1 Jn 3[1] 4[8-12] etc.). In a similar way God's acts of love in OT precede the use of the term. As Dillmann remarks of the term 'righteousness' (צֶדֶק), which likewise is not found in the Mosaic books, 'The ethical norm, the will of God, must first be revealed according to its content, before there could be mention of an agreement of the acts of God with this norm' (Alttest. Theol. p. 271; see his whole excellent treatment of the love of God, pp. 258–283).

When Dt and the prophets speak of the love of God, they carry back that love to the beginning of God's dealings with Israel as a nation, and find the proof of it in His acts towards that people, and the covenant He made with them (Hos 11[1], Is 63[9], Ezk 16). Dt carries the love further back still, to the time of the patriarchs, for whose sake this kindness was shown to their descendants (Dt 4[37], cf. Is 51[1]). And the biblical history has only to be studied in its entirety to see that it is a revelation of the love of God to Israel throughout. The word itself may not be employed,—in the psalms we find it used with such objects as 'righteousness,' 'judgment,' 'Zion,' 'the gates of Zion,' etc. (Ps 11[7] 33[5] 78[68] 82[2]), —but there is a rich vocabulary of terms to denote the particular manifestations of love: as חֶסֶד, mercy, loving-kindness; חֵן, grace, favour; טוֹב, טוּב, goodness, long-suffering, etc., and these are constantly in use. The wrath of God also is not a blind impulse, but springs from an ethical ground, and is tempered and restrained by His long-suffering and mercy (Ex 34[6], Nu 14[18], Is 48[9], Jer 15[15], Nah 1[3. 7], Ps 78[38] etc.). It is no doubt true, as alleged, that the special object of this love of God is the covenant people Israel—a fact which has again its exact analogue in the use of ἀγάπη in NT (see below); but it is to be borne in mind that this particularism is with a view to an ultimate wider blessing (Gn 12[1-3], Ps 67. 87 RV); and the term 'hate' in Mal 1[3] is not to be more rigidly interpreted than Christ's own use of the same term (Lk 14[26]). Schultz observes, 'Passages like Gn 29[31] and Pr 30[23] show that the expression "hatred" is taken from the idioms of polygamy, and denotes, not hostility, but neglect' (Alttest. Theol. p. 547). As against the idea that the love of God was that of the narrow partiality of a tribal deity for his protégés many facts speak. The original creation was evidently an outcome of goodness (Ps 136[1-9]), and God 'blesses' the original representatives of mankind, and richly dowers them with dominion over the creatures (Gn 1[27-29]). The patience of God bears with the antediluvian world (Gn 6[3]); and after the flood His covenant is made with Noah for all flesh (Gn 9[8-17]). The Abrahamic covenant has, as shown, an aspect of blessing to the world. It is repeatedly declared that the whole earth is full of God's goodness, and that His mercies are over all His works (Ps 33[5] 119[64] 145[7-9] etc.). When it is declared that God desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he turn from his wickedness and live (Ezk 18[32] 33[11]), this cannot be held to apply exclusively to Israel; and the Bk. of Jonah furnishes a proof that the pity of God extends to heathen nations as well as to His own people (Jon 4[10. 11]). The classical passage on the divine character in OT is that in the Mosaic history in which J″ proclaims His name, 'The Lord, the Lord, a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger,' etc. (Ex 34[6. 7]); and it is also that in which the graciousness of this character is brought to fullest expression. If the sins of the fathers are visited on the third and fourth generation of those that hate Him, mercy is kept for thousands of those that love Him (cf. Ex 20[5. 6]).

It is, however, doubtless, in the special relation of God to Israel that, in OT, His love is distinctively manifested, for this people He has bound in covenant with Himself, and set them apart, that He might be glorified through them. This relation of love is already implied in the term 'son' which He applies to the nation (Ex 4[22. 23]); but comes out with peculiar distinctness in the glowing language in which the covenant is proposed to the people at Sinai (Ex 19[3-6]). This relation springs in no sense from desert, but is a result of God's free electing grace (Dt 7[7]); and, so far from placing Israel in a position of favouritism in which their offences are lightly condoned, it lays on them an increased responsibility and subjects them to special chastisements in case of unfaithfulness (Am 3^{2}). But the same love secures that God will not cast His people off, but will work on them by judgment and mercy till He has finally subdued them to Himself (Hos 2, 14 etc.).

An interesting point of inquiry relates to the relation of this 'love' of God in OT to His other ethical attributes of 'righteousness,' 'truth,' 'zeal,' 'wrath,' holiness,' etc. On the relation to 'wrath' (with 'zeal,' 'holiness'), see ANGER; but a word may be here said on the relation to 'righteousness' (with 'truth,' 'faithfulness,' etc.). These two ('righteousness' and 'love') are not to be identified (as with Ritschl, etc.), yet they stand in the closest relation, and God's 'righteousness' is manifest in His saving acts (Ps 31^{1} $48^{10.\,11}$ $103^{6.\,7}$, Hos 2^{19} etc.). Righteousness, with Ritschl, is identical with grace; it is the consistency of God in carrying out the ends of His love (Recht. und Ver. ii. pp. 102–113). But ethical norms are implied alike in the determination of these ends, and in the choice of the means by which they are accomplished, and it is these ethical norms with which 'righteousness' has to do. 'Righteousness' is that which answers to the ethically right norm or standard. So far as 'love' is involved in ethical perfection, or is demanded by that, it falls under the category of 'righteousness,' and, so far as God has bound Himself by covenant obligations to His people, His 'righteousness' requires that He be faithful to His pledges (cf. 1 Jn 1^{9}). 'Righteousness' thus interposes for their salvation, help, protection, etc. But it has other and more general functions in the upholding of the moral order and judgment of the world, and the punishment of the obstinately wicked (e.g. Ps 94. 96^{13} 98^{9}). Its highest satisfaction, nevertheless, is not the infliction of judgment, but the conversion and salvation of the sinner and the production of righteousness in the earth (Ezk 33^{11}, Ps 11^{7}, Is 45^{8} 61^{11} etc. Dorner has an original investigation of the relation of love to righteousness in his System of Christian Ethics, pp. 68–93). We may add that it is of the essence of love in God as in man that it does not remain a mere self-enclosed or inoperative principle, but reveals itself in acts for the benefit of the beloved object. It is impossible to believe in a God of love who, as Carlyle said, 'does nothing.' The religion of the Old Testament, therefore, and of the New as well, is pre-eminently that of a God who reveals His gracious purposes in history, and acts for man's salvation (Ps $103^{6.\,7}$, Ro 5^{8} etc.).

(B) The NT Doctrine of the love of God presupposes that of OT, and stands in no essential contradiction with it (as Marcion supposed), but perfects and completes it in the full revelation of the character of God in His Son, and in the discovery of His plan of love for man's salvation,—in the gospel. It is certainly a striking fact—especially for those who would have us find the whole revelation of Christ in the Synoptics—that, as remarked above, Jesus in no single saying in these Gospels speaks directly of the 'love' (ἀγάπη) of the Father, or uses the corresponding verb (ἀγαπᾶν). The impartial beneficence of the Father is indeed urged as an example (Mt 5^{45}); and the Father is set before us as rewarding, hearing prayer, giving good gifts, forgiving trespasses, caring for His children, as for the lilies and the fowls, revealing Himself to babes, avenging injuries to His little ones, etc. (e.g., Mt $6^{1-4.\,6.\,8.\,25-32}$ 10^{29-31} 11^{25} $18^{6.\,10.\,14}$). But perhaps even these determinations do not carry us essentially beyond the bounds of OT. Yet there is a new significance in the very name 'Father,' the depth and tenderness of which are revealed in the relation of the Father to the 'beloved' Son (ἀγαπητός); and the whole spirit, character, and gracious words and deeds of Jesus are a revelation of the meaning of love in God which is altogether new. It is in the Gospel of St. John that we have the assurances that those who are in union with the Son are loved with the same infinite and tender love with which the Son Himself is loved by the Father (Jn $14^{21.\,23}$ $17^{23.\,26}$). In Ac the word 'love' is not used of God's attitude to men, though God's acts of grace (χάρις frequently) in the sending of His Son, raising Him from the dead, exalting Him to heaven, sending the Spirit, granting forgiveness of sins, salvation, and healing through His name, are abundantly extolled (Ac 2. 3. 4^{1-12} 10^{34-43} 13^{23-39} etc.). It is, however, in the Pauline and Johannine Epistles that this doctrine of the marvellous love of God, as revealed in the gift, incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and glorification of the Son, and in the salvation and eternal life that have come to men through Him, with unspeakable spiritual blessings and privileges here, and everlasting glory hereafter, is discovered in its full-orbed splendour (Ro $5^{5.\,8}$ 8^{35-39}, 1 Jn 3^{1} 4^{8-12} etc.). In so far as God desires the salvation of all (1 Ti 1^{15} 2^{4} 4^{10}), and has provided in the mission and sacrifice of His Son for the salvation of all (1 Ti 2^{6}, 1 Jn 2^{2} 4^{10}), His love embraces the whole world (Jn 3^{16}),—this extension of the blessings of salvation to the Gentiles on equal terms with the Jews being the peculiar 'mystery' of God, which had been hid from earlier ages, and which St. Paul was commissioned to reveal (Eph 3^{1-11}; in this sense the NT doctrine is a transcending of the 'particularism' of the OT, Gal 5^{6}, Col 3^{11} etc.). Nevertheless, the love of God is not in NT, any more than in OT, a vaguely diffusive, indiscriminating affection, but has for its peculiar objects those in union with Christ, who, as chosen in Him (the elect one, Is 42^{1}, Mt 12^{18}) before the foundation of the world, and foreordained to the adoption of children, and all spiritual blessings, according to the good pleasure (εὐδοκία) of His will — 'the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His will' (Eph 1^{4-12}) —are conducted by God ('foreknown,' 'foreordained,' 'called,' 'justified,' 'glorified') to the glory destined for them (Ro 8^{28-39}, cf. Jn 6^{37-40} etc.). The highest form of love, alike in God and man, is not a matter of vague impulse, but involves intelligent choice (diligo), the grounds of choice lying sometimes in the objects loved, but in the case of God, in dealing with the unworthy, lying solely in His own good, wise, and holy will (χάρις, Eph 2^{8} etc.). The exponent of this love of God to us is Jesus Christ, whose own love is joined with God's as part of the same manifestation of the divine character (Jn 10^{7-18}, Ro 5^{9-11}, Eph 3^{19} 5^{2}, 1 Jn 4^{10}, Rev 1^{5} etc.). In the compassion, tenderness, devotion, grace of Jesus in His earthly life; in His hope for the vilest, and yearning desire to bring them back to God; in His self-sacrifice and surrender of Himself for His sheep (Jn $10^{11.\,14}$), we have the 'interpretation' (ἐξηγήσατο, Jn 1^{18}) of the Father's heart to us. Love, as thus exhibited, is not simply complacency in the good; it unites itself also with the bad, yearns over them with inexpressible tenderness and sorrow (Mt 23^{37}), identifies itself so closely with them that their sin and shame and sorrow are felt and shared as if they belonged to the loving One Himself,—love, in other words, becomes substitutionary, and in the case of Christ propitiatory (Mt 8^{17} 9^{36}, Lk 15, Jn 10^{10-18}, 1 Jn 4^{9-14}). The last and all-comprehensive word on this subject is spoken by the Apostle of Love when he sums up the whole significance of the gospel revelation in the saying — 'GOD IS LOVE' (1 Jn 4^{8}).

It lies beyond our province to discuss the more properly theological questions which arise out of this scriptural doctrine of the love of God—its bearings, e.g., on the doctrine of the Trinity (cf. Sartorius, Doctrine of the Divine Love, p. 8 ff., Eng. tr.); or its relation to Creation, and the supreme ethical end (cf. Ritschl, Recht. und Ver. iii.^{3} pp. 263–266). It is a tempting, and not baseless, speculation, that, as love in its essential nature has relation to another, and involves, in its fulness, surrender and self-communication to another, so, if love and fatherhood are to be predicated eternally of God, there must be self-distinction and sonship also within the divine essence (for the world and human spirits, as non-eternal, contingent, and finite, cannot be adequate objects of this eternally complete, and infinite, and active love of God). It is a speculation, however, which lies, in this form, beyond Scripture, though the NT doctrine of the Trinity throws back light on it, and it has a point of relation to the recognition of the Son in the Gospels as the peculiar object of the Father's knowledge and love (Mt 3^{17} 11^{27} 12^{18}, Jn 5^{20} etc.).

ii. LOVE IN MAN.—The primary and unalterable duty of man, in both OT and NT, is to love God with all his mind, and heart, and soul, and strength (Dt 6^{5}, Mt 22$^{37.\,38}$, Mk 12$^{29-33}$). This obligation is based in part on the natural relation of man to God as created and dependent (Dt 8$^{17.\,18}$, Ps 95$^{6.\,7}$ 100^{3}, Is 1^{3}); but specially on the morally perfect character of God (Mt 5^{48}, Mk 10^{18}); and, above all, on the fact that God is Himself a Being of Love—this, too, not simply in a general respect, but as having manifested His love in gracious relations to ourselves. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' etc. (Dt 6^{5}). In OT it is the superabounding grace of God in His relations to Israel in the covenant (Dt 4$^{1-14}$ $^{32-40}$ 11$^{1.\,13.\,22}$ 19^{9} 32$^{1-14}$, Ps 5^{11} 31^{23} 116^{1}, Is 54, Hos 11$^{1-4}$ 14, etc.); in NT it is the love of God in Christ (Ro 8$^{35.\,39}$ 12^{1}, 1 Co 2^{9}, Eph 2$^{4-10}$, 1 Jn 4^{19}) which is the ground of obligation. It is evident how far we are here from the abstract grounds of natural theology. This love, moreover, is no mere sentiment, or excitement of feeling, but is connected in both OT and NT with an obedient will and the keeping of God's commandments (Dt 6, Jos 22^{5}, Is 1$^{10-18}$, Mt 7$^{21-23}$, Jn 14^{15} 15$^{9-14}$ etc.). 'This is the love of God,' St. John says emphatically, 'that we keep his commandments' (1 Jn 5^{3}). The scriptural love to God is thus entirely practical, it is also intelligent, and fed through growing knowledge ('thy mind'; cf. Eph 1$^{17.\,18}$ 3$^{17.\,18}$ etc.). It will specially manifest itself in the intelligent adoption of the ends of God's kingdom as our own (Mt 6^{33}). The love of God thus enspheres the being of the true child of God; it is shed abroad in the heart (Ro 5^{5}); the soul dwells in love, i.e. dwells in God and God in it (1 Jn 4^{16}). But this feeling and enlargement of the heart in love to God, and experience of the love of God, cannot remain self-contained. It spontaneously overflows in love to others, and yearns with the desire to bring them within the same circle of blessing. Specially will it feel a peculiar delight in those who are within the same sphere of love as itself. The love of God thus necessarily issues in love to our brother; and so imperative is this connexion, that where the latter does not exist, we are warranted in declaring that the former is absent also (1 Jn 3$^{14-17}$ 4$^{7.\,8}$).

Love to man has thus its spring and principle in love to God, and here a wider and a narrower sphere is recognized—the one, the entire human family; the other, the peculiar brotherhood in Christ (Gal 6^{10}, 1 P 2^{10}). The grounds on which this duty of love is based are entirely different from those of philosophical ethics. The stoical ideal of a brotherhood of reason remained an unrealized dream. The ethics of Jesus laid the foundations of a true love to man in spiritual relation to God, and the destination to sonship in His kingdom. A brotherhood arises out of the Fatherhood. If we inquire more narrowly into the biblical development of this great duty of the gospel, we find the principle in which the whole is involved already enunciated in OT, though its full scope and bearing were not apparent under the Old Covenant. It is from Leviticus (19^{18}) that Jesus quotes the precept, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' as one of the two 'great' commandments on which hang all the law and the prophets (Mt 22$^{39.\,40}$, Mk 12^{31}); even as He declares of His enunciation of 'The Golden Rule'—'for this is the law and the prophets.' The question was as to the breadth of the signification of the term 'neighbour'; and while here also the correct principle was already involved in the doctrine of the oneness of the human family as made in the image of God (Gn 1^{27}), and in the truth of one God of the spirits of all flesh (Nu 16^{22}), it was alien to the modes of thought of antiquity, and perhaps was impossible to the Hebrews under the peculiar limitations of their national economy, to give to this pregnant term 'neighbour' a universal application. (How few do so even now under Christian teaching!) It is certain in any case that they did not give it this wider scope; and it was reserved for Jesus to correct 'particularism' here also, and, in the light of His broad, universal doctrine of God and man, to lift this duty to its proper level of unlimited obligation. Our 'neighbour,' He teaches in the parable of the Good Samaritan, is every man without distinction of nationality (Lk 10$^{29-37}$); and the obligation of love is extended to embrace even enemies (Mt 5$^{43-48}$), the pattern in this case being the example of the Father in heaven. (The germ is found here also in OT both in precept and example, Lv 19$^{17.\,18}$, 1 S 24. 26, Ps 7^{5}). This principle, then, becomes in Christian morality the single principle in which all duty to our fellow-men is summed up, for it requires, comprehensively, that we do our neighbour no injury (Ro 13^{10}), but do him all the good we can; it requires even that we overlook his wrongs to us, and strive to overcome his evil with our good (Ro 12$^{19-21}$); and it furnishes the only, but all-powerful motive, through which this discharge of duty can be accomplished. He who loves his neighbour as himself will not, e.g., kill him, will not steal from him, will not bear false witness against him, will not covet his possessions (Ro 13^{9}). But this love will further change these negative precepts into positive ones, and lead him to seek his neighbour's highest well-being in soul and body. In this one word, therefore, as it is repeatedly said, the whole law is fulfilled (Ro 13$^{8.\,10}$, Gal 5^{14}, Ja 2^{8}). The example of Jesus in His earthly life is again the interpretation to us of the depth and range of this precept, alike in its practical beneficence, its compassion for the lost, its forgiveness of injuries, and its voluntary self-sacrifice, even unto death, for others (Ac 10^{38}, Ro 15^{3}, He 12$^{2.\,3}$, 1 P 2$^{21-24}$, 1 Jn 4^{16} etc.). How high and wide-reaching the spiritual requirements of this law of love are—how love is patient and kind; excludes envy; is humble; not easily provoked; does not impute motives; mourns over iniquity, and rejoices in truth; endures wrong; believes the best; where it cannot believe, hopes; where it cannot even hope, suffers—is magnificently brought out in that incomparable hymn of love chanted by St. Paul in 1 Co 13. In this principle of love, as we are further taught by Christ's example, and by apostolic teaching, there lies, not only the fulfilling of the law, but a great, nay, the chiefest, part of practical religion (Ja 1^{27} 2$^{14-18}$, 1 Jn 4$^{14-17}$). And we are reminded that it is precisely these deeds of love which the King is represented as inquiring into at the great last day of account, and it is by their presence or absence that men's everlasting destinies are adjudged (Mt 25^{34-46}).

LOVE (BROTHERLY).—See BROTHERLY LOVE.

LOVE, LOVELY, LOVER.—In 1 Es 4^{24} we find 'love' used in the concrete, one that is loved, 'when he hath stolen, spoiled, and robbed, he bringeth it to his love' (τῇ ἐρωμένῃ; Vulg. amabili suae; Wyc. 'leef' [=loved one]; Cov. 'his love'). Cf. Shaks. Venus and Adonis, 867—

'She hears no tidings of her love.'

The adj. lovely has come to be used somewhat carelessly, and now means scarcely more than attractive; but in AV it always carries a distinct sense of its origin. It has two meanings, however. 1. Worthy of being loved, Ezk 33^{32} 'thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice' (שִׁיר עֲגָבִים, lit. as AVm 'a song of loves,' RVm 'a love song'); Ca 5^{16} 'he is altogether lovely' (כֻּלּוֹ מַחֲמַדִּים, lit. 'all of him is loveablenesses'); Ph 4^8 'whatsoever things are lovely' (ὅσα προσφιλῆ). Cf. Preface to AV, 'A man may be counted . . . a comely man and lovely, though he have some warts upon his hand'; Tindale, Expositions, p. 26, 'If thou believe in Christ, that he is thy Saviour, that faith will lead thee in immediately, and show thee God with a lovely and amiable countenance'; Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, i. 3—

'Mir. Can you love a man?
Lil. Yes, if the man be lovely,
That is, be honest, modest.'

Milton, PL ix. 232—

'Nothing lovelier can be found
In woman than to study household good.'

2. Loving, 2 S 1^{23} 'Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives' (הַנֶּאֱהָבִים, lit. 'the loved,' LXX οἱ ἠγαπημένοι). Cf. Chaucer, Miller's Tale, i. 156—

'Many a lovely look on hem he caste.'

Shaks. Taming of Shrew, III. ii. 125—

'I should bid good-morrow to my bride,
And seal the title with a lovely kiss.'

Lover has become restricted in meaning. Its wider application formerly may be seen in Tindale's tr. of Lk 6^{32} 'For the very synners love their lovers'; 15^9 'And when she hath founde it she calleth her lovers and her neighbours'; 15^{29} 'and yet gavest thou me never soo moche as a kyd to make mery with my lovers'; 3 Jn ^{14} 'The lovers salute the. Grete the lovers by name.' So in AV, 1 K 5^1 'Hiram was ever a lover of David'; Ps 38^{11} 'My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore.' But if it was wider, it was also darker in meaning sometimes and definite enough, as in Hos 2^5 'For their mother hath played the harlot: she that conceived them hath done shamefully; for she said, I will go after my lovers.' Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 196, 'And Jeremie lykewyse in mokage of thame, sayis, Lat thy loveris delyver thee; call upon thame, and lat tham heir thee! Thow hast committed fornicatioun with thame, and hes committit huredome with stoke and stone.'

LOVE-FEASTS (ἀγάπαι, Jude ^{12} and some MSS of 2 P 2^{13}; δοχή, Apost. Const. ii. 28; ὑποδοχή or διακονία τραπεζῶν, Julian, Frag. Epist. p. 305 [ed. Spanheim, 1696]; δημώδης ἑστίασις, Clem. Alex. Pæd. II. i. 12; cf. συνευωχεῖσθαι, Jude, 2 P, ll.cc.; Latin, epulæ, Jude ^{12}, Vulg. convivium, 2 P 2^{13} ib., but, technically, agape from the 2nd cent. onwards [cf. Tert. Apol. 39, 'cœna nostra . . . id vocatur quod dilectio apud Græcos est'; Acta Perpet. et Fel. 17; Aug. c. Faustum, xx. 20]; Eng. RV 'feasts of charity').—These feasts sprang out of the common meals of the early Christian Church, in which all the members of the local church shared, and which served at once as a token of brotherhood (Ac 2^{46}) and as a method of helping the poor (Ac $6^{1.2}$; cf. Chrys. ad 1 Co 11^{17} καὶ γὰρ ἀγάπης ὑπόθεσις ἦν καὶ πενίας παραμυθία καὶ πλούτου σωφρονισμὸς καὶ φιλοσοφίας ἀφορμὴ τῆς μεγίστης καὶ ταπεινοφροσύνης διδασκαλία). They probably originated in an imitation of the private meal of a Jewish household, widened out by the Christian conception of brotherhood, and consciously reproducing the last Supper which the Lord had kept at Jerusalem; but their wide dissemination among the Gentile Christians would have been facilitated by the similar common meals which were usual in the pagan religious brotherhoods (Hatch, BL ii. p. 31 note). The fullest account of a love-feast in the NT is to be found in 1 Co 11^{17-34}; in subsequent writers, in Tert. Apol. 39.

The feast was an afternoon meal at which rich and poor met together in one common building. Formal prayers of benediction, based upon the Jewish benedictions, were said over the food; the prayers preserved in Didaché, c. 9, are possibly specimens of those used at the Agape. The 'Kiss of Charity' (φίλημα ἀγάπης, 1 P 5^{14}) perhaps concluded the meal. After the meal, hands were washed, lights were lit (cf. Ac 20^7), and there followed singing and prayer under the leadership of a prophet (Did. c. 14) or some other minister. The Agape stood in close connexion with the Eucharist, which possibly preceded it (so Chrys. loc. cit.), but more probably followed it; and hence the phrase ἀγάπην ποιεῖν seems to include the Eucharist in Ign. ad Smyrn. c. 8 (where see Lightfoot), and εὐχαριστία is applied to Christian meals in Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. ii. 10).

But the NT itself bears witness to the dangers which such a meal ran of degenerating into licence. St. Paul had to check this at Corinth, and perhaps also at Ephesus (Eph $5^{18.19}$). St. Peter mentions the presence of immoral men degrading the feast into a banquet (συνευωχούμενοι). The heathen were not slow to exaggerate this, and to accuse the Christians of wild licence and immorality. Hence in the course of the 2nd cent., throughout many parts of the Christian Church, the Agape was separated from the Eucharist, the former being celebrated in the evening, the latter in the morning. This was already the case in Bithynia at the time of Pliny's letter to Trajan (Ep. 96), and the Agape was dropped there owing to Trajan's edict against sodalitates. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 67) describes the Eucharist without any reference to the Agape; Tertullian (Apol. 39) describes the Agape without any reference to the Eucharist, and speaks of the Eucharist as celebrated before daylight (de Corona, c. 3). At Alexandria the connexion of the two, at any rate on some occasions, is found much later (cf. Socrates, HE v. 22), and the Agape took two forms there: either it retained the old idea of a common meal in the church, and tended at Alexandria to become an elaborate banquet; or it took the form of a dinner for the poor given by a richer brother at his own house, and apparently it was then called δοχή rather than Agape (Bigg, Christian Platonists, pp. 102–105). By the time of St. Augustine it was little more than a dole for the poor (c. Faustum, xx. 20; cf. Canons of Hippolytus, xxxi.–xxxv.). The changes in the observance of the Agape may be compared with those in the Roman 'sportula.' For the later history in which the meal was first banished from the churches and then entirely disused, the reader is referred to Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. The institution has left its permanent mark in two ways upon the Christian Church: first, in all acts of charity that take the form of entertainment of the poor; and, secondly, in certain points of ritual connected with the Eucharist, such as the offertory, the washing of hands, the kiss of peace, and in the Oriental Church the distribution among the poor of bread which had been blessed but not consecrated. The Methodist 'Love-feasts' were a deliberate attempt on Wesley's part to revive the apostolic practice.

LOVINGKINDNESS.—We owe this beautiful word to Coverdale. His use of it is somewhat capricious, and in that respect he has been imitated by all subsequent versions until we come to the American Revised Version. The Heb. word so translated (חֶסֶד ḥeṣed) is used of God's love to man, and less frequently of man's love to man. It is disputed whether it also denotes man's love to God. The passages relied on for the last meaning are Jer 2^2, Hos $6^{4.6}$, together with Is 57^1 men of piety, and 2 Ch 32^{32} 35^{26}, Neh 13^{14} pious acts. The Oxf. Heb. Lex. favours the sense of piety to God in all these places. It is only when the word means God's love to man that it was translated by Coverdale (followed by AV) 'lovingkindness,' and that was well, for, as Driver says, that term is too strong to be used generally of men. But unfortunately it is only some of the passages with that meaning that have been so translated, chiefly in the Psalter, the other renderings in AV being 'mercy' (Gn 19^{19} 24^{27} 32^{10}, Ex 15^{13} 20^6 34^7, Nu 14^{18}, Dt 5^{10} $7^{9.12}$, 2 S 7^{15} 22^{51}, 1 K 8^{23}, 1 Ch $16^{34.41}$ 17^{13}, 2 Ch 5^{13} $6^{14.42}$ $7^{3.6}$ 20^{21}, Ezr 3^{11} 7^{28} 9^9, Neh 1^5 9^{32} 13^{22}, Ps 5^7 6^4 13^5 18^{50} 21^7 23^6 $25^{7.10}$ $31^{7.16}$ 32^{10} $33^{5.18.22}$ 36^5 44^{26} 52^8 $57^{3.10}$ $59^{10.16.17}$ 61^7 62^{12} 66^{20} 69^{13} 77^8 $85^{7.10}$ $86^{5.13.15}$ $89^{1.2.14.24.28}$ 90^{14} 94^{18} 98^3 100^5 101^1 $103^{8.11.17}$ $106^{1.7.45}$ 107^1 108^4 $109^{21.26}$ 115^1 $118^{1.2.3.4.29}$ $119^{41.64.124}$ 130^7 $136^{1.2.3.4.5.6.7.8.9.10.11.12.13.14.15.16.17.18.19.20.21.22.23.24.25.26}$ 138^8 143^{12} 145^8 147^{11}, Pr 16^6, Is 55^3, Jer 33^{11}, La $3^{22.32}$, Dn 9^4, Mic $7^{18.20}$); 'goodness' (Ex 34^6, Ps 33^5 52^1 $107^{8.15.21.31}$ 144^2); 'kindness' (Ps 31^{21}, Jon 4^2); 'merciful kindness' (Ps 117^2 119^{76}). The RV has made but few changes. It has preferred 'lovingkindness' to 'mercy' in 2 S 22^{51}, Ps 5^7 6^4 18^{50} 21^7 $25^{7.10}$ 31^{16} 36^5 44^{26} 61^7 143^{12}, to 'goodness' in Ps 33^5, to 'kindness' in Ps 31^{21}, to 'merciful kindness' in Ps 119^{76}, and once it goes the other way, changing 'lovingkindnesses' in Ps 89^{49} into 'mercies.' But the Amer. Revisers have chosen 'lovingkindness' for all the passages in which the meaning is God's love to man, and for these only. See their note on this word under 'Classes of Passages' in the Appendix to the English RV.

The best statement of the meanings of ḥeṣed in the OT will be found in the Oxf. Heb. Lexicon. Cheyne has much to say of the word, see esp. his Origin of the Psalter, p. 378 (where he happily distinguishes אַהֲבָה from חֶסֶד in reference to man, the former being 'right feeling towards J" as the root of right action,' the latter 'right action as the flower of right feeling'); see also W. R. Smith, Prophets^{2}, pp. 160 f., 408 f.; Driver on Dt 7^9; Kirkpatrick, Psalms, i. 220; Girdlestone, Synonyms of OT^{2}, p. 111 f.; and the art. HASIDÆANS. The English word is purely biblical.

LOZON (Λοζών), 1 Es 5^{33}=Darkon, Ezr 2^{56}, Neh 7^{58}.

LUBIM (לוּבִים, in Dn 11^{43} לֻבִים, Λίβυες LXX, Libyes Vulg.).—They are mentioned as auxiliaries and neighbours of the Egyptians: 2 Ch 12^3 as the chief auxiliaries of Shishak, 16^8 with the Ethiopian Zerah, Nah 3^9 as helpers of Thebes at the side of Put, Dn 11^{43} together with the Ethiopians as neighbours of Egypt. Most probably the Lehabim of Gn 10^{13}, 1 Ch 1^{11} are the same nation (see LEHABIM); the identification with the LUDIM (which see), attempted by some, has many difficulties to contend against. The name appears in Arabic as Lûbî لُوبِّى = the singular לובי (occurring in the Talmud) 'Libyan' (on the Egyptian form, see below).

The Greeks first used Libya of the whole country W. of Egypt which was reckoned as a part of Asia; consequently Libya was equivalent to Africa. Later, Libya was used only of the part between Egypt and the Roman province of Africa, consisting of Marmarica in the E. (Libya Inferior as a Roman province) and Cyrenaïca (Libya Superior, modern Barka) in the W. (Libya Interior was S. of both). The Libyan Nomos (i.e. country) of Egypt extended from Marea to Apis (W.) and, along the frontier of Egypt, to Memphis (S.), a strip of borderland always visited by Libyans with their flocks.

The Libyans appear on Egyptian monuments from the earliest period, but more frequently from about B.C. 1600. They are depicted (earliest example in Newberry, Benihasan, I. pl. 45, 47) as tall, well-built, of whiter complexion even than the Syrians and Europeans, with blue eyes, blond hair and beard. These pictures agree closely with the type of the modern Kabyles in Algeria, in whom many travellers have sought descendants of strayed Germans, e.g. Vandals (very erroneously, as the Egyptian pictures show). Their hair, ornamented with ostrich feathers, was worn tied in a long pig-tail hanging over the ear, while it was cut half-length at the back part of the head; the beard was pointed. Blue tatoo-marks, varying according to the tribe, ornamented the body. The dress consisted of a girdle and a long mantle. They were chiefly a pastoral people, wandering with their leather-tents and their flocks of goats and sheep over their sandy country. Frequently they appeared at the W. frontier of Egypt as invaders, especially under the 19th and 20th dynasties, i.e. after 1350. Seti I., Ramses II. and III. record invasions warded off with great difficulty. Merenptah, the successor of Ramses II., defeated an army of Libyans allied with pirates from Asia Minor and Europe, after they had nearly reached Memphis, slaying almost 10,000 of them. They fought with arrows and long swords, the chiefs from chariots. Being very brave, they were employed as mercenaries by the Pharaohs, more and more frequently after B.C. 1100. Finally they became the privileged soldiers of Egypt; and their leaders, as Egyptian generals, grew so influential that several dynasties of Egyptian princes, as well as the great Bubastide (22) and Saïtic (24, 26) dynasties, which include most of the Pharaohs mentioned by name in the Bible, were of Libyan descent. E.g. Shishak (more correctly Shoshaḳ for Shoshanḳ) is a name of Libyan etymology. In their own country the Libyans assumed a few elements of Egyptian culture, e.g. the worship of the god Am(m)on (whose principal temple was in the oasis of Amon, now Siwah), circumcision, etc., but always remained at a low stage of civilization. Their strange and rude system of writing, still employed by the desert tribes S. of Algeria, and now called Tifinaghen, was borrowed from Southern Arabia, it would appear, about the Persian period. Also the introduction of the camel, and several customs, possibly also elements of their language, point to later connexions with this country—a strange fact, and not yet sufficiently understood. Their difficult language is, however, witnessed to by Egyptian monuments from about 1400, so that only a small part of the people can have consisted of immigrating Easterners. Under Greek (in Cyrene) and Carthaginian influence, and still more under Roman dominion, the Libyans were only superficially civilized in the cities; a large part of them, especially in the interior, always remained barbarous shepherds. They extended from Egypt to Timbuctoo and the Senegal river until the invasion of the Arabs; the subsequent adoption of Arab religion made a great part of them give up their language and nationality. Their language (the Tamasheg), which recently has been studied very zealously (in England especially by the late Prof. Newman), is at present much mixed with Arabic. Grammatically, however, it shows the purest Hamitic type. It is not so closely related to ancient Egyptian as we should expect, and betrays more affinity with the Hamitic languages on the coast of the Red Sea. The national name of this great race (at present pronounced Imushagh, Imuhag, etc.) is of obscure etymology. The Egyptians called them Themḥeu (plural, perhaps the same word), later Phaiat, and the easternmost part Theḥnu (or Theḥnyu, plural) and distinguished various tribes. Of these the Mashauasha (Μάξυες of Herodotus?) and Lob (written Ra-bu, plur. Ra-bu-y) were most prominent in the wars of Dyn. 19 and 20 (minor tribes Kahak, Qaiqasha, Shaïtep, etc.), and we can observe how the name Lob gradually became general, as we find it among the Greeks and all Semites. It is probable that in Gn 10 it already includes the whole of the white Africans W. of Egypt, although the Egyptians (and through these the Hebrews) hardly knew any tribes W. of Cyrene; the dominion of the conquering Pharaohs did not extend even so far. W. MAX MÜLLER.

LUCAS, Philem [24] (AV only) for LUKE (wh. see).

LUCIFER (הֵילֵל 'shining one,' i.e. the morning star, as explained by the following words בֶּן־שָׁחַר 'son of dawn,' Is 14^{12}).—The word is applied by the writer of the prophecy to the king of Babylon, partly in reference to the astrology for which Chaldæa was famous in ancient times, partly to the prevailing belief in the deification of heroes. The king of Babylon had complacently looked forward to the time when he would ascend into heaven and exalt his throne above the stars of God. But in reality his dead body would be treated with the utmost contempt, 'a carcase trodden under foot'; while his soul would descend into Sheol, and there receive but an empty honour from the shades, astounded that the great and mighty king could become like one of themselves.

From a supposed reference to this passage in our Lord's words, 'I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven' (Lk 10^{18}), in connexion with Rev 9^{1-11} (the language of 9^1 being in part probably derived from this passage), Lucifer came in the Middle Ages to be a common appellation of Satan. The star of Rev 9^{1-11} is a fallen angel who has given to him the key of the abyss, from which he sets loose upon the earth horribly formed locusts with scorpions' tails, who have, however, power to hurt only such men as have not the seal of God on their foreheads. But this angel is not actually identified with Satan by the writer of the Apocalypse. The imagery in Is was no doubt suggested by a meteor, and possibly it was so in Rev also.

LUCIUS (Λεύκιος) is described in 1 Mac $15^{16\text{ff.}}$ as the 'consul of the Romans' (ὕπατος Ῥωμαίων), who, in consequence of the embassy sent to Rome by the high-priest Simon, wrote to Ptolemy VII. Euergetes, king of Egypt, to inform him that the Jews were under the protection of Rome. He sent copies of the same decree to other Eastern sovereigns, and to several small independent states. The title of this decree of the Senate is clearly imperfect, and it is not certain who is intended by this consul, whose prænomen is alone given. His date is approximately determined by the fact that Numenius and his fellow-ambassadors returned to Palestine in B.C. 139–138 (1 Mac 15^{10-15}). Three possible identifications may be mentioned.

1. Lucius Cæcilius Metellus Calvus was consul in B.C. 142. This, however, seems too early, though the historian places the despatch of the embassy to Rome before the decree of the Jews in favour of Simon, made on the 18th Elul, B.C. 141 (1 Mac 14^{24-28}).

2. Josephus mentions a decree of the Senate, passed under similar circumstances, and couched in similar terms, which he assigns to the 9th year of Hyrcanus II. (Ant. XIV. viii. 5). Most moderns, however, except Mommsen, consider that Josephus is in error with regard to the date, and identify this senatus-consultum with that passed in the time of Simon. In Josephus the prætor Lucius Valerius is named as presiding in the Senate; it is possible that he is the 'consul Lucius' of 1 Mac 15^{16} (cf. Schürer, HJP I. i. 266 ff.).

3. Most probably the reference is to L. Calpurnius Piso, who was consul B.C. 139. His prænomen is often given as Cneius, but Lucius is the best authenticated reading in Valerius Maximus i. 3. 2 (see Westcott in Smith's DB 'Lucius'; Schürer, l.c.). H. A. WHITE.

LUCIUS (Λούκιος).—1. Of Cyrene (ὁ Κυρηναῖος). In Ac 13^1 we are told that certain prophets and teachers were at Antioch, and amongst them is mentioned Lucius of Cyrene. He comes third in the list, and is supposed to have been one of the prophets. Nothing further is known about him. The suggestion that he was the same as St. Luke (Λουκᾶς) has nothing in its favour. Such evidence as there is points the other way. For the difference between the descriptions of scenes at Antioch and those at places which the author of Acts must have visited is striking, and makes it clear that the writer had no intimate knowledge of the place, and doubtful if he had ever been there. It is probable, however, that it was this mistaken identification which first caused the tradition that St. Luke was an Antiochene by birth, which appears in Eus. HE iii. 4, and in many subsequent writers, and which is also without foundation.

2. In Ro 16^{21} a certain Lucius is introduced as sending greetings with Timothy and others. Whether he was the same person as Lucius of Cyrene we have no means of judging.

A. C. HEADLAM.

LUCRE (from Lat. lucrum through Fr. lucre, gain) had not always the bad sense which belongs to it in AV and in modern use. Erasmus, On the Crede (1533), fol. 70, says 'God is very greatlye to be thanked, whose goodness hath tourned the malyce and wickednes of other men unto his servauntes, into the lucre and encreace of godlynesse.' In 1 S 8[3] בֶּצַע, which means gain obtained by violent or dishonest means, is rendered 'lucre,' 'And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment' (LXX ἐξέκλιναν ὀπίσω τῆς συντελείας, Vulg. declinaverunt post avariciam, Wyc. 'boweden aside after averyce,' Cov. 'enclyned unto covetousnes,' Gen. 'turned aside after lucre'). The word is not again used in OT, but occurs five times in NT, always qualified by the adj. 'filthy.' In 1 Ti 3[3. 8], Tit 1[7] the adj. αἰσχροκερδής is tr[d] 'greedy of filthy lucre' (RV after edd. omits from 1 Ti 3[3]); in 1 P 5[2] the adv. αἰσχροκερδῶς is translated 'for filthy lucre'; and in Tit 1[11] the phrase αἰσχροῦ κέρδους χάριν is rendered 'for filthy lucre's sake.' All these expressions we owe to Tindale. Except in language coloured by biblical recollection the word is no longer used. Bacon (Essays, 'Of Superstition,' Gold. Treas. ed. p. 69) shows the ordinary use in his day: 'The Strategems of Prelates for their owne Ambition and Lucre.' Shaks. uses the word twice (I Henry VI. v. iv. 141, Cymb. IV. ii. 324), both in the same sense.

J. HASTINGS.

LUD, LUDIM (לוּד, plur. לוּדִים, לוּדִיִּים, Λούδ, Λουδιείμ, Lud, Ludim).—In Gn 10[22] Lud appears as fourth 'son' of Shem, in Gn 10[13] we are told that Mizraim 'begat' Ludim. Here two very different races are indicated, a Semitic Lud and an Egyptian Ludim. Both names are, however, used by the prophets in such a way as to prevent any distinction between the words Lud and Ludim. In 1 Ch 1[17] and 1[11] the statements of Genesis are simply repeated. In Is 66[19] Lud is named with Tarshish, Pul (which is generally considered to be an error for Put, i.e. Phut), as among the far-off nations. In Jer 46[9] the Ludim are mentioned with Cush and Phut as auxiliaries of Egypt. In Ezk 27[10] Lud appears with Persia and Phut as soldiers of Tyre; and in 30[5] Lud occurs with Cush, Phut, and others as allies of Egypt.

The many difficulties that arise from these references are due to two causes—the difficulty of recognizing the people referred to, and doubts as to the integrity of the text. Since the time of Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 4) a prevailing opinion has been that the Semitic Lud denotes the Lydians of Asia Minor; and would then correspond with their mythical ancestor Lydus, mentioned by Herodotus, i. 7. Herodotus (l.c.) also describes their first king Agron as a descendant of Ninus and Belos, which may be taken to imply an Assyrian (or Babylonian?) origin. To support this opinion, the many affinities of Lydian worship with Syrian, and the marked similarity of their art to Assyrian types, have been pressed. Against the Semitic origin of the Lydians is the evidence of the remains of their language embodied in place names and preserved in native personal names. It is not too much to say that in the earliest times of which we have evidence Lydia was not Semitic, but peopled by a race that everywhere preceded the Greeks and spread wide into Europe. Lydia admitted several successive overlying strata of population, Greeks and Persians, not to mention Kimmerians and Scythians. These were not Semitic. It is difficult to see in what sense the classical Lydia was ever Semitic. That Josephus meant that country seems certain, not only from his own words, but from the fact that Lydia was known by name to the Jews (1 Mac 8[8]). To the author of Gn 10[22] Lud may not, however, have meant Lydia at all, but some more southerly folk. The direction of the geographical distribution of the sons of Shem runs from S.E. to N.W., then apparently W. and no farther S. than Aram. Stress cannot be laid on this till we are sure which way Arphaxad lay from Asshur. But as the genius of Winckler has compelled us to admit the Syrian land of Muṣri in passages where Egypt had always been seen before (see Expos. Times, vii. p. 405 f.), and as even Cush may be the land Kusu in the same horse-producing Cilician direction, so it may be that cuneiform evidence will yet locate a Lud in some North Syrian land. To the early Greeks Lydia was unknown by that name, they called it Mæonia; its later name does not appear till the 7th cent. B.C. What if the founder of the Lydian name were, after all, a Semitic Lydus bringing with him Assyrian culture? He need not have made Lydia Semitic, but he might have left a Semitic Lud behind him. When Gyges, king of Lydia (about B.C. 660), sent an embassy to Assurbanipal, king of Assyria, to seek alliance against the Kimmerians, it is stated that the Lydian tongue was not understood by the king's interpreters, and that only with difficulty was an interpreter found (G. Smith's Assurbanipal, p. 79). This seems decisive against Lydian being then a Semitic tongue. We are further told that the name Lu-ud-di had not been known before in Assyria (KIB ii. p. 172). Whether this means that no intercourse had ever taken place between the countries is open to question; perhaps it only means that the name was fresh. The mere absence of any Assyrian mention of a Semitic Lud may be pressed too far.

On the other hand, the theory of a widespread Semitic nation, Lud, including (according to Knobel) Amalek, the Amorites, the Philistines, the Egyptian Ludim, and the Lydians of Asia Minor, seems out of the question.

If it is difficult as yet to locate a Semitic Lud, the Egyptian Ludim are quite as difficult to locate. No satisfactory identification from native Egyptian sources has yet been given. The Rutu or Retu, suggested by some, appear not to be a nation at all; the word even is now read Romet (see Dillm. on Gn 10[13]). It has been suggested to read Lybians,* which is simply cutting the knot. Movers would identify with the great Berber tribe of the Lewâta, inhabiting the shores of the Syrtes; but these people do not appear in history till the 6th cent. A.D.

According to the direction of the geographical distribution of Mizraim's offspring, perhaps we should find them W. of Phut, and so somewhere S. or even W. of the Syrtes. This can hardly be separated from the localization of Phut near Egypt.

When we turn to the prophetical passages, we find some marked characteristics. The Ludim are warriors and bowmen. Nowhere in antiquity do we find the Lydians famous as warriors or bowmen. This, however, is not of much weight against the fact that the Carians and Ionians were mercenaries of Egypt from the time of Psammetichus I. (B.C. 663–610). The biblical Ludim may cover these. Winckler has pointed out that in an inscription of the 37th year of Nebuchadnezzar, a fragmentary account of his wars with Amasis, king of Egypt, we have mention of the people Puṭ-Iaman. As Iaman (Ionians) is the regular Assyrian term for Greeks, we are forced to conclude that Puṭ, the biblical Phut, was, if not exactly Greek in race and language, at least indistinguishable from them for political purposes in Egypt. The prophets may have had better knowledge of the racial affinities of these Egyptian mercenaries, and kept the term Phut for one, Ludim for another.

The versions, whether influenced by Josephus and Herodotus or independently preserving a historical tradition, frequently render Ludim by Lydians. The various commentators on the books of the OT resort to all kinds of devices to bring the text into accord with the facts known to them.

* For instance, by Stade (Javan, 5 f.), who proposes to read in Gn 10[13] and Jer 46[9] לוּבִים (Libyans) for לוּדִים.

Many of these difficulties will doubtless disappear with greater knowledge of the ancient inhabitants of Egypt and Syria. They cannot be discussed here. See also art. LYDIA.

LUHITH (מַעֲלֵה הַלּוּחִית Is 15^5, מַעֲלֵה הַלֻּחוֹת Jer 48^5 [Kethîbh]; LXX in Is Λουειθ, in Jer B Ἀλώθ, A Ἀλαώθ).—A place which practically is only once mentioned in OT. It occurs, as 'the ascent of' or 'to Luhith,' in Is 15^5 and in the corresponding section of Jer (48 [LXX 31]^5). The refugees from ruined Moab are there represented as fleeing to Zoar, by the ascent of L. and in the way of Horonaim, names which may be selected as local asylum sanctuaries where fugitives would be secure, or as merely different roads for escape out of the wasted country. The 'ascent' may then mean either the hill on which the sanctuary stood (cf. מַעֲלֵה הַזֵּיתִים=mount of olives, 2 S 15^{30}), or the pass which led to safety (cf. מַעֲלֵה עַקְרַבִּים=the scorpion ascent, Nu 34^4).

The derivation of the name must at present remain uncertain. Gesenius (Thes.) translates it 'made of boards, i.e. probably having houses made of boards'; but this derivation ignores the fact that Luhith must be a more or less exact transliteration into Heb. of an originally Moabite word. In that connexion the variation between Is and Jer (Kethîbh) is noteworthy.

Eusebius still knew a village which bore the name. The Onomasticon (s.v. Luith, Λουιθ) states 'there is to-day a village between Areopolis (i.e. Rabbath-moab) and Zoar which is named Luitha.' See, further, RABBAH and ZOAR.

LUKE, THE EVANGELIST.—The name Λουκᾶς does not seem to occur before the time of the NT (Zahn, Einl. ii. 336). As a Greek name, it is found without any variation in spelling, unless Λουκουᾶς (Eus. HE iv. 2) is to be regarded as such. It is, no doubt, a contracted form of Lucanus, a Latin name which occurs frequently in inscriptions (Lightfoot on Col 4^{14}), and is found in one Vulgate MS at the head of St. Luke's Gospel (as well as in b f g^{2} i), the other MSS quoted by Wordsworth and White giving only a Latinized form of the Greek name, 'secundum Lucan or Lucam.' The identification of the name with Λούκιος or Λούκειος (Ac 13^1, Ro 16^{21}) is not philologically impossible, but is unlikely. As to the person, see LUCIUS and below.

A person of this name is mentioned three times in the NT, viz. Col 4^{14}, 2 Ti 4^{11}, Philem ^{24}. From these passages we infer that he was with St. Paul at Rome when these Epistles were written, and was alone with him at the date of the latest. In the first passage he is spoken of as ὁ ἰατρὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός,[*] and as he sends a greeting to the Colossians, he must have been known to that Church. He is, in this passage, distinguished from οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς (Col 4^{11}), and so was a Gentile by birth. This makes the identification with Λούκιος of Ro 16^{21} (see Orig. ad. loc.) impossible,—for the latter was a kinsman of St. Paul,—and disproves the view of Tiele and others that St. Luke was a Jew. Jerome (Quæst. in Gen.) refers to a tradition that he was a proselyte (and as such ignorant of Hebrew), but it is more probable that he became a Christian without becoming a Jew, and the Western reading of Ac 11^{20} (D) would require that his conversion to Christianity took place before St. Paul met him (but cf. Tert. c. Marc. iv. 2). In the other passage, Philem ^{24}, St. Luke sends greeting to Philemon, and is spoken of as one of St. Paul's συνεργοί. We know then that he was with St. Paul in both his imprisonments at Rome, but, from our finding no mention of him in Ph, Lightfoot (Phil. p. 35) argues that he was not there continuously. If we may assume (see ACTS for the arguments to justify this assumption) that St. Luke was the writer of the Acts, and refers to himself in the 'we-sections,' then we may note the connexion with Antioch in Syria,[*] implied by the Western reading of Ac 11^{28}, mentioned by Eus. (HE iii. 4) and others, but perhaps based on a supposed identification with Lucius of Ac 13^1 (Wetstein, Bengel). More certain is the inference that he joined St. Paul at Troas (Ac 16^{10}) about the year 50 A.D. (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 422), and was with him until his arrival at Rome about A.D. 59, except during the period which elapsed between St. Paul's departure from Philippi on the Second Missionary Journey (17^1), and his arrival again there on the Third (Ac 20^5). If we may anticipate here the proofs (given in next art.) that St. Luke was the writer of the third Gospel, then, from the preface to that book, we may add that he did not belong to those who could claim to be οἱ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται. The references to St. Luke in NT may be completed by a mention of the tradition, first found in Orig. (Hom. i. in Luc.), that he is the 'brother whose praise is in the Churches' (2 Co 8^{18}), sent by St. Paul with Titus to carry the letter. He is also mentioned in the subscription to that Epistle as one of the bearers.[†]

When we pass outside the NT we find a number of assertions made about him, some of which are contradicted by the statements already noticed in the NT. Thus the late tradition that he was one of the Seventy (Epiphanius), or the unnamed companion of Cleophas, mentioned in Lk $24^{13ff.}$ (Theophyl.; Gr. Menol. etc.), are both untenable in face of Lk 1^2. The tradition that he was a painter is also late, though not so late as it used to be thought.[‡] What its origin was we cannot say. It is first mentioned by Theodore the Reader, whose date may be assigned to the 6th century. Zahn suggests (Einl. ii. 337) that the tradition may be due to a misinterpretation placed on the word καθιστορεῖν in Theodore's statement as to τὴν εἰκόνα τῆς θεοτόκου, ἣν ὁ ἀπόστολος Λουκᾶς καθιστόρησεν. A much earlier authority—the Præfatio Lucæ, given in Wordsworth's Vulgate, p. 269, and ascribed by Harnack (Chronologie, p. 653) to the 3rd cent. at latest—gives us many additional facts about St. Luke: 'Luke, by nation a Syrian of Antioch, a disciple of the apostles, and afterwards a follower of St. Paul, served his Master blamelessly till his confession. For having neither wife nor children he died in Bithynia at the age of seventy-four, filled with the Holy Ghost.' To Eusebius (HE iii. 4) we are indebted for some facts, and he has been followed by Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 7). Probably, though not certainly, Eusebius' words—τὸ μὲν γένος ὢν τῶν ἀπ' Ἀντιοχείας—imply that St. Luke came himself from Antioch,[§] though some scholars regard this belief as resting on nothing more substantial than the identification of St. Luke with Λούκιος of Ac 13^1 mentioned above. His special sphere of work is said to have been [‡] Plummer, Commentary on St. Luke, pp. xxi, xxii.

[§] Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. 200 ff., 389 f.) regards St. Luke as a Macedonian, who 'belonged to a family that had a connexion with Antioch,' and thinks Eusebius' phrase was intended to preclude the belief that St. Luke himself belonged to Antioch

Achaia, but (Const. Apost. vii. 46) another tradition connects him with Alexandria, where he is said to have consecrated the second bishop. In Achaia or in Bithynia (Rom. Martyr., etc.) he died. As to the mode of his death there are two traditions, one of which (Menol. Basil.) says that he died a peaceful death, the other (Greg. Naz., ap. Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxv. 589) that he was martyred under Domitian. His bones are said to have been carried from Achaia to Constantinople, and buried there in the twentieth year of Constantius.

1. AUTHORSHIP AND CANONICITY.—(a) Authorship.—The proof that St. Luke was the writer of the Third Gospel depends partly on internal, partly on external, evidence.

The internal evidence consists in the connexion between the Gospel and the Acts which is seen in the style, and also in the common dedication of the two books to Theophilus, and the reference in Ac 1^{1} to a 'former treatise,' which was no doubt the Gospel. It is here assumed (see ACTS for the arguments to support this view) that St. Luke was the writer of the Acts, and on this assumption it is impossible not to accept the Lucan authorship of the third Gospel. The argument from style (see below) is quite conclusive. Again, there are many points of connexion between the Gospel and Acts other than those of style, as, for instance, the reference to the Holy Spirit as 'the promise of the Father' (Ac 1^{4}; cf. Lk 24^{49}), the idea of apostolic 'witness' (Lk 24^{48}, Ac passim), the common explanation of Simon as ὁ ζηλωτής in Lk 6^{15} and Ac 1^{13}, but not in the other lists.

The external evidence * is to be found in the references which mention St. Luke by name as the writer of one of the four Gospels. It is well known that the earliest allusions to the Gospels do not give the names of the writers, but so soon as this mode of reference begins we find St. Luke's name connected with one of the Gospels. The earliest of these is in the Muratorian Fragment, which opens with the words tertio evangelii librum secundum Lucan Lucas . . . conscripsit. Irenæus repeatedly refers to St. Luke by name, the strongest passage being perhaps Hær. III. xiv. 3, where he mentions multa quæ inveniri possunt a solo Luca dicta esse, quibus et Marcion et Valentinus utuntur, and earlier in the same section a rejection of St. Luke is spoken of as tantamount to a rejection of 'the Gospel of which he claims to be a disciple.' In very many other passages Irenæus definitely quotes St. Luke (e.g. 3^{1} 3^{22} etc.), and nowhere is his authorship called in question. Another passage which gives unquestionable support to St. Luke's authorship is to be found in Tert. c. Marc. iv. 2—cf. ib. iv. 5, id evangelium quod Lucæ refertur penes nos. So Clem. Alex. (Strom. i. 21) quotes the Gospel often as by St. Luke.

It is unnecessary to multiply the evidence of later authorities, for the passages quoted show that writers of a comparatively early date and coming from all parts of the Christian Church unhesitatingly ascribe the authorship of one of the Gospels to St. Luke. 'It is manifest that in all parts of the Christian world the third Gospel . . . was universally believed to be the work of St. Luke. No one speaks doubtfully on this point' (Plummer, St. Luke, p. 16).

(b) Canonicity.—Though the references which connect Luke by name with the Gospel are, from the nature of the case, comparatively late, those which prove its use as an authoritative writing carry us back very much further. We find, it is true, no certain trace of its use in the Apostolic Fathers. 'We must be content to leave it doubtful whether Clement of Rome knew our Gospel according to Luke, and the same must be said of Polycarp and of Ignatius' (Plummer, l.c. p. xxv); but when we come on to Justin Martyr and to Tatian, the evidence of a use of this Gospel is abundant and unquestionable. Justin refers to a number of details which are found only in this Gospel: thus he mentions particulars given only in Lk 1. 2, such as the message of Gabriel (1^{35}) and the journey to Bethlehem in consequence of the enrolment; he also alludes to other incidents from later chapters, such as our Lord's being sent to Herod (23^{7}), or the last word from the Cross (23^{46}), or the explanation of the Scriptures to the disciples on the way to Emmaus (24^{45}). The use of St. Luke's Gospel by Tatian, who was a scholar of Justin, is equally clear from the Diatessaron, the second section of which (as given by Hemphill) contains Lk 1^{5-80}.

These writers sufficiently prove the use of the Gospel within the Church, but perhaps more striking testimony is to be found in the fact of its use by those outside the Church. Thus it formed the basis of the narrative which Marcion drew up (see below), it was used by the Valentinians in their system of chronology (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 57), and was the subject of a commentary by Heracleon (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9).

It was then, from the first, fully recognized and used in the Church, and is omitted in no lists of the canonical books.

Its position in the New Testament Canon among the Gospels varies. It must be remembered that the order in which the books succeed each other would not tend to be fixed until the Codex began to take the place of the Roll, that is, in the beginning of the 3rd century. Origen (ap. Eus. HE vi. 25) mentions as traditional that order with which we are familiar, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and this order is found in most of our authorities, beginning with the Muratori Canon. After this the order most frequently found is the so-called Western order, Matthew, John, Luke, Mark. The object of this—which is met with in D, many MSS of the Old Latin, the Gothic version, and elsewhere—was, no doubt, to bring together the two apostles and place them first, and afterwards the 'apostolic men.' The Curetonian Syriac puts St. Luke's Gospel last, k and X (a Munich MS of the 9th cent.) have the order John, Luke, Mark, Matthew, while in two cursives the order is John, Luke, Matthew. The order in which the Gospels come in the MSS may have been affected, moreover, by their supposed chronological order, or by the symbols assigned to them. We may perhaps notice here Blass's view (Philol. of the Gosp. p. 77) that there is evidence in the spelling adopted by D of 'a time when there was a closer connexion between Luke's first and second parts than between Luke's Gospel and the other Gospels.'

2. DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING.—(a) Date.—Various dates have been assigned to the Gospel,

---

* The title κατὰ Λουκᾶν cannot be taken to prove much, though the forms cata Lucam, etc., in MSS of the old Latin, in Cyprian, and elsewhere, show that the Greek MSS on which they were based had the titles in 2nd or 3rd cent. (Zahn, Einl. ii. 178).

ranging from A.D. 56–60 (Blass, Philol. of Gospels, pp. 53, 54) to some date after A.D. 130. The main argument in favour of the latest date, which was that accepted by Baur, Zeller, and others, was the supposed dependence of the Gospel on that of Marcion; but this argument has been proved to be valueless by the almost universal agreement of critics that Marcion is really dependent on St. Luke. A comparatively late date for the Gospel has also been urged on the ground of a similar dependence on Josephus. This, if proved, would make the date about A.D. 100; but here, again, the hypothesis must be regarded as unproven. Nor can any definite and certain conclusion be reached by comparing St. Luke's Gospel with those of St. Matthew and St. Mark, for the dates of these two books are uncertain. It is true we have a tradition which Clement of Alexandria received from οἱ ἀνέκαθεν πρεσβύτεροι (Eus. HE vi. 14) that the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke —τὰ περιέχοντα τὰς γενεαλογίας—were the first written. The statement of Irenæus (iii. 1. 1) need not be taken as giving the chronological order of the Gospels (as Zahn, Einl. ii. 181), for the ἔπειτα, on which Zahn lays stress to prove this, only implies that St. John's Gospel was written later than the other three, and though dates are by him assigned to St. Matthew and St. Mark, none is given for St. Luke. External evidence of any value as to the relative dates of the three Synoptic Gospels is therefore not forthcoming; nor does a comparison of them show very clear results, as will be seen below.

The first definite piece of evidence to be considered is that afforded by Ac 1^{1}, where reference is made to a πρῶτος λόγος, which, on the assumption that the Acts and the Gospel were both St. Luke's writings, is the Gospel, the date of which we are discussing. The Gospel is therefore prior to the Acts, but the date of the latter book cannot be regarded as fixed; and the question is further complicated, if we attach any weight to Blass's view that there were two separate editions of the Gospel and the Acts. In any case the date of the Gospel must depend on that of the Acts, and from a careful comparison of the style of these two books Sir John Hawkins (Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 143–146) draws the conclusion that 'a considerable time must have elapsed between the writing of the two books,' and that there is 'some internal evidence in favour of placing the Gospel at a considerably earlier date than Acts.'

Another class of arguments is concerned with data afforded by the Gospel itself. (1) Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 387) argues that St. Luke's dating of Tiberius' reign in 3^{1} requires us to reckon it from the time when he was associated by Augustus in the empire. Such a method of reckoning, he implies, is so unusual, that 'there can be hardly any other reason' for it 'than that the calculation was made under an emperor whose years were reckoned from his association as colleague.' This was the case with Titus, who began to reign in association with his father in A.D. 71, and therefore Ramsay dates the writing of St. Luke's Gospel about that time, the 'finishing touches' being given while Titus was reigning as sole emperor, A.D. 79–81. This argument, as the writer allows, 'taken by itself would be insufficient.'

(2) The preface to the Gospel (1^{1-4}) states that there had been 'many' previous attempts to draw up a narrative of our Lord's life, and this requires us to assume the lapse of some time after our Lord's death. The length of the interval will depend on whether St. Luke's words are taken to imply written narratives. 'The process described in the preface implies a longer period than would fall within the year A.D. 63: it is probable that the common basis of our three Synoptic Gospels was not committed to writing so early' (Sanday, Inspiration, p. 278).

(3) It is argued that we find in St. Luke's Gospel language so definite and precise in regard to the circumstances of the destruction of Jerusalem, as to suggest to us to date the writing of the Gospel after that event. The three chief passages adduced are $19^{43.44}$ 21^{20} 21^{24}. The first of these passages occurs in the account of our Lord's triumphal entry, on His first coming in sight of the city of Jerusalem. The words are ἥξουσιν ἡμέραι ἐπὶ σέ, καὶ παρεμβαλοῦσιν οἱ ἐχθροί σου χάρακά σοι καὶ περικυκλώσουσίν σε, καὶ συνέξουσίν σε πάντοθεν καὶ ἐδαφιοῦσίν σε καὶ τὰ τέκνα σου ἐν σοί, ἀνθ' ὧν οὐκ ἔγνως τὸν καιρὸν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς σου. Here the concluding words imply that the whole passage is a comment on the verse which precedes, and which contains a statement of our Lord's grief over Jerusalem for her failure to forecast the consequences of her conduct. The whole incident is recorded by St. Luke only, which is a sufficient explanation as to why the words in question should not be found in Mt or Mk, and they form an integral part of the incident. Nor is there anything suspiciously definite in the words, for if our Lord could foretell (Mt 24^{2}, Mk 13^{2}, Lk 21^{6}) such a destruction of Jerusalem that 'not one stone should be left on another,' there is nothing so precise in the words quoted above—which refer to the process by which that destruction was to be effected—as to require that St. Luke has inserted these words—and not only these words, but the whole incident of which they form a part—after the event. In the next passage, 21^{20}, the reference made by St. Matthew and St. Mark to Dn 9^{27} has been dropped, and, instead of the words ὅταν οὖν ἴδητε τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, κ.τ.λ., we find the phrase ὅταν ἴδητε κυκλουμένην ὑπὸ στρατοπέδων Ἰερουσαλήμ, κ.τ.λ. The fact of our having here a substitution for words found in St. Matthew and St. Mark, and not, as in the last case, an addition, is at first sight more suspicious. But one very reasonable view is that St. Luke is giving here an explanation of the words quoted from Daniel, the exact meaning of which is uncertain even now, while they would probably have been quite unintelligible to St. Luke's Gentile readers. Some support is to be found for this view in St. Luke's use of the word ἐρήμωσις at the end of the verse, which may be an allusion to the words τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως. Another equally possible explanation of St. Luke's divergence from St. Matthew and St. Mark here is that he is drawing from a different source from that used by the other two Gospels, and this is borne out by numerous other passages in this chapter, where St. Luke's independence is clear. The suggestion, therefore, that the words were inserted after the destruction of Jerusalem is only one of three possible explanations of the facts, and is not required by the words themselves, which, like those in $19^{43.44}$, are not, after all, particularly definite. The last passage mentioned above, viz. 21^{24}, is also peculiar to St. Luke—πεσοῦνται στόματι μαχαίρης καὶ αἰχμαλωτισθήσονται εἰς τὰ ἔθνη πάντα, καὶ Ἰερουσαλὴμ ἔσται πατουμένη ὑπὸ ἐθνῶν, ἄχρι οὗ πληρωθῶσιν καιροὶ ἐθνῶν. But these words only state the destruction of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, and the further thought of a terminus ad quem for the punishment of the Jews is found in Ro 11^{25}, an Epistle earlier than the earliest date assigned to the Gospel.

Not one of the passages just examined seems to the writer to contain anything incompatible with the reference of the Gospel to an early date, and all the arguments appear to rest on a very precarious basis. Another passage ($21^{31.32}$) has been thought to imply that, by leaving out the words ἐπὶ θύραις found in the parallel passages of St. Matthew and St. Mark,—ὅταν ἴδητε ταῦτα γιγνόμενα, γινώσκετε ὅτι ἔγγυς ἐστιν ἐπὶ θύραις,—St. Luke has emphasized a distinction between the fall of Jerusalem and the end of the world which they have not, and is therefore later. The next verse, stating that 'this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled,' has, on the other hand, been used (e.g. by Weiss, Introduction to the NT, ii. 313) as a proof that because it is implied that the 'second coming of Christ was still expected by the first generation of Christians,' therefore the words would not have been allowed to stand in this form after about A.D. 80.

More weight may perhaps be attached to the evidence afforded by the theological terms used in this Gospel—as, for example, the expression ὁ κύριος of our Lord (cf. Ev. Pet.—some of which point to a date later than that of St. Matthew or St. Mark. Another proof of a similar kind is to be found in the points of contact which have been noticed between this Gospel and that of St. John (see below, p. 167).

These arguments, and that based on the lapse of time required by the circumstances presupposed in the preface, seem to preclude a very early date, and there is little or no evidence to require a late date. We may accept, perhaps, some date about the year 80, that is, the beginning rather than the end of the period (A.D. 78–93) within which it is placed by Harnack (Chronologie, p. 246 ff.).

(b) Place.—In regard to the place at which the Gospel was written, the data are too vague or too late to give a certain conclusion. We have seen above (p. 162) that St. Luke's sphere of preaching was associated with Greece, and so Jerome tells us that 'in Achaiæ Bœothiæque (var. lec. Bithyniæ) partibus volumen condidit' (Vulgate, ed. Wordsworth, i. p. 12), and within this district Godet selects Corinth. Another tradition connects St. Luke with Egypt, and accordingly a catalogue of NT books ascribed to Ebed Jesu (14th cent.) assigns the writing of the Gospel to Alexandria. The address to Theophilus, and the mention of St. Luke as St. Paul's companion at Rome, have led Keim, Holtzmann, and others to place it at Rome, but we have no evidence to prove this. Other scholars (as Michaelis, Thiersch, and Blass) have fixed on Cæsarea, others again (e.g. Hilgenfeld) have suggested Asia Minor. Many of these places and also others will be found mentioned in the subscriptions to the Gospel found in MSS of the Greek and of the versions (Tischendorf, NT, i. 738). We cannot attempt, in the absence of data, to decide finally between the many various alternative suggestions just mentioned, and may agree with Weiss (Introduction, Eng. tr. ii. 314) that 'all conjectures as to the place of composition are quite visionary, and have no value whatever.'

3. TRANSMISSION OF THE TEXT.—It is necessary to devote a separate section to this point, because of the questions suggested by the 'Western' readings in St. Luke's Gospel. Blass began by basing on the 'Western' readings in the Acts (which see) a theory that they preserve for us another and earlier edition than that with which we are familiar, and in his Acta Apostolorum secundum formam quæ videtur Romanam (Leipzig, 1896) he attempted a reproduction of this. Since then he has extended his theory to the Gospel (Leipzig, 1897), but with this important difference, that while the Western text of the Acts gives us the earlier of the two editions, the same text of the Gospel is in his opinion the later and revised edition. Some explanation is necessary of the difference between the characteristics of the Western text in the two books, for in the Acts these consist largely of additions to the ordinary text, while in the Gospel they are, for the most part, omissions, and Blass's view (Philol. of the Gospels, pp. 103, 104) is that the second edition would in each case be shorter, for the author would be naturally 'disposed to omit many unessential circumstances and details.' This is one of several 'a priori arguments,' as Blass himself calls them (l.c. p. 102), for a theory, which is an extension of a view tenable and accepted by many in regard to the Acts, but in the Gospel not established by the facts.

As far as the Acts is concerned, the theory of two editions goes back to J. le Clerc (Clericus), i.e. to the middle of the 17th cent. Lightfoot (Fresh Revision, p. 29) seems not unfavourable to the view that in the Gospel also 'the evangelist may have issued two separate editions.' It is only within the last few years, however, that this theory has seriously challenged the attention of textual critics. What, then, are the facts as far as the Gospel is concerned? The most striking are the series of omissions which we meet with chiefly in the later, but also more sparsely in the earlier, chapters. In these cases the omissions are made by the same authorities for the most part, sometimes with the support of a MS or version not necessarily 'Western.' As illustrations of such omissions may be quoted, the leaving out in 24^{36} of the words καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς Εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, in 24^{40} of the words καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν ἔδειξεν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας καὶ τοὺς πόδας, and in 24^{51} of the words καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν. From other parts of the Gospel we may quote 10^{41}, where μεριμνᾷς καὶ θορυβάζῃ περὶ πολλά is shortened into θορυβάζῃ, and the first part of the next verse is omitted, or 12^{19} where (in the parable of the Rich Fool) the words ἔχεις πολλὰ ἀγαθὰ κείμενα εἰς ἔτη πολλά, ἀναπαύου, φάγε, πίε, εὐφραίνου, are reduced to ἔχεις πολλὰ ἀγαθά, ἀναπαύου. These passages sufficiently illustrate the nature of the omissions. We find also some additions, but they are very few. As an instance may be quoted the long addition in regard to the man working on the Sabbath day, which we find in D after 6^4. Of course Blass has to give some explanation as to why in a second draft these omissions or additions were made. Thus, of the insertion at 6^4, he says (l.c. p. 154) that it was probably omitted by St. Luke as likely to give offence to Christian or other Jews who would form a 'considerable part' of the Oriental congregations. Of the omission of the account of the Ascension in 24^{51} the explanation given is that it was (l.c. p. 140) 'to fit the close of the Gospel (Western text) to the beginning of the Acts (Western text),' or that it 'might be not without some degree of probability ascribed to some reader of Luke who was offended by the repetition in Ac 1' (l.c. p. 142). These will illustrate the explanations by which the position is maintained, and in regard to the last it will be noticed that the theory of revision by St. Luke is so far modified that it is referred to 'some reader.'

What are we to say in regard to this theory as an explanation of the facts? We may admit that this Gospel, as having been addressed firstly to an individual, and afterwards to a wider circle, may have had a different textual history from the others, and we may make all allowance for the greater difficulty of establishing the theory in the Gospel than in the Acts, because the Western text in the Gospel differs almost entirely by its omissions, and because the early history of the Synoptic text must be obscure. Further, we may allow that the term 'Western non-interpolations' given to these omitted passages by Westcott and Hort is not applicable, inasmuch as there is, as a rule, little besides the suggestion of 'assimilation' to show that they are interpolations. And yet we must demand further proof before we can accept Blass's view, for the arguments on which it rests are inconclusive.

In the first place, the distribution of the phenomena is at once too wide and too narrow. Similar omissions are found in the same group of authorities, or in some members of the group, in the other Gospels, and elsewhere in the NT. We might quote, for example, the omission of all reference to the Pharisees in Mk 10^{2} and other similar instances, but two illustrations from Mt 19^{9} and 19^{29} will serve to show not only that the omissions are widely distributed, but also that they are capable of being explained by a divergence in the oral tradition. In the first passage, a number of Western authorities (here with ℵ and other Greek MSS) omit the words καὶ ὁ ἀπολελυμένην γαμήσας μοιχᾶται, and in the second many of the same authorities (here with B) omit the words ἢ γυναῖκα. The distribution of the instances of omission in Western texts is therefore too wide. It is also too narrow, for the most important of the cases come in the last few chapters of the Gospel, and are sufficiently explained by 'the natural variations between the reports given by two different hearers of a story orally delivered in the presence of both' (Salmon, Text. Criticism, p. 148).

Again, it may reasonably be objected that 'if there had been a definite Western written text we should have been able to reproduce it in a way we cannot now' (Salmon, l.c. p. 148). There is certainly very early support for many of the readings, so that we may well believe that many of them 'express the form in which the Gospel was read in the Church of Rome in apostolic or sub-apostolic times,' yet still the distribution of the support can not be regarded as indicating two editions, one Eastern and one Western, and to meet this difficulty Blass has to fall back upon the position that in none of our authorities have we 'the Western text while still in its pure form.' Blass, indeed, states that 'besides conflations with the other Gospels, which began at a very early date, conflations [of the Western] with the Oriental text must have been more inevitable than in the case of the Acts.' As instances of such 'conflation,' by which we suppose he means corruption of the Western text by the Eastern, he would, presumably, regard cases where the authorities on which he relies are divided, as, for example, the insertion of δευτεροπρώτῳ (6^{1}), or the word from the Cross (23^{34}). We cannot deny the very early and varied character of the attestation which is found for the Western readings, when we meet with them in Justin, Tatian, and Marcion. We can say that the evidence of these authorities does not allow us to rest on their evidence an edition such as that of Blass.

Again, it is urged by Corssen, whose view is endorsed by Bousset (Theol. Rundschau, July 1898), that the language of the Western text, as Blass has constructed it, often shows an absence of marked characteristics of St. Luke's style, and therefore is not the work of St. Luke himself, but 'a revision by another hand.'

Finally, it has to be urged, if not against the theory as a whole, at any rate against Blass's presentation of it, that the selection of one reading in preference to another is often very arbitrary, and that readings are adopted which have only very slight support, or may be shown to be inferior to the ordinary text, and less original. Some of these are collected by Zahn (Einl. ii. 354 ff.).

The theory, then, of two editions has been rejected by most scholars, even by those who have accepted it in regard to the Acts, and we must say that it is at any rate unproved. The phenomena on which it rests point at most (Harnack, Chronologie, p. 700 n.) to a correction of St. Luke's Gospel, not to two editions of it; they are not peculiar to the third Gospel, and, though they often preserve an original reading, they are far from representing always the best text, and they are sufficiently explained by a consideration of the circumstances under which the Gospels were first circulated and took written shape.

4. THE SOURCES OF THE GOSPEL.—The determination of the sources used by St. Luke must depend partly upon external, partly upon internal, evidence. Under the first head fall the assertions of the preface, and the statements made by early writers as to St. Luke's connexion with St. Paul. Both these are dealt with below. Under internal evidence will be included arguments based on points of style, subject-matter, and arrangement, which involve the question of St. Luke's relation to the other Gospels, and bring us face to face with the Synoptic problem. This problem, which is one of 'extraordinary difficulty and complexity' (Sanday, Inspiration, p. 281), need be discussed here only so far as it concerns St. Luke.

The first point to consider is the amount of matter which is peculiar to St. Luke, and this may be estimated in different ways.[*]

'According to one calculation, if the contents of the Synoptic Gospels are divided into 172 sections, of these 172 Luke has 127, Matthew 114, and Mark 84: and of these 172 Luke has 48 which are peculiar to himself, Matthew has 22, and Mark has 5. According to another calculation [that of Reuss], if the total be divided into 124 sections, of these Luke has 93, Matthew 78, and Mark 67, and of these 124 Luke has 38 peculiar to himself, Matthew 17, and Mark 2' (Plummer, St. Luke, p. xxxv).—Or we may consider the kind, as well as the quantity, of peculiar matter, and then we find that of the recorded miracles 6 are peculiar to St. Luke, 3 to St. Matthew, and 2 to St. Mark; while of the parables, 18 are peculiar to St. Luke, 10 to St. Matthew, and 1 to St. Mark. Or we may take the more mechanical method of reckoning by the number of verses, and we find that St. Matthew (RV) has 1068 verses, of which 337 are not found in St. Mark or St. Luke; St. Mark (RV) has 674, of which 50 are peculiar to this Gospel; while St. Luke (RV) has 1149, of which 612 are only found there. These figures show roughly the state of the case, and we may say that the peculiar matter in St. Luke is rather more than half of the whole Gospel. The following is a list of the more important longer sections found only in St. Luke:—

3^{10-14} the questions asked of John the Baptist by 'the multitudes,' 'publicans,' and soldiers.
3^{23-38} the genealogy of our Lord.
4^{16-30} at Nazareth in the synagogue [this may be the narrative of Mt $13^{54\text{ff.}}$ and Mk $6^{1\text{ff.}}$, but is quite independent].
5^{1-11} the miraculous draught of fishes, and call of the disciples.
6^{24-26} the denunciations on the rich, and on those well spoken of.
7^{11-17} the raising of the widow's son at Nain.
7^{36-50} the anointing by the sinner, and parable of the Two Debtors.
8^{1-3} the attendant women, the wife of Chuza.
9^{51-56} the rejection at the Samaritan village.
$9^{61.\ 62}$ a would-be follower.
10^{1} the mission of the Seventy [our Lord's address has much in common with the address to the Twelve, Mt $10^{1\text{ff.}}$, Mk $6^{7\text{ff.}}$].
10^{17-20} the return of the Seventy—Satan fallen from heaven.
10^{28-42} parable of the Good Samaritan.

11^{5-8} parable of the Importunate Friend.
$11^{27.\ 28}$ the comment of the woman on our Lord's teaching.
12^{13-21} the avaricious brother, leading to the parable of the Rich Fool.
12^{47-50}.
13^{1-17} the Galilæans slain by Pilate, the falling of the tower in Siloam, the parable of the Barren Fig-tree, healing of the woman with the spirit of infirmity.
13^{31-33} the message to Herod Antipas.
14^{1-14} healing of the man with the dropsy.
14^{15-24} parable of the Supper [cf. Mt 22^{2}].
14^{28-33} conditions of discipleship—the man building a tower—the king going to war.
15^{8-32} parables of Lost Piece of Silver, and Prodigal Son.
16^{1-12} parable of Unjust Steward.
$16^{14.\ 15}$ the Pharisees' comment, and our Lord's rebuke.
16^{19-31} parable of Rich Man and Lazarus.
17^{7-19} the nature of service—the Healing of the Ten Lepers.
$17^{28.\ 29.\ 32}$ references to Lot.
18^{1-14} the Unrighteous Judge—the Pharisee and the Publican.
19^{1-10} Zacchæus.
19^{11-27} the parable of the Pounds [but cf. Mt $25^{14\mathrm{ff.}}$, the parable of the Talents].
19^{39-44} the Lament over Jerusalem.
$22^{15.\ 27-32.\ 35-38}$ at the Last Supper.
23^{7-12} Jesus sent to Herod.
23^{27-31} the daughters of Jerusalem.
23^{39-43} the penitent thief.
23^{48} the word from the Cross.
24^{13-53} the walk to Emmaus; the appearance to the Eleven, and final instructions; the Ascension (?).

Besides these longer sections there are a number of shorter passages of varying length and importance, which are peculiar to St. Luke, but are embedded in material common to St. Luke and one or both of the other Synoptic narratives. These amount to about 113 verses out of the 612 mentioned above as peculiar to St. Luke, and will be found collected in Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 158 ff. In his 'tentative and to a large extent speculative attempt' Sir John Hawkins classifies these variations as follows:—(1) Cases where Luke may have retained while Matthew omits the occasions of sayings, which they drew from a common source, e.g. 11^{1} $13^{22.\ 23}$ etc.; (2) cases where Luke may have retained while Matthew, after his manner, shortens, e.g. 7^{4-6}; (3) later insertions from other sources, e.g. $22^{43.\ 44}$; (4) independent traditions, or variants of traditions, preserved also elsewhere, e.g. 12^{35-38} [cf. Mt 25^{6}, Mk 13^{34}]; (5) additions which may be editorial, bringing out the prayerfulness of Jesus, e.g. 6^{12b}, or the right use of wealth, e.g. $6^{33.\ 34}$, or heightening the effect of the narrative, e.g. 3^{18} 9^{43}; (6) Pauline expressions, e.g. 21^{34}; (7) other various additions, probably editorial.

Finally, we have to mention cases where the general agreement of St. Luke with the other Synoptic narratives is clear, but where we find changes of expression or of order made by him in going over common ground. Such will be in part editorial and due to preference for a particular word or to the need of explanation, in part due no doubt to oral transmission. Special mention must also be made of the evidence afforded by 'doublets,' i.e. passages of similar content occurring in two different places in the same Gospel, and possibly introduced from different 'sources.' These are carefully examined in Hawkins (Hor. Syn. p. 64 ff.), who sums up the evidence as pointing in three directions—(1) to a use of two sources, probably Marcan and Logian; (2) to a freedom of the editors in using their own phraseology; (3) to divergencies between Matthew and Luke which may perhaps imply the use of a special source by the latter.

Such are the data we have to discuss, and in dealing with them in relation to St. Luke's sources two general considerations are clear—(1) that St. Luke must have had some source or sources not used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, and that, as the above references show, not merely for one part of our Lord's ministry, but affecting the whole of it. It is clear also that this source preserved both narrative and teaching: (2) that 'both St. Matthew and St. Luke, and especially St. Luke, have so "worked over" the sources they employed that they frequently represent to us the substance rather than the words of the original documents' (Hawkins, l.c. p. 92). This fact obviously increases the difficulty of tracing the sources.

It will only be possible here to state, in a very summary way, the relation of St. Luke (a) to St. Mark, (b) to St. Matthew, (c) to St. John, and then (d) to consider this special source or sources.

(a) St. Mark and St. Luke are mentioned as at Rome together (Col 4^{10-14}, Philem ^{24}, cf. 2 Ti 4^{11}), and, moreover, it is generally agreed that St. Mark's Gospel represents, in the main, the earliest form of the Gospel narrative, and may, therefore, have existed in substance before St. Luke. Weiss, in his Markus-Evangelium, established the fact of a relationship between them; and now 'it is unnecessary to prove anew that Luke used Mark' (Harnack, Chronologie, p. 652), for 'the use of Mark as one of Luke's sources is a generally-established fact of Gospel criticism' (Feine, Eine vorcanonische Ueberlieferung, etc. p. 4). At the same time, the following points require explanation. Things are omitted by St. Matthew and St. Luke which are recorded by St. Mark, e.g. Mk $4^{26\mathrm{ff.}}$ $8^{22\mathrm{ff.}}$, or omitted by St. Luke which are recorded by St. Matthew and St. Mark, e.g. $6^{45\mathrm{ff.}}$, and we ask, why, if St. Mark was used by St. Luke, were these omitted? Again, we find instances in which St. Matthew and St. Luke agree against St. Mark, and frequent cases where St. Mark and St. Luke are independent in regard to details. A sufficient explanation of these facts would be that St. Luke used not St. Mark as we have it, but the source which underlies St. Mark, an Ur-markus, which, by additions and alterations made after St. Luke used it, became our canonical St. Mark. Weiss, however, maintains strongly that it was our St. Mark which St. Luke used, and Sir J. Hawkins explains away the difficulties which have just been urged (1) by showing that many of the omissions from St. Mark, which St. Matthew and St. Luke make (generally independently), may well have been made by them with St. Mark before them, and that 'the results are largely in favour of the view that the Petrine source used by the two later Synoptists was not an Ur-markus, but St. Mark's Gospel almost as we have it now' (l.c. p. 122); (2) by suggesting that the agreements of St. Matthew and St. Luke against St. Mark, so far as they imply a common source, were first made in one of these two later Gospels, and then were carried across, intentionally or unconsciously, to the other, either by scribes or more probably in the course of oral transmission (l.c. p. 176).

(b) St. Matthew and St. Luke have a great deal in common which is not found in St. Mark, and of this very much is occupied with our Lord's discourses. This general resemblance in material not found in St. Mark may be explained on the hypothesis of Simons, Holtzmann, Wendt, and others, that St. Luke used the Gospel of St. Matthew, or by supposing that both used a common written source, such as the Λόγια might have been, or a common oral tradition. It is difficult to believe that St. Luke had St. Matthew's Gospel before him, when we consider their great independence, amounting sometimes to divergence, as in regard to chs. 1 and 2, and the genealogy, or in reference to details of fact as in 18^{35} 24^{4}. We may accept Weiss' statement (Introduction to the NT, ii. 294) that 'Luke's acquaintance with and use of the apostolic source of the first Gospel is just as certain as his want of acquaintance with the Gospel itself.' Zahn, indeed, maintains (Einl. ii. 402 ff.) not only that St Luke did not use St.

Matthew, but also that their resemblances in parts where they are not both dependent on St. Mark are sufficiently explained by the use of a common oral tradition. But such close verbal agreement as we find in Mt 6^{24}=Lk 16^{13} and Mt 6^{27}=Lk 12^{25} seems to require the use of a common written Greek source (Feine, l.c. pp. 10, 11) and not (as Resch) different Greek translations of an Aramaic original. It is probable that they had collections of our Lord's sayings in several forms and in different connexions. The use of some such sources will explain on the one hand how it is that the peculiarities of St. Luke's style are most rare in reports of discourses common to him and St. Matthew, showing the fidelity with which he has reproduced them, while on the other hand it will explain the differences both in expression and context which exist in the two Gospels. We see how it may have been possible for St. Matthew to bring together all the sayings, as in the Sermon on the Mount, which St. Luke has scattered over many parts of his Gospel. We get also on this hypothesis an explanation of the 'doublets,' and see why 'the original form is preserved sometimes in the first, sometimes in the third Gospel' (Weiss), while the original context also seems to be kept sometimes in St. Luke, sometimes in St. Matthew (Weiss, l.c. p. 292 ff.).

(c) St. Luke and St. John.—We have already noticed (above, p. 164) that St. Luke has more points in common with St. John than either St. Matthew or St. Mark has, but they are not enough to establish any literary relation. Among such points of contact may be noted the allusions to a ministry in Judæa (4^{44} 13^{34}); the Galilæan journey before the death of John the Baptist (wh. see), implied by the term ὑπέστρεψεν (4^{14}), 22^{50} (=Jn 18^{10} τὸ δεξιόν); the visit of Peter to the sepulchre, 24^{12} (=Jn 20^{3}). Others may be seen by a reference to the ninth of the groups marked in the Ammonian sections, or in Weiss (l.c. p. 297 n.) or in Holtzmann (Joh. Evang. p. 6 ff.). The result of a comparison does not 'establish a literary relation,' but indicates some common points in the oral tradition used by both.

(d) St. Luke's special source or sources.—In face of the large amount (see above, p. 165) peculiar to St. Luke, we are justified in assuming that St. Luke had access to some source or sources not used by St. Matthew or St. Mark. Our object here must be to try and determine the extent and nature of these sources. This we might expect to do, partly from the style, partly from the subject-matter. (1) In regard to the first we do not get much help, because St. Luke has so worked over the sources that they are permeated by his own style; nor do the Hebraisms really help us much, if at all, because on one theory (see below, p. 169) they are artificially distributed by St. Luke to suit his subject-matter, while according to another, and, as it seems to the present writer, much truer, view they are not due to the sources but are characteristic of St. Luke's style, and therefore appear in the connecting links between the narratives. It is possible that in such summaries of history or teaching as we get in $4^{14.\ 15}$ 4^{44} etc., we may find, as in Ac, the marks of the beginning or end of documents used. Other expressions, like εἶπεν δέ (4^{24} 6^{39} etc.) or ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, may point in the same direction, but they occur too frequently to be safely used in this way.

(2) The subject-matter has to be considered under the two main divisions of narrative and discourse. The additions in the narrative begin with the first two chapters, and are scattered over the whole Gospel. Some of these are sufficiently explained by oral tradition, such as the additional references which St. Luke makes to Herod (e.g. 3^{1} 9^{9} 13^{31} 23^{7}), which it is not fanciful to connect with Chuza. To the same sort of tradition may be due the additions which we find in the narratives of the Passion and Resurrection (e.g. $22^{24\text{ff.}\ 51}$ $23^{4\text{-}12.\ 27\text{-}31}$ etc.), or the little differences of detail either by way of addition or correction which we find in the material which St. Luke has in common with the other Gospels (see p. 165). This would explain also points of difference in the order in which the material is arranged (e.g. $22^{33.\ 34}$). We have also, finally, to take into account cases where a narrative is preserved in St. Luke, but in a form quite independent of the other Gospels, e.g. those of $4^{16\text{ff.}}$ $5^{1\text{ff.}}$ 7^{36}.

In regard to the discourses we find very puzzling phenomena. A large amount of them is common to St. Matthew and St. Luke and not found in St. Mark. These are no doubt due to some such source as the Λόγια, and Sir J. Hawkins (l.c. pp. 88, 89) in a 'tentative' list ascribes some 72 passages to this source, apart from the passages derived through St. Mark. These amount to some 185 verses, or about one-sixth of the whole Gospel. The special point which requires notice is that more than two-thirds of this material appears in quite a different connexion in St. Matthew and St. Luke. There is nothing impossible in the supposition that some of this teaching was repeated by our Lord on more than one occasion, and so preserved in both places. Thus the teaching about anxiety occurs in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6^{25}) and also as a corollary to the parable of the Rich Fool (Lk 12^{22}). The warning against serving two masters occurs in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6^{24}) and also as an addition to the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16^{13}). As a rule, St. Matthew has collected together (e.g. ch. 10) what St. Luke has preserved in connexion with separate incidents; but sometimes the reverse has happened, as in the passage beginning Lk 12^{22}. The 'doublets' already referred to (see p. 166), which occur chiefly in the discourses, are another perplexing factor. These have been most fully dealt with by Sir J. Hawkins (l.c. pp. 64–92), and his conclusions have been already given.

These differences in regard to the discourses may or may not have been due to the use of a special source by St. Luke. There can be no doubt as to some special source for a large part of the material found in the long section from 9^{51} onwards, most of which is recorded with only the vaguest references to time and place, and some of which seems obviously out of place, e.g. the lament over Jerusalem 13^{34}, while in other places there are marks of a grouping which regards the subject dealt with, such as prayer or the responsibility of riches.

The most elaborate attempt to reproduce the special source used by St. Luke is that of Feine. He regards this special source as an enlarged edition of the collection of discourses common to St. Luke with St. Matthew. To this had been added (1) a number of discourses and parables, (2) a series of narratives. Following Lipsius, he regards it as a Jewish-Christian source, perhaps (l.c. p. 154) originating from the Jerusalem community, written in Greek, not after A.D. 70, and later than the common groundwork of the Synoptic Gospels.

A summary of the results of this section would show that the sources which St. Luke used were as follows:—Firstly, he follows, over a large part of the narrative, the Gospel of St. Mark, and that probably in the form in which we have it, and not merely some underlying document.—Secondly, the matter common to St. Luke and St. Matthew, not found in St. Mark, implies a common written source, and that requirement is to be satisfied by the hypothesis, not of a direct use of St. Matthew by St. Luke, but by the supposition that both have used some one collection, or more, of our Lord's discourses.—Besides these, St. Luke seems to have had access to oral tradition, by which he corrects, or supplements, the narratives common to him and the others.—Lastly, he used, especially for chs. 1 and 2 and the section beginning with 9^{51}, some special written sources, which do not supply much information as to Galilee, and may have been connected in origin with Jerusalem. This would suit Feine's view that the special source of St. Luke is that used in Ac 1–12, and would explain the points of contact with St. John noticed above. There is nothing to warrant the view that this source was Ebionitic in character, or prejudiced in favour of any peculiar and one-sided presentation of the history and teaching of our Lord.

5. St. Luke and St. Paul.—The passages already quoted (Col 4^{14}, 2 Ti 4^{11}, Philem ^{24}) are evidence of a close connexion of St. Luke with St. Paul at Rome, and if we add to these the 'we-sections' of Ac, St. Luke will be seen to have been with St. Paul for long periods together between the date of Ac 16^{10} and that of 2 Ti 4^{11}. To describe this intimate relationship many different expressions are used by early writers. The Muratorian Fragment (as emended by Westcott) says: Lucas iste medicus post ascensum Christi cum eum Paulus quasi ut juris studiosum secundum adsumsisset nomine suo ex opinione conscripsit; Irenæus (Hær. iii. 1) says: ὁ ἀκόλουθος Παύλου τὸ ὑπ' ἐκείνου κηρυσσόμενον εὐαγγέλιον ἐν βιβλίῳ κατέθετο, and more generally describes St. Luke (Hær. iii. 10. 1, 14. 12) as sectator et discipulus apostolorum, and inseparabilis a Paulo et cooperarius eius in evangelio; Tertullian (c. Marc. iv. 2) describes St. Paul as St. Luke's illuminator, and (ib. iv. 5) says: Lucæ digestum Paulo adscribere solent. Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. § 7) says St. Luke was sectator apostoli Pauli. None of these terms seems to imply as close a relationship as that between St. Peter and St. Mark in regard to the writing of the Gospel. They do not support the view mentioned by Origen (ap. Eus. HE iii. 4, vi. 25) that the expression 'according to my Gospel' (Ro 2^{16} 16^{25}, 2 Ti 2^{8}) refers to that of St. Luke. Nor do they lead us to believe that St. Luke derived all or most of his information from St. Paul, for that would be contrary to his own words in his preface. Nor is there any reason, apart from the 'strong personal affection and enthusiastic admiration for Paul' manifest in Ac, to regard the third Gospel as Pauline, in the sense of its being a polemic in favour of Pauline doctrine, or a 'revision of a hypothetical one-sided Pauline primitive Luke, written with a conciliatory aim' (Baur, Scholten, etc.). On the other hand, it is difficult to maintain (as Jüngst, SK, 1896, p. 215 ff.) that there are no traces of Pauline influence. The points in which this influence are indicated are firstly in the actual Greek words and expressions used, secondly in the mode in which the teaching is presented. Thus, in regard to the first point, while the vocabularies of the Gospels give 32 words found only in St. Mt and St. Paul, 22 found only in St. Mark and St. Paul, and 21 found only in St. John and St. Paul, we get as many as 101 found only in St. Luke and St. Paul. Again, of the 'characteristic words and phrases' which mark the three Synoptists, the proportion common to St. Paul and St. Matthew is rather above, and to St. Paul and St. Mark rather below one-half, while nearly two-thirds are common to St. Luke's Gospel and St. Paul. These details are taken from Hawkins (l.c. p. 154 ff.), but the points of language common to St. Paul and St. Luke have been often collected, and are clearly and most fully tabulated in Plummer (Commentary on St. Luke, p. liv ff.). In regard to the actual teaching conveyed in the Gospel, there is evidence that many leading ideas of St. Paul's are to be found in St. Luke. Thus both agree in laying stress on the universality of the Gospel, on the need of πίστις, on the χάρις shown by God to men, on the importance of the work of the Holy Spirit. Thus there are many points of contact between St. Luke and St. Paul, both in the language they use and in the teaching which they emphasize. Many passages have been set side by side to show the close relation of St. Luke to St. Paul (Resch, Aussercanonische Paralleltexte, p. 121; Plummer, l.c. p. xliv; Weiss, l.c. p. 312); from among them the following may be selected, 1 Th 5^{6}=Lk 21^{34}, 1 Co $11^{23\text{-}26}$=Lk $22^{19\text{ff.}}$, 1 Co 15^{5}=Lk 24^{34}, 1 Ti 5^{18}=Lk 10^{7}, 1 Co 10^{27}=Lk 10^{8}, Eph 6^{14}=Lk 12^{35}.

6. St. Luke and Josephus.—The relation of St. Luke to Josephus has been discussed in regard to Acts (see vol. i. p. 30), and for the Gospel it is equally true that the differences 'are only conceivable on the supposition of independence.' Belser, in two articles in the Theologische Quartalschrift for 1895 and 1896, shows that the arguments of Krenkel (Josephus und Lucas, Leipzig, 1894) to establish a connexion, are based partly on resemblances which prove nothing, such as the use of words like πορεύεσθαι and αὐξάνειν, partly on expressions used certainly by both writers, but in different senses. The literary points in common are sufficiently explained in other ways, as, for instance, by the influence of the LXX on both, while many of the alleged instances are 'the common material of various Greek writers.' When we pass from the language used to the facts referred to by the two authors, their connexion is equally unproved. Zahn (Einl. ii. 394 ff.) shows this in regard to their references to the Census. Both writers mention it, but the area which it concerned is limited in Josephus to the territory of Archelaus (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, ii. 1; BJ VII. viii. 1), or at most extends to Syria (Ant. XVII. xiii. 5), and is not, as in Lk $2^{1\text{-}3}$, an event of world-wide importance. Again, Josephus seems to know nothing of the official position of Quirinius in Syria, or at most only vaguely implies it. 'No single historical fact of Luke finds its explanation by means of the hypothesis that he has read Josephus. On the contrary, he often shows a knowledge clearly independent of Josephus in regard to historical events of the time, and in regard to persons more or less prominent' (Zahn, l.c. p. 397). As instances may be quoted the facts mentioned in Lk 8^{3} 13^{1} 23^{12}. These, however, only show that, independently of Josephus, St. Luke had detailed information; they do not disprove a use of Josephus. The arguments dealing with the question are summed up by Clemen in his Chronologie d. Paul. Briefe, Halle, 1893. We must suppose (with Schürer) either that St. Luke did not use Josephus at all, or that if he did he forthwith forgot what he had learnt from him. As maintaining a connexion between the two writers may be quoted Holtzmann, Krenkel, Keim, Hausrath, and others; while their independence is upheld by such authorities as Schürer, Harnack, and Zahn. In the words of the last-named we need not use further argument to support the view that 'Luke could have followed Josephus as an authority neither in historical matters nor in his Greek style' (l.c. p. 397).

7. St. Luke and Marcion.—It is generally admitted by all scholars at the present day that the Gospel of St. Luke was the foundation of Marcion's Gospel, and that Marcion's work was not enlarged so as to become our third Gospel. Such was the unanimous opinion of early and independent witnesses. Thus Irenæus (Hær. I. xxvii. 2) speaks of Marcion as circumcidens id quod est secundum Lucam evangelium, and (ib. III. xii. 12) describes Marcion and others as decurtantes secun- dum Lucam evangelium; Tertullian (c. Marc. i. 10. 1) speaks of Marcion as one qui evangelia corrosit. The same is true of Epiphanius. It is only in quite recent times, and partly on grounds of textual criticism, that it has been maintained, as by Baur and Ritschl, that Marcion's was the earlier form; but subsequent investigations have established, beyond a possibility of doubt, that the statements of Irenæus, quoted above, give the true state of the case. It is possible to reconstruct, almost in its entirety, from the quotations of Tertullian and others, the form of Marcion's Gospel. This has been done most recently by Zahn (Geschichte des Kanons, i. 674 ff., ii. 409 ff.). Omitting all the first three chapters except the chronological data in 3^{1}, Marcion begins with 4^{14}, and, except for one or two small omissions, e.g. 7^{29-35}, goes on to 11^{28}. Then, 11^{29-32} (the reference to Jonah), 11^{49-51} (ref. to OT history), 13^{1-9} (the massacre of the Galilæans), 13^{29-35} 15^{11-32} (prodigal son), 17^{5-10} 18^{31-34} (announcement of the Passion), 19^{29-48} (triumphal entry), 20^{9-18} (wicked husbandmen), $20^{37.\ 38}$ (refs. to OT), $21^{1-4.\ 18.\ 21.\ 22}$ $22^{16-18.\ 28-30.\ 35-38.\ 49-51}$ 24^{47-53}, are all omitted. It is to be noticed that Marcion's Gospel differs from that of St. Luke almost entirely by omission, and that many of the omissions are sufficiently explained by Marcion's dogmatic views. Such minor changes as 'all the righteous' for 'Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets' (13^{28}) are also explicable in the same way. The omissions amount in all to some 309 verses. Another point to notice is that St. Luke's Gospel and Marcion's agree so closely that not only has Marcion preserved almost all the sections peculiar to St. Luke, but he has kept the same order. In settling the question which of the two documents was prior, the question of style is decisive. This has been carefully worked out by Sanday (Gospels in the Second Century, ch. viii.), and he comes to the conclusion that there is a unity of style, both in regard to words and syntax, so that 'the verified peculiarities of St. Luke's style are found in the portions omitted by Marcion in a proportion of more than one to each verse' (l.c. p. 229).

But while there can be no doubt that Marcion's work is only an abridgment of St. Luke's Gospel, made with a doctrinal object, the text preserved in it often contains readings of great interest, which cannot be regarded as arbitrary changes, for they are supported by other early authorities. The assertions of Epiphanius (Hær. xlii.) and Tertullian, that Marcion altered the text of his authorities to suit his views, must be qualified by the fact that, in many of the instances mentioned, Marcion's reading finds other support, and represents (according to Blass) one of the two early recensions of St. Luke's Gospel (see above), though not always 'in its pure form.' Blass, in his edition of St. Luke (see p. xliii ff.) has collected together the passages where Marcion departs from D and other authorities. On the ground of the readings they contain, the fragments of Marcion may have an importance; but they throw no suspicion on the integrity of St. Luke's Gospel, from which they are extracted.

8. ST. LUKE'S STYLE.—The verdict of Jerome (Migne, Pat. Lat. xxiv. 100) in regard to St. Luke's style is sermo comptior est et secularem redolet eloquentiam, and Renan (Les Évangiles, ch. xiii.) says of it that St. Luke's 'is the most literary of the Gospels.' The opening verses, 1^{1-4}, arrest our attention at once on account of their classical character, and offer a strong contrast to the verses which follow, which are marked by a number of Hebraisms. This combination of characteristics is traceable in varying degrees throughout the Gospel, but it seems a little fanciful to suggest that St. Luke 'has in places allowed his style to be Hebraistic because he felt that such a style was appropriate to the subject-matter.' It will be necessary to say something as to St. Luke's characteristics of style in regard to vocabulary and syntax, and then to notice some points connected with the Hebraistic usages.

(a) An examination of St. Luke's vocabulary shows that he uses a very large number of words not found in any other NT writer. Sir John Hawkins* (l.c. p. 162 ff.) gives the number of words peculiar to the Gospel as 261, which number is increased by 471 if we add words used only in the Gospel and the Acts. If we further analyze the character of these peculiar words, we find that not quite three-fourths of them occur in the LXX, St. Luke showing himself more familiar with the vocabulary of the LXX than St. Matthew or St. Mark. Out of the same total of peculiar words 38 are marked as non-classical, i.e. 'not occurring in Greek writers earlier than the Christian era'; the proportion of non-classical words is therefore about one-seventh, which is the same as that in St. Matthew, and very much smaller than that in St. Mark. But these figures do not adequately represent the classical colouring of St. Luke's style, which may be illustrated in almost every narrative which he has in common with St. Matthew and St. Mark, by his rejection of a non-classical word or expression in favour of one which is classical. Thus, to take a few illustrations, κατακείμενοι ἦσαν (5^{29}) is preferred to the συνανέκειντο of Mt 9^{10} and Mk 2^{15}: twice (4^{33} 8^{27}) a more classical expression is adopted for St. Mark's expression ἄνθρωπος ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ; St. Luke avoids (with St. Matthew) the unclassical word κράββατος (Mk $2^{4.\ 11}$); παραλελυμμένος is preferred to παραλυτικός. Other instances will be found in Plummer (l.c. p. li) or Zahn (l.c. ii. 419). A very striking, because obviously unpremeditated, illustration of the classical character of St. Luke's vocabulary will be found by examining in a concordance the distribution of the use of τε in the books of the NT. Besides the greater purity in choice of words, as compared with those used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, another characteristic of St. Luke's vocabulary is his use of medical terms. This point has been carefully examined by Hobart (The Medical Language of St. Luke, London, 1882), who has made a long list of words which in the NT occur chiefly or solely in St. Luke, and are also found in Greek medical writers. Plummer (l.c. p. lxiv) points out that a very large proportion of these words occur in the LXX, and may have come to St. Luke through that channel, while he allows a large residuum, which, taken together, point to a familiarity with medical terms which would be natural in 'the beloved physician.' As illustrations may be quoted συνεχομένη πυρετῷ μεγαλῷ, 4^{38}; ἡμιθανής, 10^{30}; ἔστη ἡ ῥύσις τοῦ αἵματος, 8^{44}; κραιπάλη, 21^{34}. Another point in regard to St. Luke's vocabulary is the amount common to him and St. Paul, which has been alluded to above (see p. 168). The last characteristic which need here be noticed is St. Luke's fondness for compound words, e.g. προσαναβαίνειν, ἐπεισέρχεσθαι, etc.

(b) In regard to St. Luke's syntax, a number of usages recur so frequently that they may be regarded as characteristic. Thus πρός with the accusative is preferred to the simple dative after verbs of saying. This construction occurs 151 times in the Gospel and Acts, and 25 times in the rest of the NT. Another noteworthy usage is that of γίνομαι followed by καί, a finite verb, or an infinitive; these are almost confined to St. Luke, in whose writings they are found more than 50 times. His use of the optative, a mood comparatively rare in the NT, is also remarkable. In regard to conjunctions, his fondness for τε, especially in Ac, has been already noticed; he shares with St. Paul a fondness for the expression δὲ καί. These may be taken as illustrations of points in St. Luke's syntax. Complete lists will be found in Plummer's Commentary, which is particularly good and full on the linguistic side, and in the work of Sir John Hawkins already quoted, as well as in the older books of Gersdorf, Vogel, and Holtzmann.

* Plummer (l.c. p. lii), following Thayer's Lexicon, p. 703, gives the number rather differently.

(c) The Hebraisms have attracted especial attention in St. Luke because of the purity of his own style. Their distribution is not altogether explained by saying that St. Luke has preserved them as he found them in his sources, for if they had offended his ear he would no doubt have removed them, with the same freedom which he has shown generally in regard to the use of his authorities. It is pointed out by Zahn (l.c. ii. 400) that these Hebraistic turns of expression are used in the editorial links between the narratives, and in these places must be due to St. Luke himself. This is especially true of the expression καὶ ἐγένετο καὶ . . . or ἐγένετο δέ. This seems to indicate that, though St. Luke, no doubt, did preserve the Aramaic expressions of his sources, or may even (as in the first two chapters) have directly imitated the style of the LXX, yet his Hebraisms are in the main to be attributed to the fact that he was thoroughly imbued with the style of the LXX, and not only (as we have already seen) with its vocabulary. Whatever the cause, the number of Hebraistic usages is very large in St. Luke, and they are scattered over the whole Gospel. Besides the uses of γίνομαι, already mentioned, we may notice his periphrastic use of the participle, his use of ἰδού and καὶ ἰδού, such genitives as ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας (18^{6}), or ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας (16^{8}), and circumlocutions by means of words like πρόσωπον, χείρ, στόμα, etc., as in the expression πρὸ προσώπου (7^{27} 9^{52}).

9. St. Luke's Preface.—This is so unique in character as to claim separate special notice. Lagarde, in his Psalterium iuxta Hebræos Hieronymi, tried to show that St. Luke's is modelled on that of Dioscorides in his Materia Medica. There does not seem, however, to be much more resemblance than would be natural in two cases where the writers were referring to the work of their predecessors in the same field, and therefore used a number of similar words. The dedication, though unique in form, as far as the NT is concerned, is in itself only an instance, as Zahn tells us, of a custom which prevailed widely at that time among Greeks and Romans.

What is of more importance for us is the evidence afforded by the preface in regard to the early narratives of our Lord's life, in reference to St. Luke's use of his materials, and other similar questions. The exact meaning of each of the more important words has been closely investigated, as well as the inferences which may be drawn from them. This has been done most recently by Blass in his Philology of the Gospels. The following points deserve attention: (1) Many had before St. Luke attempted to 'restore from memory' (Blass) a continuous narrative, not necessarily written (διήγησις, see Liddell and Scott). The word ἐπεχείρησαν does not necessarily imply (as Origen) an unfavourable criticism of these 'attempts,' and in the καὶ ἐμοί of v.^{3} St. Luke puts himself on the same footing as these predecessors. (2) These accounts were all second-hand, and handed down orally (so Zahn argues from παρέδοσαν), but based on the evidence of those who had been eye-witnesses from the beginning (i.e. of our Lord's public ministry). Are we precluded by these words from supposing that amongst the διηγήσεις of v.^{1} was any apostolic narrative? (3) St. Luke, inasmuch as he had at some earlier date carefully investigated all the facts to the very beginning (ἄνωθεν perhaps goes further back than ἀπ' ἀρχῆς), ventures to write, and that (4) καθεξῆς, i.e. either a continuous narrative in contrast with a number of narratives of separate events, or a complete account in contrast with accounts marked by omissions. The word does not necessarily, or probably, imply an order of time. (5) St. Luke's purpose in writing was to supply Theophilus, as yet, perhaps, not a Christian, with a convincing account of the things in which he had been instructed.

The exact meaning of almost every word has been pressed in one direction or another, and correspondingly divergent inferences have been made.

10. Purpose and Arrangement of the Gospel.—The primary purpose of the Gospel (as well as of the Acts) is stated in the preface, namely, that Theophilus may have full knowledge in regard to the truth of the accounts given to him in the teaching which had been imparted orally—ἵνα ἐπιγνῷς περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν. What was intended for a single person was adapted for others in similar circumstances, and so St. Luke may have sent out the Gospel in a second form (as Blass holds), though it has been said above that this is unlikely, and not required by the facts of the case, so far as the Gospel is concerned. The principle of arrangement is also stated in the preface, in the word καθεξῆς, but the interpretation to be put upon the word is doubtful, and has to be gathered from the Gospel itself.

(a) Purpose.—The first point which may be regarded as significant of St. Luke's purpose is the way in which the facts are definitely brought into connexion with secular history. He alone among the NT writers mentions a Roman emperor by name (2^{1} 3^{1}, Ac 11^{28} 18^{2}), and in Ac other Roman officials, whose names would fix the dates, to some extent at any rate. Another point which would help to carry conviction (Zahn, l.c. ii. 375, 391) is the relatively large number of personal names, not only of prominent actors, but also of those of secondary importance (e.g. $2^{1.2}$ $3^{1.2}$ 7^{40} 8^{3} 19^{1} 24^{18}). Again, it is a noteworthy characteristic of St. Luke that, while St. Matthew seems to collect our Lord's teaching together, he keeps the sayings in what must have been their original setting, and emphasizes the circumstances which called them forth. This may best be illustrated from the way in which the Sermon on the Mount in St. Matthew is scattered over St. Luke's Gospel. This greater definiteness of circumstance could not fail to impress Theophilus, and from the point of view of conviction is more important than definiteness of place or time, which St. Luke, in the Gospel, as in the Acts, often cannot give. In these ways Theophilus would see the work of 'the critic who has had diligent inquiry made in regard to the external facts of the history, and the historian who makes every effort to bring his figures out of the gloom of vague tradition into the clear light of reality.' Another point which St. Luke emphasizes is the impression which our Lord's teaching and acts made on those who were present; and just as St. John, in order to instil 'the belief that Jesus was the Christ the Son of God,' is careful to record the impression made by our Lord's work, so St. Luke lays stress on the way in which our Lord's hearers were affected (e.g. 4^{15} 9^{43} 18^{43} 19^{37} etc.), where these points are not mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark. Again, there can be no doubt that St. Luke, all through the Gospel, has in mind the points on which a Gentile reader would want further information or would feel greater or less interest, or would be more or less impressed, and so we meet with explanations, we find teaching of special Jewish interest ignored or curtailed, and methods of argument such as appeal to the OT dropped. These are all illustrated in the next section of this article.

We see, then, how the expressed purpose of the Gospel seems to be carried out as the narrative proceeds, and we may add that probably St. Luke endeavoured to make his work as complete as possible, and did not omit facts or sayings as irrelevant to his immediate object of convincing Theophilus.

Other objects have been assigned to St. Luke of a polemical or conciliatory character, but the features of the Gospel referred to below show that it will be difficult to make a completely consistent theory on these hypotheses.

(b) In considering St. Luke's arrangement of his Gospel, we may suppose him to have followed in the main the sources which he used, unless he had any occasion to think these were incorrect, or unless his special purpose required him to deviate from them for the sake of clearness. And so we find that over large stretches of the narrative the order of events follows exactly that of St. Mark. (1) After the first two chapters comes the narrative of our Lord's baptism and temptation. Here St. Luke's independence of arrangement is seen in the way in which he finishes the history of John the Baptist before beginning the account of our Lord's ministry. The most important deviation at this period of the narrative is to be found in the previous journey through Galilee, implied in the word ὑπέστρεψεν, 4^{14}. The next point to notice is the visit to Nazareth, 4^{16-30}. In this account the reference to miracles at Capernaum (4^{23}) seems to indicate that it is inserted out of chronological order, unless we suppose these miracles to have happened on the circuit in Galilee just mentioned. In 4^{31} Capernaum is introduced as if it had not been mentioned before, which supports what has just been said. (2) 4^{31}–6^{19}—St. Luke's order follows St. Mark's (1^{21}–3^{19}) exactly, save for the section 5^{1-11} which records the call of the disciples and the miraculous draught of fishes. But there are marks of independence: thus St. Luke assigns no time or place to the healing of the paralytic ($5^{17\text{ff.}}$), unless the connexion with the call of Levi (5^{27}) fixes it. St. Mark and St. Matthew definitely fix it at Capernaum. Again, the two cases which touch Sabbath observance (6^{1} and 6^{6}) St. Luke assigns definitely to two different Sabbaths, St. Mark apparently to the same. (3) 6^{20}–8^{3}—the record seems to agree generally with St. Matthew. Thus in both the discourse on the Mount (or Plain), 6^{20-49} is followed by, and in both definitely connected with, the healing of the centurion's servant (omitted by St. Mark). St. Luke adds the incident at Nain on the next day (? ; var. lec. 7^{11}), and then in both St. Luke and St. Matthew the message of John the Baptist follows, but with no reference as to time. The incident at the house of Simon the Pharisee follows (7^{36}), but with no note of time. The section closes (8^{1-3}) with a circuit of Galilee, ἐν τῷ καθεξῆς. (4) 8^{4}–9^{17}—St. Luke and St. Mark (4^{1}–6^{44}) agree, but St. Luke leaves out Mk 3^{20-27}, and inserts later Mk 3^{28-30}. Here St. Matthew seems to support St. Luke's order. As to Mk 3^{31-35}, the visit of our Lord's mother, St. Matthew and St. Luke put it on the same day as the parable of the Sower, but St. Matthew records it before, St. Luke after, the parable. They all agree in inserting here the parable of the Sower, but St. Matthew records the 'other parables' and the private explanation to His disciples, which are only mentioned in St. Mark ($4^{33.\ 34}$). The narratives here diverge, because the crossing of the lake, the storm, the events in Gadara are put much earlier in St. Matthew ($8^{18\text{ff.}}$), in connexion perhaps with the first visit to Capernaum. St. Mark, however, connects these definitely (4^{35}) with the parable, while St. Luke, perhaps having St. Mark and also the order of St. Matthew before him, records this in the same place as St. Mark, but (8^{22}) with a vague reference to 'one of the days.' It is possible that St. Luke has acted in exactly the same way with regard to the events which follow in St. Matthew (the healing of the paralytic, the call of Levi, the discourse on fasting, Mt 9^{1-17}) after the return from Gadara, but are in St. Luke and St. Mark given earlier. Here, again (5^{17}), St. Luke avoids the need of reconciling the accounts by taking refuge in the phrase 'on one of the days.' The narratives then proceed together (but St. Matthew 8^{18} definitely adheres to his order, for he connects what follows with the call of Levi), but St. Matthew adds to the healing of Jairus' daughter and of the woman with the issue of blood two miracles, 9^{27-34}, which he assigns to the same day. Then follows a departure from Capernaum (Mk 6^{1-6}) to Nazareth, and a circular journey through Galilee mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark, though the reason for it is to be found in the miracle recorded only by St. Matthew (9^{31}) requiring his withdrawal. In this connexion (though St. Luke does not state the time) occurs the mission of the Twelve, followed by Herod's comments on the result of that mission. St. Luke omits the account of John's death (which St. Matthew and St. Mark here insert). With the withdrawal to Bethsaida (which St. Matthew attributes to the news of John the Baptist's death) and the feeding of the five thousand this section closes (9^{17}). (5) Here St. Matthew and St. Mark give in general agreement a long section (Mt 14^{22}–16^{12}, Mk 6^{45}–8^{26}), narrating a return to Gennesaret, a visit to Phœnicia, a return through Decapolis to the Sea of Galilee, the feeding of the four thousand, a crossing by ship and back, and (Mk only) a visit to Bethsaida. All this is practically omitted by St. Luke, except for one or two sayings which he records in another connexion. (6) At 9^{18-50} the three narratives proceed together in recording, exactly in the same order, the confession of St. Peter (the scene of which St. Luke does not mention), the announcement of the Passion, the Transfiguration, the lunatic boy, another announcement of His death, and the dispute as to who should be greatest (the scene of which St. Luke again does not mention). With this St. Matthew and St. Mark connect a discussion as to offences which St. Luke puts much later, and distributes ($17^{1.\ 2}$ 14^{34} 15^{3-7}). (7) The section beginning with 9^{51} is independent of the other accounts, as far as 18^{14}. All the narratives (Mt 19^{1}, Mk 10^{1}, Lk 9^{51}) agree in making our Lord leave Galilee at this stage, and St. Matthew and St. Mark add 'for Peræa.' St. Luke mentions a journeying to Jerusalem several times during the section, e.g. $9^{51.\ 53}$ $13^{22.\ 23}$ 17^{11}, and St. John (7^{2} 10^{40} $11^{7.\ 54}$) tells us of visits to Jerusalem and its neighbourhood and withdrawals again; and so some, e.g. Wieseler and Ellicott, have supposed that St. Luke here gives us the narrative of three definite journeys to Jerusalem. But St. Luke in this section impresses upon us so often his uncertainty as to time and place, that a chronological sequence seems out of the question; and in certain chapters it is obvious that the subject of prayer, or riches, or something similar, is the link which holds the narrative together. The proposal of Mr. Halcombe (The Displaced Section of St. Luke, Cambridge, 1886) to remove bodily a small part of this section, namely 11^{14}–13^{21}, and to insert it after 8^{22}, involves an impossible act of violence to textual evidence with a very slight improvement from the point of view of harmonizing the narratives. (8) At 17^{15} the narratives unite again, and go on to the end of 18^{43}; but St. Matthew and St. Mark are independent in details, and St. Luke adds the incident of Zacchæus, and the parable of the Pounds (19^{1-28}). (9) At 19^{29} the account of the triumphal entry begins, and from here on to the end of the Gospel the question of arrangement does not need to be considered, though even in the events of the last week we may notice (e.g. 20^{1}) the same indefiniteness as to time, and resort to summaries (e.g. 19^{47} 21^{37}). The main facts recorded are the same in all, though there are, of course, additions and omissions in St. Luke's account as in the others. Blass (Philology of the Gospels) and Reuss assume that a different source has been used here also, and certainly St. Luke is independent of St. Matthew and St. Mark in the form in which he gives the eschatological discourses. The general order of events is, however, the same, as must necessarily have been the case. Here and there St. Luke seems to have intentionally put together events separate in time and place. Thus St. Peter's denials are placed together in order 'to add force to the episode' (Lightfoot), and in the account of the appearances after the resurrection St. Luke seems to have summarized and put them all on the day of the resurrection, though he cannot from his acquaintance with St. Paul have been ignorant of the events of 1 Co 15^{5-7}.

We have seen that in the main St. Luke follows the order of the framework found in St. Mark.

Are we in a position now to say, looking back over the Gospel, what St. Luke meant when he purposed to write καθεξῆς? Various theories as to St. Luke's principle of arrangement have been put forward. Plummer (l.c. p. xxxvi ff.) says, 'we may assert with some confidence that Luke generally aims at chronological order.' Weiss (l.c. p. 301) says the evangelist 'has attempted to divide Jesus' public ministry into work in Galilee, outside Galilee, and in Jerusalem.' Another aspect is represented by Godet and Westcott. The former (Biblical Studies, p. 43) regards the Gospel as giving an account of the 'organic growth of the person and of the work,' and Westcott (Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, ch. vii. note G) gives an elaborate analysis based on a general development of ideas such as 'marks of the future Church,' 'the universal Church,' etc. Zahn (l.c. ii. 366) thinks that 'the chronological exactness is not a clearly marked principle in the representation,' but that, 'in contrast with the disconnected narratives of single incidents,' St. Luke's object is to give Theophilus 'a continuous representation of the history, in which the earlier prepares the way for the later, and makes it intelligible.'

11. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE GOSPEL.—These must depend in this, as in any other work, partly on the nature and extent of the sources to which the writer alludes in his preface and the use he makes of them, partly on his consideration of the readers for whom the Gospel was intended, partly on his own personality. It is not always easy to say to which of these causes the different characteristics are to be assigned: thus the selection of particular incidents may be due to the personal interest of St. Luke, or to consideration for the readers he wished to interest, or it may be explained by the fact of his finding them in the sources he used. The following are among the most important characteristics which have attracted attention in the Gospel. Some of them have been alluded to already.

That St. Luke wrote for Gentiles is clear. A number of technical terms are explained. Thus we find νομικός (7^{30} 10^{25} etc.) instead of γραμματεύς, ἐπιστάτης where the other evangelists have some other word (e.g. 8^{24}). Hebrew names are translated: e.g. Γολγοθά (23^{33}) and Καναναῖος (6^{15}). The position of places, especially in Palestine, is often defined, e.g. 4^{31} 8^{26} 23^{51}. Expressions which might be misunderstood by Gentile readers are modified or added to: thus (9^{29}) in the account of the Transfiguration μετεμορφώθη (Mt, Mk) becomes ἐγένετο . . . ἕτερον. The appeals to the OT are very few, and the quotations from it are found for the most part in the sayings of our Lord (e.g. $4^{4.8}$ 7^{27} etc.), which are reproduced by St. Luke from his authorities, or are reminiscences of the LXX, with which, as we have seen, he was very familiar. There are only five references to prophecy, and of these only one (3^{4}) occurs in the narrative of St. Luke. Points in our Lord's teaching which would have no interest for Gentile readers are altogether passed over or curtailed. Thus the teaching, in the Sermon on the Mount, as to the relation of the new to the old Law is omitted; so also is the denunciation of the Jews for observing the 'tradition' at the expense of the Law (Mt 15^{1}, Mk 7^{1}); the rebuke of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt $23^{1ff.}$) is very much shortened. The frequent allusions to the universality of the Gospel are to be explained by the same reference to Gentile readers. St. Luke alone quotes in full ($3^{5.6}$) the prophecy of Is 40^{3}—'All flesh shall see the salvation of God'—a prophecy which all the evangelists connect with John the Baptist. Our Lord's first recorded teaching ($4^{24ff.}$) emphasizes the admission of Gentiles to privileges at the hands of Elijah and Elisha, while His last explanation of the Scriptures at Emmaus (24^{47}) showed that 'repentance and forgiveness of sins were to be preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.' Between these limits a number of passages and incidents might be quoted to establish this characteristic of the Gospel, e.g. $10^{25ff.}$ 13^{29} etc. In accordance with this, we find a 'marked antipathy to exclusiveness and intolerance' (Plummer), and stress laid on those qualifications for entrance to the kingdom, which it is open to all without distinction of birth to attain. On the other hand, the Gospel is not anti-Jewish, though the Jews are strongly condemned directly or indirectly, and that in parts of the Gospel peculiar to St. Luke, e.g. $10^{31.32}$ 16^{15} etc. Jewish expressions are often kept in parables or teaching found only in St. Luke, and the regard for temple worship and observance of the law is not depreciated. All the rites of the law are fulfilled in our Lord's case (2^{21} etc.): He is the 'Son of David' (18^{38} etc.): The commands of the Jewish law are to be observed (5^{14} 17^{14} etc.), and are of lasting importance (16^{29} 18^{20} etc.). In all these and similar cases St. Luke may have been preserving only the language of his sources, but, if his purpose had been to depreciate Judaism, he would no doubt have acted as Marcion did towards the allusions to the OT which he found in St. Luke's Gospel, and removed them.

In regard to the way in which he uses his sources, it has been suggested that St. Luke 'avoids duplicates on principle' (Weiss, Introduction, Eng. tr. ii. 300), and thus gives no account of the cursing of the barren fig tree (Mk 11^{13}, Mt 21^{18}) because he has already narrated a similar event in $13^{6ff.}$, does not mention the anointing of Mk 14^{3}, Mt 26^{6} because of the narrative of $7^{36ff.}$, and so on. But this supposed characteristic of 'Sparsamkeit' (as Storr calls it), which may be illustrated by many other omissions of St. Luke (such as the passing over of the miracle of the 4000), has to be taken in connexion with the numerous cases where St. Luke does not show this tendency. Thus we have a twofold dispute as to who should be the greatest 9^{46} 22^{24}; in regard to the miracles and parables we find similar cases of repetition; and the so-called 'doublets' (e.g. $8^{16}=11^{33}$; $14^{11}=18^{14}$) show that not only in the narratives, but in our Lord's words, the same characteristic of repetition is found. Other instances may be found in Plummer, l.c. p. xxviii, and Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 64 ff. Another characteristic of the Gospel is a vagueness as to time and place, even in cases where the other narratives are more definite. This vagueness may be illustrated from $5^{12.17}$ etc., is perhaps most marked in the section $9^{51\text{ff.}}$, and extends even to the account of the passion, e.g. 20^{1}. On the other hand, it must be noted that St. Luke very frequently connects sayings of our Lord with the occasion which called them forth, which in the other Gospels are collected together with no such reference, as for instance in the Sermon on the Mount, e.g. $12^{22\text{ff.}}$ $14^{25\text{ff.}}$. Mention has already been made of the stress St. Luke lays on the effect of our Lord's words, of his preference for more literary Greek, of his fondness for medical expressions, of his close connexion in thought, and often in language, with St. Paul.

In the account of Jesus' life and teaching the symbol of the ox (with which this Gospel is almost universally associated) may perhaps, as the sacrificial animal, represent St. Luke's Gospel as especially that which emphasizes our Lord's 'gentleness' to the sinner and the outcast. This may be illustrated from the parables peculiar to St. Luke, e.g. the Prodigal Son; or from such incidents as that of the sinner in the house of Simon ($7^{36\text{ff.}}$), or that of the penitent robber ($23^{39\text{ff.}}$). Most marked, again, are the repeated references to prayer, both in the narrative of our Lord's life—in which he records many instances of our Lord praying which are not found in the other narratives (e.g. 3^{21} 5^{16} 6^{12} etc.)—and also in parables which he alone records (e.g. 11^{5} $18^{1\text{-}14}$). Again, it is noticeable how much of the teaching preserved for us only by St. Luke deals with the use of riches. This is to be regarded rather as proclaiming him as the 'Evangelist of Philanthropy' (Herder), than as proving that St. Luke made use of an Ebionitic source. This characteristic appears in much of our Lord's teaching as recorded by St. Luke, as well as in a large number of the parables peculiar to him, e.g. those of Dives and Lazarus, the Rich Fool, the Unjust Steward. It may have had a special appropriateness for a rich man like Theophilus (Zahn, l.c. ii. 379), or may have been the outcome of St. Luke's 'great sympathy with the suffering poor, and a great horror of the temptations which beset all the rich.' It does not (as Weiss, Introd., Eng. tr. ii. 309) 'rest on the idea that wealth is pernicious in itself and poverty salutary in itself.' There is no sufficient evidence of St. Luke's use of an Ebionitic source or sympathy with Ebionitism, for many of the expressions on which this theory is based are found in the other Gospels; and the latter contain many things not found in St. Luke which have as good a claim to be regarded as Ebionitic: thus they (Mt 13^{22}, Mk 4^{19}), and they alone, speak of 'the deceitfulness of riches,' where St. Luke simply says 'riches.' 'There is no evidence that the protest against worldliness is due to some particular source from which he drew and from which the others did not draw' (Plummer).

For a discussion of many difficulties connected with special points in St. Luke, such as the Genealogy, Census, etc., readers are referred to the articles GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. p. 645 f., and QUIRINIUS. The present article has aimed at dealing with the main headings of the general topics connected with the Gospel, and giving sufficient illustrations to explain the allusions. The literature given below will enable students to follow out the points more in detail.

LITERATURE.—Besides general books of Introduction to the New Testament, and works on the Canon, the following may be mentioned: (A) Commentaries.—A list of these, complete for all practical purposes, may be found in Plummer's volume on the Gospel in the International Critical Commentary. This may itself be recommended as the best English Commentary, especially on the linguistic side, in regard to which it is very full and scholarly. Besides these, reference may be made to Schanz, Das Evangelium des heiligen Lucas; Godet, Commentaire sur l'Évangile de St. Luc; Knabenbauer (in the Cursus Scripturæ Sacræ); Meyer, Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar (last edition of St. Luke by B. and J. Weiss).

(B) St. Luke and Josephus.—Clemen, Die Chronologie der Paul. Briefe, p. 66 ff., discusses the literature of the question, etc.; see also Zahn, Einl. ii. 394, 414. A connexion between St. Luke and Josephus is maintained by Krenkel (Josephus und Lucas), Keim (Aus dem Urchristenthum), and others, and is denied by Nösgen (SK, 1879), Belser (Theol. Quartalschrift, 1895, 1896), etc.

(C) St. Luke's Style.—Besides grammars of the NT, like Winer, Schmiedel, and Blass, books on NT writers like that of Simcox, and lexicons like that of Thayer (in which a list of words peculiar to St. Luke is given), may be mentioned especially Plummer, Holtzmann, Gersdorf (Beiträge zur Sprachcharacteristik, etc.), Vogel (Zur Characteristik des Lucas nach Sprache und Stil).

(D) St. Luke and Marcion.—The most recent discussion of Marcion's Gospel is in Zahn, Geschichte des Kanons, i. 680 ff., ii. 411 ff.; see also Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, ch. viii.; Westcott, The Canon, p. 314 ff.

(E) The Text of St. Luke's Gospel, with reference to the readings in the later chapters, has been examined by Graefe in articles in SK, 1888, 1896, 1898. The theory of a double edition is stated by Blass in his edition of St. Luke's Gospel, and also in his Philology of the Gospels.

Amongst other more recent literature of importance for the study of points connected with St. Luke may also be included Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ; Resch, Das Kindheits-evangelium nach Lucas und Matthäus ('Texte und Untersuchungen,' x. 5); and Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?

LUNATICK.—The Greek vb. σεληνιάζομαι (from σελήνη, the moon) occurs in Mt 4^{24} 17^{15} and nowhere else in class. or bibl. Greek. Its lit. meaning is 'to be moonstruck'; the Vulg. has lunaticus and (17^{15}) lunaticus est, and Wyc. followed with 'is lunatik.' The other versions chose the same expression (except Tindale's 'is franticke' in 17^{15}),* which also means literally 'is moonstruck.' RV prefers 'is epileptic,' for which it is taken to task by Beckett (Revised NT, p. 99). See MEDICINE.

J. HASTINGS.

LUST (Anglo-Sax. lust=Ger. Lust, 'pleasure,' 'delight') is now restricted to sexual desire, and that special meaning is found also in AV. But the word has a wider application in most passages, and signifies any gross appetite. Thus Ex 15^{9} 'The enemy said, I will pursue . . . my lust shall be satisfied upon them' (נַפְשִׁי, lit. 'my soul,' Amer. RV 'my desire'); Ps 78^{18} 'And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust' (לְנַפְשָׁם); 78^{30} 'They were not estranged from their lust' (מִתַּאֲוָתָם); 81^{12} 'So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust' (בִּשְׁרִירוּת לִבָּם). These are all the examples of the subst. in OT. In NT the word most frequently tr. 'lust' is ἐπιθυμία, 'strong desire' of any kind, the special kind being sometimes designated by an adj., 'worldly' Tit 2^{12}, 'fleshly' 1 P 2^{11}. In 1 Th 4^{5} we have the still more general word πάθος; in Ro 1^{27} ὄρεξις, a strong word, but capable of a good or a bad sense; and in Ja $4^{1\text{-}3}$ ἡδονή, in itself no more than 'pleasure.'

In his Com. on 2 P 1^{4}, Thomas Adams says, 'Lust, concupiscence in itself, as it is a faculty of the soul, and gift of God, is not sin; but may be the hand of virtue, or the instrument whereby she works. Keep her at home, and set her on work, to light the candle, and sweep the house; let her be under the correction of grace, and she may prove a chaste virgin, fit to meet the Bridegroom at his coming. Lust is in itself as they write of the planet Mercury in the horoscope of man's nativity; if it be joined with a good planet it makes it better; if with a bad one, it makes it worse. There is a lusting of the Spirit; for "the Spirit lusteth against the flesh," Gal 5^{17}. But it is most commonly taken in the worse sense.' And he proceeds to say that, taken in the worse sense, it may be either 'a particular effect of that grand beldam concupiscence,' i.e. uncleanness; or stand 'for the whole general corruption of our nature, prone to all sin.' And on the same verse he comments: 'Ambrose saith of Samson, he could choke a lion, not his lust. Another of Hercules—

---

* Sir John Cheke, however (1550), in his preference for Saxon words, chose 'is moond.'

> Lenam non potuit, potuit superare leænam;
> Quem fera non valuit vincere, vicit Hera,

He found the lioness weaker than his lust, and no beast so savage as his harlot.' Whittingham's New Test. of 1557 is distinguished from all other versions by translating Jn 1^{13} 'Which are borne not of bloud, nor of the lust of the fleshe, nor of the lust of man, but of God.' The word is no doubt used in the indifferent sense of desire. Cf. Tindale's renderings of Gn 3^{16} 'And thy lustes shall pertayne unto thy husbond, and he shall rule the'; 19^5 'Bringe them out unto us that we may do oure lust with them'; 27^{46} 'Yf Iacob take a wife of the doughters of Heth, soch one as these are, or of the doughters of the lande, what lust shuld I have to lyve.' But the difference between the old and the new use of the word is more clearly seen in his tr. of Nu 14^8 'Yf the Lorde have lust to us, he will bring us in to this londe'; or of He 10^6 'In sacrifices and synneofferynges thou hast no lust'; or in Coverdale's tr. of Is 53^2 'When we loke upon him, there shal be no fayrnesse: we shal have no lust unto him.' Again, in his 'Parable of the Wicked Mammon' (Works, i. 115) Tindale translates Mt 5^6 'Blessed are they which hunger and thirst for righteousness' sake (that is, to fulfil the law), for their lust shall be fulfilled'; and still more striking is the use in Expositions, p. 168, 'God hath no rod in his hand, nor looketh sour, but merrily, that it is a lust to behold his cheerful countenance.'

The verb to 'lust' or 'lust after' has the same meanings as the subst., to desire or crave in general, as 1 Co 10^6 'Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things (εἰς τὸ μὴ εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἐπιθυμητὰς κακῶν), as they also lusted' (ἐπεθύμησαν); passing into the special sense of sexual desire, in Mt 5^{28} 'Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart' (πρὸς τὸ ἐπιθυμῆσαι αὐτὴν [αὐτῆς]). Tindale has the verb in a distinctly bad sense in Dt 5^{21} 'Thou shalt not luste after thi neighbours wife,' though not in the sense of sexual desire; it is more colourless in Mt 17^{12} 'but have done unto him what soever they lusted' (so most VSS until AV 'listed,' Gr. ὅσα ἠθέλησαν, Rhem. 'whatsoever they would'); and the better meaning is clearly seen in Tindale, Works, i. 103, 'For if we were of God we should cleave to God, and lust after the will of God.' Cf. Archbp. Hamilton, Catechism, 'The tabil'—'That the special faith suld be loiffit and lustit for mony excellent operations, quhilk it workis in Christen men and wemen'; and Rutherford, Letters, No. ccxxvi. 'What heaven can be there liker to hell, than to lust, and green, and dwine, and fall a swoon for Christ's love, and to want it?'

Lusty, meaning stout and vigorous, is perhaps still in good use. It occurs in AV but once, Jg 3^{29} 'all lusty, and all men of valour.' Heb. שָׁמֵן is originally 'fat,' as AVm, and some take the meaning here to be 'wealthy,' but AV is better.* Cf. Ps 73^4 103^5 [Pr. Bk.] and As You Like It, II. iii. 47—

> 'Though I look old, yet am I strong and lusty;
> For in my youth I never did apply
> Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood.'

LUZ (לוּז 'almond' or 'bone'; Οὐλαμμαύς Gn 28^{19}, Λοῦζα 35^6 etc.; Sam. לוזה, Luzah Gn 28^{19} 48^3).—1. An old Canaanite city, afterwards known as Bethel, Gn 28^{19} 35^6 48^3, Jos 18^{13} (P or R), Jos 16^2 (E), Jg 1^{23}. See art. BETHEL. 2. A place in 'the land of the Hittites,' founded by a man of Bethel, Jg 1^{26}. The mention of the ancient name of Bethel in P is in accordance with the writer's fondness for such archæological details; cf. Gn 23^2 35^{27}, Jos 15^{54} 21^{11} (Kiriath-arba), Gn 35^{19} 48^7 (Ephrath). The meaning of Luz is 'almond,' Gn 30^{37}, as in Arabic; hence in the Talmud the mystical characteristics of the almond are ascribed to Luz, see art. BETHEL, vol. i. p. 277 and n. Another meaning is 'bone'; in particular, a bone of the spine. So in the Midrash Beresh. Rabba, § 28, fol. 31b, lûz is the bone of the spine out of which man is to be re-fashioned in the world to come; similarly Meẓora', § 18, fol. 14b, Midrash Ḳoheleth, fol. 24a. Levy, NHWB, s.v., takes this meaning as secondary, 'a bone shaped like an almond'; but Lagarde (Bildung d. Nomina, p. 157 f. n.) prefers 'bone' as the original meaning, and supposes that the place was called Luz from its resemblance to a backbone. Identifications have been suggested for the Luz in 'the land of the Hittites,' e.g. Lizan in Kurdistan (see Neubauer, Géogr. du Talmud, p. 394), and Shaizar (שורא=שרגא=לוז, see refs. to Midrash above) in Cœle-Syria on the Orontes (Lagarde, l.c.); but these identifications are very doubtful. The place must have been outside Israelite territory and in the north, somewhere in Cœle-Syria or the Lebanon.

LYCAONIA (Λυκαονία), the land of the Lycaones, was a large country in the centre and south of the great plateau of Asia Minor. It is almost entirely a vast level plain, in the centre of which, like an island in the sea, the lofty Kara-Dagh has been thrown up by volcanic action. On the edge of Kara-Dagh are the remarkable ruins called Bin-Bir-Kilisse (Thousand and One Churches), probably the site of the ancient Barata. The great Lycaonian plain is merged on the north and east in the plains of Galatia and Cappadocia; on the west and south it is limited by hills. The soil has little value except for pasturage; but the immense flocks which grazed on it were a source of revenue to king Amyntas (Strabo, p. 568), and are still a feature that strikes the travellers. Many of the wells supply a brackish water, unfit for human use, but said to have a good effect on the wool of sheep, which drink it freely.

Lycaonia was bounded on the north by Galatia proper, on the west by Phrygia and Pisidia, on the south by the mountainous country that stretches back to the great ridge of Mount Taurus (a country generally summed up in earlier time as Cilicia Tracheia, of which Isauria was part, and in later time as Isauria in its wider acceptation), and on the east by Cappadocia. The exact boundaries varied at different times. On the north a large district, which had originally been part of Lycaonia, was at some uncertain date (perhaps about B.C. 164, see GALATIA, vol. ii. p. 83; Stud. Bibl. iv. p. 46 ff.) transferred to Galatia as one of the twelve tetrarchies into which that state was divided (Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 95); this district contained fourteen cities, of which Iconium was politically the capital (though ethnographically and in the feeling of its inhabitants it was a Phrygian city).* The fact that Iconium was the last city of Phrygia towards Lycaonia (Xen. Anab. i. 2. 19), and that the frontier must have been in the hill-ridge fringing the vale of Lystra on the north, gives a fixed point in earlier time; but politically and in the estimation of external nations Iconium regularly, and even Laodicea Combusta, and sometimes Tyriaion, were reckoned to Lycaonia. The hilly country west of Iconium was added to Lycaonia when it was constituted a province of the Empire in A.D. 372; but previously that country was Pisidian. The southern boundary ran through the hilly country between Lystra and Isaura (Zengibar Kalessi) and south of Laranda (Karaman). On the east the limit passed near the lake Ak Göl, west of Kybistra (Eregli), and touched Karadja Dagh, thus making Hyde (Kara Bunar, probably) the frontier city of Lycaonia towards Cappadocia on the east and the enlarged Galatia on the north.[*]

* RV adds Is 59^{10} 'among them that are lusty we are as dead men,' for AV 'we are in desolate places as dead men.' The passage is difficult, perhaps corrupt.

* To the authorities quoted under ICONIUM add the words in Vita S. Artemii (ascribed to Joan. Damasc.), διελθὼν τοίνυν ἅπασαν τὴν Φρυγίαν, καὶ πρὸς τὴν ἐσχάτην αὐτῆς πόλιν τὸ καλούμενον Lycaonia was part of the great Seleucid Empire until B.C. 190. Thereafter it was assigned to the Pergamenian kingdom (Livy, xxxvii.); it was so remote that there is little probability that the sovereignty could ever have been made a reality.[†] The northern part was probably seized by the Gauls. The southern part, after being probably disputed between native and Galatian chiefs, was given by Aquillius to Cappadocia in 129, temporarily overrun by Pontus in 74, and finally set free by Pompey's victories over Mithridates. At the settlement of the East by Pompey in 64, Lycaonia seems to have been divided into three parts: the north was added to Galatia (Ptol. v. 4, 10); the south-east to Cappadocia, forming an eleventh strategia of that country;[‡] the west was attached to the Roman Empire, and administered by the governor of Cilicia. The Romans evidently retained a right of way through eastern Lycaonia, for the only practicable road for an army between Iconium the Lycaonian capital and Tarsus the Cilician metropolis passed across it by Kybistra and the Cilician Gates; and Cicero's movements during his governorship of Cilicia show that he could go back and forward at will, and yet that Kybistra was part of Cappadocia. Thus Cicero was brought into close and friendly relations with the Cappadocian royal family, which was practically dependent on Rome, and half subject to it.

The eastern part of Lycaonia long continued subject, at least in name, to the weak Cappadocian rule; but Antipater of Derbe, a friend of Cicero, profited by the troubles of the Civil Wars to make himself an independent chief; and Laranda also was perhaps subject to him (see DERBE). Antony gave the western part (certainly including Lystra and Iconium)[§] to king Polemon in B.C. 39; but in 36 it was transferred to Amyntas, king of Pisidia, who also received all Galatia proper. Amyntas conquered also Derbe and Laranda, which then were incorporated in the Roman Empire, when Amyntas' kingdom was made into the province Galatia in B.C. 25. Roman soldiers from Laranda were serving in the seventh legion not long after this (Corp. Inscr. Lat. iii. 2709, 2818). In A.D. 37 eastern Lycaonia was placed under Antiochus of Commagene along with most of Cilicia Tracheia, and acquired the name Lycaonia Antiochiana or (χώρα) Ἀντιοχιανή, which is applied to it by Ptolemy, v. 6. 17, in a Latin inscription, Corpus, x. 8660, and probably in a Greek inscription.[*] In 41 Claudius confirmed this arrangement. It is probable that Laranda was at this time reunited to eastern Lycaonia, for the policy of Antiochus (a far more active king than the Cappadocian monarchs) was carried out along lines of road radiating from Laranda;[†] and his coins reading ΛΥΚΑΟΝΕϹ were certainly struck at an important city, and Laranda is the only important Lycaonian city that could be within his kingdom. Ptolemy, indeed, mentions even Derbe in Antiochiana; but the name Claudio-Derbe (like Claud-Iconium) proves that it was in the province under Claudius (A.D. 41–54), and Ptolemy has probably fallen into error owing to the fact that Derbe had been originally attached to the eastern or Cappadocian half of Lycaonia at the settlement of Pompey in B.C. 64.

Under Claudius and Nero, when St. Paul visited the churches of South Galatia, Lycaonia included the two parts, the Roman and the Antiochian. The former contained two cities, Lystra and Derbe, and a number of villages and small towns, chiefly towards the north-east, and it is correctly described (Ac 14^{6}) as 'the cities of Lycaonia, Lystra and Derbe, and the region round about'; in other words, the apostles, when driven out of Iconium, crossed the frontier of Phrygia into Roman Lycaonia. Moreover, the regions of which the vast province Galatia was composed (see vol. ii. p. 87) were called χῶραι, 'Territories'; and, as we have seen, the part of Lycaonia not governed by the Romans was called the Antiochian Territory, or Lycaonia Antiochiana.[‡] In distinction therefrom the Roman part would naturally be called by an adjective derived from the provincial name (for a country became part of the Roman Empire in virtue of being included in a province), i.e. it would be styled either the Galatic Territory (Ac 18^{23}) or Lycaonia Galatica, a name which does not occur, but is proved by the similar names Galatic Pontus (as distinguished from Polemoniac Pontus, ruled by king Polemon) and Galatic Phrygia (as distinguished from Asian Phrygia in the province Asia). In place of the bare title Λυκαονίαν τὴν Γαλατικήν, the more descriptive and complete appellation τὰς πόλεις τῆς Λυκαονίας, Λύστραν καὶ Δέρβην, καὶ τὴν περίχωρον is used in Ac 14^{6}; and this is practically equivalent to τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν τῆς Λυκαονίας, ἔχουσαν τὰς πόλεις Λύστραν καὶ Δέρβην καὶ περικειμένας κώμας. In Ac 16^{1-4} this Territory is not formally named, but merely its two cities are mentioned in succession. In Ac 18^{23} the expression τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν is explained by Asterius[§] (bishop of Amaseia in Pontus in A.D. 401) as τὴν Λυκαονίαν καὶ τὰς τῆς Φρυγίας πόλεις.

Both parts of Lycaonia were included in the united province of Cappadocia-Galatia under the Flavian emperors. When they were again divided about 106 by Trajan, it is probable that eastern Lycaonia continued to be connected with Cappadocia. But about A.D. 137 a new province was formed, commonly called the Triple Eparchy, consisting of Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Isauria. The Lycaonian cities were formed into a union called Κοινὸν Λυκαονίας, meeting in the worship of the Emperors: the cities composing it struck coins in the name of the Koinon. If Ptolemy is correct, neither Lystra nor Iconium was included in the Triple Eparchy, but both continued to be in Galatia; and, certainly, neither struck coins as member of the Koinon. Derbe, on the other hand, was a member of the Koinon and included in the Triple Eparchy.

Ἰκόνιον καταντήσας. The other thirteen cities of the Tetrarchy were Savatra or Soatra, and the towns on the west side of Lake Tatta, probably Laodicea and Lystra, but not Derbe (which was in the eleventh Strategia, attached to Cappadocia; see below and Strab. p. 569).

[§] Lycaonia is not formally mentioned in this transaction; but it is evidently summed up at this time under the general title of Cilicia, for Strabo, p. 568, mentions that Iconium was ruled by Polemon, while Polemon's kingdom is described simply as μέρος τι Κιλικίας by Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 75, and it was owing to this connexion that Iconium is several times called a city of Cilicia (see ICONIUM).

But that was not so, and Antioch is included in the preceding term Φρυγίας. Ἀντιοχίας is here equivalent to Ἀντιοχιανῆς (χώρας).

The name of the Lycaonians (Λυκάονες) is not used in the Bible, but the adverb Λυκαονιστί, 'in the speech of the Lycaonians,' occurs in Ac 14^{11} (see LYSTRA). While the villages and small towns probably retained the native language and manners of Lycaonia, the cities such as Iconium and Derbe were likely to have been Grecized between A.D. 334 and 190, and probably had a Seleucid tone in municipal law and customs (see Ramsay, Historical Comm. on Galatians, 1899).

A Jewish element was likely to spread in Lycaonia while it formed part of the Seleucid Empire (see LAODICEA); on the traces of it see GALATIA, vol. ii. p. 88, and ICONIUM. A strong Christian influence is perceptible in the epigraphy of Western and Northern Lycaonia (v. ibidem).

Another people called the Inner Lycaones (Λυκάονες πρὸς ἔνδον), who lived in Phrygia, must be distinguished. It was probably this Phrygian people to whom Bartholomew went as an apostle. Their country was probably Cutchuk Sitchanli Ova, north from Sandykli Ova. Their history is treated in Cities and Bishops of Phrygia, pt. ii. pp. 664, 693 ff.

LITERATURE.—Lycaonia is treated by Ramsay, Hist. Geog. of Asia Minor, pp. 330–346, 350, 355, 357–360 (in that work, sect. 17 on Castabala should be deleted; there was no Castabala north of Taurus), and better in Hist. Com. on Galatians. Many Lycaonian inscriptions are given by Sterrett (who discovered Lystra, and approximately located Derbe) in his Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor. See also the admirable Hamilton and other travellers. W. M. RAMSAY.

LYCIA (Λυκία) was the country that occupied the south-eastern part of Asia Minor. Though it is a land that presents great interest, as regards antiquities, and history, and physical features, yet it is of singularly little importance in the story of early Christianity.

The country consists to a great extent of lofty mountain masses, rising in many parts, especially in the eastern half, almost direct from the seashore. But in the fertile valleys of the Xanthos and other smaller streams, which break the mountains, or at their mouths, were situated many great cities, such as Patara, Ac 21^{1} (a famous seat of the worship of Apollo), and Myra of Lycia, Ac 27^{5}[*] (whose important harbour was a common starting-point or finish of the run across sea between Alexandria and the Asia Minor coast). The number of separate glens, by which Lycia is broken up, prevented it from ever becoming a powerful country. It derived its unity only from foreign conquest. It was ruled by the Persians, and conquered by Alexander the Great; it formed part of the Seleucid Empire, and was disputed between the Seleucid and Ptolemaic kings; it was taken from Antiochus the Great by the Romans in B.C. 188 and given at first to Rhodes, but soon afterwards in 168 it was set free, and for many years it was very prosperous. It is mentioned as one of the self-governing states to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jews in B.C. 138–7, 1 Mac 15^{23} (see CARIA, DELOS). This implies that there were Jewish residents; and the ships carrying pilgrims to and from Jerusalem would touch at Lycian harbours. The numerous cities of Lycia were united in an association called τὸ Λυκιακὸν Σύστημα. Nearly 100 places in Lycia are known to have struck coins, and Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 28, says there were formerly 70 cities, and in his time only 36; but only 23 had votes in the Assembly, called τὸ κοινὸν συνέδριον (six cities of the first rank had three votes each, those of the second class two votes, of the third one). In reward for their fidelity to Rome in the Mithridatic war, the freedom of the Lycians was confirmed by Sulla. They suffered exactions occasionally, especially from Cassius in B.C. 43; but their freedom was again confirmed by Antony. Lycia was formed into a Roman province by Claudius in A.D. 43 on account of the dissensions between the cities; and in 74 was formed into a double province along with Pamphylia (see Mommsen on Corp. Inscr. Latin. III. Suppl. No. 6737). From 43 onwards the governor was a prætorian legatus Augusti pro prætore; and the old Systema was transformed into a union called Κοινὸν Λυκίων, meeting in the worship of the Emperors under the presidency of a Lykiarch.

Christianity does not appear to have spread very rapidly in Lycia; and perhaps to this is due the petition against the Christians addressed by the joint province to the Emperor Maximin in A.D. 312 (similar to many petitions from cities of the Empire, replies to which were returned in identical terms, quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. ix. 7). Part of the petition, with a scrap of Maximin's reply, has been found at Arykanda, and is published by Mommsen in Arch. Epigr. Mittheil. aus Œst. 1893, p. 93 ff.

An important Jewish inscription of Tlos in Lycia is published in Eranos Vindobonensis, p. 99.

LYDIA (Λυδία).—A purple-seller from Thyatira (Ac 16$^{14.\ 15.\ 40}$). It is probable that Lydia was her proper name, as we know that it was a name commonly borne by women (Hor. Od. i. 8, iii. 9, vi. 20); but (see p. 177^{b}) it may have been a designation derived from the district of Lydia, in which Thyatira was situated. The account of Lydia's occupation is confirmed by what we learn from other sources of the purple dyes of this district (cf. Hom. Il. iv. 141; Claud. Rapt. Proserp. i. 270); and the whole incident in Acts points to her having been a woman of some position and means (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 214). She had made her home apparently at Philippi, and, having become a Jewish proselyte, was in the habit of resorting to a place of prayer which was located by a riverside, according to a common practice among the Jews for the facility of the frequent ablutions which their worship required (Farrar, St. Paul, i. p. 487). There she was found along with certain other women by St. Paul and his companions on their first Sabbath in Philippi; and in her, at any rate, the apostle found a ready listener. The Lord opened her heart, and along with her 'household' she was baptized, the first Christian convert, so far as we know, whom St. Paul made in Europe. (For the significance of her conversion, taken in connexion with those subsequently mentioned in this chap., see Lightfoot, Philipp. p. 52 ff.). Lydia's gratitude showed itself in the eager desire (παρεβιάσατο, v.^{15}, cf. Lk 24^{29}) that the apostle and his companions should take up their abode in her house; and it was thither that they again returned after their imprisonment (v.^{40}). To the Church which grew out of this little company St. Paul afterwards addressed the most jubilant of all his Epistles; though the fact that Lydia herself is not mentioned in it by name makes it probable that she had either died or left Philippi in the interval. G. MILLIGAN.

[*] Myra is mentioned also in the Bezan text of Ac 21^{1}.

LYDIA (Λυδία).—A large country on the west of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Mysia (called in later times Hellespontus), on the east by Phrygia, on the south by Caria, and on the west by the Ægean Sea. It contained the valleys of the Cayster, the lower Hermus with its tributary the Cogamos, and the Caicus, also as much of the lower Mæander valley as lay north of that river. Several of the great Ionian cities, Smyrna, Colophon, Ephesus, etc., were situated on its western coast. The ancient Lydian kingdom, once great and powerful, was conquered by the Persians about 546.[*] It passed under the rule of Alexander the Great in 334; and it was disputed by his successors after his death, especially between the Pergamenian and Seleucid kings, until the victory of the allied Roman and Pergamenian armies in B.C. 190 near Magnesia, in the Hermus valley, brought it entirely into the Pergamenian kingdom of Eumenes (as is mentioned in 1 Mac 8^{8}). In B.C. 133 Lydia, according to the will of Attalus III., the last Pergamenian king, passed into the Roman Empire, and formed part of the province Asia. The name Lydia henceforth had no political, but only a geographical, ethnological, and antiquarian existence. The generic name Asia alone was employed by the Romans; and Lydia was merged in that great province, which embraced also Caria, Mysia, and Phrygia. Geographers and historians wrote about Lydia; coins (e.g. of Tralleis and Kidramos) and inscriptions (e.g. CIG 5852, 5984, 6855*d*) mention facts of old Lydian religion or mythology; but those who had regard to existing facts of society and government had no reason to use the name.

The avoidance of the name Lydia in the NT to designate the country, though the action often lies in its cities, is due to the fact that the early Church accepted from the first the Roman political divisions (i.e. the provinces), and classified accordingly. St. Paul, St. John, and St. Peter always speak of the Roman provinces Achaia, Macedonia, Illyricum, Asia, etc.[†] So does St. Luke, except that he sometimes uses the Greek instead of the Roman name for each province in the cases where there was a difference, as Hellas for Achaia, Ac 20^{1}. Hence Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, etc., are summed up, not as 'cities of Lydia,' but as 'cities of Asia.'

It has, however, been maintained recently by Blass (Acta Apostolor. p. 176) and Zahn (Einleitung in d. NT, i. p. 132) that Luke uses the name Asia to indicate only the western part of the province. According to Zahn, Luke's Asia is restricted to Lydia, excluding Caria,[‡] Phrygia, and Mysia (which were all included in the Roman province Asia). Blass maintains that Luke's Asia included Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, and excluded only Phrygia: the province had that extent from 133 to 84 B.C., and Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 150, wrongly admitted that sense in Ac 2^{9}. But there is no example of the name Asia being used in either of these senses at this time.[*] Towards A.D. 295 the province Asia was restricted to the country Lydia, and thereafter Asia bore the meaning which Zahn attributes to it in Luke's writings. But in earlier writers Asia has only two senses: (1) the entire continent, (2) the Roman province distinguished by Ptolemy as ἡ Ἀσία ἰδίως λεγομένη. Some Greek antiquaries, indeed, maintained that Lydia had once, in very early times, been called Asia; but this was a mere theory; not a single example can be quoted in its favour; and, according to Strabo (p. 627), these antiquaries qualified their theory with a 'perhaps' (τάχα γὰρ ἡ Μῃονία Ἀσία ἐλέγετο). There appears in Aristides about A.D. 150 a single example (to which no parallel is known) of a third sense, in which, by popular conversational usage, the name Asia is restricted to the greatest and most civilized part of the province, i.e. Asia par excellence; but even in this narrow sense it includes a considerable part of Phrygia, the Mæander valley from its source, with the rich and important cities, Apameia, Eumeneia, Laodicea, Hierapolis (λέγω δὲ (1) οὐχὶ τὴν μέχρι Μαιάνδρου πηγῶν [Asia par excellence],[†] (2) οὐδ' ὅσην ὁ τῶν ἡγεμόνων ὑμῶν κλῆρος ὁρίζεται [province], (3) ἀλλ' ἣν ἐξ ἀρχῆς οἱ Ἕλληνες προσεῖπον Ἀσίαν [continent], xxii. p. 475 C, Dind. vol. i. p. 441), so that it justifies neither Zahn nor Blass. Moreover, it would be unjustifiable to suppose that Luke uses the term in a sense which is not found before Aristides, and is in him indicated as a mere conversational expression. Again, in the letter of the Church of Lugudunum, addressed τοῖς ἐπ' Ἀσίας καὶ Φρυγίας ἀδελφοῖς (imitated by Tertullian, adv. Prax. 1, ecclesiis Asiæ et Phrygiæ), we are not to understand a formal distinction between Asia and Phrygia, as two mutually exclusive divisions. Phrygia was divided between the provinces Asia and Galatia; and Galatic Phrygia, with the Churches of Iconium, Antioch, Apollonia, etc., was closely connected with Asian Phrygia, and is classed along with it as a recipient of the Lugudunensian letter. The name Ἀσία occurs very often in inscriptions and coins, both within and beyond the province: usually it means the province, sometimes it has a wider sense (e.g. CIG 5127, 5913, a coin of Nicomedia boasting itself πρώτη Ἀσίας), never a narrower sense. It is used in many inscriptions of Phrygia to include that country, in such cities as Apameia, Laodicea, Eumeneia, etc. (Cit. and Bish. of Phr., No. 8, 292; CIG 3957, 3902*b*, etc.). The ordinary usage of the word Ἀσία in the province is beyond doubt.

The feminine of the adj. Lydian (Λυδία) probably occurs in Ac $16^{14.\,40}$. The Thyatiran hostess of the apostle in Philippi was familiarly known in the town by the ethnic that showed her origin. To every one who considers how common the custom was of using a familiar name (a nickname even) in place of the formal name, this opinion will seem practically certain. Even in honorary inscriptions, and on the bases of statues, the familiar name is often added to the formal name, and is sometimes even expressed in a line by itself and in larger letters,[‡] to bring home to the minds of citizens their peculiar and intimate relations to the person honoured. But apparently Paul, who is more formal and distantly courteous than Luke in his allusions to individuals, uses the formal personal name (possibly either Euodias or Syntyche, Ph 4^2), just as he speaks of Silvanus (whom Luke calls Silas), and once of Prisca (Ro 16^3, though he elsewhere, like Luke, employs the familiar diminutive Priscilla; see Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 151 f.).

[*] Lydia in Ezk 30^{5} AV is corrected to Lud in RV. See LUD.

[†] Scholars who hold the North-Galatian theory maintain that in the single case of Galatia St. Paul made an exception to his usual practice, and used that name to indicate, not the Roman province, but the country inhabited by the Asiatic Gauls.

[‡] He does not state his view about Caria explicitly; some of his words would place the Carian coast-lands in Asia, and exclude upper Caria; others would exclude all Caria.

[*] Blass quotes Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. xxviii. 102) as an example of the sense which he advocates for Asia, but the passage does not justify him, see Studia Biblica, iv. p. 45 f. Zahn quotes it as supporting himself, equally unjustifiably.

[†] This is much the same as ἡ κάτω Ἀσία (Pausan. I. iv. 6; Irenæus, ap. Euseb. HE v. xx. 5), i.e. lower Asia as distinguished from upper Asia (compare ἡ ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου Ἀσία, Cis-Tauran Asia, as distinguished from Trans-Tauran, a common phrase); but such expressions imply one part taken out of the whole.

The wealth, the ancient renown, and the high civilization of Lydia (including the central Ionian cities), gave it a specially important influence on the development of Christianity during the first three centuries. The evangelization of Lydia dates from the long residence of St. Paul at Ephesus, Ac $19^{1ff.}$. The apostle had aimed at evangelizing Asia on his second journey, but was forbidden to preach the word there. Accordingly, he did not touch Lydian soil till he landed at Ephesus while going back to Jerusalem from his second journey (Ac 18^{20}), when he made a promise to return shortly. LYSANIAS.—The L. mentioned in Lk 3^1 as being tetrarch of Abilene at the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry is not expressly mentioned elsewhere. Jos. (Ant. XV. iv. 1, and BJ I. xiii. 1) relates that Lysanias succeeded to the government on the death of his father Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, and was killed by Antony at the instigation of Cleopatra, on the charge of being in league with the Parthians. This was about B.C. 34. In A.D. 42 (Jos. BJ II. xi. 5) the emperor Claudius bestowed on Agrippa, besides the territories given by Augustus to Herod, another kingdom, called that of L. (see also BJ II. xii. 8). In Ant. XIX. v. 1, Abila of Lysanias is said to have been given by Claudius to Agrippa, and in Ant. XX. vii. 1 occur the words Ἀβίλᾳ, Λυσανία δὲ αὕτη γεγόνει τετραρχία. St. Luke has been accused of inaccuracy in stating that the victim of Antony was tetrarch of Abilene some sixty years after his death. The facts may, however, be set forth as follows:—On the murder of L. the son of Ptolemy, his 'house' (Ant. XV. x. 1), was farmed by Zenodorus, and after the latter's death was given by Augustus to Herod (Ant. XV. x. 3) B.C. 23. Abila is not mentioned among the districts that passed to the latter, and is, in fact, expressly distinguished from the possessions of Herod (Ant. XIX. v. 1). It may well be that Augustus gave this town, with its neighbouring district Abilene, to Lysanias, a descendant of the former possessor. He is known to have acted in a similar way, in at least one instance, when Jamblichus was restored to his father's dominion of Emesa in Parthia, the latter having been killed by Antony. Abila was afterwards called A. of L., and was given by the emperor Claudius to Herod Agrippa I. The title A. of L. seems to point to a restoration of a part of the kingdom of L. to a namesake (probably a descendant) of the original ruler under the name of tetrarch. In defence of this view it may be noticed that the original L. only reigned about five years, scarcely long enough for his name to attach to the district in perpetuity. Again, a medal was found by Pococke in the 17th cent., alluding to a L., both tetrarch and high priest, who could not have been identical with the king. Two inscriptions, also, of the time of Tiberius prove that there was a tetrarch L., a freedman of whom executed some work to which one inscription refers, while the other implies from the mention of L.'s sons that the tetrarch was a descendant of the king. L. was, no doubt, a family name attached to the district of Abilene. The L. mentioned in Lk 3^1 was probably a descendant, possibly a son of the L. killed by Antony, and may have been identical with, or the father of, the L. in the time of Claudius.

LYSIAS (Λυσίας).—1. A Syrian general. After the victory of Judas Maccabæus at Bethhoron (B.C. 166), Antiochus Epiphanes, in departing for Persia, appointed 'Lysias, an honourable man, and one of the seed royal, to be over the affairs of the king from the river Euphrates unto the borders of Egypt, and to bring up his son Antiochus until he came again' (1 Mac $3^{32f.}$).* His orders were to carry on a war of extermination against the Jews (v.$^{35f.}$). In fulfilment of this commission, Lysias assembled a great army, which was placed under the command of three generals, Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. Gorgias (or, according to 2 Mac $8^{23ff.}$, Nicanor) was defeated by Judas at Emmaus (1 Mac $4^{14ff.}$), and Lysias himself sustained a crushing defeat the following year (B.C. 165) at Bethsura (v.$^{34ff.}$, Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 5). Upon the death of Epiphanes (B.C. 164) Lysias as regent-guardian of the youthful Antiochus Eupator (wh. see) prosecuted the war against the Jews, captured Bethsura, and was besieging Jerusalem, when he had to turn his attention to a rival in the person of Philip, another of the generals of Epiphanes, to whom the latter, before his death, had transferred the care of his son (1 Mac $6^{14ff.}$). Although he defeated Philip (1 Mac 6^{63}), he was unable to maintain the cause of the youthful king against another claimant to the throne, a nephew of Epiphanes, who afterwards reigned under the title of Demetrius Soter (wh. see). Both Lysias and Eupator, having fallen into the hands of the latter (B.C. 162), were by his orders put to death (1 Mac 7^{2-4}, 2 Mac 14^2, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 1).

2. See CLAUDIUS LYSIAS. J. A. SELBIE.

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσίμαχος).—1. L., the son of Ptolemy, of Jerus., is named in the subscription to the Greek edition of Esther (Ad. Est 11^1) as the translator of that book into Greek. This statement may imply that the additional sections, for which no Heb. original existed, are also to be ascribed to Lysimachus. We are told that the tr. was brought to Egypt in the 4th year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra; but as four Ptolemies had wives named Cleopatra, this information gives hardly any clue to the date.

2. The brother of the high-priest Menelaus, whom he left as his deputy (διάδοχος) in Jerus. when summoned to appear before Antiochus (2 Mac 4^{29}). L. excited the hatred of the populace by his systematic plundering of the temple treasures; and seeing that an insurrection was imminent, he took the precaution of arming 3000 men, and letting them loose upon the people. Many were injured in the riot which took place, and L. himself was killed beside the treasury (ib. 4^{39-42}). H. A. WHITE.

LYSTRA was founded as a Roman Colony by Augustus, probably about B.C. 6, when an effort was made to tame and regulate the mountain tribes on the southern frontier of the province Galatia by a system of military roads and garrison cities (Antioch, Lystra, Parlais, Cremna, Comama, Olbasa). These colonies all used the Latin language officially, a rare and noteworthy fact in the eastern provinces, where, as a rule, Rome acquiesced in the use of Greek, and made no attempt to naturalize Latin. The use of the Roman tongue implies that these colonies felt a special pride in their Roman character. Lystra was about 18 miles S.S.W. from Iconium, and a frontier line passed between them (see ICONIUM, LYCAONIA). It was situated in a vale at the northern extremity of the hills which fringe the Lycaonian plain on the south, and which grow higher and higher as one proceeds south, till they rise to the main mass of Mount Taurus. A stream, which flows eastward between gentle hills through the smiling vale, about a mile in breadth, loses itself after some miles in the great plain. On the north of the stream, about a mile north-west from the village of Khatyn Serai, is situated a hillock of considerable extent, on which stood the fortified Colonia; but the buildings of the city certainly extended to east and south, over the lower ground at least, where a large basis bearing an inscription in honour of Augustus stands probably in its original position, and perhaps indicates the site of a sacred place, Augusteum, dedicated to the worship of the Emperor and of Rome. The city stood about 3780 ft. above sea-level, and about 430 ft. above Iconium.

* Cf. 2 Mac 10^{11} $11^{1ff.}$, where, however, the order of events is less correctly given, the appointment of Lysias to be 'chancellor' and his defeat at Bethsura being placed under Eupator instead of Epiphanes.

The history of Lystra is quite unknown; and even the fact that it was a Roman colony was unknown until 1885, when the inscription just mentioned was discovered by the American Sterrett, and Waddington published a coin with Latin legend of COLONIA · IULIA · FELIX · GEMINA · LUSTRA (the Latin form Lustra, instead of the Grecizing Lystra, is usual on coins and inscriptions). Leake guessed the site in 1820; Sterrett proved it in 1885, after intermediate travellers had rejected Leake's view.

Hardly any remains of the old city are now visible above ground. There is an Ayasma (as the Turks call a fountain held sacred by Christians, ἀγίασμα) in the low ground south of the hill. Not a trace has been found of the temple of Zeus Propoleos, Ac 14^{13}; but it is possible that the Augusteum was in the precinct of the temple; it was very common to unite the worship of the Emperor to that of the chief god of a city. The Bezan reading, τοῦ ὄντος Διὸς πρὸ πόλεως, is perhaps the original Lukan text, and is certainly excellent. The epithet Propoleos was a sort of technical term, often given to gods whose temple stood outside the city; and it is characteristic of Luke's style to use the participle ὤν (much in the same way as καλούμενος) before a name or technical term; compare Ac 5^{17} 13^{1} 28^{17}. No inscription has yet been found relating to the worship of this god; but the analogy of other great native hiera in Asia Minor[*] makes it practically certain that there was a college of priests attached to it; hence the Bezan text ἱερεῖς is true to fact, though this reading is rejected by all editors, even including Blass, the special champion of the Western text.

The sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas, in celebration of the Epiphany of the gods, Ac 14^{13}, was probably made at the entrance to the sacred precinct (πυλών), and the apostles hearing of it as they were teaching in a public place in the city, ran forth and stopped it.

Lystra, standing in a retired situation some miles away from the high road, was not likely to participate strongly in the diffusion of Greek civilization, when Lycaonia was ruled by the Seleucid kings; but its neighbourhood to Iconium, the capital, would give it some opportunity of sharing in the Grecizing tendency which was such a powerful influence in the Seleucid and Pergamenian cities of Asia Minor. A town doubtless existed there before the Roman colony was founded; but it was only through that event that Lystra became important. The population of the colony would consist of (1) the Latin-speaking colonists, a local aristocracy of soldiers; (2) the native population (incolæ), some of whom were doubtless educated in Greek, and strong supporters of the Roman imperial policy; while the majority were evidently uneducated, not well acquainted with Greek, but more naturally expressing themselves in the Lycaonian tongue, and much under the influence of the native superstition, Ac $14^{13\text{ff.}}$.

While the presence of Jewish residents in Lystra is clear, Ac 16^{1}, no synagogue is mentioned there; and the general tone of Ac $14^{8\text{-}19}$ suggests surroundings more thoroughly pagan and less permeated by Jewish influence than in Iconium and Pisidian Antioch. That is natural, for the Jews would be found most in cities which lay on the main trade road, and which had been important in Seleucid times (when the large settlements of Jews were formed).

When Paul at Lystra healed the lame man, in whom he discerned the signs of a capacity for faith, the multitude concluded that the two apostles were the gods Hermes and Zeus, who had visited the abodes of men according to a widespread ancient belief. The same two gods are mentioned in a legend, localized[*] in these regions, as visiting the old couple, Philemon and Baucis, who lived on the Phrygian hills. But afterwards, when hostile Jews from Iconium and Pisidian Antioch came to Lystra (probably in pursuance of the trade which must have existed between those cities and Lystra), they exerted such influence on the weak and changeable superstition of the people that a riot was aroused, and Paul was stoned and thrown out of the city for dead. From 2 Ti $3^{10.\,11}$ it is clear that Timothy, son of a Jewess Eunice, wife of a Greek, and brought up in the Jewish faith by his mother and his grandmother Lois, saw this occurrence. Certainly he was converted at this time, and doubtless helped to consolidate the newly founded Church in Lystra, which Paul revisited three times, Ac 14^{21} 16^{1} 18^{23}.

In Ac 14^{6} Lystra is named before Derbe, in 16^{1} after it, corresponding to the geographical order necessitated by the direction of the journey in each case.

The connexion between Colonia Lustra and its Roman metropolis Antioch, the military centre of Southern Galatia (which is well illustrated by the dedication of a statue of Concord at Antioch by Lystra, Sterrett, Wolfe Expedition in Asia Minor, p. 219), was maintained by an imperial road, which is called in the Acta Pauli et Theclæ βασιλικὴ ὁδός, 'the road made by the βασιλεύς,' i.e. the Roman emperor. According to that document (which goes back to a very early original, though much corrupted by interpolation), Paul, when expelled from Antioch, Ac 13^{50}, went along the 'royal road' that leads south to Lystra until he came to a place where a cross-road diverged eastwards to Iconium: here Onesiphorus of Iconium was waiting for him, being warned in a vision, and induced him to go to Iconium with him.[†]

Little is known about the post-biblical history of Christianity in Lystra. Artemas, one of the Seventy disciples, is said to have been bishop there according to a late and untrustworthy tradition. Eustochius of Vasada settled at Lystra and was arrested there and carried to Ancyra, where he was executed. The tradition may be good, for it preserves the memory that Lystra was under Ancyra, the metropolis of the province Galatia, until about A.D. 295. Tiberius was bishop of Lystra in A.D. 325 (for a list of later bishops see Gams, Series episcoporum, p. 45). See also LYCAONIA, ANTIOCH, ICONIUM. W. M. RAMSAY.

[*] Good examples are found in inscriptions of Pessinus (Körte in Athen. Mittheil. 1897, pp. 16, 30) and of the Milyadic Zeus-Sabazios (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. i. p. 288).

[*] The name is corrupted in Ovid, Metam. viii. 719, our only authority. MSS. have trincius, fineius, thineyus, Ocineius, chineius, tirinthius, tyreneus, thyrneius, etc. These point to Tyrieius or Tyriaius, belonging to Tyriaion, though the editors almost all give the impossible Tyaneius. Tyana was not in Phrygia, and could not give an adj. of this form.

[†] The term royal road, denoting imperial highways as distinguished from common country roads, occurs also in an inscription of Termessos, Lanckoronski, Städte Pamphyliens, ii. p. 203, and regalis via is mentioned at Colonia Comama, Corp. Inscr. Latin. iii. Suppl. No. 6974.

M

MAACAH (מַעֲכָה 'oppression').—1. Father of Achish, king of Gath in the beginning of Solomon's reign, 1 K 2^{39}. It is just possible that he is identical with Maoch מָעוֹךְ of 1 S 27^{2}; but as there is an interval of about fifty years between the events recorded in these two references, we may suppose that Maacah was grandson of Maoch. Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 2 S 10^{2}) maintains the identity, but says that M. was mother of Achish. 2. One of David's wives, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, and mother of Absalom (2 S 3^{3}, 1 Ch 3^{2}). Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 2 S 13^{37}) quotes a Jewish tradition that she had been captured in war by David, who used to raid the Geshurites while he was at Ziklag (1 S 27^{8}). Possibly David's marriage with M. was the ratification of a treaty with her father. 3. Favourite wife of Rehoboam and mother of Abijam or Abijah (2 Ch 11^{20}). Probably she was named after No. 2. In 1 K $15^{2.\,10}$ she is called the daughter of Abishalom (Absalom, 2 Ch $11^{20.\,21}$). But Absalom's only daughter was Tamar; accordingly the LXX of 2 S 14^{27} adds of Tamar that 'she became wife of Rehoboam' (γίνεται γυνὴ τῷ Ῥοβοάμ). This is followed by Josephus twice (Ant. VII. viii. 5, VII. x. 3). However, in 2 Ch 13^{2} she appears as 'Micaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah' (LXX and Syriac, Maacah). It is commonly supposed that Uriel married Tamar, and so Maacah was really Absalom's granddaughter (so Josephus once, Ant. VIII. x. 1). 'Daughter' is sometimes used in this way, e.g. 2 K 8^{26}. Jerome, however (Qu. Heb.), distinguishes her father from David's son. M. retained the position of queen-mother (gĕbîrah, ἡγουμένη) until the reign of her grandson Asa. He in his reforming zeal deposed her 'because she had made an abominable image (simulacrum Priapi) for an Asherah' (1 K 15^{13}, 2 Ch 15^{16}). She was apparently shielded from the extreme penalties resolved on by the people according to 2 Ch 15^{13}. 4. Son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gn 22^{24}). 5. One of the concubines of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Ch 2^{48}). 6. Wife of Machir, daughter of Benjamin, and whole sister of Huppim and Shuppim (1 Ch $7^{15.\,16}$). RVm supposes another Maacah, sister of Machir. The text is corrupt according to QPB. 7. Wife of Jeiel the father of Gibeon (1 Ch 8^{29} 9^{35}). 8. Father of Hanan, who was one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11^{43}). 9. Father of Shephatiah, who was captain of the tribe of Simeon in David's reign (1 Ch 27^{16}).

MAACAH.—A small Aramæan kingdom in Gaulanitis, the modern Jaulân, east of the Sea of Galilee (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 553; Ewald, HI ii. 302). In Dt 3^{14}, Jos 12^{5} the territory in Bashan assigned to Manasseh extends 'unto the border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites.' But in Jos 13^{11} 'the border' of these peoples is included in Manasseh. The discrepancy is explained by the fact that they maintained their independence (Jos 13^{13}, 1 Ch 2^{23}). Accordingly in 2 S 10^{6} the Ammonites hire 'the king of Maacah' (B Ἀμαλήκ) to aid them against David. Here and in v.^{8} Maacah and Tob seem to be distinguished from the other mercenaries, who were Syrians, but in the account of the battle all are alike called Syrians. This is confirmed by the parallel narrative (1 Ch 19^{6}), where their country is called Aram-maacah. It is evident that they were a small community, from a comparison of the numbers furnished by the other allies. Abel-beth-maacah in Naphtali (2 S $20^{14.\,15}$, 1 K 15^{20}, 2 K 15^{29}) was probably a colony that went north-west. The names of some Maacathites are recorded. Eshtemoa (1 Ch 4^{19}), who occurs in the genealogy of Judah; Ahasbai, father of Eliphelet, one of David's heroes (see QPB on 2 S 23^{34} and 1 Ch $11^{35.\,36}$, where MT, perh. by textual error, has Mecherathite); and Hoshaiah, father of Jezaniah, who was one of the captains of the forces who joined Gedaliah (Jer 40^{8} 42^{1}). See, further, Dillm. on Gn 22^{24}, Dt 3^{14}, Jos 13^{13}, and Driver on Dt 3^{14}. N. J. D. WHITE.

MAACATHITE.—See preceding article.

MAADAI (מַעֲדַי; B Μοδεδειά, A Μοοδειά, Luc. Μοουδειά).—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{34}; called in 1 Es 9^{34} Momdis.

MAADIAH (מַעַדְיָה; A Μααδιάς, Luc. Μαασιάς, B om.).—A priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12^{5}; called in v.^{17} Moadiah (מוֹעַדְיָה, A ἐν καιροῖς [apparently through a confusion with מוֹעֲדִים 'sacred seasons'], Luc. Μασαί).

MAAI (מָעַי; A Μααί, Luc. Μαιά, B om.).—One of the sons of Asaph who took part in the ceremony of the dedication of the walls, Neh 12^{36}.

MAALEH-ACRABBIM.—Jos 15^{3} AV ('ascent of Akrabbim,' RV). See AKRABBIM, and DEAD SEA in vol. i. p. 575^{b}.

MAANI (A Μαανί, B Μανεί, AV Meani), 1 Es 5^{31} = MEUNIM, Ezr 2^{50}, Neh 7^{52}.

MAARATH (מַעֲרָת; B Μαγαρώθ, A Μαρώθ, Luc. Μααρώθ).—A town of Judah, in the mountains, noticed with Beth-anoth, Jos 15^{59}. The site is uncertain. Possibly the name survives corrupted at Beit 'Ummâr, in the Hebron hills west of Tekoa. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

C. R. CONDER.

MAAREH-GEBA (מַעֲרֵה גֶבַע; B Μαρααγάβε, A δυσμῶν τῆς Γαβαά [cf. Vulg. ab occidentali urbis parte]; AV 'the meadows of Gibeah,' RVm 'the meadow of Geba').—The place from which the men placed in ambush rushed forth to attack the Benjamites (Jg 20^{33}). There can be little doubt that Bertheau, upon the authority of LXX (A) and Vulg., rightly emends MT to מִמַּעֲרַב לַגֶּבַע 'to the west of Geba' (better Gibeah; see GIBEAH, No. 2). This is accepted by Moore (who, however, reads Gibeah), Budde, etc. Studer, following the Peshitta, reads מִמְּעָרַת ג׳ 'from the cave which is in Gibeah.' J. A. SELBIE.

MAASAI (מַעְשַׂי; B Μαασαιά, A Μασαί, Luc. Μαασεί).—The name of a priestly family, 1 Ch 9^{12}.

MAASEAS (Μαασαίας). — The grandfather of Baruch (Bar 1^{1}) = MAHSEIAH (which see) of Jer 32^{12} 51^{59}.

MAASEIAH (מַעֲשֵׂיָה and מַעֲשֵׂיָהוּ 'work of J″'; on the distribution of this name in different periods of Israel's history and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 181, 293).—1. A priest of the sons of Jeshua, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{18}, called in 1 Es 9^{19} Mathelas. 2. A priest, of the sons of Harim, who had committed the same offence, Ezr 10^{21}. Foreign wives had been taken also by 3, 4. a priest, of the sons of Pashhur, Ezr 10^{22}, called in 1 Es 9^{22} Massias, and a layman, of the sons of Pahath-moab, v.^{30}. 5. The father of Azariah who helped to rebuild the wall, Neh 3^{23}. 6. One of those who stood upon the right hand of Ezra at the reading of the law, Neh 8^{4}, called in 1 Es 9^{43} Baalsamus. 7. One of those who expounded the law to the people, Neh 8^{7}, called in 1 Es 9^{48} Maiannas. He is perhaps the same as the preceding. 8. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{25}. 9. A Judahite family name, Neh 11^{5}, in 1 Ch 9^{5} Asaiah. 10. A Benjamite family name, Neh 11^{7}. 11, 12. Two priests (B om.), Neh $12^{41\text{f.}}$. 13. A priest in the time of Zedekiah, Jer 21^{1} 29^{25} 35^{4} 37^{3}. 14. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah, Jer 29^{21}. 15. A Levitical singer mentioned upon the occasion of David's bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom, 1 Ch $15^{18.\,20}$. 16. One of the captains who assisted Jehoiada in the overthrow of Athaliah, 2 Ch 23^{1}. 17. An officer (שֹׁטֵר) of Uzziah, 2 Ch 26^{11}. 18. A son of Ahaz slain by Zichri the Ephraimite, 2 Ch 28^{7}. 19. Governor of Jerusalem under Josiah, 2 Ch 34^{8}. 20. In 1 Ch 6^{40} Baaseiah (בַּעֲשֵׂיָה) appears to be a textual error for Maaseiah (מַעֲשֵׂיָה), by a not infrequent confusion between ב and מ. J. A. SELBIE.

MAASMAS (Μαασμᾶς, AV Masman), 1 Es 8^{43}.—Corresponds to SHEMAIAH, Ezr 8^{16}. But the text is corrupt, Σαμαίας the Gr. equivalent of Shemaiah being inserted later in the verse.

MAATH (Μαάθ).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{26}.

MAAZ (מַעַץ, Μαάς).—A Jewish family name, 1 Ch 2^{27}.

MAAZIAH (מַעַזְיָה, מַעַזְיָהוּ).—The name of a priestly family which constituted the 24th course, Neh 10^{8} (B Ναδειά, A Μααζειά), 1 Ch 24^{18} (B Μαασαί).

MACALON (οἱ ἐκ Μακαλῶν), 1 Es 5^{21}.—The same as MICHMASH; cf. Ezr 2^{27} (Μαχμάς). The second syllable is perhaps due to reading M as ΑΛ.

MACCABÆUS (Μακκαβαῖος).—The surname of Judas, the third son of Mattathias (1 Mac 2^{4} 3^{1} etc., 2 Mac 5^{27} etc.). See next article.

MACCABEES, THE (οἱ Μακκαβαῖοι).—

i. THE NATIONAL RISING UNDER MATTATHIAS.

In B.C. 175 Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) began to reign over Syria. It was the ill-starred attempt of this monarch to Hellenize the Jews by force that caused the Maccabæan revolt. At the time of his accession to the throne the Greek influences which everywhere followed in the wake of the conquests of Alexander the Great were fast penetrating the life of Palestine; the more aristocratic section of the population were, in particular, affected by them. The advance of Hellenism was, indeed, partially checkmated by the organized resistance of the Hasidæans (Heb. Ḥăsîdîm = the 'pious'), who were the champions of the law. But only partially. The leader of the Hellenistic faction in Judæa was Joshua, a younger brother of the noble-minded high priest Onias III. He Grecized his own name into Jason, and apparently imagined that the name Jahweh might similarly be converted into Zeus. At Antioch he bargained with Epiphanes that the priesthood should be transferred from Onias to himself, and that he should be authorized to start an active pagan propaganda in Judæa. A gymnasium was accordingly built at Jerusalem, and Greek sports were practised quite close to the temple; even the priests forsook the altar to join in the games (2 Mac $4^{11\text{-}14}$). After holding office for three years (174–171), Jason was supplanted by Menelaus, a Hellenistic Benjamite, who became a complete renegade from Judaism, and obtained the help of Syrian troops against the unyielding Jason. An unfounded rumour that Antiochus had died in Egypt led Jason to attack Jerusalem, and Menelaus had to secure himself in the fortress. The Syrian despot viewed these disturbances as a Jewish rebellion (2 Mac 5^{11}), and his arrival at Jerus. in 170 was signalized not only by the flight of Jason, but also by the profanation and robbery of the temple, and by the slaughter of many of the inhabitants. At this time Philip the Phrygian, a man of low morale, seems to have been appointed governor of Jerus. so as to assist Menelaus in the task of reducing the Jewish people to a proper degree of subserviency to the king.

Two years later, the Holy City was laid waste by Antiochus' general Apollonius, and Syrian soldiers were placed in the Acra, a stronghold overlooking the temple. The tyrant next gave orders that Jewish rites should cease and heathen customs be observed, under pain of death. An idol altar ('the abomination of desolation' [see art. ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION], Dn 9^{27}) was set up in the temple, and sacrifices offered to Jupiter; copies of the law were searched for and destroyed; women with the babes they had circumcised were hurled headlong from the city wall. But Antiochus had overshot the mark. Hitherto under the Ptolemies as well as the Seleucidæ religious freedom had been expressly guaranteed to the Jews, and, before the province could be completely Hellenized, the stolid conservatism with which they clung to the observances of the Mosaic law required to be overcome. Experience showed that it could not be overcome. The extreme measures of Antiochus alienated many whose sympathies were largely with the Greek party. In consequence of his avowed intention to extirpate the Jewish religion the whole situation in Palestine was changed, and an invincible spirit of earnest religious patriotism was evoked. Many saved their lives by acquiescing in the king's measures, but others chose rather to die. It soon became clear that nothing would induce Israel to abandon her ancestral worship, and the moral force of her leaders enabled her to withstand the oppressive cruelty of the Syrians, and to achieve what might well have been considered impossible.

The ruthless policy of Epiphanes, adopted at the instigation of some apostate Jews who assured him that the whole country could be Hellenized, speedily brought matters to a crisis. Every village in Palestine was required to set up its heathen altar, and imperial officers were told off to see that heathen sacrifices were duly offered by all the citizens. A brave stand was made by Mattathias, an aged priest whom the persecution had driven to live at Modin, a little country town between Joppa and Jerusalem. When ordered to offer the first heathen sacrifice, he refused; and when a base Jew was about to do the unholy deed, Mattathias slew both him and the king's commissioner (Apelles), and pulled down the altar. Calling on all the faithful to follow him, he then with his five sons—John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan—fled into the mountains and raised the standard of rebellion. Many who shared his feelings took refuge in the wilderness, but were pursued by the Syrian officers, who bade them yield or die. Rather than profane the Sabbath by fighting, 1000 fugitives allowed themselves to be slaughtered. But after this, to avoid extermination, Mattathias and his friends resolved to defend themselves from attack even upon the Sabbath. Approving of this spirited policy, a large army of Jews who loved their country and their religion now came forward in their support, and openly began to put down heathenism throughout the land. Mattathias died in B.C. 166 after blessing his sons and solemnly charging them to be zealous for the law, and to give their lives for the covenant of their fathers. The leadership he bequeathed to Judas, who was (? even then, cf. 1 Mac 2^{66}, or only afterwards) surnamed Maccabaeus, and whose followers consequently came to be known as the Maccabees.

ii. THE NAME MACCABEE.—As already indicated, Maccabæus (Gr. Μακκαβαῖος, ? Heb. מַקַּבִּי) is properly the distinctive surname of Judas, third son of Mattathias, and after him leader of the heroic struggle against the Seleucidæ (1 Mac 2^{66} 3^{1} etc.). For long it was held that Maccabee was formed from the initials of the opening words of Ex 15^{11}: *mî kh*āmōkhah *b*ā'ēlîm *J*ahweh ('who is like thee among the gods, Jahweh?'), which were further conjectured to have been inscribed by the party upon their banners. But (1) the custom of forming new words in this fashion, although common among the Jews at a later date, does not appear to have as yet come into vogue; (2) the Gr. form as written with κκ cannot upon this theory be accounted for; (3) this interpretation of the name is too vague to fit in with the facts of the history, for in the first instance it was not the watchword of the party, but the individual surname of Judas (ὁ Μακκαβαῖος). In a treatise upon The Name Machabee (Leipzig, 1876), S. J. Curtiss contends that the word is derived from kābāh and means 'the extinguisher' (of his enemies), after Is 43^{17}; but this derivation also rests on precarious grounds. The original Heb. form having been lost, it is impossible to say with certainty whether it was written with k (כ) or with ḳ (ק), and in fact the Rabbinical texts use both letters indifferently. Curtiss argues that Jerome's spelling of the word (Machabaeus) points to his acquaintance with a Heb. form מכבי, whereas he probably adopted the Latin orthography current in his time. But as the Old Latin version is derived from the Gr. text of 1 Mac, we are thrown back upon the Gr. form of the name as the nearest indication of the original, and this leaves the matter uncertain, as Μακκαβαῖος might come either from a word with k or from one with ḳ. There remains what must be regarded as the most probable derivation, viz., that from maḳḳābāh (מַקָּבָה) = 'hammer.' If, as Ewald supposes, the surnames of the sons of Mattathias were intended merely as distinctive titles, that of 'hammerer' appears to be natural enough; while, on the theory that they were symbolical, the idea conveyed will be that of 'vigorous, sharp-beating warrior,' or 'chivalrous hero.' The case of Charles Martel is not strictly analogous, as he derived the title directly from his battle-axe. A better parallel is afforded by the designation of Edward I. as 'Scotorum malleus.' Curtiss may be right in his assertion that in the OT (Jg 4^{21}, 1 K 6^{7}, Is 44^{12}, Jer 10^{4}) maḳḳābāh denotes an ordinary hammer, and not the heavy sledge-hammer which would more adequately symbolize the impetuosity of Judas; but this circumstance can scarcely be considered decisive. See, further, Kautzsch (Apocr. u. Pseudepigr. d. AT, 24, where the interpretation 'hammerer' is adopted).

The name Maccabee was gradually widened in scope so as to embrace not only the brothers of Judas and all who were his blood relations, but also all his followers and coadjutors in the desperate struggle against the tyranny of the Syrian kings. It became in a special manner connected with the seven martyred brethren whose story is (rhetorically) told in 2 Mac 6^{18}–7^{42}, and whose moral bravery is reckoned worthy to stand alongside of that shown by those who fell in battle for the same sacred cause. Ultimately the name came to have a purely ideal significance, as, e.g., in the titles of the so-called Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees. At present, however, it is used to designate only the sons and descendants of Mattathias. Although even in this limited sense the term Maccabees has established itself in general usage, the proper name of the family is that of Hasmonæans (or Asmonæans), derived from Hashmon (i.e. 'fat,' 'rich' = magnate; cf. Ps $68^{31\,[32]}$), Gr. 'Ασαμωναῖος (Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1), the great-grandfather of Mattathias. Jewish writers accordingly use this name in preference to that of Maccabees, and among the Jews 1 and 2 Mac are known as 'Books of the Hasmonæans' (ספרי החשמונאים; see Winer, Realwörterb. under 'Makkabäer').

iii. THE JEWISH WAR OF INDEPENDENCE LED BY THE MACCABEES.

(i.) Campaigns of Judas Maccabæus (166–161).—The prescience of Mattathias in nominating Judas as his successor was fully justified by events. Judas soon proved himself a born general. He united in his own person the faith of Abraham, the zeal of Elijah, the stature of Saul, and the courage of David. He was at once the terror of his enemies and the pride of his nation. 'He angered many kings, and made Jacob glad with his acts, and his memorial is blessed for ever' (1 Mac 3^{7}). In the very first year of his leadership he rose to fame by defeating the Syrian generals Apollonius and Seron: 'Every nation told of the battles of Judas' (1 Mac 3^{26}). Enraged at the defeat of his forces, Antiochus sent his kinsman Lysias with half of his whole army to root out the Jewish nation and divide their land among strangers, while he himself with the rest of the troops crossed the Euphrates to exact tribute and collect money. Lysias at once sent against Judæa a large army under three trusted generals, Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. The Syrians made so sure of victory that they had arranged for the attendance of slave-dealers to buy up Israelitish prisoners, but Judas and his brethren met them fearlessly. Gathering at Mizpeh, they observed a day of fasting and prayer, and further prepared for battle by organizing their troops into a regular army. With a detachment of 6000 men Gorgias planned a night attack on the Jewish camp; but Judas cleverly removed his forces, smote the main army under Nicanor, set fire to the Syrian camp, and waited for the disappointed Gorgias, whose troops fled on sighting the smoke of the burning tents. Thus 'Israel had a great deliverance that day' (1 Mac 4^{25}). The next year (165–164) Lysias himself led a still larger army against Judæa, but was heavily defeated by Judas at Bethzur, between Hebron and Jerusalem. He then retired to Antioch with the view of enlisting the services of mercenary troops to suppress the rebellion in Judæa. Meanwhile Judas took occasion to restore the temple worship. The shrubs that were growing wild in the courts were cleared away; the idol-altar was destroyed, and a new altar erected; and in general the sacred furniture which had been removed by Antiochus Epiphanes was replaced. On the 25th Chislev (Dec.) 165, just three years after its first defilement, the temple was purified by the offering of the legal sacrifice upon the new altar, and the Feast of the Dedication or Renewal (Jn 10^{22}), which continued to be observed until the destruction of the temple by the Romans, was joyfully celebrated for eight days (1 Mac 4^{56}). Thereafter Judas went on to fortify the temple mount and the city of Bethzur. These measures conclude the first stage in the history of the wars of the Maccabees. As yet they had never experienced defeat.

The brilliant exploits of Judas and his brethren excited the latent hostility of the neighbouring heathen tribes, who formed a fresh coalition against 'the race of Jacob' (1 Mac 5^{2}). Among other and less known parties to the league, Edom and Ammon, both old hereditary enemies of Israel, were routed by Judas. In response to appeals made to them, the Maccabees then busied themselves for a time in delivering from their enemies and lodging safely in Jerus. many Jews who were shut up in the fortresses of Gilead and Galilee. No fewer than 11,000 men were employed in these expeditions—3000 in Galilee under Simon, and the rest in Gilead under Judas and Jonathan. At the fortress of Ephron, which lay in a deep and narrow pass W. of Irbid, the inhabitants tried to obstruct the Jewish caravan, with the result that a way was forced over their dead bodies and through the ruins of their city. In the meantime Joseph and Azarias, who had been left in command at Jerus., foolishly risked an engagement with Gorgias, and were repulsed with the loss of 2000 men. This disaster, however, was counterbalanced by some fresh successes of Judas against the Edomites and Philistines.

No longer under the immediate necessity of defending the Jewish religion, the Maccabees had now begun to act upon the aggressive, and even to aim at the restoration of Jewish independence. Their ambition in this direction must have been stimulated by the unexpected tidings that Antiochus Epiphanes had died in the far East (164). He had appointed Philip, one of his 'Friends,' to act as regent and guardian to the minor Antiochus V., but Lysias had the latter crowned as king with the surname of Eupator. In the year following, by making a determined attack upon the citadel of Jerus. (Acra), Judas forced the Syrian garrison to seek help from Antioch. With a great army, including 32 fighting elephants, Lysias laid siege to Bethzur, and Judas pitched his camp at Bethzacharias, 8 miles nearer Jerusalem. Although in the battle that followed 600 Syrians were slain, the Jews were defeated. This first check to the victorious career of Judas was aggravated by the loss of his brother Eleazar, who, seeing a superbly caparisoned elephant on which he supposed the king to be riding, stabbed the animal from beneath, but was himself crushed by its fall. The Syrians had already got possession of Bethzur, and were on the point of taking the temple mount—it was a Sabbatic year, and the Jews were scarce of food—when Lysias was obliged to hasten to Antioch, where Philip, who had returned from the East, was trying to assert his title to the regency. Lysias therefore quickly made peace with the Jews, and granted them by treaty the religious liberty for which they had fought so well (1 Mac 6^{60}). As the formal abandonment of the attempt to abolish the Jewish religion by force, this concession marks the second important stage in the Maccabæan struggle. Hitherto it had been a war for religious freedom; henceforth it became a war for political independence.

Lysias soon got the better of Philip, but was himself, along with his ward, put to death by Demetrius I., the rightful heir to the Syrian throne, who had until now been kept as a hostage at Rome. The Greek party in Judæa induced Demetrius to send an army under Bacchides to install the ungodly Alcimus as high priest. Content to have 'a priest of the seed of Aaron,' the Hasidæans no longer opposed the Syrian rule, but sixty of them were treacherously slain in one day. After Bacchides had returned to Antioch without being able to entrap Judas, the latter speedily got the upper hand in Judæa, and Alcimus had once more to solicit help from Syria. In consequence, Judas again met Nicanor in battle. The Syrian general was beaten, and fell back upon Mount Zion, where he insulted the priests and threatened to burn the temple. But in a further battle at Adasa (161), near the pass of Beth-horon, he was himself slain, whereupon his army fled. The head and hand of the insolent blasphemer were hung up in front of one of the temple gates (Gorionides, iii. 22. 12; cf. 2 Mac $15^{31ff.}$), and the 13th Adar—the day of the battle—was afterwards kept as 'Nicanor's day' (1 Mac 7^{49}). At this stage Judas, despairing of being long able to continue the unequal contest with the imperial armies, sent ambassadors to the Roman Senate to invoke their protection against the Syrians. But although a treaty was concluded, nothing came of it beyond a warning to Demetrius that further interference with the Jews would mean war with Rome. Before the Roman rescript could have reached Antioch, the contingency dreaded by Judas had actually occurred. About six weeks after the defeat of Nicanor, Demetrius sent a fresh army into Judæa under Bacchides. Only 3000 men were with Judas at Elasa, and most of these deserted him on seeing the vastly superior strength of the Syrian host. Even the noble 800 who stood by him vainly tried to dissuade him from risking a battle, and Elasa became 'the Jewish Thermopylæ.' In spite of all they could do, Judas and his little band were overcome by sheer weight of numbers. 'Judas fell, and the rest fled' (1 Mac 9^{18}). His body was carried off by his brothers and laid in the sepulchre of his fathers at Modin (161).

In the long roll of Israelitish worthies we meet with no more striking personality than that of Judas Maccabæus. His piety was manifest to all; his motives were pure and unselfish; he fought for God's glory and his country's good. His unselfish devotion was equalled by his military genius. For seven years, with an enthusiasm that never flagged, and a generalship which has never been surpassed, he led the Jews to victory, and died only when even the noblest heroism could not conquer.

(ii.) The leadership and high-priesthood of Jonathan (161–143).—The friends of Judas, now openly persecuted by the Hellenizers, chose as their leader his brother Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (Gr. Ἀπφοῦς, Ἀφφοῦς, Σαπφοῦς, Σαφφοῦς; Syr. H̱appūs = ? cunning), who filled the post with much shrewdness and success. Wishing as yet to avoid Bacchides, Jonathan withdrew to the wilderness of Tekoah, and sent his eldest brother John to deposit the baggage with the friendly Nabathæans. But his plans miscarried, and John fell a prey to a robber clan at Medaba. Jonathan crossed the Jordan and avenged his brother's death, but meanwhile Bacchides seized the fords and lay in wait for him. The Jews thus found themselves in a situation of extreme peril; they saved their lives, however, by swimming across the river. The return of Bacchides to Antioch on the death of Alcimus (160) so strengthened the Maccabæan party, that within two years their opponents had once more to call in his aid. Although they had given Bacchides the assurance that Jonathan should be made his prisoner, the vigilance of the Maccabees made them cognizant of the plot, and, after slaying about fifty of the conspirators, Jonathan and his followers entrenched themselves at Bethbasi. This stronghold Bacchides could not reduce; he was repulsed with loss by Simon, while Jonathan at the head of a detached squadron overran the adjacent territory. Stung by these reverses, Bacchides slew many of the Hellenizers, accepted Jonathan's proposals for peace, and departed into Syria vowing that nevermore would he interfere in Judæa (c. 156). 'And the sword ceased from Israel' (1 Mac 9^{73}). For four years Jonathan dwelt at Michmash, 'judging' the people and restraining the Hellenizers.

Unbroken peace prevailed until Alexander Balas entered upon a contest with Demetrius I. for the Syrian crown (153). Happily for Jonathan, who coveted the power and prestige belonging to the high-priesthood, the office was vacant, and this dispute over the succession to the throne of Syria paved the way for his appointment. The rival claimants looked upon him as a valuable ally, and he knew how to exploit them. While availing himself of certain privileges granted in a letter from Demetrius, he unhesitatingly threw in his lot with Alexander Balas, who appointed him high priest, invested him with the order of 'King's Friend,' and sent him a purple robe and a diadem, the emblems of royalty. The same year, at the Feast of Tabernacles, Jonathan assumed the sacred vestments, and showed himself zealous in support of the pretender Balas. Demetrius now, in turn, offered the most tempting inducements (including the abolition of taxes, the cession of Acra, the release of Jewish prisoners, the enlargement of Judæan territory, the payment of Jewish soldiers, and liberal allowances for the temple and the building of the city walls) by way of outbidding his rival; but Jonathan, sceptical as to the sincerity of Demetrius, and aware that the claims of Balas were favoured at Rome, wisely adhered to his former choice. In a pitched battle which ensued, Demetrius was defeated and slain. By the distinguished reception given to Jonathan at Ptolemais, where in B.C. 150 Alexander Balas married the Egyptian princess Cleopatra, and the rebuff given to certain apostates from Mosaism who would fain have impeached him in the royal presence, the triumphant Balas showed his gratitude to his Jewish ally. He also 'wrote him among his Chief Friends, and made him a captain and governor of a province' (1 Mac 10^{65}). Subject to the suzerainty of Syria, this gave him both the civil and military command in addition to his spiritual supremacy as high priest. When, three years later, Demetrius II. came from Crete as the avenger of his father, his cause was espoused by Apollonius, governor of Cœle-Syria. But though Balas had proved a worthless king, and had forfeited the esteem of his subjects, Jonathan stood loyally by him. Taking the field against Apollonius, he captured Joppa, won a battle at Ashdod (where he destroyed the temple of Dagon), and received the submission of Ascalon. In gratitude for these services Alexander presented Jonathan with the gold buckle worn by princes of the blood, and with the city of Ekron. But no effort on the part of Jonathan could save Balas from ruin after his father-in-law Ptolemy Philometor turned against him. In a pitched battle Balas suffered defeat, and fled into Arabia; but a sheikh of that country 'took off Alexander's head and sent it to Ptolemy' (1 Mac 11^{17}). Within three days thereafter the latter died of wounds received in the battle, and Demetrius II. became king (145).

At this juncture Jonathan boldly laid siege to the Acra, and as boldly appeared to answer for himself before the king at Ptolemais. The result was a triumph of diplomacy. He carried costly gifts to the king; and the latter, instead of treating him as a rebel, 'gave him pre-eminence among his Chief Friends' (1 Mac 11^{27}), besides confirming him in the high-priesthood, and conceding to the Jews several of the benefits vainly offered by his father as the price of their adherence. Shortly afterwards Jonathan rendered useful service by sending 3000 men to Antioch to aid in putting down an insurrection which had broken out there against Demetrius. The latter promised on his part to withdraw the Syrian garrisons from Jewish strongholds, but as he failed to keep this promise Jonathan went over to the side of Tryphon, a former officer of Alexander Balas, who took advantage of the unpopularity of Demetrius to bring forward Antiochus, the son of Balas, as a claimant for the throne, and who was careful to confirm Jonathan in all his dignities. Jonathan lost no time in bringing the entire territory between Gaza and Damascus into subjection. Proceeding to Galilee he met the generals of Demetrius, whom, after a threatened reverse, he routed on the plain of Hazor (c. 144). At Hamath the Syrians rallied once more with a view to invade Palestine, but Jonathan marched beyond Lebanon and dispersed them.[*] He afterwards subdued the Arab tribe of the Zabadæans on the Antilibanus, returned home by way of Damascus, and set himself, in concert with the elders, to strengthen the defences of the country. The walls of Jerus. were heightened, and an effort made to isolate the Acra. Meanwhile Simon had not been idle in his new capacity of commander (στρατηγός) of the Palestinian seaboard (1 Mac 11^{59}). Besides capturing Bethzur, he reduced and garrisoned Joppa, and fortified Adida.

Tryphon now began to distrust the Maccabees, who had certainly not been unmindful of their own interests while 'they fought for one king against the other, and in the name of the Syrians drove the Syrians out of Judæa and the adjacent regions.' Surmising that the Jewish high priest would probably oppose his plans for usurping the throne, he suddenly marched into Palestine and encamped at Bethshan (Scythopolis), where Jonathan prepared to give him battle. But by dint of artful flattery Tryphon induced even this wary Jewish prince to walk into a trap. Having entered Ptolemais, accompanied by only 1000 men, Jonathan found himself a prisoner and had his escort slain. Thus ended his period of active service. Although a high priest of Israel, he was in no sense a religious man; it was merely as a ladder to power that the priest's office had attractions for him. He was essentially a worldly ecclesiastic. And if he was less disinterested in his aims than his brother Judas, he was also less scrupulous in his methods of realizing them. But few men in his circumstances could have achieved more, either for themselves or for their party. By the adroitness with which he turned to account the mistakes of his enemies, he more than made up for the lack of strength in his adherents.

[*] According to 1 Mac 12$^{21-23}$ Jonathan at this juncture sent ambassadors to Rome, Sparta, etc., to conclude or renew friendly treaties, and they were favourably received by the Romans. Nothing is said regarding their reception at Sparta, but the writer gives what purports to be a 'copy' of Jonathan's letter, and also—apparently as a precedent—one of a letter formerly written by the Spartan king Arius I. to the Jewish high priest Onias I. (B.C. 323–300). Wellhausen (IJG^{3} p. 266, n. 3) rejects the whole passage as unhistorical. Unquestionably, it interrupts the main narrative in a very awkward manner; but if Jonathan, who was at the time a Syrian officer, did send such an embassy, it must have been because he had no faith in the stability of the Syrian kingdom.

(iii.) The administration of Simon, ethnarch and high priest (143–135).—Simon (Gr. Συμεών, Σίμων), surnamed Thassi (i.e., probably, 'the zealous'), the sole surviving son of Mattathias, now gallantly stepped into the breach and was chosen leader (ἡγούμενος) at a public assembly in Jerusalem. He had already justified the epithet, 'man of counsel' (ἀνὴρ βουλῆς, 1 Mac 2^{65}), and had also distinguished himself as commander of the Mediterranean coast from Tyre to Egypt. Tryphon soon marched against Judæa, but found himself intercepted by Simon at Adida. He thereupon offered to release Jonathan for 100 talents of silver and the custody of two of his sons as hostages; but although Simon judged it best to accede to these terms, Tryphon neither set Jonathan at liberty nor relaxed his hostile attitude. All his efforts to reach Jerus., however, were rendered futile by the sleepless vigilance of Simon. Even a projected night expedition with supplies for the famished garrison in the Acra was wrecked by a heavy fall of snow. Soured and baffled, he marched into Gilead and gave vent to his spleen by putting Jonathan to death at Bascama (143). The body of Jonathan was afterwards interred at Modin, where Simon erected a magnificent family monument, which appears to have been a landmark for sailors on the Levant (1 Mac 13^{29}). See MODIN.

Now that the war was over, Simon applied himself with increased vigour to the task of strengthening the defences of Judæa. Having made Joppa a Jewish port, he laid siege to the fortress of Gazara, and expelled the heathen inhabitants. Shortly afterwards he appointed his son John commander-in-chief of his forces, with a residence at Gazara. He achieved another noteworthy triumph in the reduction of the Acra, the garrison being at length starved into surrender, and instituted an annual festival in commemoration of the day of his entry into this last outpost of the Syrians—the 23rd Iyyar (May) 142. Meanwhile Tryphon had murdered the puppet-king Antiochus VI. and seized the Syrian crown. Demetrius II. was also embroiled in difficulties with the Parthians, who were invading his north-eastern provinces, and Simon took occasion to demand complete exemption from taxes. This Demetrius consented to grant, along with an amnesty for all political offences. Thus was 'the yoke of the heathen' removed, and the wished-for goal of Jewish independence actually reached (1 Mac 13^{41}).

Simon was the founder of the high-priestly dynasty of the Hasmonæans. In B.C. 141, in recognition of his great services to the nation, he was formally appointed leader, high priest, and governor (ἐθνάρχης); and these offices were declared to be hereditary in his family until 'a faithful prophet' should otherwise direct (1 Mac 14^{41}). The popular decree embodying these honours was engraven on a memorial tablet placed in the temple. The first year of Simon's reign was made the beginning of a new era, according to which Jewish legal documents were dated. He also renewed the friendship and treaty with Rome and Sparta, and struck his own coins like any other independent sovereign. The beautiful picture of 1 Mac 14^{4-15} shows how well Simon utilized the years of peace that followed, in building up the prosperity of Judæa. In peace he was even greater than in war. He possessed the administrative genius. Under his wise and beneficent sway the country enjoyed a period of moral and material well-being for which there is no post-exilic parallel. He was the patron of trade and agriculture; the friend of liberty, justice, and religion; a brave soldier, a worthy priest, and a gifted statesman.

After four or five years, during which 'Israel rejoiced with great joy' (1 Mac 14^{11}), Simon was once more caught in the meshes of Syrian politics. Although Demetrius II. was a prisoner in Parthia, his younger brother Antiochus VII. (Sidetes) took up arms against Tryphon, and wrote to solicit the friendship of Simon. But after defeating Tryphon he reversed his policy. While he was besieging his rival in Dor, Simon sent him gifts and auxiliaries. These were haughtily declined, and a demand made for 1000 talents, failing the surrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the Acra. This was equivalent to a declaration of war, and very soon the Syrian general Cendebæus invaded Judæa. Now an old man, Simon left his two sons Judas and John to prosecute the campaign. Near Modin they gained a decisive victory.

For two or three years more Simon laboured at his favourite task of developing the internal resources of his kingdom. Then came the tragic end. In the castle of Dôk, near Jericho, at a banquet ostensibly held in their honour, he and two of his sons fell victims to the murderous ambition of his son-in-law Ptolemy, the son of Abubus, who aimed at the supreme power (135). Ptolemy's designs were frustrated, however, owing to the miscarriage of his plans for the assassination of Simon's third son, John, governor of Gazara. The latter, warned in time, slew the emissaries of Ptolemy, and forthwith assumed the government and the high-priesthood.

More than thirty years had passed since Mattathias openly resisted the religious persecution of his nation. In the faithful and skilful hands of his sons the crusade inaugurated by him had been singularly successful. One by one they had fallen in the sacred cause which he had committed to them (1 Mac 6^{46} 9^{18} $9^{36.42}$ 13^{23} 16^{16}). But they had not shed their blood in vain. The valour of the Maccabees had rehabilitated the Jewish nation. Not only was the old spirit of independence thoroughly aroused, but there was also developed a new consciousness of the worth of their revealed religion. As the most thrilling epoch in Jewish history, and that which shaped the last phases of Jewish belief prior to the advent of our Lord, the age of the Maccabees has a peculiar interest for the student of Christianity.

iv. THE HASMONÆAN DYNASTY.—The relationship of the various scions of the Hasmonæan house is exhibited in the subjoined genealogical table.

The reign of John Hyrcanus (135–105) was bright and prosperous. After the flight of Ptolemy, his brother-in-law, he encountered the hostility of Antiochus VII. (Sidetes), to whom he agreed to pay tribute. But in B.C. 128 Antiochus met his death in fighting against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus availed himself of the opportunity afforded by the dispute which arose about the succession to the throne of Syria to make the Jewish kingdom territorially as extensive as it had ever been. The country E. of the Jordan, Samaria, and Edom were in turn brought under his sway, and no further tribute was paid to the Syrian kings. He further added to the defences of the country, and during his reign the old fortress of Baris (later Antonia) was rebuilt. Hyrcanus also concluded a treaty with the Romans, and was the first Jewish prince whose name was inscribed on the coins. Men liked to flatter themselves that the prophetic gift had been restored in his person (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 7). Outwardly brilliant, however, as his reign was, it was marked by a strong development of internal discord. It was at this time that the sects of the Pharisees and Sadducees first took definite shape as political and religious parties. The Maccabæan party was originally Pharisaic, but Hyrcanus now went over to the Sadducees, who attached more value to political supremacy.

Of the five sons left by Hyrcanus, three rose to power. Their names were originally Judas, Mattathias, and Jonathan, but in accordance with their father's new-born Hellenistic proclivities they were now designated Aristobulus, Antigonus, and Alexander Jannæus.

Hyrcanus bequeathed the civil power to his wife, and the high-priesthood to his eldest son Aristobulus. But the latter shut up all his relatives in prison except Antigonus, and openly assumed the title King of the Jews, 'a name previously unknown to Heb. history, but destined to carry with it a sacred and enduring significance' (Mt 27¹¹, Mk 15² etc.). Antigonus also fell a victim to his jealousy, owing to suspicions awakened in him by 'his evil spirit' Salome Alexandra. In other respects he appears to have deserved well of his country, whose boundaries he enlarged by the subjugation of the Ituræans; but remorse for the murder of his brother is said to have brought on his death, which occurred in B.C. 104, after a reign of only one year.

The next king was Alexander Jannæus (104–78), the eldest surviving brother of Aristobulus. Of warlike disposition, he set himself to complete the conquest of Palestine, which his father had begun, and after varying fortunes succeeded in bringing under his sway most of the important towns on the Philistine coast, as well as the regions E. of the Jordan. But Jannæus had other battles to fight. His reign was marked by civil dissension and internal revolt. A supporter of Hellenism, and a dissolute high priest whose hands reeked with blood, he came into acute collision with the Pharisees, and took the most savage revenge on his opponents.

Before his death Jannæus handed over the government to his wife Salome Alexandra, who soon proved her fitness to rule. Shrewdly enough, she at once threw herself into the arms of the Pharisaic party, allowing them practically to regulate the inner life of the nation, but reserving to herself the control of external affairs. Her elder son Hyrcanus II., as a pliable weakling, was invested with the office of high priest, while her younger son Aristobulus, who had energy and ability enough to render him dangerous, was kept strictly aloof from public affairs. The latter, who disliked the Pharisees and the docility with which his mother gave effect to their wishes, particularly as regards an ill-advised attempt to take vengeance on those who had counselled the crucifixion of 800 rebels during the reign of his father Jannæus, ultimately seized several fortresses, and contrived to raise an army, with which he bore down upon Jerusalem. At this stage Alexandra, who had on the whole ruled happily and with discretion, died after reigning for nine years (69).

Aristobulus soon got the better of Hyrcanus II., who agreed to retire in his favour and reside in Jerusalem as a private citizen. But the abdication of Hyrcanus was distasteful to some, and especially to one whose name we now meet with for the first time—the Idumæan Antipater, father of Herod the Great. Working upon the fears of Hyrcanus, this man persuaded him to flee for protection against his brother to the Arabian king Aretas, from whom he extracted a promise to re-establish Hyrcanus in his dominions, provided the latter gave up all claim to twelve cities unjustly wrested from the Arabians by Alexander Jannæus. Defeated in battle, and deserted by many of his troops, Aristobulus retreated to the temple mount, where he was besieged by a coalition army of Arabs and Pharisees.

At this juncture (B.C. 65) the shadow of Rome first fell upon the land. Scaurus, the legate of Pompey in Syria, having been appealed to by both parties, went to Jerusalem and decided in favour of Aristobulus. Aretas had accordingly to withdraw. But in the spring of 63 ambassadors from both parties appeared before Pompey himself at Damascus, while the representatives of a neutral party pled for the abolition of the monarchy and the re-establishment of the ancient constitution. Pompey delayed his decision, and Aristobulus, feeling insecure, at once occupied the stronghold of Alexandrium. Pompey advanced to attack him, whereupon Aristobulus surrendered all the fortresses, but fell back upon Jerus. and prepared for resistance. His vacillating policy was further illustrated when Pompey approached the city. Aristobulus sued for peace, and offered to open the gates and make a money payment; but when Gabinius was sent for the money, the gates were closed against him, and Pompey advanced against Jerusalem. The party of Hyrcanus, to which fear of the Romans brought many accessions, opened the city gates, but the supporters of Aristobulus entrenched themselves in the temple mount. After a three months' siege, however, the walls were scaled, and 12,000 Jews were slain. Apparently from curiosity, and to the lasting horror of the Jews, Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, but subsequently ordered the sanctuary to be purified, and the usual sacrifices to be continued. The ringleaders in the war were executed; Aristobulus and his family he took with him as prisoners; Hyrcanus was designated high priest and ethnarch, but not king. The boundaries of Judæa were also greatly contracted, and Jerus. was garrisoned by the Romans. Not even yet had the Jews learned to avoid calling in the interference of foreigners, but Rome knew how to profit by their internal strifes and factions.

As the star of the Hasmonæan dynasty set, that of the Herodian rose. Hyrcanus was only a puppet in the hands of Antipater and the Romans. The division of Palestine by Gabinius into five districts (συνέδρια) did not, as was hoped, weaken the feeling of national unity. The Hasmonæans made several abortive efforts to regain power. Revolts were led in the year 57 by Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, in 56 by Aristobulus himself and his son Antigonus, and again in 55 by Alexander. Once more, in B.C. 54, after the defeat of the Romans at Carrhæ, the Jews rose in rebellion, but were routed by Cassius. These attempts would have succeeded as against Antipater, but they could not do so as against Antipater and the Romans, who always came to his aid. In B.C. 49 Cæsar set Aristobulus at liberty in order to send him with an army against Antipater; but while he was yet in Rome Aristobulus was poisoned by the adherents of Pompey, who also contrived to have Alexander put to death at Antioch.

While Antipater continued to curry favour with the Romans, the Jews became jealous of his growing power. This feeling was intensified through the appointment of his eldest son Phasael as governor of Jerus., and of his second son Herod as governor of Galilee. The latter soon felt himself strong enough to defy the Sanhedrin, and even to menace Jerusalem. In spite of the accusations of the Sadducæan dignitaries, the two brothers secured the friendship of Antony. Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II., made yet another desperate effort to obtain the kingdom. Although defeated by Herod, he was actually set up as king by the Parthians, and Herod's fortunes sank to the lowest ebb. Phasael made away with himself in prison, and Herod escaped to Rome, where he was recognized as king of Judæa (B.C. 40). A year later Herod landed at Ptolemais, and, after a war extending over two years, he at length, with the help of the legions of Sosius, captured Jerus. and mercilessly slaughtered his opponents. Antigonus was carried a prisoner to Antioch and there put to death. Herod now assumed the kingdom, and the Hasmonæan dynasty was at an end. Shortly before Jerus. fell into his hands he had married Mariamne, who, as granddaughter to both Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, represented the two opposing sections of the Hasmonæan house. But within the first decade of his reign this brilliant and resourceful but cruelly jealous man murdered all its still surviving members, to make sure that none of them should ever supplant him in the government. So perished in succession the youthful high priest Aristobulus, the aged Hyrcanus II., Herod's own wife Mariamne, and last of all Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus II. For these crimes Herod was to suffer a poetic retribution. In his closing years the murderer of the Hasmonæans became the murderer of his own sons, having about the year B.C. 7 ordered Alexander and Aristobulus to be done to death at Sebaste, where their mother Mariamne had become his bride. With them the history of the Maccabees comes to a close.

LITERATURE.—The chief sources for the Maccabæan history are 1 and 2 Mac (see next article), and Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1 onwards. Several Psalms, notably 44. 74. 79. and 83 are probably Maccabæan; some scholars, e.g. Reuss and Cheyne, ascribe many more to this period, but their conclusions are to be accepted with caution. For passing references in Greek and Roman authors, see Schürer, HJP I. i. p. 110 ff. MACCABEES, BOOKS OF (Μακκαβαίων, α', β', etc.).—Some important MSS of the LXX contain four books so entitled.* Of these the first two were incorporated in the Vulgate from the Old Latin translation, and accepted as canonical by the Council of Trent (1546). The Churches of the Reformation, on the other hand, adhering more strictly to the Heb. Canon, placed them among the OT Apocrypha, which were originally included in the Geneva Bible (1560) and in all the English Versions. The remaining books, which are only very remotely connected with the story of the Maccabees, have found, as they deserve, much less recognition in the Church. The order in which these books exist in the MSS, while not chronological as regards their subject-matter, accurately reflects the date of their composition as well as their comparative worth.

A. I MACCABEES is the main source we possess for the history of the period with which it deals. This period covers the forty years (B.C. 175–135) from the accession of the Syrian king Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) to the death of Simon.

1. Contents and Style.—After a brief introductory allusion to the conquests of Alexander the Great and the partition of his empire among his successors, by way of tracing back to its commencement the history of the Greek supremacy in Judæa (1^{1-9}), the author goes on to give a detailed description of the attempt made by Epiphanes, in concert with a Hellenizing party among the Jews themselves, forcibly to introduce into Palestine foreign customs and pagan rites, and to destroy the Jewish religion root and branch (1^{10-64}). He then narrates the action taken by Mattathias the priest, who in his native town of Modin openly resisted the persecuting measures of Antiochus, and placed himself at the head of a band of faithful Israelites who first betook themselves to the mountains, but who, as their numbers increased, began to traverse the land and enforce the observance of Jewish rites (ch. 2). Almost before the movement had been well started, Mattathias died (2^{69}), and the remainder of the book deals with the splendid struggle for faith and freedom under the leadership of his sons, who ultimately succeeded in securing for their country, not only the religious liberty for which they first took up arms (6^{60}), but civil independence as well (13^{41}). After graphically describing the course of events under the successive leadership of the three brothers Judas (3^1–9^{22}), Jonathan (9^{23}–12^{53}), and Simon (13^1–16^{18}), the book closes with the record of the escape of Simon's son, John Hyrcanus, from the fate which overtook his father and his two brothers, and with a reassuring reference to the chronicles of his high-priesthood (16^{19-24}).

The hero of the book is undoubtedly Judas Maccabæus, and its most detailed section is naturally that which narrates his achievements and fortunes. It is written for the most part in the simple narrative style of the OT historical books, and in the phraseology it is easy to detect many reminiscences of both the prose and the poetry of the older canonical writings ($1^{28.37}$ $9^{21.23}$ 14^9 etc.). At times the language throbs with passion (1^{25-28}), becomes eloquently descriptive (14^{8-15}), or rises into poetry (3^{3-9}). But the work is in no sense that of a skilful literary artist who groups his facts with a view to scenic effect. The writer is a plain and honest chronicler who sets down the facts in their historical sequence, with scarcely an attempt to theorize upon them or to point out their significance.

2. Unity.—Previous to the 19th cent. no attempt was made to impugn the unity of the book. In view of the striking absence of the Divine Name from first to last, the careful chronology of the work as a whole, and the uniformity of the style throughout, there has been a very general disposition to ascribe the entire composition to a single author. Some modern scholars, however (e.g. Whiston, Destinon, and Wellhausen), regard chs. 14–16 as a later addition unknown to Josephus. The singularly brief manner in which that historian deals with the reign of Simon may perhaps lend some colour to this theory, but can scarcely be said to prove it. At the opposite pole from this view, and still more improbable, is that of Ewald, who thinks these concluding chapters are the main portion of the book, to which chs. 1–13 are merely introductory.

3. The Language of the Original Book.—The Greek text of 1 Mac is beyond doubt a translation; the work was written originally in Hebrew. On this point we have the express testimony of Origen and Jerome. The former, at the close of his list of the canonical books (in Euseb. HE vi. 25) says, 'But outside the number of these is the Maccabæan history (τὰ Μακκαβαϊκά), entitled Sarbeth Sabanaiel' (Σαρβὴθ Σαβαναιέλ). The work here referred to as known to Origen in its Heb. form is unquestionably the First Book of Maccabees.* Jerome († 420) states explicitly: 'The first book of Maccabees I found in Hebrew; the second is Greek, as can be proved from its very style' (Prol. Gal. ad lib. Reg.). The internal evidence for a Heb. original is also sufficiently conclusive. Although the book has many points of resemblance to the LXX, upon which its Greek seems to be largely modelled, and from which it even directly quotes (cf. 7^{17} with Ps $79^{2.3}$), the constant use of Heb. idioms and OT phrases (1^{29} 2^{48} etc.), as well as the whole structure of the sentences, precludes the idea of its having been written originally in Greek. There are also in the Greek text many obscurities, due in all probability to mistaken renderings from the Hebrew (2^8 6^1 11^8 14^5). Moreover, at this period no Palestinian Jew seems to have written in Greek. A more plausible case might be made out in favour of an Aramaic original, although it is practically certain that the author wrote in classical Hebrew, which was still the language of the learned, and above all of sacred literature.

4. The Author.—The name of the author is unknown. It is, however, quite clear from his warm sympathy with the Maccabæan movement, as well as from his minute knowledge of Palestine, that he was an orthodox Jew of that country. Nor can we tell who was the translator. In spite of its Hebraistic character, his Greek is not difficult to read, and is marked even by a certain fluency. His translation was probably executed somewhere about the middle of the 1st cent. B.C., and certainly not later than the time of Josephus, who seems to have been acquainted with it.

5. The Date.—As to the date of the original work, it is clear from $16^{23f.}$ that it was not composed until after the death of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 105). Ewald's opinion, however, that our author wrote immediately thereafter, is not borne out by the nature of the reference to the annals of that prince as an already well-known work. On the other hand, in view of the writer's friendly tone towards the Romans (ch. 8), the time of composition cannot have been later than B.C. 64, the year prior to Pompey's entrance into Jerusalem. At some point between these two limits the work must have been produced, but the exact year cannot be determined. The likelihood is, however, that it belongs to the first or second decade of the 1st cent. B.C., for as there is no allusion to anything later than the death of Hyrcanus, it seems best not to separate the composition of the book by too long an interval from that event.

6. Sources.—There can be little doubt that the author drew to a certain extent upon existing written sources. Even if an old man at the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C., his own recollections could extend to only a part of the period with which he deals. There is, of course, to be kept in mind the possibility of his having gathered information from older men, as well as the fact that he had doubtless at command a body of tradition singularly fresh, living, and distinct. But the narrative is so well informed, includes such a mass of detail, and is in general so accurate and precise, that we must suppose him to have had access to certain written notices of the Maccabæan struggle, and of the three brothers with whose names it is specially identified. Otherwise, no one living in the second generation after could have produced such a work. The use of written sources seems to be implied in 9^{22}, but the passage throws no light upon their origin or nature.

* The meaning of the Semitic title given by Origen has been much disputed. Most of the conjectures advanced (see Grimm, Kurzgef. Exeget. Handb. p. xvii; Keil, Comm. p. 22; Bissell in Lange-Schaff's Comm. p. 475) are based upon the reading Sarbeth Sarbane El (Σαρβὴθ Σαρβανὲ Ἔλ), adopted by Stephanus, and accepted even by Fritzsche (Schenkel's Bib.-Lex. under 'Makkabäer'), although by far the best attested reading, and according to Schürer (HJP II. iii. 9) 'the only reading that can claim to be recognized,' is that given above. It may possibly be transcribed שַׂר בַּיִת שֶׁבָּנָה אֵל (sar bayith shebbānāh el), i.e. 'the prince of the house which God hath built up.' In any case the title is Semitic, and points to a Heb. original of our book.

Some of the official documents which, as in the Book of Ezra, are incorporated with the narrative, the author states to be 'copies' (8^{22} $12^{5.\ 19}$ $14^{20.\ 27}$), and these may perhaps for the most part be accepted as genuine,—or at least as fairly accurate Heb. translations,—as may also some of the letters from the Syrian kings. Yet in not a few cases (cf. esp. 10^{51} $12^{20\mathrm{ff.}}$ $14^{20\text{-}23}$ $15^{16\mathrm{ff.}}$) we have probably only an attempt on the part of the writer or his authority to give a free version of the lost originals.* He evidently did not hesitate to deal in a free and easy manner with such documentary materials as lay to his hand. In substance, however, these ostensibly official records are quite apposite to the historical relations of the period.

7. Historicity.—In spite of the clever attempt made by the brothers E. F. and G. Wernsdorf about the middle of the 18th cent. to discredit 1 Mac as a historical work, there is but one verdict among modern critics with regard to its general trustworthiness. The writer's habit of dating the chief events according to a fixed era (the Seleucid era of B.C. 312), the general agreement of his chronology with that of Greek and Roman authors, and with the data furnished by extant coins of the period, the frankness and self-restraint shown by him in chronicling victory or defeat on the part of the Jews, and in speaking of their adversaries, the absence from his pages of tawdry ornamentation and weak supernaturalism,—all combine to give to his work the stamp of authentic history. Occasional errors occur, as in 1^{6}, which represents Alexander the Great as dividing his kingdom among his generals; in 8^{6}, where the author overstates the number of elephants employed at the battle of Magnesia (cf. Livy, xxxvii. 39); in $8^{1\mathrm{ff.}}$, where mistakes are made in several particulars regarding the Romans; in 12^{6}, where he speaks of the Spartans as racially akin to the Jews; and in 14^{1}, where he is at variance with other writers as to the time when Tryphon murdered Antiochus VI. But these are mostly blemishes due to his limited knowledge of the world outside of Judæa, and do not seriously affect the value of the book as a contribution to Jewish history. The one criticism which may with justice be offered in this connexion is that the writer sometimes undoubtedly exaggerates in point of numbers (5^{54} $6^{30.\ 37}$ 11^{47}), but even this fault is to some extent condoned by the prevailing custom of that age.

8. Religious Character.—The religious character of the book corresponds to its trustworthiness as history. It breathes a spirit of genuine piety. The standpoint of the author is that of orthodox devotion to 'the law and the ordinances' (2^{21}), and unqualified abhorrence of heathen presumption (1^{25}), blasphemies (7^{38}), and enormities ($1^{55\mathrm{f.}}$). In presence of the direst disasters he retains his faith in an overruling Providence (1^{64}), and does not forget that a righteous cause is more essential than a great army (2^{61} 3^{18}). But, in spite of the intense theocratic feeling that underlies the book, there is a remarkable reserve shown in the expression of it. The Maccabees are pious ($4^{8\mathrm{ff.}}$ 12^{15} 16^{3}) and devoted men ($2^{21\mathrm{f.}}$ $3^{59\mathrm{f.}}$ etc.), but their triumphs are represented as due to their soldierly skill and diplomatic wisdom, and not to any special intervention of God. In this we detect a deviation from the mode of statement adopted in the older canonical histories. Yet the religious spirit of the book is such that Luther felt it might with advantage have been included in the Canon of Scripture, and altogether it stands on a higher plane than the other 'Books of Maccabees.' Devout Israelite as he is, however, the writer avoids the mention of the Divine Name, which (according to the true text) does not once occur in his narrative. Prayer is directed to the remote heaven, not to a present encompassing Jehovah (3^{50} 4^{10}). Except in the diluted form of a pathetic forward look towards 'a faithful prophet' who should announce the divine will with regard to pressing problems in Church and State (4^{46} 14^{41}), the Messianic hope is absent from the book. Nor is there any reference to the doctrine of the resurrection.

9. Use in the Christian Church.—Although not extensively, 1 Mac would seem to have been used in the Christian Church from an early date. Tertullian († 220), adv. Judæos, c. 4, says: 'Nam et temporibus Maccabæorum sabbatis pugnando fortiter fecerunt' (cf. 1 Mac $2^{41\mathrm{ff.}}$); Cyprian (c. A.D. 250) quotes the book in his Testimonia (iii. 4. 15, 53), each time with the formula in Machabaeis; Clement of Alexandria († 220) speaks of τὸ (βιβλίον) τῶν Μακκαβαϊκῶν, and also of ἡ τῶν Μακκαβαϊκῶν ἐπιτομή, Strom. i. 123, v. 98; Hippolytus († 235) in his Comm. in Daniel, chs. 31–32, draws largely on 1 Mac, quoting almost verbatim $2^{33\mathrm{ff.}}$; Origen († 254) also, in his Com. in Ep. ad Rom. (bk. viii. ch. i.), says: 'Sicut Mattathias, de quo in primo libro Machabæorum scriptum est quia "zelatus est in lege Dei,"' etc. (1 Mac 2^{24}). References to our book as the First Book of Maccabees also occur in the Demonstr. Evang. of Eusebius († 338), and in the writings of Augustine († 430). On the other hand, the Maccabæan books are placed outside the Canon by Origen, and omitted from the lists of OT Scriptures given by Athanasius († 373), Gregory of Nazianzus († 390), and Cyril of Jerusalem († 386), and until the Council of Trent enjoyed only 'ecclesiastical,' not canonical rank.

10. The MSS. — The Greek Text of 1 Mac, although not contained in the Codex Vaticanus (B), has a place in both the Codex Sinaiticus (ℵ) and the Codex Alexandrinus (A)—MSS dating respectively from the 4th and 5th centuries. Next to these in age and importance comes the (8th or 9th cent.) Codex Venetus (V.). All the other (16) MSS are later than the 11th century. The best modern editions are those of Fritzsche (Lib. Apoc. Vet. Test. Græce, 1871) and Swete (Old Test. in Greek, Cambridge, 1894, 2nd ed. 1899).

11. Versions.—Only two old versions of 1 Mac are extant: (1) The Latin, which exists in two recensions, (a) the common text embodied in the Vulgate, and (b) another containing chs. 1–13, printed in Sabatier's Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinæ Versiones Antiquæ, ii. p. 1017 ff., and more recently discovered in a complete form in a MS now at Madrid. The latter appears to be the older recension. (2) The Syriac. This version, like the Latin, was evidently derived from the Greek. The translator's mode of giving the names of places, however, seems to point to his acquaintance with them in their Semitic form, and this circumstance, while rendering the version exegetically serviceable, is also a testimony to its antiquity.

B. II MACCABEES covers the history from the close of the reign of the Syrian king Seleucus IV. Philopator (B.C. 176) to the death of Nicanor (B.C. 161), a period of little more than 15 years. This takes us back one year further than 1 Mac does; but, on the other hand, the narrative stops short by a quarter of a century of the point reached in that work. Except that it deals with a relatively smaller section of the history, the Second Book thus virtually runs parallel with the First. For the opening year (or rather more) of the period which it covers, i.e. for the events narrated from 3^{1}—where, properly speaking, the book begins—to 4^{6}, it remains the chief authority, but for the rest of this period it ranks only as an independent supplement to the First Book.

* Fritzsche accepts as genuine all the documents called 'copies,' and regards all the rest as free reproductions by the author. But this seems too artistic.

1. Contents and Historicity.—In its present form 2 Mac begins with two letters in which the Palestinian Jews urgently invite their kinsmen in Egypt to take part in the Feast of the Dedication (1–2^{18}), whether in Egypt or in Jerusalem is not quite clear, although the latter supposition has the greater probability. Then follows the writer's own preface, in which he remarks upon the source, scope, and design of his work (2^{19-32}). After this comes the main narrative (3–15), which is an abridgment (ἐπιτομή, $2^{26.\,28}$) of a larger history in five books by one Jason of Cyrene, a Hellenistic Jew. The first part of the abridgment (3^{1}–4^{6}) tells of a futile attempt by Heliodorus, prime minister of Seleucus IV., to rob the temple, and of the traitorous and slanderous policy pursued by a certain Simon against the good high-priest Onias. From 4^{7}–7^{42} the narrative is practically an expanded version of 1 Mac 1^{10-64}, setting forth with great fulness of detail the religious persecution under Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), and exhibiting at once the lamentable apostasy of one section of the Jews and the immovable faithfulness of others, even to the point of martyrdom. The remainder of the work (8–15) corresponds broadly to 1 Mac 3–7, and describes the rise and progress of the Maccabæan insurrection down to the crushing defeat of the Syrian general Nicanor by Judas.[*] The epitomizer concludes with some characteristic remarks regarding his own work (15^{37-39}).

The first letter (1^{1-9}), which is dated from the year 188 of the Seleucid era (B.C. 124), refers to a letter written by the Palestinian Jews to their brethren in Egypt during 'the tribulation and extremity' induced by the apostasy of Jason the high priest under Demetrius II., and asks them to repeat the sympathy apparently shown to them then by keeping 'the feast of tabernacles of the month Chislev' (i.e. the Feast of the Dedication) now that the temple service was happily restored. The second letter (1^{10}–2^{18}), which bears no date, purports to be addressed by the Jews of Palestine, the senate (γερουσία), and Judas to the priest Aristobulus, king Ptolemy's teacher (διδάσκαλος), and to the Egyptian Jews. After telling how their oppressor Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) had perished while attempting to rob the temple of Nanæa (1^{11-17}), and intimating their intention of celebrating the Feast of the Dedication and commemorating the recovery of the sacred fire under Nehemiah, they invite their kinsmen in Egypt to take part in the festival (1^{18}). There follow legendary stories of the manner in which the holy fire was preserved and found again (1^{19-36}), and of the hiding by the prophet Jeremiah, in a cave-dwelling, of the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar of incense until God should again smile upon His people (2^{1-8}). A miracle similar to that associated with Nehemiah had already taken place at the dedication of the temple by Solomon, who 'kept the eight days' (2^{9-12}). Judas Maccabæus is also represented as having meritoriously followed the example of Nehemiah in making a collection of national records and sacred books (2^{13-15}). The letter closes with another invitation to keep the feast, and with the hope that God may speedily gather the dispersed Israelites into the holy land (2^{16-18}).

The two letters prefixed to the book have in reality no connexion either with it or with one another, except in so far as they both aim at commending to the Egyptian Jews the Feast of the Dedication. The particle (δέ) by which they are linked on to the 'epitome' does not necessarily imply any prior narrative. Schürer correctly holds that 'they are evidently originally independent pieces of writing, afterwards combined by a later hand, but not that of the epitomizer, with this Second Book of Maccabees' (HJP II. iii. p. 213). The glaring contradictions of 1^{7}, which represents the climax of affliction as having been experienced under Demetrius II. Nikator, and 15^{37} which states that from the time of Nicanor's death (B.C. 161) the Holy City had been held by the Hebrews, and of 1^{11-16} and ch. 9 with respect to the death of Epiphanes, render impossible the view that these letters were indited by the epitomizer. Besides, they are written in a simpler and less rhetorical style than the main narrative, their proper chronological position in which would be after 10^{1-9}.[*] Both letters are palpable forgeries. In B.C. 144, when the first was written, 'the extremity' (1^{7}) was certainly past, and it seems incredible that the second, which, among other blunders, ascribes to Nehemiah the rebuilding of the temple and the altar (1^{18}), should have emanated from the Jewish senate. Such blemishes unmistakably stamp both epistles as apocryphal products of a later time.

Of Jason or of his history nothing is known beyond what is conveyed in 2 Mac. That he was identical with the ambassador of 1 Mac 8^{17} is a pure conjecture. Although a Jew 'of Cyrene' he shows more acquaintance with Syria than with Egypt and Palestine. In all that relates to the former kingdom his knowledge is extensive and minute. The names and rank of Syrian officers (4^{27} 5^{24} 12^{2} 14^{12}), as well as the identity of minor personages (4^{30} 8^{32} 10^{32}), are familiar to him. On the other hand, his knowledge of Palestine and even of Egypt is geographically defective, and is limited to outstanding events and personages. All this points, perhaps, to his having been no longer resident at Cyrene when his work was written.

2. Author.—The personality of the epitomizer is unknown. He was perhaps an Alexandrian Jew, although his work bears no trace of the Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy of religion, and contains nothing alien to the orthodox Palestinian Judaism of the period. His relation to Jason's history is made quite clear by himself (2^{19-32}); he expressly informs us that his work is only a condensed version of Jason's. From the 'painful labour' involved, it is natural to suppose that his epitome covers the whole of the ground embraced in the five books of Jason. The latter was probably also the sole literary source from which he drew. It is unwarrantable to infer from the fact that in his general digest of the contents of Jason's work he fails to mention that it included events within the reigns of both Seleucus IV. and Demetrius I., that it was therefore confined to the period during which Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) and his son Eupator held the throne, and that he must have used other sources for those parts of his narrative which deal with events prior and subsequent to that period. According to Grotius only chs. 3–11, according to Bertholdt only chs. 4–11, are based upon Jason's history. But it was enough that in his summary of contents the epitomizer should name the two kings with whom the narrative is chiefly concerned. Moreover, the way in which he disclaims originality and even responsibility for the historical accuracy of the facts embodied in his work (2^{28}) seems to [*] Some prefer to divide the book into five sections, of which the respective endings (3^{40} 7^{42} 10^{9} 13^{26} 15^{37}) are supposed to be coincident with the close of the several volumes of Jason.

[*] Fritzsche (in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon), while agreeing that the epitomizer did not write these letters, thinks that he prefixed them to the book because they were consonant to his purpose. But even this is to rate his intelligence very low.

imply that had he made use of any other documentary material he would certainly have specified it. No doubt he has given a certain colouring of his own to the book as we possess it. The exaggerations and florid rhetoric which characterize it are probably due to him, but 'the manifestations that came from heaven' on behalf of Judaism are mentioned as being treated of in the original work, to which also are undoubtedly to be attributed not a few of the inconsistencies found in the 'epitome' (cf. 9^{29} with 13^{23} etc.). And it is to be remembered that the latter is probably quite as much of a selection from the original as a digest of it. To judge from the sample of ability and literary taste exhibited in the epitomizer's prefatory and closing words, his share in the subject-matter must in any case have been slight.

3. Language.—Both Jason and his epitomizer must have originally written in Greek. As a Jew of Cyrene, Jason would naturally make use of that language. That he did so is also suggested by the remarkably pure Greek of the epitome. The Hebraisms which might have been looked for in a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic are in general conspicuous by their absence. Jerusalem is always written Ἱεροσόλυμα according to the Greek, never Ἱερουσαλήμ according to the Heb. form. That the Greek text of the epitome is the original can be proved, as Jerome says, from its very style: 'Secundus (Machabæorum) Græcus est, quod ex ipsa quoque φράσει probari potest.' In this remark we have at once external evidence for a Gr. original, and the recognition of internal evidence pointing in the same direction. The style of the present work, although at times bald and rough (as e.g. in 13^{19-26}), is on the whole fluent and unrestrained, and not seldom highly ornate. There is a certain straining after rare words and expressions, as: φιλοφρονεῖν εἴς τι, 2^{25}; ἀλλοφυλισμός, 4^{13} 6^{24}; διεμπίμπλημι, 4^{40}; θωρακισμός, 5^{3}; ὁπλολογεῖν τινά, $8^{27.\,31}$; κατευθικτεῖν, 14^{43}. Some words are employed in an unusual sense, e.g. εἰσκυκλεῖσθαι, 2^{24}; φροντίζειν τί, 2^{25}; ψυχικῶς, 4^{37} 14^{24}; δευτερολογεῖν, 13^{22}. Several ἅπαξ λεγόμενα appear also to occur, e.g. δυσπέτημα, 5^{20}; ἀπευθανατίζειν, 6^{28}; δοξικός, 8^{35}; πολεμοτροφεῖν, $10^{14.\,15}$; διάσταλσις, 13^{25}. The writer is fond of the alliterative use of words from the same root, e.g. ἄγειν ἀγῶνα, 4^{18}; ἀποδεχθεὶς . . . εἰσεδέχθη, 4^{22}; δεξιασθεὶς . . . δεξιάν, 4^{34}; εὐημερίαν δυσημερίαν, 5^{6}; ἀποξενώσας ἐπὶ ξένης, 5^{9} etc. He is also partial to the use of ποιεῖσθαι with the accusative of the substantive necessary to complete the verbal idea, as in 2^{30} etc. Clearly he had a large vocabulary at command, and could write the Greek language with ease and mastery.

4. Sources and Date.—If, as is probable, Jason based his narrative on the oral accounts of contemporaries who recited from memory the stirring events of those fifteen years, he must have written soon after B.C. 160. The mythical strain of chs. 6–7, which relate the martyrdom of Eleazar and the seven brethren, and of other parts of the narrative, does not preclude this view, as such myths require no long time for their formation, especially at some distance from the theatre of events. But the exact date of writing cannot be determined. The same is the case as regards the epitome. The curious statement of 15^{37} might seem to suggest the period immediately subsequent to Nicanor, but this is clearly out of the question. All that can be said with safety is that the work must have been written before the destruction of Jerus. in A.D. 70, since the existence of the city and the temple worship are presupposed. This is further apparent from the fact that 4 Mac, which is based on 2 Mac, was written prior to that event. That our book was composed later than 1 Mac may be inferred from the changed tone of the references to the Romans. If 2 Mac was known to Philo (see below), this would fix the inferior limit of its composition at about A.D. 40.

5. Relation to 1 Mac.—2 Mac contains much that is special to itself, but where it evidently covers the same ground as 1 Mac it does so with many divergences of detail. It is not, of course, surprising that between two independent narratives dealing with the same events there should be many points of difference. Our two books are, however, so different in genius, form, and contents, that strict comparison is impossible. In historical credibility and value 2 Mac is admittedly inferior to the First Book, the authority of which must therefore be preferred in the case of irreconcilable discrepancies. Of such it may suffice to enumerate the following:—(1) The campaign of Lysias, ascribed in 1 Mac 4^{26-35} to the year before the death of Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), is transferred in 2 Mac 11 to the reign of Antiochus V. (Eupator); (2) the Jewish raids on neighbouring tribes, and campaigns in Gilead and Galilee, represented in 1 Mac 5 as carried on in rapid succession between the rededication of the altar and the concession of religious liberty, are separately placed in different historical settings (8^{30} 10^{15-38} 12^{2-45}); (3) the account given in ch. 9 differs in several particulars from that of 1 Mac 6 regarding the death of Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes), who it is falsely declared wrote a letter to the Jews; (4) the statement in 9^{29} that after the death of Antiochus, Philip fled to Egypt, is at variance with that of 1 Mac $6^{55.\,63}$; (5) in 14^{1} Demetrius I. is said to have landed in Syria 'with a mighty host and a fleet,' in 1 Mac 7^{1} 'with a few men'; (6) Nicanor's personal liking for Judas, 14^{24}, is an incredible circumstance, and contrary to the whole trend of 1 Mac; (7) according to 15^{37} the Acra was in the possession of the Jews at the time of Nicanor's death, whereas according to 1 Mac 13^{51} it was captured by Simon only in B.C. 142. Other blemishes disfigure the work, e.g. the absurd exaggerations in the numbers of the slain ($8^{24.\,30}$ $10^{23.\,31}$ 11^{11}); the highly coloured picture of the martyrdoms in 6^{18}–7^{42}, and the representation that Epiphanes witnessed them in person; the erroneous particulars as to the place and manner of death of that monarch (9); and the extraordinary details respecting the suicide of Razis ($14^{37\text{ff.}}$). Yet with all its defects 2 Mac is by no means historically worthless. The earlier portion of the narrative (3^{1}–4^{2}) is of the greatest value, and there is no reason to doubt its substantial truthfulness. There are indeed many important particulars in which the book agrees with 1 Mac (cf. 4–6^{10} with 1 Mac 1^{10-64}). It is also in accord with Josephus, who was unacquainted with it, in regard to several events about which 1 Mac is silent (cf. 4. 6^{2} 13^{3-8} 14^{1} with Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1, v. 5, ix. 7, x. 1). Vain attempts have been made to reconcile discrepancies between 1 and 2 Mac on the theory that the writers followed a different chronology. In all probability both adopted the Seleucid era, which began in Oct. B.C. 312. On the relation of this era to dates B.C., see Schürer, HJP I. i. p. 36 ff., I. ii. Appendix v. p. 393.

6. Religious Character.—As to its religious character, 2 Mac presents a strong contrast to the First Book. In 1 Mac the name of God remains unuttered, in 2 Mac it is freely used; in the former frequent reference is made to the OT, here it is but seldom alluded to (7^{6} 8^{19} 15^{22}); in the one, great reserve is shown in the expression of theocratic feeling, in the other the reverse is the case. Again, instead of a simple objective narrative in which the facts are allowed to make their own impression, we have a highly coloured rhetorical composition with a running commentary upon the events recorded ($4^{16f.}$ $5^{9f.\,17f.}$ $6^{12f.}$ $9^{6.\,18}$ etc.). The writer aims at the glorification of Judaism, and selects and modifies his historical material with a view to homiletic ends. In particular, it seems to have been the chief design of the compilation in its present form — and in this respect the two introductory letters are certainly significant—to magnify the temple (2^{19} 3^{2} 9^{16} 13^{23}), to exalt the importance of the two national festivals connected with the re-establishment of the legal worship and the death of Nicanor, and to encourage, admonish, and edify the Jews of the Dispersion. The work can scarcely be termed a history in the ordinary sense, its whole material being grouped around the temple and the two great festivals, without regard to strict chronological sequence. E.g. the institution of the Feast of the Dedication is placed after the account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (cf. $10^{6ff.}$ with 1 Mac 4^{56}) for the sake of effect, and the circumstances connected with the death of Judas are passed over, apparently in order that the previous engagement in which Nicanor lost his life, and its commemorative festival, might stand out in bolder relief. Owing perhaps to an inclination on the part of the Egyptian Jews to set increasing store by their own temple at Leontopolis, the writer seems to represent the temple at Jerus. as the only legitimate sanctuary. It is the headquarters of the Jewish worship (2^{19} 5^{15} 14^{31} etc.), and honoured even by heathen kings (3^{2} 13^{23}). The Almighty had often interposed to protect it, and had severely punished its desecrators (3^{24} $13^{6\text{-}8}$ 14^{32} 15^{32}). There are constant references to heavenly manifestations (ἐπιφάνειαι, 2^{21}) on behalf of the defenders of Judaism ($3^{24ff.}$ $10^{29f.}$ $11^{6ff.}$ 12^{22}). The history is only seen as it were through a coloured spectrum of portents (5^{4}), dreams (15^{11}), and visions (3^{33}). The Lord is conceived as the wonder-worker (τερατοποιός) who in answer to prayer sends 'a good angel to save Israel' (11^{6} $15^{21ff.}$).

Israel is 'God's people' (1^{26}), His 'portion' (ἡ μερὶς αὐτοῦ, 14^{15}); their calamities are His loving chastisement for their sins (5^{18} 6^{12}); and from them He will never withdraw His mercy (6^{16}). The heathen, on the other hand, are allowed to fill up their cup of iniquity prior to their destruction (6^{14}). Foreign kings and their Jewish supporters are the unconscious instruments of the divine punitive righteousness with respect to Israel, but their insolence does not go unpunished (7^{36}), and their punishment exactly corresponds to their guilt (4^{38} 5^{9} 13^{8} $15^{32f.}$). The view taken of providential rewards and punishments is thus distinctly mechanical and external. 'Providence appears no longer as God's providence, but man's shaped by his wishes and governed by his caprices.'* God will one day gather the dispersed Israelites into Palestine (2^{18}); than this there is no nearer approach to the Messianic hope. The doctrine of the resurrection, on the other hand, finds the clearest expression (7^{36}), and the offering of prayers for the dead seems to have the sanction of $12^{42ff.}$.

According to Geiger, 1 and 2 Mac are partisan writings, the work, respectively, of a Sadducee who espoused the cause of the Hasmonæan house, and of a Pharisee who bore it a distinct grudge. As regards 2 Mac at all events, his theory seems to have much in its favour. Of the genealogy of the Maccabees, the death of Judas, the family sepulchre, no account is taken in the narrative. The priestly order, as represented by Jason and Menelaus, appears in the darkest light. Among the martyrs spoken of there is no priest, whereas one of 'the principal scribes' ($6^{18ff.}$) was the first to defy imperial cruelty. The Pharisaic bias of the work is seen also from its rigid Sabbatarianism (5^{25} 6^{11} etc.), its partiality for wonders and visions, and its teaching concerning the resurrection (7). Even the action of Judas himself is ascribed to his mindfulness of the resurrection (12^{43}).

7. Use by Jews and Christians. — Among the Jews 2 Mac was never received as canonical. In the Rabbinical writings, however, some use is made of it, and in Philo's treatise, Quod omnis probus liber (Mang. ii. 459), the descriptions of tyrannical persecutions of the pious appear to be based upon it. The earliest Christian reference to it is supposed to be in the Ep. to the Heb. (cf. He $11^{35ff.}$ with 2 Mac $6^{19.\,28}$). The first quotation from the book is found in the writings of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. v. 14. 97). Frequent reference is made to it by Origen (Exhortatio ad martyrium, c. 22–27, de Oratione, c. 11, contra Celsum, viii. 46, etc.). The history of the Maccabæan martyrs was a favourite subject with the early Fathers generally (Cyprian, Test. iii. 17; Jerome, Prol. Galeat.; Augustine, de Doctr. Christ. ii. 8, de Civitate Dei, xviii. 36). That the estimation in which the Books of the Maccabees were held by Augustine exceeded that accorded to them by Jerome, who recognized them as ecclesiastical but not as canonical, appears from the passage last referred to: 'Maccabæorum libri, quos non Judæi, sed ecclesia pro canonica habet propter quorundam martyrum passiones.'

8. MSS and Versions.—What has been said above on 1 Mac with reference to MSS and versions applies for the most part to 2 Mac also. But (1) 2 Mac is omitted in ℵ; (2) besides the Old Lat. version which is adopted in the Vulg., and which is not, as in the case of 1 Mac, supplemented in Sabatier by an older text, there is a Cod. Ambrosianus published by Peyron in 1824. The Syriac version is very inexact.

C. III MACCABEES. — 1. Contents. — This book relates how Ptolemy IV. Philopator, after defeating Antiochus the Great at Raphia (B.C. 217), visited Jerusalem, and 'conceived the purpose of entering the sanctuary' (1^{10}). Everything was done to dissuade him from this act of desecration, but in vain. Great excitement consequently arose among the Jews, who were with difficulty prevented from taking to arms ($1^{11\text{-}29}$). At the critical moment the calm and reverend figure of Simon the high priest was seen kneeling in front of the temple, and in answer to his earnest prayers God smote the king with paralysis, and he was borne helpless from the sacred precincts ($2^{1\text{-}24}$). On coming to himself Ptolemy returned to Egypt, but vowing vengeance. This took the form of subjecting the Jews of Alexandria to certain religious disabilities, depriving them of the equal civic rights which they enjoyed with the Macedonian founders of the city, and branding them with an ivy-leaf as worshippers of Bacchus. Only those who voluntarily embraced the worship of this deity were to retain their privileges ($2^{25\text{-}30}$). Enraged at the steadfastness with which the great majority adhered to their ancestral faith, the king commanded the entire Jewish population of the country to be brought in chains to Alexandria (2^{31}–3^{1}). In spite of attempts made to represent them as disloyal citizens, the Jews had so won the good opinion of all, that some of their Gentile associates interested themselves on their behalf ($3^{2\text{-}10}$). Notwithstanding the stringent terms of the royal edict,—which caused as much grief to the Jews as it did joy among the heathen,—and the equally harsh manner in which it was carried out, the majority succeeded in evading arrest (3^{11}–4^{10}). As a preliminary to the intended massacre, the names of all were ordered to be taken down. But, at the end of forty days' continuous work, the clerks reported that, owing to the vast number of Jews to be dealt with, their writing materials were exhausted ($4^{14\text{-}21}$). Ptolemy next commanded that 500 elephants should be intoxicated with wine and incense and let loose upon the Jews in the racecourse. Although all was in readiness for it, the execution of the order was delayed for another day because the king had slept until it was past the hour fixed for his principal daily meal (5^{1-22}). Next morning, however, Ptolemy was providentially made to forget the orders he had given, and recollected nothing but the loyalty of the Jews to himself and his ancestors (5^{23-25}). Yet the same evening he summoned the keeper of the elephants and renewed his order for the destruction of the Jews; and in reply to the higher officials, who expressed amazement at his instability of purpose, he swore that he would send the Jews to Hades, and that he would invade Judæa and destroy the temple (5^{36-43}). When, accordingly, on the third day at dawn an enormous crowd had collected, and the king rushed forth to see his commands executed, the Jews called upon the Lord to show them mercy (5^{44-50}). At the prayer of the venerable priest Eleazar, 'two angels, glorious and terrible,' appeared from heaven, to the consternation of the king and his army. The elephants also turned upon and trampled down the royal forces (6^{1-22}). The king now directed his wrath against his counsellors, ordered the Jews to be released from their fetters, and feasted them for seven days at the imperial expense. They resolved on their part to observe these days in all time coming as a festival to commemorate their deliverance. The king also provided them with a letter to the provincial authorities securing them against injury and reproach (6^{23}–7^{9}). They were further empowered to put to death more than 300 of their kinsmen who had apostatized from the law of God, and, after duly availing themselves of this concession, they joyfully set out for their homes. At Ptolemais they celebrated their deliverance for another seven days, and erected a house of prayer. On arriving at their several destinations they had all their property restored to them, and were held in higher esteem than ever by the Egyptians (7^{10-23}).

2. Historicity.—That the narrative has to some extent a historical background is clear from the opening sketch of the war between Philopator and Antiochus. The details given agree broadly with the statements of Livy, Justin, and Polybius. At Raphia the scale was turned in favour of Philopator, through the appeal made to the soldiers by his sister Arsinoe ($1^{1.\,4}$), whom, however, Livy (xxxvii. 4) names Cleopatra, and Justin (xxx. 1. 7) Eurydice. According to Polybius (v. 87), Philopator remained for three months in Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia. His Bacchanalian proclivities ($2^{25\mathrm{f.}}$) are also mentioned by Justin (xxx. 1) and Strabo (xvii. 796). Theodotus (1^{2}) is a historical personage; Polybius (v. 40, etc.) speaks of him as an Ætolian who was Ptolemy's commander-in-chief over Cœle-Syria, but who in B.C. 219 went over to the side of Antiochus. Grimm (Introd. § 3) further regards the observance of the two annual festivals (6^{36} 7^{19}), and the existence of the synagogue at Ptolemais (7^{20}), when the author wrote, as the witness of tradition to some great deliverance; but there is force in the remark of Fritzsche ('Makkabäer' in Schenkel's Bib.-Lex.), that among the Jewish writers of that period it had become an almost stereotyped custom to link on a festival to every event of importance.

Certainly, in spite of the historical allusions which it contains, and the manifest intention that it should pass for real history, the work must be regarded as a fiction, and that not of the highest order. It abounds in incredible situations (4^{20}, cf. with 5^{5} $6^{1.\,30}$ 7^{18}) and psychological absurdities ($5^{27\mathrm{ff.}}$); it is characterized by false statements (5^{2} 7^{2}) and inconsistencies (4^{18}); it shows, too, great zest in the interpretation of providence (4^{21} 5^{30} etc.). In short, it bears every mark of being a mythical tale founded perhaps on some no longer definitely ascertainable historical occurrence. There is nowhere else any mention of Philopator having either visited Jerus. or persecuted the Jews. But in Jos. (c. Ap. ii. 5) there is a story of a somewhat similar character connected with the reign of Ptolemy VII. Physcon. That monarch, it is said, punished the Alexandrian Jews for their loyalty to Cleopatra by putting them in fetters and throwing them to intoxicated elephants. As the animals, however, turned against Physcon's friends and killed many of them, and as the king saw a terrible visage which forbade him to injure the Jews, he abandoned his intention, and the Jews kept a feast in commemoration of the event. This appears to be the older as it is also a simpler version of the same floating tradition, which may have been based upon an actual but unsuccessful attempt on the part of some monarch to enter the temple at Jerus. by force—an attempt which was followed up by an effort to be avenged on the Jews. But in 3 Mac, which was apparently unknown to Josephus, the reference of the story to an earlier king of Egypt, and the addition of other embellishments, already mark a deviation from the older tradition. According to many scholars (Ewald, Reuss, etc.), the legend is founded upon the attempt of the emperor Caligula to erect his statue in the temple at Jerus. (Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii. 2), and his subsequent persecution of the Jews, the transference of the event to the reign of Ptolemy IV. Philopator being due to prudential reasons. But there is nothing in the work which definitely points to Caligula's time, and our author does not represent Ptolemy as aspiring to the honours of deity. The one significant parallel to the times of Caligula is the circumstance, vouched for by Philo, that the Roman governor Flaccus Avillius deprived the Jews of the rights of citizenship. On the other hand, if the work be referred to this period (c. A.D. 40), the confinement of the Jews in the hippodrome of Alexandria ($4^{11\mathrm{ff.}}$) might have been suggested by Herod's command that his leading opponents should be so dealt with at Jericho (Jos. Ant. XVII. vi. 5; BJ I. xxxiii. 6). But the exact date of writing remains uncertain. The Greek additions to Daniel are known to the author, who cannot therefore have written earlier than the 1st cent. B.C., but he very possibly lived as late as the 1st cent. A.D. His design was evidently to cheer and console his co-religionists in a time of persecution at Alexandria.

3. Integrity.—In its present form 3 Mac appears to be incomplete. It begins abruptly (ὁ δὲ Φιλοπάτωρ); in 1^{2} there is a reference to 'the plot' (τὴν ἐπιβουλήν) of which no previous mention has been made; and in 2^{25} allusion is made to the king's 'before-mentioned' companions, although the foregoing part of the work is silent regarding them. But it is unnecessary (with Dähne, Ewald, Fritzsche) to suppose that it is a mere fragment; the loss of an introductory chapter would explain all (Grimm). Fritzsche thinks the title of the book indicates that we have in the extant fragment a sort of prolegomena to a complete history of the Maccabees. Certainly 'Book of Maccabees' is a misnomer as applied to the existing work, which professes to deal with a situation considerably anterior to the Maccabæan rising.

4. Language.—Our book bears every evidence of having been written in Greek by an Alexandrian Jew. The vocabulary is exceptionally rich. Hebraisms are comparatively rare, and never harsh (e.g. 'thy glorious name,' 2^{14}; 'the heaven of heavens,' 2^{15} etc.). The style, however, is 'bom-bastic and involved,' and even further removed from the category of ordinary prose narrative than is that of 2 Mac, with which it has many points of affinity, such as, e.g., the use of τόπος to designate the temple at Jerus., and of ἐπιφάνεια to denote the special miraculous interposition of God, and the love of rhetorical word-painting ($1^{16ff.}$ $4^{3ff.}$ $5^{48f.}$). It exceeds that work, however, in obscure expressions ($1^{9. 14. 17}$ 2^{31} 4^{11}), and in straining after poetic effect (1^{18} 4^{8} 5^{26} $6^{4. 8}$). The opening words of 5^{31} (ὅσοι γονεῖς παρῆσαν ἢ παίδων γόνοι) form an iambic trimeter, and seem to be a quotation from some Greek dramatist. Some words bear an unusual meaning, e.g. διάγειν (1^{3}), ἀπρόπτωτος (3^{14}), καταχρᾶσθαι (4^{5}); others do not occur elsewhere, e.g. ἀνεπιστρέπτως (1^{20}), λαογραφία (2^{29}), προσυστέλλεσθαι (2^{29}), χαρτηρία (4^{20}); and others are very rare, or are used only in late Gr. writings, e.g. ἔνθεσμος (2^{21}), φρικασμός (3^{17}), ἀλογιστία (5^{42}), μεγαλομερῶ (6^{33}). The work appears to be more or less coloured by the influence of the Alexandrian philosophy; compare in this connexion the names (μέγιστος, $1^{9. 16}$ 4^{16} 7^{22}; ὕψιστος, 6^{2} 7^{9}) applied to the Supreme Being, and the distinction made between God and His glory ($2^{9ff.}$).

5. Use by Jews and Christians.—The book seems to have been practically neglected by the Jews, while the first Christian reference to it occurs in the Canones Apostolorum, c. 85 (Μακκαβαίων τρία). It is mentioned (ad Dan. 11^{7}) by Theodoret of Antioch († c. A.D. 457); in the catalogue of Nicephorus (Μακκαβαϊκὰ γ΄), and in the Synopsis Athanasii apparently as Πτολεμαϊκά.[*] The work found no acceptance with the Latin Church, and is not included in the Vulg.; but in the Syrian Church it met with considerable favour, as is shown by the existence of an ancient Syriac version, by the respectful allusions of Theodoret, and by the fact that in all probability the catalogue of Nicephorus had its origin in the Syrian Church.

6. MSS and Versions.—3 Mac is found in most MSS and editions of the LXX. A Latin translation was first made for the Complutensian Polyglott, and has since been followed by several others. Many German versions also now exist, among which may be mentioned those of the Züricher Bibel, Berlenburger Bibel, Bunsen's Bibelwerk, and Kautzsch's Apocryphen u. Pseudepigraphen. According to Cotton (The Five Books of Maccabees in English, Oxford, 1832, Introd. p. xx), the first English version (by Walter Lynne) appeared in 1550, and was with some modifications embodied in a folio Bible issued by John Daye in 1551.

D. IV MACCABEES.—1. Contents.—This, as a philosophical treatise, occupies a unique position among apocryphal books. The writer's theme is 'the supremacy of pious reason (=religious principle) over the passions,'[†] and the Judaism which he advocates is distinctly coloured by the Stoic philosophy. Although the composition takes the form of a discourse in which the direct mode of address is adopted ($1^{1. 7}$ 2^{14} 13^{19} 18^{1}), we are not therefore warranted in supposing (with Freudenthal) that we have here an actual specimen of a Jewish sermon. The style is too abstruse for an ordinary congregation, and it never became the habit to base discourses upon philosophical propositions instead of Scripture texts. At the same time, the work is not a mere academical thesis. If it suggests an artificial spirituality rather than the natural outflow of a heart deeply under the power of religion (Grimm), the writer undoubtedly handles his subject with vigour, moral earnestness, and a desire to edify his readers (or hearers). These were apparently confined to his co-religionists (18^{1} Ὦ τῶν Ἀβραμιαίων σπερμάτων ἀπόγονοι παῖδες Ἰσραηλεῖται), whom he assures that in order to lead a pious life they have only to follow the dictates of 'pious reason.'

After an introduction (1^{1-12}), the author lays down his thesis that pious reason is perfect master of the passions, and expounds this proposition not without dialectic skill. Reason he defines as 'intelligence combined with an upright life, and holding in honour the word of wisdom' (1^{15}),[*] and wisdom as 'the knowledge of affairs divine and human, and of their causes' (1^{16}). Wisdom is attained through 'the instruction of the law' (1^{17}), and is manifested in four cardinal virtues, viz. φρόνησις, δικαιοσύνη, ἀνδρεία,[†] σωφροσύνη (1^{18}). A description and classification of the affections, with special reference to the antagonism offered by them to the four cardinal virtues, is also given, and it is shown by examples taken from Jewish history that pious reason is lord of all the affections except forgetfulness (λήθη) and ignorance (ἄγνοια). With this ends the first and more strictly philosophical part of the book (1^{13}–3^{18}). In the second part (3^{19}–18^{2}), after a historical review of the tyrannical treatment of the Jews under the Syrian king Seleucus and his son (sic) Antiochus Epiphanes (3^{19}–4^{26}), the conquering power of reason is further represented as most brilliantly illustrated in the martyrdom of Eleazar (5–7) and of the seven brethren (8–14^{10}) and their mother (14^{11}–16^{25}). The writer accompanies his account of the martyrdom of these heroic defenders of the faith with frequent and copious remarks of a religious and edifying nature, and introduces occasionally philosophical reflexions (e.g. $5^{22ff.}$) which would have been more in place in the first part of his work. In 17–18^{2} the author sets down his final impressions regarding the character and significance of the martyrdoms described by him. The closing section (18^{3-23}) appears to be an appendix by a later hand, but the nature of it indicates that it must have been added at no great interval from the composition of the book itself. Fritzsche and Freudenthal regard the spurious addition as limited to 18^{6-19}.

4 Mac possesses no value as history. The writer merely appropriates certain incidents from 2 Mac 6^{18}–7^{42} by way of illustrating his fundamental proposition regarding the supremacy of pious reason. His delineation of the tortures to which the 'Maccabæan martyrs' were subjected is even more gruesomely realistic than that of 2 Mac, although the detailed description of the inhumanity of the persecutors serves, of course, to bring out more emphatically the steadfast patience of their victims. He may have had sources of information other than 2 Mac, but there is no evidence that he used as an authority the five books of Jason of Cyrene (2 Mac 2^{23}). While the work does not aim at being a history, it has nevertheless an importance of its own as a unique example of the way in which Jewish history was turned to account for didactic and homiletic purposes.

2. Language and Style.—The Greek of 4 Mac, although rather laboured, is not so involved or so rhetorical as that of 3 Mac. Owing to the uniformity of the style, which is clear, correct, and genuinely Greek, the work has more of real individuality about it than either 2 or 3 Mac. Lavish use is made of metaphor and declamation, yet the writer can deftly change his style to suit his subject. Considerable fondness is shown for words and expressions of a rare, novel, or poetical description. Frequent use is also made of prepositional compounds, e.g. ἐπιρωγολογεῖσθαι (2^{9}), ἀντιπολιτεύομαι (4^{1}), ἐξευμενίζειν (4^{11}); and compounds with πᾶν, e.g. πάνσοφος (1^{12}), πανγέωργος (1^{29}), πάνδεινος (3^{15}), πανάγιος (7^{4} 14^{7}). Short as it is, quite a number of words seem to be peculiar to the book, e.g. αὐτοδέσποτος (1^{1}), μονοφαγία (1^{27}), ἀρχιερᾶσθαι (4^{18}), ἀποξαίνειν (6^{6}), ἐμπυριστής (7^{11}), μισάρετος (11^{4}), κηρογονία (14^{19}), ἑπταμήτωρ (16^{24}). With the exception of Jerusalem (Ἱεροσόλυμα) and Eleazar (Ἐλεάζαρος), the proper names are written according to the Heb. form, although Hebraistic expressions scarcely occur (cf., however, 1^{12} δόξαν διδόναι). Only in a very few passages ($2^{5.\,19}$ 17^{19}) is use made of the LXX.

3. Authorship and Date.—Eusebius (HE III. x. 6) refers to our book under the title περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, and ascribes it to Josephus. In this he is followed by Jerome (de Viris Illustr. c. xiii., c. Pelag. ii. 6), Suidas (Lex. s.v. Ἰώσηπος), and others; and indeed for long it seems to have been regarded as settled that Josephus was the author. In the editions of his works it occupies the last place, and is inscribed Φλαβ. Ἰωσήπου εἰς Μακκαβαίους λόγος ἢ περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ. But it exists also in important Scripture MSS of the LXX, and both A and ℵ call it simply 'the fourth of Maccabees' (Μακκαβαίων δ'). Gregory of Nazianzus quotes from it without naming Josephus or any one as the author. Its ascription to the Jewish historian must either have been a pure guess, or the result of confusion between him and some other Ἰώσηπος, whom tradition named as its author, for the testimony of Eusebius is quite overborne by the internal evidence. The language and style are utterly different from those of Josephus; the latter was unacquainted with 2 Mac, while 4 Mac is almost wholly based upon it; the grossly unhistorical statements of $4^{15.\,26}$ 5^{1} $17^{23f.}$ are inexplicable on the hypothesis that the work was penned by Josephus; finally, there is about it a flavour of Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy, and an enthusiasm for the heroic, which we do not naturally associate with that writer.

While the exact date of the book cannot be determined, it seems certain that it must have been written after 2 Mac, from which it borrows, and before the destruction of Jerus., of which it makes no mention. Grimm would infer from the statement of 4^{1} that Onias was holding the priesthood for life (διὰ βίου) that the author wrote after the overthrow of the Hasmonæan dynasty, when the life-tenure had been abolished, and from the horror-stricken concern of the Egyptian Jews on hearing of the sufferings endured by the Maccabæan martyrs (14^{9}) that the former were themselves at the time exempt from persecution. This would point to a date prior to their experiences under Caligula (A.D. 40). Schürer (HJP II. iii. 246), on the other hand, accepts as the date of composition the first century after Christ.

4. Aim and Standpoint.—The aim of 4 Mac is by demonstrating the supremacy of pious reason to exhort the Jews steadfastly to adhere to the Mosaic law, and not allow themselves in any particular to depart from it (18^{1}), either through fear of sufferings or through the subtle attractions of Hellenistic culture. As an educated Jew acquainted with the exacting demands of philosophic paganism, the writer seeks to show his countrymen how to maintain their Judaism intact. Taunts about the fatuity of their ceremonial law were levelled at the Jews by the persecutor ($5^{6ff.}$), and doubtless by the philosopher as well; but our author reminds his co-religionists of the essential reasonableness of the law even in regard to ritual commands ($5^{25f.}$), and seeks to show that only through obedience to its precepts can the Stoic ideal of humanity be realized. In the concrete examples of endurance unto death furnished by the Maccabæan martyrs he sees the perfection of piety (12^{14} 15^{17}), and a conclusive proof that in virtue's cause the Hebrews alone are invincible (9^{18}).

The writer's own standpoint is formally influenced by Greek philosophy, especially by Stoicism, which placed the passions under the sovereignty of reason, so providing him with his central idea, as well as with the postulate of four cardinal virtues. In his division and description of the affections, however, he does not so much adopt the position of any of the current Greek philosophies as give to his own treatment a philosophic cast. And if he writes from the standpoint of Stoicism, he is none the less true to that of legal Judaism. Wisdom, of which the four cardinal virtues are forms (ἰδέαι), cannot be attained apart from the Mosaic law ($1^{16ff.}$). It is not reason as such, but pious reason (ὁ εὐσεβὴς λογισμός), i.e. reason regulating itself by the divine law ($1^{15ff.}$), that he exalts as ruler over the passions. So literal, indeed, is his conception of the Mosaic law, that some* on this account maintain the Palestinian origin of the book. His philosophy certainly resembles Pharisaism in its advocacy of rigorous legalism, and of carrying piety into every relation of life (18^{1}). In his doctrine of the resurrection, however, it is not the Pharisaic but the Alexandrian position that is reflected. The writer believes, not in a bodily resurrection confined to the Jews, but in the immortality of all souls, the pious entering into blessedness (9^{8} 17^{18}), and the wicked into torment (9^{9} 12^{12} etc.), upon the death of the body. It is also noticeable that he regards the sufferings of the martyrs as a vicarious atonement for the sins of the people (6^{29} 17^{22}), and that a Pelagianistic spirit underlies the book in so far as no account is taken of the influence of divine grace upon human reason.

5. MSS and Versions.—The Gr. text has come down (1) in some Scripture MSS, including A and ℵ; (2) in MSS of Josephus; and has been printed under both categories. The best recensions are those of Fritzsche in his edition of the Libri Apoc. Vet. Test. Græce, 1871, and Swete in the Camb. Septuagint, 1894, 2nd ed. 1899. There is an old Syriac version, published by Ceriani in his photo-lithographed facsimile of the Milan Peshiṭta manuscript of the OT (1876-83). An English translation by Cotton (The Five Books of Maccabees in English) was published at Oxford in 1832.

Another Fourth Book of Maccabees is mentioned by Sixtus Senensis (Bibliotheca Sancta, i. p. 39) as still extant in manuscript when he wrote (1566). He himself saw it at Lyons, in the library of Santes Pagninus, which soon afterwards perished by fire. It was written in Hebraistic Greek, and began with the words, 'After the murder of Simon, John his son became high priest in his stead.' Sixtus thinks it may have been a Greek translation of the 'chronicles' of the reign of John Hyrcanus referred to in 1 Mac 16^{24}; but, in view of the statement he makes as to its contents, it is more likely that the book was 'simply a reproduction of Josephus, the style being changed perhaps for a purpose' (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 14).

E. V MACCABEES.—This is the title given to an Arabic 'Book of Maccabees' printed in the Paris and London Polyglotts, the Arabic text being in both cases accompanied by the Latin translation of Gabriel Sionita. Cotton's English version is a literal rendering of the Latin. The book purports to be a history of the Jews from the time of Heliodorus (B.C. 186) to the last years of Herod

(B.C. 6–4?). It is merely a Hellenistic compilation, not always accurate, from 1 and 2 Mac and the writings of Josephus, and is in no sense an independent history. In ch. 12, the only passage which does not directly depend upon these works, the author shows himself singularly ill-informed with regard to certain well-known facts of Roman history. He evidently wrote after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 (cf. 9^5 21^{30} 22^9 53^8). In point of language the book is decidedly Hebraistic, even after being twice translated, although this does not prove that it was originally written in Hebrew. The religious standpoint of the compiler merely reflects that of his authorities.

There is also another so-called 'Fifth Book of Maccabees' in the great Ambrosian Peshiṭta, but it is nothing else than a translation of the sixth book of Josephus' de Bello Judaico.

LITERATURE.—The principal authorities upon points of literary and textual criticism have been named in the body of the article. Among older commentaries may be mentioned those of Drusius on 1 Mac, and of Grotius on 1, 2, and 3 Mac in Critici Sacri; and that of Michaelis on 1 Mac (Uebersetzung der 1 Macc.-B.'s mit Anmerk., Götting. u. Leipz. 1778). The most complete modern comm. is that of Grimm on 1, 2, 3, and 4 Mac in the Kurzgef. Exeget. Handb. series, 1853–57. Since that date there have appeared commentaries by Keil on 1 and 2 Mac, 1875; Bissell on 1, 2, and 3 Mac in Lange-Schaff's Commentary, 1880; Rawlinson on 1 and 2 Mac in the Speaker's Comm. 1888; Zöckler on 1, 2, and 3 Mac in his Die Apokryphen des Alten Testaments, 1891; Fairweather and Black on 1 Mac in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1897; Kautzsch on 1 and 3 Mac, and Kamphausen on 2 Mac in Die Apokr. u. Pseudepigr. des AT, 1898.

MACEDONIA (Μακεδονία = the land of the Μακεδόνες, who, themselves akin to the Doric branch of the Greeks, formed the core of a mixed nationality, to which Illyrian, Pæonian, and Thracian elements contributed along with numerous Greek colonies) was in antiquity the common name for a region in the centre of the Balkan peninsula, separated for the most part by natural boundaries of mountain-ranges from Thessaly on the south, Illyria on the west, Mœsia on the north, and Thrace on the east. It contained the river-basins of the Haliacmon (Vistritza), the Axius (Vardar), the Strymon (Struma), and the Nestus (Kara-su); and it presented along its Ægean shore the three prongs of the great Chalcidian peninsula between the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs (now named from Saloniki and Rendina). This region, with its mountainous interior rearing a hardy population, its well-watered and fertile plains, and its extensive fringe of seaboard encouraging colonization and commerce, obtained a political significance and exercised a paramount influence for two centuries over the fortunes of the ancient world, such as could hardly be expected from its earlier history or from its size and apparent resources. The steps of this development, the growth and unifying of its military power—the aggressive policy and gradual ascendency of Philip over the Greek republics—the supremacy of Alexander, whose world-empire reached from the Adriatic to the Indus—its partition after his early death among his leading generals, out of which sprang the Seleucid empire in Syria, the rule of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and a series of violent changes in the occupancy of the throne of the Macedonian motherland—and the final struggles, which, culminating in the battles of Cynoscephalæ (B.C. 197) and Pydna (B.C. 168), brought Macedonia under the power of Rome—hardly fall within the province of this article, except in so far as they helped to shape the Macedonia which confronts us as an Oriental power at the outset of the Maccabæan history, and as a Roman province in NT.

The history of the conflict with Epiphanes and his successors opens (1 Mac 1^{1-9}) with a striking description of the achievements of Alexander the Great, and of the division of his dominions upon his death. There (1^1) he is said to come forth from the land of Chittim (Χεττιείμ), and at 6^2 to have been the first reigning as king over the Greeks; while at 8^5, in the account of the power of the Romans whereof Judas had heard, there is mention of their having discomfited and overcome Philip (V.), and Perseus who is called king of the Chittim (Κιτιέων, see KITTIM). At 2 Mac 8^{20} the term Macedonians seems applied to the Syro-Macedonian warriors in the service of the Seleucid kings. On the application of the epithet to Haman in the LXX Ad. Est 16^{10}, and its use in 16^{14}, see HAMAN.

The Macedonia of NT is the Roman province of that name. For a time after the Roman victory at Pydna (B.C. 168) it was allowed to retain some measure of independence and self-government; but its unity was broken up. It was divided into four districts, in which republican federative leagues were modelled on the system of the Greek confederacies. The first embraced the region between the Strymon and Nestus; the second, that between the Strymon and Axius with the Chalcidian peninsula; the third, that from the Axius to the Thessalian Peneius; and the fourth, the mountain lands towards the north-west. Their capitals were, respectively, Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella, and Pelagonia. [For details of the arrangement, see Liv. xlv. 29, 32; Mommsen, Hist. of Rome, ii. p. 508 f.]. But in B.C. 146 dependence was exchanged for subjection; the country received a definitive provincial organization; and from that date began the Macedonian era, henceforth used on inscriptions and coins. The new province included portions of Illyria and Thessaly, and Thessalonica became the headquarters of the Roman government, although it and some other towns retained local autonomy. It was administered by a proprætor with the title of proconsul; and there was usually associated with it the province of Achaia or Greece, which was administered by a legate [on the relation of Greece as a Roman province to Macedonia, see Mommsen, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 271, note]. On several occasions in NT we find them mentioned together; but Macedonia takes precedence (Ac 19^{21}, Ro 15^{26}, 2 Co 9^2, 1 Th $1^{7.8}$). It was traversed by the great Roman military road, the Via Egnatia, and afforded a fruitful soil for the missionary labours of St. Paul,* who amidst no small opposition and with various success sowed the seeds of the gospel, and founded Churches in some of its chief towns, Philippi, Thessalonica, Berœa (Ac 16^8–17^{15}), and subsequently revisited them on his way to and from Greece (Ac 19^{21} 20^{1-4}), when several of his Macedonian converts accompanied him to Troas (Ac 20^5). His warm interest in the Churches which he had planted bore fruit in the Epistles addressed to Thessalonica and Philippi; and their readiness to receive the word, to love the brethren, and to minister to his personal needs, are heartily acknowledged and commended (1 Th $1^{3.8}$ 3^6 4^9, 2 Th $1^{3.4}$, Ph $4^{10.15.16}$).

MACHAERUS (Μαχαιροῦς, Grecized from מְכָוִור, Tamid iii. 8, sometimes מכבא and מכבר) is confidently identified (originally by Seetzen, Reisen durch Syrien, ii. 330, iv. 378) with Mkawr (but see Jastrow, s.v.), an extensive collection of ruins on the spur of a hill overlooking the Dead Sea from the east. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Wars, VII. vi. 2), but was taken from his grandson by Gabinius and demolished (ib. I. viii. 5; Ant. XIV. v. 4). Herod the Great fortified it (Jos. Wars, VII. vi. 1, 2), and used it as one of his principal residences. On his death it became the property of Antipas, being situated in his tetrarchy. When Antipas divorced his wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, she desired to be sent to Machaerus, which is inconsistently described (Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 1) as on the borders of the dominions of the two kings, and as subject to Aretas. The inscriptions do not reveal the exact frontier at the time; but there is no evidence in support of the latter statement of Josephus. He is probably in error, especially as the context implies that the queen chose her place of retreat with a view to avail herself of its proximity to her father's dominions for the purpose of escape. Shortly afterwards John the Baptist was imprisoned and put to death in the dungeons of Machaerus (ib. XVIII. v. 2; Mk 6^{21} is not against this, as Keim, Jesus of Nazara, iv. 218, note 1, shows). The fortress, of whose importance Pliny speaks (Hist. Nat. v. 16, 72), was garrisoned by the Romans until A.D. 66 (Jos. Wars, II. xviii. 6), when they withdrew to avoid its investment. But six years later it was recovered (ib. VII. vi. 4), and finally demolished by Lucilius Bassus.

* Ramsay (St. Paul the Trav. p. 203) suggests that the 'man of Macedonia' who was seen by Paul in a vision (Ac 16^9) is to be identified with Luke himself, who meets the apostle at Troas.

MACHBANNAI (מַכְבַּנַּי; B Μελχαβανναί, A Μαχαβαναί).—A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{13}.

MACHBENA (מַכְבֵּנָה, van d. H. מַכְבֵּנָא; B Μαχαβηνά, A Μαχαμηνά, Luc. Μαχβανά).—Named in the genealogical list of Judah (see GENEALOGY, IV. 34) as the 'son' of Sheva, 1 Ch 2^{49}. It is clear that a place and not a person is intended. Machbena is probably the same as Cabbon (כַּבּוֹן) of Jos 15^{40}, which may perhaps be identified with el-Kubeibeh, situated about 3 miles south of Beit Jibrin (see Dillm. on Jos 15^{40}). J. A. SELBIE.

MACHI (מָכִי [derivation and meaning uncertain: if the vocalization implied in Μακχί is correct, the word comes from the Hiph. of נכה, and means 'striking']; LXX Μακχί, Μαχί, Μακοσί: F has the more familiar form Μαχείρ, in which it agrees with the Peshiṭta ܡܟܝܪ).—The name occurs only once, in Nu 13^{15}, where P mentions Machi as the father of Geuel, who acted on behalf of the tribe of Gad as one of the twelve men sent to spy out the land of Canaan. J. TAYLOR.

MACHIR (מָכִיר).—1. Son of Manasseh (the son of Joseph), Gn 50^{23},—the eldest son, according to J (Jos 17^{1b-2}), the only son, according to P (Nu 26^{29}). Machir has, however, really a tribal significance: he, or his 'sons,' represent the leading branch of the tribe of Manasseh,—usually that warlike part of the tribe (Jos 17^{1b} 'for he was a man of war, and had Gilead and Bashan') which, after Moses had assigned inheritances on the E. of Jordan to Reuben and Gad (Nu 32), went and took possession of (the N. half of) Gilead (v.^{39}; cf. v.^{40}, Dt 3^{15}), to which other passages add Bashan (N. and N.E. of Gilead) as well (Jos 13^{31} 17^{1b}): in Deborah's song, however (Jg 5^{14} 'from Machir came down commanders' [Moore, 'truncheon-bearers'; Heb. מְחֹקְקִים]), it seems that Machir must denote that part of Manasseh which was settled on the W. of Jordan (so practically all commentators). On account, partly, of this localization of Machir in Deborah's time W. of Jordan, it has been supposed by many modern scholars that the conquest of Gilead was in reality effected, not at the time when Israel first invaded the lands E. of Jordan in the days of Moses, but subsequently, later even than the time of Deborah, by Manassites invading it from W. Palestine (cf. MANASSEH). From the connexion subsisting between Machir and Gilead, he is habitually spoken of as the 'father'* of Gilead, Jos 17^1 אבי הגלעד (where the art. shows distinctly that 'Gilead' is the name of a locality), 1 Ch $2^{21.23}$ 7^{14} (cf. Nu 26^{29} P, where it is said that Machir 'begat' Gilead); and, conversely, Gilead is called the 'son' of Machir, Nu 27^1 36^1, Jos 17^3 (all P), 1 Ch 7^{17} (cf. GILEAD 1, above, vol. ii. p. 174). In Nu 26^{29} (P) mention is made of the family of the Machirites, who traced their descent from 'Machir.' See, further, MANASSEH, where the genealogies in which Machir is included are printed in tabular form, and where the inferences which seem to be suggested by the differences between them are more fully stated.

2. See next article. S. R. DRIVER.

MACHIR (מָכִיר, Μαχείρ).—The son of Ammiel, described as living at Lo-debar, on the E. of Jordan. The site of this spot is uncertain, but it probably lay on the N. border of Gilead, and is to be identified with Lidebir (Jos 13^{26} RVm). We gather from the biblical narrative that Machir, who was evidently a wealthy and powerful landowner, had remained faithful to the house of Saul during the struggle between David and Ishbaal (or Ishbosheth), and after the latter's death had extended his protection to Meribbaal (or Mephibosheth), the lame son of Jonathan, until assured of the friendly intentions of the reigning monarch (2 S $9^{1ff.}$). His friendly support doubtless contributed in no small measure to Meribbaal's escape from the subsequent destruction of his father's house at the hands of the Gibeonites (21^{1-14}), an event which chronologically must have preceded $9^{1f.}$. At a later date Machir, together with Barzillai of Gilead, and Shobi, an Ammonite prince, came to the assistance of David and his army at Mahanaim when they were pursued by the rebellious Absalom, and furnished them with ample supplies of food and drink (17^{27-29}). According to Josephus (Ant. VII. ix. 8), Machir was the principal man of the country of Gilead.

J. F. STENNING.

MACHNADEBAI (מַכְנַדְבַי; B Μαχαδναβού, Μαχναδααβού, ℵ Ἀχαδναβού, Luc. καὶ Ναδαβού).—One of the sons of Bani, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{40}. G. Buchanan Gray (Expos. Times, Feb. 1899, p. 232 f.), partly upon the strength of the above readings in B and ℵ, argues that the latter element in the word is the divine name Nebo. He thus obtains the form מכדנבו, which he would further change (ד and ר being often confused) into מכרנבו = 'possession of Nebo.' In the same article, which is well worthy of study, Mr. Gray argues that the same species of compound is found in the name Barnabas, which would thus be = 'son of Nebo.'

J. A. SELBIE.

MACHPELAH (הַמַּכְפֵּלָה, always with the article).—The name of the spot where was the piece of ground and cave bought by Abraham for a burying-place. The name is not met with outside Genesis; but though the meaning is uncertain, authorities generally concur in one rendering. Gesenius (Lex.) gives 'a doubling.' The LXX, Vulgate, Targum of Onkelos, and Pseudo-Jonathan, render it 'double.' The place is mentioned twice (Gn 23^9 25^9) as 'the cave of Machpelah' (מְעָרַת הַמּ׳), once (23^{19}) as the 'cave of the field of Machpelah' (מְעָרַת שְׂדֵה הַמּ׳), once (50^{13}) as 'the field of Machpelah' (שְׂדֵה הַמּ׳), once (49^{30}) as 'the cave which is in the field of Machpelah' (הַמְּעָרָה אֲשֶׁר בִּשְׂדֵה הַמּ׳), and once (23^{17}) as 'the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah' (שְׂדֵה עֶפְרוֹן אֲשֶׁר בַּמּ׳). In this latter case the LXX render 'Machpelah' as the 'double cave,' and in Gn 49^{30} render 'in the cave which is in the field of Machpelah' by ἐν τῷ σπηλαίῳ τῷ διπλῷ, thus leaving out 'field'; this takes place again in Gn 50^{13}. The Syriac in Gn 50^{13}, on the other hand, leaves out 'cave,' and renders the passage as the 'double field.' It may be noted that all the passages in Genesis belong to P.

---

* Cf., on the expression, above, vol. ii. p. 535ᵃ, n. ‡.

Stanley (Lectures on the Jewish Church, p. 488) considers the name 'the Machpelah' to have belonged to the whole district or property, though applied sometimes to the cave and sometimes to the field, and that the ancient versions used it almost always as if applied to the cave. The matter is of some interest, because the traditional cave is supposed to be in two parts. Dillmann on Genesis says, 'We learn from him [A, i.e. P] that [Machpelah] was the name of a locality in Hebron in which lay Ephron's land with the cave in it. It and Ephron's field lay on the front side, i.e. east of Mamre. Mamre was therefore west of it.'

'So Abraham acquired possession of the piece of land in Machpelah, which lies before Mamre, with the cave in it, and all the trees on it' (Gn 23$^{17f.}$). This transaction accentuates the fact that Abraham was a stranger and a sojourner in the land promised to his seed, and that the burying-place he bought in Machpelah was his sole landed possession in the land of Canaan. Abraham at this time was dwelling at the oak of Mamre, to the west of Machpelah. In this cave, that is, in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, they buried Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah (Gn 49^{30} 50^{13}).

There is nothing further in the Bible concerning the burying-place of the patriarchs, except that in the speech of St. Stephen (Ac 7^{16}), by a singular variation, the tomb at Shechem is substituted for that at Hebron. It is not mentioned in the visit of the spies to Hebron, in Caleb's conquest, or in David's reign there (Nu 13, Jos 15^{13}, 2 S 5^{5}). The only possible allusion is in the account of Absalom's vow of a pilgrimage to Hebron when absent in Geshur (2 S 15^{7}). During the struggles of the Maccabees many battles were fought around Hebron, which had become one of the northern towns of Idumæa, and was taken and burnt by Judas Maccabæus; but no mention is made of the burying-place of the patriarch, or of the monuments erected there (1 Mac 5^{65}).

The priests at the temple, as they looked for break of day, used often to say, 'The face of all the sky is bright even unto Hebron' (Talm. Joma, ch. 3). Not a few believed that Adam was buried there in like manner [as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their wives]. 'Adam said, After my death they will come, perhaps, and, taking my bones, will worship them; but I will hide my coffin very deep in the earth, in a cave within a cave. It is therefore called the Cave, Macpelah, or the doubled Cave,' Juchasin, fol. 63. 1 (Lightfoot, ii. 47). A tradition concerning the death of Esau is noticed in the Talmud (Sota i. 13). A quarrel occurred at the burial of Jacob, between his sons and Esau, concerning their right to sepulture in the cave. Huskin, son of Dan, cut off Esau's head, and left it in the cave, his body being buried elsewhere. Jelal ed-Dîn repeats this story, and the grave of Esau is still shown at Sia'îr, north of Hebron (PEFSt, 1882, 208). Josephus (Ant. I. xiv. 1) tells us of the purchase of the field of Ephron at Hebron by Abraham, and that 'both Abraham and his descendants built themselves tombs (μνημεῖα) in that place' (Ant. I. xxii. 1). In speaking of the death of Isaac he relates his burial at Hebron, 'where they had a monument (μνημεῖον) belonging to them from their forefathers.' Josephus states (BJ IV. ix. 7) that 'Abraham had a habitation at Hebron, whose monuments (μνημεῖα) are to this very time shown in this small city: the fabric of which monuments is of the most excellent marble, and wrought after the most excellent manner.' He makes Hebron, and not Gibeon, the site of the 'high place' where Solomon prayed for wisdom (2 Ch 1^{3}; Ant. VIII. ii. 1); and Jerome appears to suggest (Qu. Heb. on 2 S 15^{7}) that the ancient sanctuary of J″ there was at the ancient sepulchres of the patriarchs. But this altar, built by Abraham at Hebron (Gn 13^{18}), had no connexion with the cave of Machpelah.

The connexion of Adam and Esau (Edom) with Hebron is very interesting, and it is difficult to arrive at any conclusion as to the period when this view first arose. Perhaps it was in later times, when Idumæa extended over the Negeb or South country. Originally the land of Esau (or Edom) was Mount Seir ('rough' or 'hairy'=Esau, with a different pointing), which lay to the east of the Arabah and east and south of Moab (Gn 27^{11}; Ant. I. xviii. 1). In process of time, however, when the power of the Edomites increased, the territory west extended to the south of Palestine, so that Josephus (Ant. V. i. 22) describes it as taking in the lot of Simeon, and in 1 Mac it includes even the hills north of Hebron, and Hebron itself was an Idumæan city (1 Mac 5^{65}).

Isaac was buried at Hebron by his sons Esau and Jacob (Gn 35^{29}), and after this (?; according to 32^{4} [J] Esau was already resident in Seir when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia) Esau is said to have left the land of Canaan and 'dwelt in Mount Seir: Esau is Edom' (Gn 36^{6}; both P).

Adam and Eve are traditionally (by Moslems) supposed to have been buried at Mecca, and have no Makâms in Palestine. On expulsion from Paradise, however, they are supposed to have hidden themselves in, or near, a spring at Hebron, which is now called 'Ain el-Judeidah. Here, also, the red earth from which Adam was said by the Jews to have been formed, is shown by the Moslems. This tradition is mentioned by several writers in the time of the Crusaders, and may be of Christian origin (SWP, S. Pal. 261).

Hebron is also called the City of Arba (Kiriath-arba), 'the greatest man among the Anakim' (Jos 14^{15}), which by later writers was fancifully interpreted as the 'city of four.' Thus a fourth patriarch was required in addition to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the substitution of Adam for Edom (Esau) may be suggested as the consequence. The view taken by the Jewish writers (from the words of Jos 14^{15}) (Bereshith rabba, quoted by Beer, Leben Abrahams, 189) is that the 'city of four' refers to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam, who are buried there. See KIRIATH-ARBA. Jerome (Onomast. p. 120, Ep. Paul. 11) also explains that the 'city of four' refers to the four above mentioned.

The statements of the various historians concerning the sepulchres of the patriarchs are to be found collected together in Archives de l'Orient Latin, ii. (1884), 411, and in Palestine under the Moslems (1890), 318. The following are the more important. It will be noted that there is no direct allusion to the present Ḥaram enclosure until the 12th cent., and as its construction is considered to be at least as early as the time of Herod the Great, it seems doubtful whether it was ever visited by Christians until the time of the Crusades, the House of Abraham, about two miles north of Hebron, being then probably the Christian traditional site of the tombs of the patriarchs. In the 4th cent. the sepulchres of the patriarchs are spoken of as existing at Hebron, built of marble, and of elegant workmanship, and the Basilica of Constantine close to the great enclosure is called 'Abraham's House' (Onomast. art. 'Arboch'). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) describes the square enclosure within which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with their wives, were buried, as built of stones of great beauty. Antoninus Martyr (c. A.D. 600) adds Joseph to the three patriarchs, and says that a Basilica was built there 'in quadriporticus' with an interior court open to the sky, in which the Jews and Christians entered from different sides, burning incense as they advanced. Arculf (c. A.D. 698) speaks of the double cave and the monuments of the four patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam, enclosed by a low square wall; the tomb of Adam lies not far from the others, and the three women, Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah, have smaller monuments, and were buried in the earth. The hill of Mamre is a mile from these monuments, with a church and a stump of the oak of Mamre. Mukaddasi (c. A.D. 985) speaks of the strong fortress round the tombs of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their wives, built of great squared stones, the work of Jinns (i.e. of people before the Moslems: the Moslems often attribute old buildings of superior construction to Jinns). The Moslem name at the present day for the enclosure is 'The wall of Solomon.' Saewulf (A.D. 1102) and the Abbot Daniel (1106) are the first Christians who speak of the tombs being surrounded by a very strong castle or high wall. The caves are said to have been discovered and opened in A.D. 1119 (Archives de l'Orient Latin, ii. 411). John of Wurzburg (A.D. 1100), Theodoricus (A.D. 1172), Jacques de Vitry (A.D. 1220), Burchardt (A.D. 1230), speak of the fourth tomb being that of Adam, while Saewulf and Daniel make the fourth the tomb of Joseph.

Benjamin of Tudela (1163) states of Hebron: 'Here is the large place of worship called St. Abraham, which during the time of the Mohammedans was a synagogue. The Gentiles have erected six sepulchres in this place, which they pretend to be those of Abraham and Sarah, of Isaac and Rebekah, and of Jacob and Leah; the pilgrims are told that they are the sepulchres of the fathers, and money is extorted from them. But if any Jew come, who gives an additional fee to the keeper of the cave, an iron door is opened, which dates from the time of our forefathers who rest in peace, and with a burning candle in his hand the visitor descends into the first cave, which is empty, traverses a second in the same state, and at last reaches a third, which contains six sepulchres, those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah, one opposite the other.' Ali of Herat, writing in 1173 (PEFSt, 1897, p. 59), fifteen years before Hebron was retaken by Saladin, states that he was informed that in the year 1119, in the reign of Baldwin II., a certain part over the cave of Abraham had given way and was repaired by the Franks from below. Rabbi Samuel bar Simson in 1210 claims to have visited the cave. 'We descended by 24 steps, very narrow, and without means of turning to the right hand or the left. We saw there the place of the Holy House, and we noticed these monuments. This place has been erected 600 years (i.e. about A.D. 600), it is near the cavern' (PEFSt, 1882, p. 212). Sir John Maundeville (1322, Early Travels in Pal. p. 61) says: 'In Hebron are all the sepulchres of the patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and their wives, Eve, Sarah, Rebekah, and Leah—they suffer no Christian to enter that place except by special grace of the Sultan—and they call that place where they lie Double Spelunk, Double Cave, or Double Ditch, because the one lies above the other.' (The tomb of Joseph had already been added here by the Moslems).

Nasir-I-Khussan (A.D. 1047, Diary of a Journey through Syria and Palestine), after describing the tombs of the patriarchs, states, 'It is said that in early times the sanctuary (at Hebron) had no door into it, and hence that no one could come nearer to (the tombs) than the outer porch ('iwân), whence from outside they performed their visitation. When, however, the (Fatemeh Khalif) Mahdi came to the throne of Egypt (A.D. 918) he gave orders that a door should be opened (into the sanctuary). The entrance door of the sanctuary is in the middle of the northern wall, and is four ells high from the ground. [Note.—This door is usually now said, at the present day, to be on the eastern side: it is actually north-east]. On either side of it are stone steps, one staircase for going up and one for coming down, and the gateway is closed by a small door.'

Jelal ed-Dîn (A.D. 1470) says that the Moslems destroyed the Christian church in the Ḥaram enclosure when Saladin took Hebron; this destruction may have been only partial, as the church still exists. This author's writings are not considered as reliable as those of Mijr ed-Dîn.

Mijr ed-Din (A.D. 1495) speaks of the Mosque of Hebron as the work of the Greeks (Rûm), by which term he may mean the Christians, i.e. the Crusaders (see BRP ii. 78). He gives an account of the 'invention' of the Tomb of Joseph, outside the Ḥaram enclosure, opposite the Tomb of Jacob, in A.D. 908–932, and states that the doorway through the west Ḥaram wall between the two tombs was pierced A.D. 1394 by Yaghmuri, governor of Hebron. Makrisi (followed by Mijr ed-Dîn) relates that a poor idiot boy, having fallen through the hole existing in the floor of the mosque leading down into the cave, some servants descended into the cave and rescued him. They saw a stone staircase of 18 steps which led to the Minbar.

David the Reubenite, a Jew (A.D. 1523, PEFSt, 1897, p. 47), visited the Ḥaram area at Hebron, and, on being shown the cenotaphs of the patriarchs, said, 'These are not true; the truth is that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are in the cave under ground; and I told them to show me the cave. So I went with them, and they showed me the opening of the door of the cave in the mouth of the pit; and they let down the lamp into the pit by a rope, and from the mouth of the pit I saw the opening of the door about the height of a man, and I was convinced that it was under the cave. Then I said, This is not the opening to the cave, there is another opening; and they answered me, Yes, in ancient times the opening of the cave was in the middle of the Great Church, in which is a cenotaph of Isaac.' They showed him this opening, which was shut with large stones and lead; and they read to him a book in which it was stated that a certain king (the 2nd from Mohammed), after the Moslems had taken the sanctuary from the Christians, had built up the opening to the cave.

Jichus ha-Aboth (1537, a tract) describes the Ḥaram area: 'An admirable and magnificent edifice, attributed to king David on whom be peace. Near the door is a little window in the wall; they pretend that it extends to the cavern: it is here that the Jews pray, as they are not allowed to go into the interior' (PEFSt, 1882, p. 212).

The only Europeans who had visited the Ḥaram enclosure during this century before 1867 were the Spaniard Badia (Ali Bey), travelling as a Moslem (1807); Giovanni Finati, the Italian servant of Mr. Bankes (1816); and the servant of Mr. Munro (1833). Ali Bey is said to have entered the cave through an iron door in the north side of the Ḥaram at the bottom of the steps; but this was only the popular account in Hebron in 1867, and cannot be relied on.

In 1834 Ibrahim Pasha was let down into the cavern from the mosque, but was quickly brought up again, he being suddenly smitten with the impropriety of looking on another man's wife. In 1862 the cenotaphs of the patriarchs were visited by the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Dean Stanley (see a full account in Lectures on the Jewish Church, p. 483 ff.). In 1864 they were visited by Mr. James Fergusson, who gives additional information in Appendix J, 'The Holy Sepulchre.' In 1867 the present writer was shown the iron door which is said to lead into the caves. It is situated on a level with the street at the bottom of the steps leading up to the mosque at Jâwalîyeh, at the north-west entrance to the Ḥaram. It probably leads to the tomb of Joseph outside the Ḥaram. This door, the guardians of the mosque stated, had not been opened for 600 years (Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 41). In 1882 they were visited by Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, Canon Dalton, Sir Charles Wilson, and Captain Conder, and complete information is given about everything except the cave itself (SWP iii. 305).

The space containing the traditional caves of Machpelah is enclosed by a magnificent quadrangle of masonry 197 ft. in length and 111 ft. in width, measured externally, called the Ḥaram. The length lies N.W. and S.E., the breadth lies N.E. and S.W. The walls are of one class of masonry throughout, as in the original construction. The stone is of grey limestone, very hard, and akin to marble. The whole character of the masonry is similar to that of the lower portion of the Ḥaram wall at 'the Wailing place,' Jerusalem. The courses of stone average 3 ft. 7 in. in height, the longest stone visible being 24 ft. 8 in. in length. There is a slight batter in the walls; that is to say, each course stands back about ½ in. from the course below, as at the Wailing place, Jerusalem.

At the height of about 15 ft. (i.e. level with the floor of the mosque or church within) portions of the wall 7 ft. wide are set back about 10 in. by means of a batter, leaving 16 pilasters on the longer faces and 8 on the shorter face. These pilasters are 3 ft. 9 in. wide each; the angle pilasters are each 9 ft. 6 in. wide—the space between the pilasters being 7 ft. This wall, with pilasters, is continued up for about 25 ft., making a height of 40 ft. from the ground on the western side and 25 ft. above the pavement within. The wall and pilasters have a simple projecting cap or coping at the top. These pilasters are similar to two at the N.W. angle of the Ḥaram wall, Jerusalem, which are 4 ft. 6 in. wide, with an interval of 6 ft. and set back of 8 in. The thickness of the Ḥaram wall of Hebron is 8 ft. 6 in., counting from the intervals, or 9 ft. 4 in. from the face of the pilasters. On the top of this old masonry, which is all in situ, is an Arabic wall of recent date.

From the west on the north and south of the enclosure (along the shorter faces) steps run up to the level of the floor within, and a passage at this level runs round the eastern and longer face. This passage leads to the mosque Jâwalîyeh, situated immediately N.E. of the Ḥaram. There was originally no opening on the eastern face, but a doorway at a distance of 93 ft. 7 in. from the south-east angle has been knocked through the Ḥaram wall. So that the passage on the eastern face now leads on one side to the Jâwalîyeh mosque, and on the other side to the interior of the Ḥaram, 15 ft. above the roadway to the west.

There is no positive information as to what there is below the level of the passage to the east of the Ḥaram, but the general impression was that the rocky surface rises to the east, the Ḥaram wall on the eastern side being built on the rock or at the level of the passage. Dr. A. Paterson, in a recent communication to the present writer, entirely confirms this view.

Conder's account, however (PEFSt, 1881, p. 267), seems to settle this question. 'We visited the eastern side of the enclosure, and found ourselves on the housetops almost level with the cornice of the old wall. We here found a mosque, called el-Jâwalîyeh, with a large dome. There is also a third entrance to the enclosure on this side, and the old wall appears to be almost as high here as on the west, although the mountain called el-Jâ'abireh rises very suddenly behind the Ḥaram on the east. It would appear, therefore, that the rock beneath the Ḥaram platform, in which the great cave is said to exist, must be a detached knoll; since on all sides there is lower ground, and a retaining wall 40 ft. high' (PEFSt, 1881, p. 267). But Robinson (BRP ii. 76) says, 'The buildings stand on the slope of the eastern hill; the rocks having been excavated along the upper side, in order to lay the foundations.' Canon Dalton (PEFSt, 1882, note[1], p. 201) suggests that a portion of the interior of the Ḥaram probably represented originally 'the field of Mamre before the cave,' and was then on a level with the exterior.

When the level was artificially, and probably gradually (with débris of Byzantine church, etc.) raised 15 ft., the present approaches round the exterior of the Ḥaram, and at a higher level, were necessitated, and are entirely Moslem. As there is no ancient gateway through the Ḥaram wall above the level of the floor inside, it is apparent that all that is to be seen inside above this level is of a later date than the Ḥaram enclosure.

It has been mentioned that the walls of this enclosure are precisely of the same appearance as the wall of the Jews' Wailing place at the Ḥaram of Jerusalem, and probably of the same date. This unfortunately gives no clue to the date, as views differ as to the age of 'the Wailing place,' between the time of Solomon and king Herod. Wilson and Conder without hesitation consider the wall to be Herodian; de Vogüé and Fergusson appear to have the same view; on the other hand, Grove, Ritter, Stanley, Robinson, and the present writer, consider these walls to be pre-Herodian.

The interior of the Ḥaram enclosure (above the level of 15 ft. above the roadway) is occupied by buildings of Christian and Moslem construction, nothing in it being earlier than the 12th cent. except the Minbar or pulpit (completed A.D. 1091), and brought by Saladin from Ascalon.

The southern portion of the enclosure is taken up by a mosque (formerly a church), with length of aisles 70 ft. and breadth across aisles 93 ft. The central aisle is 35 ft. wide, and the two side aisles 30 ft. wide each. The length (70 ft.) is broken up into three bays of unequal space; that to the south is 15 ft. wide, and contains the Miḥrab and Minbar. The central bay is 30 ft. wide, and contains the cenotaphs of Isaac and Rebekah. The north bay is 25 ft. wide, and contains the Mehala or reading-desk. The church is Gothic, closely resembling the Crusading churches of Palestine, and the four pillars supporting the roof are clustered, 12 shafts being carried up the clustering walls and supporting ribbed groins; in this respect it resembles the Church of St. John at Samaria, dating between A.D. 1150 and 1180. The capitals resemble those of the Church of Bîreh, completed A.D. 1146, and the general style resembles the Church of St. John at Gaza, dating about A.D. 1152. Conder considers that the building of this church may be attributed to the latter half of the 12th cent., probably about the year A.D. 1167, when the town became a bishopric. Fergusson's view was that this church most probably was not erected before 1167 nor later than 1262, more nearly approaching the former than the latter period.

All the other buildings in the interior of the enclosure are of Moslem construction, and are attributed to the 14th cent. The Arab historians Makresi and Mijr ed-Dîn state that they were erected in A.H. 732 (A.D. 1331) by the Mameluk Sultan Muhammed Ibn Kelawun. Beyond the church to the north is a porch or narthex, which includes two octagonal chapels, containing the cenotaphs of Abraham and Sarah.

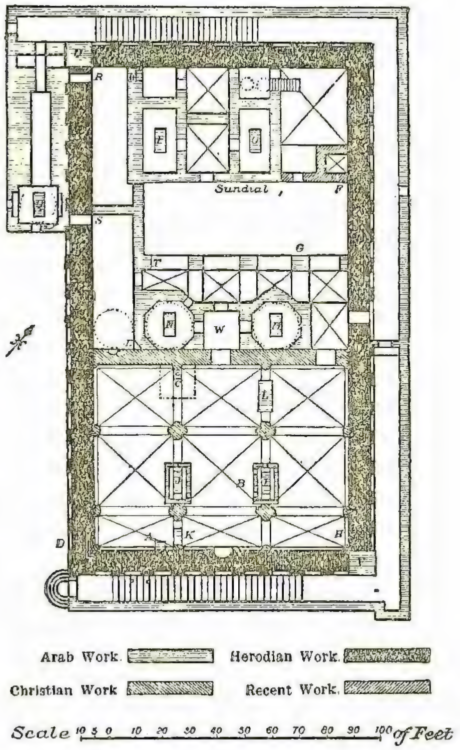
The porch appears to be of later date than the chapels, and there is an inscription on it stating that it was restored in A.H. 1172 (A.D. 1755). Beyond the porch is an open courtyard with a sundial, and beyond this courtyard are chambers occupying the northern portion of the enclosure, and containing the cenotaphs of Jacob and Leah.

On the outside of the Ḥaram enclosure, and adjoining it to the north-west, is a Moslem building, containing the cenotaph of Joseph. According to Mijr ed-Dîn, it was discovered on the traditional site by Khalanji during the reign of the Khalif al-Muḳtadir (A.D. 908–932), and a dome subsequently built over the spot. He speaks of the walls of the Ḥaram as the walls of Solomon's enclosure. He further states that one of the guardians of Hebron (Jaghmuri), A.D. 1394, pierced a gate in the western wall of Solomon's enclosure, opposite to the tomb of Joseph.

The outer gates, together with the two flights of steps and passages round the exterior of the Ḥaram, are attributed to the 14th cent., and have the character of the best Arab work; this, however, must have been a reconstruction, as they would have been required, and were probably constructed when the Fatemite Khalif Mahdi caused the door to be pierced through the east wall of the Ḥaram enclosure, A.D. 918 (Diary of a Journey through Syria and Palestine, A.D. 1047). It was apparently at this time that the Moslems first used the interior of the Ḥaram area as a mosque or sanctuary.

The cave of Machpelah is the one ancient burying-place which has been handed down with certainty as a genuine site, and the great interest which gathers round it is enhanced by its being the earliest burying-place of the Hebrew race in the Promised Land, and by the impenetrable mystery in which the sanctuary has been involved. This, as Stanley suggests, is a living witness to the unbroken local veneration with which the three religions of Jews, Christians, and Moslems have honoured the great patriarch. But it is to the cave and not to the monuments or building that the great interest attaches, and about which so little has been known even with the researches in modern times. Even now it is uncertain whether the chamber known to be under the floor of the church in the Ḥaram area is of masonry or cut in the rock, and what its extent may be. The following is a brief summary of what is known at present on the subject.

Within the church, adjoining its northern wall, in a line between the tombs of Abraham and Isaac, is a perforated stone (at point E on plan) which rises above the floor of the church. The perforation is a circular hole, a little more than 12 in. in diameter, leading by a shaft into a chamber below, the bottom of which is about level with the roadway outside to west. The chamber (as seen by the light of a lamp lowered down) seems to be square, about 12 ft. either way, with vertical walls covered with plaster. Towards the south-east a square-headed doorway can be seen in one of the chamber walls. The plaster on the walls prevents it being ascertained whether they are of rock or masonry, but the mouth appears to be in part at least of rock, like that of a cave or cistern, while in the south-east corner a piece of rock appears to project across the angle of the chamber. The floor of this chamber is thickly strewed (1882) with sheets of paper (Moslem supplications), and it has been suggested that as they do not seem to be old, and that as the whitewash on the walls of the chamber is white, clean, and apparently of no great age, it may be inferred that the chamber, whence there is an entrance to the cave, is periodically visited and cleaned by the guardians of the mosque, and that entrance can be obtained by removing the perforated stone from the pavement. The sheikh of the mosque describes the cave as being double, in accordance with the tradition.



ḤARAM ENCLOSURE, HEBRON.
(By kind permission of P.E. Fund).

There are two other points where there are supposed entrances to the cave as shown by the sheikh of the mosque in the royal visit of 1882. At A (on plan), at the south end of the church close to the pulpit, where there are stone slabs cased with iron, and a small cupola supported on four slender pillars: this entrance is said to lead to the western cave, where, or in the inner cave, the actual tombs of the patriarchs are reputed to exist. At B (on plan), near the tomb of Rebekah, is the supposed entrance to the eastern cave. It is closed with flagging, forming the floor of the church. From these two points A and B it is supposed that staircases lead down into the cave, but practically only the entrance at C (as described) is known for a fact. At the point D, outside the Ḥaram wall, close to the steps of the southern entrance gateway, there is a hole through the lowest course of the masonry, on a level with the street. It extends some distance, and is said to admit of the whole length of a lance being passed through the wall, and probably communicates with the western cave. Through this Jews were allowed to look and to stand and pray, as they were not permitted to enter the Ḥaram enclosure.

All those who have written on the subject appear to concur in supposing that the double cave did not extend beyond the limits of the floor of the church, and that there is no cavity, but made earth, under the floor of the inner court, where are the cenotaphs of Abraham, Sarah, Jacob, and Leah, and that there was originally an entrance on a level with the street to the west, and that the old portal is concealed by the buildings known as Joseph's tomb. Some also think that there was a Byzantine church in the interior before the arrival of the Moslems.

There is another view, however, that may be taken of the matter, viz. :—That originally there was no doorway or entrance to this massive enclosure, and that the first opening through the wall was made by the Moslems in the 10th cent. The Israelites in early days had no reverence for sacred graves or tombs, and the general feeling of the people appears to have been averse to memorials to the dead. There is nothing known of the tombs of Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Elisha, etc., and even the site of the tombs of the kings is lost. Abraham's desire was to 'let me bury my dead out of my sight.' But the cave of Machpelah, being the resting-place of the patriarchs in a well-known position, could not be hidden away : it may seem, then, that the massive wall built round the cave without any entrance or means of ingress was the most effectual method that could be adopted to prevent the place being used as a sanctuary. It is suggested that this continued until the Moslem occupation in the 7th cent., and that as they developed their desire for Makâms and sacred places, they eventually (in A.D. 918) pierced through the wall and built in the interior, and also opened a door into the cave from the north-west corner, to enable the vestibule of the cave to be cleared of the offerings, etc., put through the opening in the floor of the mosque ; and that the first Christian building inside was erected in the 12th cent.

MACRON (Μάκρων), the surname of Ptolemy, who was at one time governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy Philometor (2 Mac 10[12f.]), and subsequently governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia under Antiochus Epiphanes (ib. 8[8]). He is to be identified with PTOLEMY the son of Dorymenes (1 Mac 3[38], 2 Mac 4[45]).

MADAI.—See MEDES.

MADIAN.—Jth 2[26], Ac 7[29] (both AV). See MIDIAN.

MADMANNAH (מַדְמַנָּה).—A town of Judah in the south, noticed with Ziklag, Jos 15[31] (B Μαχαρείμ, A Βεδεβηνά), 1 Ch 2[49] (where Shaaph the 'father' of Madmannah is a son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah ; B Μαρμηνά, A Μαδμηνά). The site is uncertain. There is a ruin called Umm Demineh north of Beersheba, but this does not appear to be a suitable site. Dillmann thinks it may be the same place which is called in Jos 19[5], 1 Ch 4[31] Beth-marcaboth ('place of chariots'; cf. 1 K 9[19] 10[26], Mic 1[13]). In the Onomasticon (279. 139) Μηδεβηνά (which, however, is confused with מַדְמֵנָה Madmenah of Is 10[31]) is identified with Μηνοεις near Gaza, hence it has been proposed by some to find Madmannah in the el-Minyây of Robinson (BRP[2] i. 602). This last name is a corruption of the Latin limcn='shore.' C. R. CONDER.

MADMEN (מַדְמֵן).—A place in Moab, which, if the MT be correct, has not been identified. The name occurs only in Jer 48 [Gr. 31][2], where there is a characteristic word-play גַּם־מַדְמֵן תִּדֹּמִּי 'also, O Madmen, thou shalt be brought to silence' (LXX καὶ παῦσιν παύσεται). It is a very natural suggestion that the initial מ of מַדְמֵן has arisen by dittography from the final ם of the preceding word, and that for Madmen we should read Dimon (cf. Is 15[9]), i.e. Dibon (cf. 48[18] in Jer). This appears to be favoured by Siegfried-Stade (s.v. מַדְמֵן) and Buhl (GAP 268). Dillmann thinks it unlikely that in Is 25[10] the words בְּמֵי מַדְמֵנָה (Ḳerê בְּמוֹ מ׳) 'in the water of a dunghill,' there is an allusion to the name Madmen (supposing this reading to be accepted). See, further, Cheyne's note on this passage.

MADMENAH (מַדְמֵנָה, Μαδεβηνά).—A place apparently north of Jerusalem, named only in the ideal description of the Assyrian invasion, Is 10[31]. The name has not been recovered.

MADNESS.—See MEDICINE.

MADON (מָדוֹן).—A royal Canaanite city, noticed with Hazor of Galilee, Jos 11[1] (B Μαῤῥών, A Μαδών) 12[19] (B Μαρμώθ, A Μαρών). Ma*d*on has been suspected to be a clerical error for Ma*r*on (by a frequent confusion in Heb. between ד and ר; cf. the LXX forms above), the reference being to one of the two places in Upper Galilee called Mirûn and Mârûn. There is a ruin called el-Medineh ('the city') on the plateau west of the Sea of Galilee, but this is near the shrine of Nebi Sho'eib (Jethro), and probably connected with the legend of the 'city of the grove' taken from the Korân. The site of Madon (which is noticed in the list of Thothmes III.) is therefore doubtful. See SWP vol. i. sheet iii., vol. ii. sheet vi. ; van de Velde, Mem. 146.*

MAGADAN (Μαγαδάν : the reading Μαγδαλά, Magdala, of TR and AV has no support).—The name occurs but once in the NT. In Mt 15[39] it takes the place occupied by Dalmanutha in Mk 8[10], where Codex Bezæ gives prop. man. Μελεγαδά, D[1] Μαγαιδά, and a few cursives Μαγαδά. In each case the indication is general. After the miracle 'he entered into the boat, and came εἰς τὰ ὅρια Μαγαδάν' (Mt), 'εἰς τὰ μέρη Δαλμανουθά' (Mk) ; from this we may justly infer that the two places were in close proximity, so that 'the borders of Magadan' correspond with 'the parts of Dalmanutha.' Brocardus identifies Magadan and Dalmanutha with a place called by the Arabs Me-Dan, or Syala. He is obviously confused. Me-Dan must be the Leddan, the stream from Tell el-Ḳāḍi; while Syala is evidently Phiala, now called Birket Rām, 4 miles east of Baniâs. Both sites are alike impossible. Megiddo, on the south edge of Esdraelon, is also out of the question. With the information at present available no certain decision can be reached. The direction taken by the boat is not stated, therefore we cannot say they sailed to the western shore. There is no site with a name at all resembling Magadan round the lake ; and the only place in any degree like Dalmanutha is ed-Delhemîyeh on the eastern bank of the Jordan, a little north of its confluence with the Yarmuk. To this town may have belonged the land stretching to the south shore of the lake. The identification is hazardous; but if established would point to the only recorded visit of our Lord to the S. or S.E. of the Sea of Galilee; in which case Magadan would probably have to be sought farther to the east.

* On the LXX reading ἀνὴρ Μαδών in 2 S 21[20] (Heb. אִישׁ מדין Kethîbh, א׳ מדון Ḳerê) see Driver, Text of Sam. p. 273.

Schwarz (quoted by Stanley, SP 383) speaks of the cave of Teliman or Talmanutha in the cliffs overlooking the sea, W. and S.W. of el-Mejdel. This lacks corroboration: during years of intercourse with the natives the present writer never heard the name. Should it prove correct, it would be a strong point in favour of placing Dalmanutha at the south end of the cliffs where they sink into the valley which opens on the sea in the fertile plain of el-Fulîyeh (see DALMANUTHA). Here are a number of springs, walled round in ancient times, presumably to raise the level of the water for irrigation. It is brackish and slightly tepid. Where it enters the lake great shoals of fish constantly congregate, and may be seen from an elevated rock, closely packed over a wide area. On a rocky eminence south of the valley are extensive ruins which bear the name Khirbet Ḳuneiṭrîyeh. If this identification be accepted, then probably el-Mejdel represents Magadan, although the change of name remains to be explained. The village stands at the S.W. corner of the plain of Gennesaret; it is a cluster of wretched mud huts, such stones as are used being taken from older buildings. That it occupies a site of antiquity is proved by the remains of ancient walls between the village and the sea. The position may have been chosen for a tower (Heb. מִגְדָּל: the modern Arab name also signifies 'tower' or 'fortress') to guard, as here it could do effectively, the entrance to the plain from the south. A comparatively modern tower, now also ruinous, stands to the north of the village, and hard by a palm-tree rears its solitary form. A large thorn shelters the wely by the wayside, and several spreading trees afford shade, in which the village fathers spend most of their days. The inhabitants are of mingled blood, Arab, fellaḥ, and gipsy; and they own no high reputation. Part of the plain, farmed by a capitalist in Acre, is cultivated by the peasants for a pittance. Their life is mean and miserable. Behind the village to the west, the mighty gorge of Wady Ḥamâm, with the robber caves, and the fortress of Ibn Ma'ân in its precipitous cliffs, breaks away towards Ḳurûn Ḥaṭṭîn, the traditional Mount of Beatitudes: the clear stream that flows down the vale, waters the south of the plain and enters the sea hard by the village.

El-Mejdel, with a confidence by no means justified by known facts, is often pointed out as the birthplace of Mary Magdalene. This hamlet, and a handful of squalid hovels at Abu Shusheh above the stream of er-Rubadîyeh, with a few tents of the humbler Arabs, are all the dwellings of men now found in this once densely populated district.

MAGBISH (מַגְבִּישׁ; B Μαγεβώς, A Μαγεβίς, Luc. Μααβείς).—The name of an unknown town, presumably in Benjamin, whose 'children' to the number of 156 are said to have returned from the Exile, Ezr 2^{30}. The name is omitted in MT of the parallel passage Neh 7^{33} and in B of the LXX, but A has Μαγεβώς and Luc. Μαγβείς. See Smend, Listen, 15. A name which Ryle (Ezr. and Neh. p. 270) considers to be identical with it occurs in Neh 10^{20} in the list of those who sealed the covenant, namely Magpiash (מַגְפִּיעָשׁ, B Βαναφής, A Μαιαφής).

MAGDIEL (מַגְדִּיאֵל).—A 'duke' of Edom, Gn 36^{43} =1 Ch 1^{54} (in Gn A has Μετοδιήλ, in 1 Ch B has Μεδιήλ, A Μαγεδιήλ).

MAGI (μάγοι; AV and RV 'wise men').—In Jer $39^{3. 13}$ one of the Chaldæan officers sent by Nebuchadrezzar to Jerus. is called Rab-mag (רַב־מָג; probably a title, like Rab-saris or Rab-shakeh, not a proper name: the title Rab-mag, or 'chief of the Magi' (cf. Dn 2^{48}), may well be that of Nergal-sharezer, whose name immediately precedes it). The traditional account of the Magi is that they were a Median race (Her. i. 101; Amm. Marc. 23. 6; Agathias, 2. 26; see also Parsi tradition in Sacred Books of the East, iv. p. xlvii), who acted as priests of the Persians (Her. i. 132; Soz. HE ii. 9, etc.), but whose persistence as a race is frequently attested and occasionally causes violent conflicts (e.g. Her. i. 120, iii. 65, 73, 79).

This view raises two difficulties—(1) How do the Magi come to occupy an important place (cf. that in Justin, XII. xiii. 3; Q. Curt. V. i. 22) under the Chaldæans? It has been suggested that, as Media reached a high level of civilization before its neighbours (cf. Sacred Books of the East, iv. p. l), one effect of this may be seen in the influential part played by Median priests in various countries. It is no more difficult to imagine the Medes as exercising great influence at the court of Nebuchadrezzar, than to find them in Cappadocia (Strabo, xv. 733), in Cilicia (Movers, Phön. i. 240), or Persis (Strabo, xv. 727), the introduction of the Magian priesthood in the last case being expressly ascribed to Cyrus the conqueror of the Medes (Xen. Cyr. VIII. i. 23).

(2) If the Magi are identified with the Median priests of Zoroastrianism, how are we to account for the fact that the officials of a religion whose sacred books contain strong invective against magic (see J. G. Müller in Herzog's *RE*¹ viii. 676) should yet come to give their name to magicians in general? For, in classical writers, the Magi appear, not only as performing the duties of a national priesthood, but as occupying themselves with the interpretation of dreams (e.g. Her. i. 107, 120, vii. 19: for this other works than the Avesta would have had to be consulted, as is admitted by Spiegel, Eran. Alterth. iii. 594), as well as with natural science and medicine (cf. Plin. HN xxx. 1), while Zoroaster himself is described as the inventor of astrology (Just. i. 1; Suid. s.v. Ζωροάστρης). It is true that μάγος occurs often in an idealizing sense (e.g. Philo, de Spec. Legg. 792, Quod omnis probus liber, 876; Plato, Alcib. 1. 122; Aristotle in Diog. Laert. fr. 8; Cic. Div. 1. 41; Dio Chrysost. Orat. 36, etc.), but its use for a magician is to be found already in Soph. Oed. Tyr. 387. In the Sept. μάγος is the equivalent of אַשָּׁף, a charmer or astrologer (Dn $2^{2. 10}$, so Theod. Dn pass.); in Aq. it represents אוֹב, a necromancer (the secondary use of this word for the familiar spirit which abides with such a necromancer, produces the strange rendering τὴν ἔχουσαν μάγον in 1 S 28^{7}); in Symm. it stands for חַרְטֻמִּים, interpreters of signs (see Hatch and Redpath, Concord. to Sept. s.v. μάγοι). The expression μαγικὴ τέχνη in Wis 17^{7} (of Egyp. conjuring) is parallel to Gn 41^{8} Symm., Philo Mos. 616, etc. (Herzog, *RE*¹ viii. 682); and shows the transition in the sense of the word, from the practices of a local priesthood to similar actions wherever performed, as completely effected (cf. non-ethnic sense of 'Chaldæans' in Dn pass.). Ought we therefore to take advantage of Jer $39^{3. 13}$, and assume that the Magi were either (a) a Babylonian, or possibly an Assyrian, race, or (b) not a race at all, but that Magi is only a general name for a priestly caste of 'magical' tendencies, who corrupted a purer religion in Media and Persia? (a) As regards the former supposition, Jer 39, though it gives us the earliest allusion to the Magi, says nothing as to their relation to the Chaldæans. It is true that Ctes. Pers. 46 (15), Nicol. Damasc. fr. 66, etc., speak of the Chaldæans in such a way as apparently to identify them with the Magi, while the distinctions drawn in Diog. Laert. fr. 6, Porphyr. Vit. Pyth. 6, do not succeed in removing the impression that the two were frequently confused; but if once a similarity of occupation between Magi and Chaldæans were admitted, this would account for the identification easily enough (Spiegel, iii. 588). (b) The second view suggested is tempting (cf. modern view of Druids: Rhys, Celtic Britain, 68), but the connexion between Magism and Media is too strongly attested to make it easy. The absence of the name Magi from the Avesta (Spiegel, iii. 585) does not show that they belong to a different religion from the Zoroastrian, since the racial name may have been treated as a title of scorn (Sacred Books of the East, iv. p. li). But the full discussion of the question does not belong to this place, where it is merely necessary to indicate the importance of Jer $39^{3.13}$ in the controversy. (See Pauly, RE^{1} iv. 1374; Zöckler in Herzog, RE^{2} ix. 127; Schrader, COT^{2} 110, 114).

It is partly owing to this vagueness in the meaning of the word that so little certainty can be arrived at in regard to the most important allusion to the Magi in the Bible—that in Mt 2. We are told that certain μάγοι came from the east to pay their homage to the king of the Jews, whose star they had seen at its rising (ἐν ἀνατολῇ, AV and RV 'in the east,' which would probably require the plural). They consulted Herod, who procured them the required information by help of the scribes, and, after seeing the star again, they were successful in their search, offered their gifts of gold, frankincense (cf. Holtzmann, in loc.), and myrrh, and, in consequence of a divine warning conveyed in a dream, returned home by a different route, without revisiting Herod. The king, who had inquired of them secretly at what time the star first appeared, with a view to ascertaining the age of the child, put to death all the male children in Bethlehem 'from two years old and under,' the Holy Child escaping through the flight of his parents into Egypt.

(1) The Magi came from the east (ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν should probably be taken with μάγοι in spite of the absence of the article, see Alford, in loc.; but this makes no difference to the general sense), but no conjectures as to the particular part of the east can pretend to any certainty. Probably most is to be said for Arabia (Just. Martyr, Tertul., Epiphan., to whom it was suggested by Ps $72^{10.15}$, Is 60^6; the view has also modern defenders, e.g. Grotius, Wieseler, Holtzmann, Edersheim); but others have favoured Persia, Parthia, Babylon, and even Egypt (see the names in Meyer's and Holtzmann's Comm.). The expression is quite vague (cf. Mt 8^{11} 24^{27}, Lk 13^{29}, Rev 21^{13}), and Plumptre has pointed out that 'the language of OT, and therefore probably that of St. Matthew, included under this name countries that lay considerably to the N. as well as to the E. of Palestine' (see e.g. Nu 23^7, Is 41^2); while the nature of the gifts presented is not decisive (Weiss, Life of Christ, Eng tr. i. 266). It may, however, safely be assumed that they are not Jews (as v. d. Hardt, Münter, Paulus, etc.); the words ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν and the exact terms of their question seem inconsistent with this supposition, while the evidence of Christian tradition is also weighty.

(2) The controversy whether μάγοι is here to be understood in a good or bad sense is really unimportant. It is, no doubt, true that the bad sense predominates in classical writers of the time (e.g. Tac. Ann. ii. 27, xii. 22, 59; Plin. HN xxv. 59, xxvi. 9, xxx. 1, 6; cf. Kleuker, Anhang zum Zend-Avesta, ii. 3), that the Magus is frequently denounced in Rabbinical works (Hamburger, RE s.v. 'Zauberei'; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 210), and that the other NT allusions bear an unequivocally bad sense (Ac 8^9 Simon Magus, $13^{6.8}$ Elymas). However, the evangelist lays no stress, either on the value of the religion of the Magi in general or on its falsity, so that the attempt of many ancient commentators (Just., Chrys., Theophyl.; cf. J. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ii. 36) to press the bad sense here, is as irrelevant to the story in the Gospel as the ironical fears of Strauss for the dogmatic consequences of a favourable construction. The newly-born king of the Jews receives homage from Eastern sages; their views (beyond the reference to the star, which does not imply any opinion on astrology in general) are not touched upon, and therefore neither praised nor blamed—a point in which Mt 2 contrasts with Sen. Ep. 58, where some critics have endeavoured to find a parallel.

(3) The exact cause of the Magi's coming can apparently only be guessed at. The passages in the Avesta on the three sons of Zoroaster and the triumph of Soshyos would appear, even if their bearing on the present story were more clear, to be too late in date to afford any assistance (Sacred Books of the East, iv. p. xxxvii). We must suppose that the Magi, to whatever nationality they themselves belonged, derived their inference that a king of the Jews was born, from Jewish sources. The coming of Messiah seems certainly to have been expected among the Jews at this time (Lk 2^{25}; Ellicott, Hulsean Lectures^{6}, 75); and though the widespread feeling in the East, that a Jewish Messiah would conquer the world, is only attested for a later period (Edersheim, op. cit. i. 203), Jewish authorities, if consulted on the appearance of an exceptional astronomical phenomenon, might well have explained it of Messiah. Unfortunately, it is difficult to ascertain either (a) what the precise Jewish view in regard to the star of Messiah was, or (b) what the actual astronomical fact was in which they regarded the expectation as now fulfilled.

(a) As regards the former point, in Nu 24^{17} (referred to by Just. Tryph. 106; Iren. III. ix. 2; Orig. Cels. 1. 59, etc.), the star would most naturally apply to the prince himself, not to a sidereal phenomenon heralding his appearance (cf. Weiss, op. cit. i. 266; G. Baur, Altt. Weissag. i. 346); the passage in Aggadoth Mashiach (quoted by Edersheim, op. cit. i. 211), however important in other ways, is quite vague as to the nature of the star; while Abarbanel (1437–1508, a Portuguese Rabbi commenting on Daniel), who attaches special importance to the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Pisces, is a very late writer, the value of whose evidence for the earlier period is a difficult matter to decide.

(b) Various attempts have been made to discover unusual astronomical phenomena at this time, which might have aroused the attention of the Magi. Kepler (De vero anno, etc. 1614) calculated that a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn took place in B.C. 7; Ideler (Handb. d. Chronol. ii. 399), and more recently Pritchard, have repeated the calculations, the latter showing (Memoirs of Royal Ast. Soc. xxv. 119) that three conjunctions took place between May and December B.C. 7. This conjunction (besides agreeing very well with the hint in Abarbanel, whatever that may be worth) would certainly present a rare and splendid spectacle, and would undoubtedly cause much interest to those engaged in the study of the stars. No difficulty would be caused by the use of ἀστήρ in Mt 2, for (in spite of Suidas, s.v. ἀστήρ) the word may apparently be employed for any sidereal appearance (at least in the popular language of NT, e.g. Lk 21^{25}, Ac 27^{20}, He 11^{12}; cf. also Schäfer in Brunck's Ap. Rhod. ii. p. 206), while Lotz has remarked that, as neither the evangelist nor any authority of his seem to have seen the star, the word used is indifferent. But Pritchard has shown ('Star of the Wise Men,' in Smith's DB) that this conjunction cannot be considered to have guided the Magi to Bethlehem or stood over Bethlehem at the time required by the story; possibly also some weight may be attached to his remark that a still closer conjunction took place in B.C. 66, which ought to have aroused similar interest. Wieseler (Chronol. Synops. 67) follows a suggestion of Kepler, that a peculiarly coloured evanescent star may have appeared between Jupiter and Saturn, of the same kind as one which appeared at the similar conjunction observed by Kepler in 1604. Wieseler further, adopting a hint supplied by Münter (Stern der Weisen, 1827, in which work interest in Kepler's suggestion was again aroused after a long interval), claims the support of Chinese tables for the appearance of such a star in Feb. B.C. 4, and the moderate weight attached by him to this evidence seems (in spite of the ridicule of Strauss) to be justified. Accordingly he regards the evanescent star, not the conjunction, as the star of the Magi; Edersheim (op. cit. i. 211), by referring to two passages in the Midrashim which represent the star of Messiah as appearing two years before His birth, is able to suggest further that the conjunction in B.C. 7 may have aroused the attention of the Magi, and the evanescent star of B.C. 4 have seemed (as it apparently well might) to guide them and stand over Bethlehem. On the other hand, the narrative implies that the star guiding the Magi to Bethlehem was believed to be the same star as that seen at its rising before; so we should either have to credit the Magi with a mistake (which seems improbable under the circumstances), or to suppose that the evanescent star appeared twice (which is in conflict with the Chinese records, on which the hypothesis depends).

We must therefore be content to believe that astronomical reasons prompted the Magi's visit, but that it is doubtful whether the exact cause has as yet been ascertained. Considering the number of astronomical possibilities, this fact is not in itself surprising. But there is nothing in the language of Mt 2 to imply that the star is of such a kind as could not be shown to be subject to natural laws. The universal belief in ancient times that stars acted as guides (Winer, RWB^{3} ii. 524), would serve to convince the Magi that this had happened in their case; their story, which may have corresponded accurately enough to the apparent facts, is simply adopted without comment in the Gospel. The question is not whether a star can lead men and stand over a place, but whether it can appear to do so; the passage is undoubtedly of 'great poetical beauty' (Holtzmann), but it does not follow that it rests on no historical basis (cf. Weiss, op. cit. i. 265). A wooden interpretation of the text is in any case to be deprecated, whether adopted in the supernatural (as Wordsworth, in loc.) or anti-supernatural interest.

(4) The attempt to use the date of the Magi's visit for establishing that of Christ's birth, comes to very little. Commentators are unable to agree how soon after the birth the visit is to be placed; the order of Herod would certainly be meant (as Euthymius already pointed out) to be inclusive, and would not show that the child was nearly two years old; the astronomical data are too uncertain to be of any value. [But cf. art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 403; and Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? p. 215].

(5) Much criticism has been directed against the whole story in Mt 2; but a careful study of the writers who oppose it most strongly, would seem to show the difficulty of explaining it, even from a purely destructive point of view. It has been suggested that the visit of these Eastern sages would, if true, have made a great impression, and that accounts from other quarters would almost necessarily be expected; but the attitude of Herod, which would at once be suspected, would make the utmost secrecy desirable. It is admitted that the murder of the children is in keeping with Herod's character (see Jos. Ant. XVII. vi. 5; BJ I. xxxiii. 4, 6); the number of children killed would be small ('probably 20 at most,' Edersheim, i. 214; Holtzmann exaggerates it); and those who remember the controversies on the 'silence of Thucydides' and 'the silence of Eusebius' will have no difficulty with 'the silence of Josephus' here. The references in Macrobius, Sat. ii. 4. 11 (Holtzmann, in loc., regards this as a certain allusion to our story), and Chalcidius, Tim. vii. 126, are too late in date to afford any clearly independent evidence, but the absence of confirmation cannot under the circumstances be regarded as unfavourable to Mt 2 (for the earliest patristic allusions, see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, ii. 2, 80). Lk follows entirely different sources from Mt in his account of Jesus' childhood, and therefore the omission of any allusion to the Magi in the third Gospel cannot be regarded as surprising. The question how room is to be found for the Magi's visit, so as to make a consistent story of the two narratives, is a difficult one, but the view of Wieseler (Chron. Synops. 152) may perhaps be considered satisfactory.

The attempt to discredit Mt 2 by producing close parallels is not successful. The scene at Plato's death in Sen. Ep. 58 is more remarkable for its differences than its resemblances; the story of Moses, as given in Jos. Ant. II. ix. 2, though more like Mt 2 than the parallel section in Ex, does not deserve the importance which some scholars attach to it (cf. Weiss, op. cit. i. 268); the looser illustrations of Strauss carry no conviction. The expectations of the Jews as to their Messiah do not appear to have been of such a kind as would account for the invention of the story in fulfilment of them (Edersheim, op. cit. i. 209). It is true that certain parts of OT (esp. Ps 72^{10}, Is 60$^{3.\,10}$) might lead to a modification of the tradition in the direction indicated by those passages, and the subsequent history of the story shows this to have been the case, but those very points are conspicuously absent from Mt's account. Again, the two places in which Mt adduces OT quotations (2$^{6.\,18}$) certainly raise difficulties of interpretation (Edersheim, i. 206; Weiss, i. 270), but those very difficulties show that the story has not been invented to fulfil the prophecies. The utterance of Balaam (Nu 24^{17}) would necessarily be regarded as fulfilled in the star of the Magi, but it is hard to see how it could have given rise to the latter; that there should be signs in heaven at the advent of Messiah (Rev 12^{1}) is as natural as that a pretender should subsequently call himself Bar-Cochba ('son of the star'), but that Mt 2 should correspond in any sense to an expected star of Messiah is extremely unnatural. We should rather have to think of the evangelist as deliberately inventing a fulfilment, suggesting a reason why it should not have caused more excitement at the time, and combining it with the gifts of Ps 68^{29} 72^{10}, and the worship of Is 49^{7}. But the connexion with the prophecies is too slight, the combination too inferential, and the style of the whole too simple, to make this supposition satisfactory. To suppose, further, that this very fact is due to the author's ingenuity, is to credit him with almost superhuman cleverness. That Jerus. should be troubled at one moment and should have forgotten the cause at the next, is not inconsistent with the habits of an excitable populace. Nothing need be said of Keim's objection that Herod 'would not have exalted the position of the Sanhedrin' (see Weiss, i. 269), of his somewhat simple suggestion that Herod would probably have put the Magi to death, or of the difficulty found by Holtzmann in the king's secret interview with them. That so long a journey should be undertaken for such a cause is no doubt a priori improbable, but it is not impossible. If the story is legendary, the explanation of the legend has certainly not been found yet, and critics ought carefully to consider whether the difficulties involved in rejecting the account are not greater than those of accepting it as historical. But it is impossible to arrive at any definite conclusion, on critical grounds, with regard to the Magi's visit, unless it is taken in connexion with the other incidents related in the Gospels about the childhood of Jesus (see JESUS CHRIST).

(6) Tradition has much to say in regard to the Magi's visit. The influence of Ps $68^{29.31}$ 72^{10}, Is 49^{7} $60^{3.10}$, makes itself felt in the belief that they were kings (perhaps already in Tert. Jud. 9, Marc. 3. 13; but see Patritius, de Evangel. ii. 320, where it is contended that there is no clear instance before the 6th cent.). Their number was fixed at three (in spite of an Eastern tradition that they were twelve: Drisler, Classical Studies, p. 31; Op. Imp. in Mt 2 ap. Chrysost. vi. 638), probably from the threefold nature of their gifts, though symbolical meanings were also attached (e.g. Orig. Hom. Gen. 14. 3; Leo, Serm. 31. 1; [Aug.] Serm. App. 136. 4; Bede, Collect. v. 542). The gifts themselves were explained in symbolical ways (Suicer, Thes. s.v. λίβανος), though it is perhaps worth notice that Christian art attached but little importance to the actual gold, frankincense, and myrrh, for which other offerings were generally substituted (Kraus, RE s.v. 'Magier'). The star received miraculous additions (Ign. Eph. 19, see Lightfoot, ad loc.; Chrysost. Hom. Mt. 6. 2), as did the whole story (Op. Imp. l.c.; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. ch. 31). The names of the Magi, and the traditional way of representing them, became fixed (Spanheim, Dub. Evang. i. 287; Moroni, Dizion. s.v. 'Magi'; Kraus, l.c.). Their bodies were discovered in the East in the 4th cent. and removed to Constantinople; thence they travelled to Milan on the consecration of Eustorgius, and to Cologne on the conquest of Milan in 1162. Their festival, combined at first with a commemoration of Christ's baptism, His first miracle, and the feeding of the 5000 (Max. Taur. Hom. ad Epiph. 7; [Aug.] Serm. App. 134. 1), appears in the 4th cent. (Amm. Marc. 21. 2, Julian; Greg. Naz. Orat. 43. 52; Valens); and though rejected by the Donatists as an innovation (Aug. Serm. 202. 2), was honoured by the Catholics (Const. Apost. 8. 33; cf. Cod. Theod. xv. t. 5. 5; Cod. Justin. iii. t. 12. 7). Though the 'Epiphany' always retained traces of its origin as a celebration of Christ's baptism (hence its special suitability for the administration of baptism; Augusti, Handb. d. Christl. Archäol. ii. 376), the Magi assumed a gradually increasing importance in its solemnities (cf. Binterim, Denkwürd. d. chr. kath. Kirche, v. i. 310).

LITERATURE.—The most important works are cited in the course of the article, while further references can be found from them. On traditions as to the Magi and Epiphany see also Smith, DB, art. 'MAGI'; Bingham, Origines, vol. ix. p. 66; Hone, Everyday Book, Jan. 6. P. V. M. BENECKE.

MAGIC, MAGICIAN.—Magic, ars magica, is the profession and practice of the magi or μάγοι. This is the etymological signification of the word. The name and office are associated by Greek writers with the Persians. 'Among the Persians they who are wise respecting the deity, and are his servants, are called magi,' says Porphyry (de Abstin. An. iv. 16). Both Herodotus and Xenophon employ the term in the sense of priest and soothsayer (Her. vii. 37; Xenoph. Cyr. VIII. i. 23). Indeed, according to Porphyry, Darius declared himself to be a teacher of magic (μαγικῶν διδάσκαλος). In Sophocles, Oed. Tyr. 387, the word is used in an unfavourable connexion; but this cannot be said to be necessary and inevitable. In Dn 1^{20} Theod., 2^{2} LXX and Theod. etc., μάγος occurs with by no means a bad sense attaching to it. Indeed, Daniel himself (5^{11} Theod.) was chief magus, and obtained this appointment from Nebuchadnezzar himself (ἄρχων ἐπαοιδῶν, μάγων, Χαλδαίων, רַב חַרְטֻמִּין אָשְׁפִין כַּשְׂדָּאִין). And in the same ethically neutral and official sense the word μάγος occurs in the Matthew narrative ($2^{1.7.16}$).

One passage in Herodotus (i. 101) need not detain us. Here the magi are called a 'tribe' of Medes. As Schrader points out (COT ii. p. 113), they were rather a class than a tribe, i.e. the Median priestly order. We have a close parallel in the Hebrew Levi.

The origin of the name and office of Magian (μάγος, Heb. מָג only in foreign name Rab-mag) is uncertain. Both Schrader and Delitzsch claim for it a Babylonian origin, and this certainly seems probable. Yet it must be confessed that at present there is no satisfactory derivation of מָג from Assyro-Babylonian forthcoming. Schrader's combination of it with êmḳu (ímgu) 'deep,' 'wise' (עמק), is very hazardous; while Delitzsch in his Prolegg. eines neuen Heb.-Aram. Wörterb. p. 138, footn. 1, surrenders, on phonetic grounds, his former combination of the word (propounded in Heb. in the Light of Assyr. Research, p. 14) with the Assyr. maḥḥu, meaning 'prophet,' 'soothsayer' (=ašipu). Nevertheless, the close parallel between the expression רַב מָג (in Jer 39^{3}) and the Assyrian title Rab-šaḳ(ê) (WAI ii.pl.67, line 66),* points decisively to a Babylonian origin.

But our subject is not limited by the original etymologic import of the name. Magic is a term used by us to connote a certain range of acts standing in very close relation to ancient religion, yet hardly forming a normal or essential part of it. A satisfactory definition of the term is by no means easy. In a recently published work by Dr. Alfred Lehmann, entitled Superstition and Magic, in which the accompanying beliefs and usages are traced from the earliest times down to the present, the writer defines magic as every act which arises from superstition or may be explained on the assumption of superstitious ideas (p. 7, Germ. ed.). But the definition is too broad; and when we come to the definition of superstition as 'every hypothesis which has either no justification in a given religion or stands in contradiction to the scientific conceptions of a given time' (p. 6), we have too shifting a basis on which to construct an adequate definition of magic. We must therefore endeavour to fix on a more stable connotation for this term. Ludwig Blau, Das alt-Jüdische Zauberwesen, defines magic as consisting of those acts 'whereby an event or a condition is conceived of as brought to pass in some supernatural way' (p. 3). We are here standing on firmer ground. Yet even here greater clearness is needed, for the term 'supernatural' requires elucidation. Robertson Smith (Prophets of Isr., Lect. vii. ad fin.) has shown that our terms 'natural' and 'supernatural' had no relevancy to ancient Semitic modes of thought. The definition would be clearer if by 'supernatural' we meant 'transcending the normal coexistences and sequences of cause and effect.' Yet even then Blau's definition of magic remains too broad, since it might include sacrifices, augury, and soothsaying. But in its strict sense magic stands outside these, and should be entirely separated from the normal thoughts and acts of religion.

* See Schrader, COT ii. pp. 3 f., 114. The word šaḳ as an Assyrian official term is to be found not only in the annals of Tiglath-pileser III. but also in the Rassam cyl. of Assurbanipal, col. ii. 15, šu-ut-šaḳ-ja; see Delitzsch, Assyr. Lesestücke ^{3}, No. 83 in the Schrifttafel.

Magic may, in its historic sense, be best described as the special and abnormal agency, whether through words or acts, whereby certain superhuman personal powers are constrained either to create evil (or good) or to avert baleful effects. Accordingly magic falls into two parts. We have to do with the art with which the Babylonian systems make us familiar, whereby the superior deities or good demons are influenced to exercise their good offices to avert the evil, i.e. whereby counter-spells or charms are worked. This art may be called 'sacred magic.' On the other hand, we have to do with the *Black art called sorcery (see art. SORCERY), whereby evils are wrought on the unfortunate human victim through the power of the evil eye, etc., by the male sorcerer, or more frequently through the female witch, who is able to summon supernatural powers of darkness to his or her aid. Of this some illustrations will be given below.

In the definition, or rather description, above given we have had chiefly in view the usages and beliefs of the Christian era and the ages that preceded it. In other words, magic is regarded as the outgrowth of demonology, the necessary accompaniment of a belief in demons. To quote once more from Blau's treatise: 'These spirits the magician endeavours by his occult methods to bring under his power, or to compel them to carry out his will. The conceptions respecting the nature and power of these spirits, whom man can make serviceable to himself, differ with the different races. This does not, however, alter the essential fact. Belief in demons and belief in magic are inseparable the one from the other' (p. 7). As it is not the purpose of this article, contributed to a Bible Dictionary, to travel beyond the confines of the subject in its biblical relations, we shall content ourselves with the above conception of magic based on the animistic interpretation of the universe out of which demonology arose † (see article DEMON, DEVIL, vol. i. p. 590). It must be premised, however, that demonology does not wholly explain magic in all its varied forms and ramifications.

Investigation of the historic sources of the magical beliefs and practices of Israel leads us to ancient Egypt and Babylonia—more especially the latter. In both magic was highly developed, and penetrated deeply into the life of the people. In both we fortunately have access to ancient documents in considerable abundance belonging to an age far anterior to the Exile and even the Regal period in Hebrew history.

Erman's instructive work, Life in Ancient Egypt, describes vividly the magical conceptions and practices that prevailed in the Nile Valley. As in Babylonia, magic was one of the most potent influences in the intellectual and moral life of ancient Egypt. 'The belief that there were words and actions by which they could produce an effect on the powers of nature, upon every living being, upon animals, and even upon gods, was indissolubly connected with all the actions of the Egyptians' (p. 352). It infected their funeral ceremonies. Wooden figures were supposed to do the work or prepare the food for the deceased. These with stone geese and wooden models of kitchens had been endowed through incantations with magical power. Even gods availed themselves of magic formulæ to constrain each other, or wore amulets. Isis pre-eminently was mistress of magic. Her name was placed on amulets worn by the deceased as a protection, and it was also used in medicines prepared for the living. The underlying conception in many of the formulæ employed was that in the history of one of the gods some good fortune came to the deity. The magician for the time regarded himself as identified with the god, and would repeat the words which the god had spoken on that occasion, and he might even designate himself as the god. Erman cites the example (p. 353)—

> 'Thou art not above me—I am Amon,
> I am Anhor, the beautiful slayer,
> I am the prince, the Lord of the Sword,' etc.,

by which crocodiles were conjured.

In the description of the great trial for high treason—a harem conspiracy against Rameses III. (contained in the judiciary papyrus of Turin, papyrus Lee and papyrus Rollin)—we read that 'the royal superintendent of the cows, a man of high rank, procured a magical book from the Pharaoh's own library, and according to its directions made certain wax figures which were smuggled into the palace, where they were supposed to cause lameness and illness' (Erman, p. 143). Magic and medicine were closely bound up with one another in Egypt as in Babylonia. Our chief authority on this subject is the great papyrus Ebers. In order that a special remedy might be effective, certain incantations were pronounced over it. The following formula, we learn from the above papyrus, was recited in the preparation of all medicines: 'That Isis might make free, make free. That Isis might make Horus free from all evil that his brother Set had done to him when he slew his father Osiris. O Isis, great enchantress, free me, release me from all evil red things, from the fever of the god and the fever of the goddess, from death, and death from pain, and the pain which comes over me; as thou hast freed, as thou hast released thy son Horus, whilst I enter into the fire and go forth from the water,' etc. (Ebers, i. 12 ff.). From the same authority we can readily perceive the dense ignorance of Egyptian doctors respecting the internal organism and its parts. They had a vague conception of the heart as the centre of the circulatory system, as well as some knowledge of the bones and large viscera, but respecting the etiology of disease knew nothing. Diseases they, like other ancients, ascribed to demons. The body was divided into 36 parts, and over each part a demon presided, and in case of disease he was addressed in order that restoration to health might follow. From the Book of the Dead we learn that in the case of a dead body the different parts of the body fell to the care of respective deities. Thus Nu guarded the hair, Râ the face, Hathor took the eyes under her protection, Anubis the lips, while Thoth took oversight over all the limbs. Further interesting details on this subject may be obtained from Dr. A. Wiedemann's Religion der alten Ægypter, p. 146 f.

* See Lehmann, ib. p. 31 f.

† Tylor (Prim. Culture, i. p. 116), basing his generalization on a broad survey of savage life, modern superstition and folk-lore, finds the psychology of magic in faulty association of ideas. 'By a vast mass of evidence from savage, barbaric, and civilized life, magic arts, which have resulted from thus mistaking an ideal for a real connexion, may be clearly traced from the lower culture which they are of to the higher culture which they are in. Such are the practices whereby a distant person is to be affected by acting on something closely associated with him, his property, clothes he has worn, and above all cuttings from his hair and nails.' This is, no doubt, largely true. But the following passage in Tylor's work clearly shows that the theory must be supplemented by the assumption of demonology or a belief in the sorcerer, who is a quasi-demon.

In Babylonia demonology and magic were even more prevalent than in ancient Egypt. To the inhabitants of the Euphrates and Tigris lands the existence of a vast host of demons was an ever-present fact. Now demons, as we have already pointed out (art. DEMON, DEVIL), are simply a development of Animism. In the words of Prof. Morris Jastrow (Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, p. 49), 'the more important and the more uniform of the natural forces became gods, and the inferior ones were, as a general rule, relegated to the secondary position of mere sprites, like the jinns of Arabic belief.' Mere sprites or demons personify the irregular and destructive forces of nature (cf. Chantepie de la Saussaye, i. p. 214). The incantations, of which so large a number has been supplied to us in the 4th vol. of the Cuneiform Inscr. of Western Asia (WAI, occasionally designated Rawl.; see Sayce, Hibbert Lect. pp. 441–447), usually deal with bodily or mental afflictions, of which evil demons were held to be the cause. These were believed to have obtained power over the human subject owing to the wrath of some deity, or because the victim had been subjected to blighting influence through the instrumentality of some sorcerer or witch. Angry gods made use of demons for the infliction of punishment. Moreover, it was believed that domestic misfortunes, such as jealousy, evil reports, and quarrels, were brought about by these supernatural agents. In magic, forms of words constituted the means by which the demons were constrained to work these mischiefs on the unfortunate victim. Or it might be effectuated by poisonous breath or spittle, and yet more often by the evil eye. For in the very earliest times it was a popular superstition that certain beings possessed demonic power, and could exercise it malignantly on human victims of their displeasure. Jastrow thinks that 'this belief may have originated in the abnormal appearance presented by certain individuals in consequence of physical deformities. . . . The uncanny impression made by dwarfs, persons with a strange look in their eyes, and, above all, the insane, would give rise to the view that some people possessed peculiar powers. By the side of such as were distinguished by bodily defects, those who outranked their fellows by virtue of natural gifts, by keenness of intellect or cunning, would also be supposed to have received their power through some demoniac source. There would thus be associated ideas of sorcery and witchcraft. The sorcerers might be either male or female, but, for reasons which are hard to fathom, the preference was given to females.' Thus among the Babylonians, as in mediæval Europe, the witch appears more frequently than the male sorcerer. She possesses the power of demons, and in incantations the two are often conjoined.

The predominance of the sorceress may also be observed in Jewish literature as well as in that of other races, notably in that of Greece and Rome (cf. Horace, Epod. xvii., Sat. i. 8; Theocritus, Idyll ii.). Citations from the Talmud in Blau's Das alt-Jüdische Zauberwesen, p. 23 f., show how deep-seated was the belief that sorcery was the work of women. Sorceresses, in fact, abounded; and according to Simon ben Jochai (A.D. 150) they had increased in number in his time, while Rabbi Eliezer declares that Simeon ben Shetach had hanged eighty of them in Ascalon in one day. Popular belief among the Jews even assigned rabies among dogs to the agency of women. This predominance of the sorceress meets us in ancient Arabia.*

The witch held close personal relations with the demons, and could control them, being able to invoke them at her will in order to effect her malignant purposes on mankind. Magical potions constituted one of the arts which she employed. But among the most effective was the method which has been termed 'sympathetic magic': 'Under the notion that the symbolical acts of the sorcerers would have their effect upon the one to be bewitched, the male sorcerer or the witch would tie knots in a rope.† Repeating certain formulas with each fresh knot, the witch would in this way symbolically strangle the victim, seal his mouth, rack his limbs, tear his entrails, and the like. Still more popular was the making an image of the desired victim in clay or pitch, honey, fat, or other soft material, and either by burning it to inflict physical tortures upon the person representing it, or by undertaking various symbolical acts with it, such as burying it among the dead . . . to prognosticate in this way a fate corresponding to one of these acts for the unfortunate victim.'

Cuneiform scholars have devoted much attention to this weird branch of Babylonian literature. Since the days, twenty-five years ago, when Lenormant expounded this subject in his Chaldæan Magic with much graphic vigour and detail, several scholars, including Sayce and recently L. W. King (Babylonian Magic and Sorcery), Tallqvist, and Zimmern, have made notable contributions.

The demons which are mentioned in the incantation texts amount to hundreds. They are of various classes: those which inhabit the field, those which haunt the resting-places of the dead, and the evil demons which inflict physical suffering. It is with the last we are now specially concerned; and the means by which these evil influences were counteracted occupy a vast number of cuneiform tablets. We possess a great collection of incantations directed against these demons, called by a variety of names, and also against the sorcerers. In many cases the interpretations are provisional.

> The utukku of the field and the utukku of the mountain.
> The utukku of the sea, and the one that lurks in graves.
> The evil shedu, the shining alu.

Beside these we have mention of the ekimmu, 'which seizes hold of a man.'‡ These incantations fall into various elaborate series.

* Wellh. *Reste Arab. Heidenthums*², p. 159: 'There were men and women who made this art of magic their profession. The witches, however, were more numerous. They distinguished themselves among the Arabs, as among other races, from the male sorcerers by showing themselves more passive than active. Hence the demons do not serve them, but vice versâ. In fact they almost seem incarnations of the demons. In the time of Ibn Munkidh the witches rode about naked on a stick between the graves of the cemetery of Shaizar. Similarly they still ride by night on palm sticks through the air, having stripped themselves stark naked, smeared their bodies with cow's milk, and abjured Islam in a formula of renunciation.' The witches riding resemble demons in this respect; comp. p. 152. They were credited also with acts of unchastity, drawing the blood from the other sex, changing them into animals, or robbing them of reason. See Doughty's entertaining references, in Arabia Deserta, vol. ii. p. 106 f., to the Kheybar witches.

† Comp. the Hebrew חָבַר used of binding and conjuring by the tying of knots, Dt 18^{11}, Ps 58^{6}, and חֶבֶר frequently used in the plur., Is. $47^{9.12}$.

‡ From the root ekêmu, 'to take' or 'seize'; see Delitzsch, Assyr. Handw. s.v. אכם. Apparently the word properly means the manes or shade that wanders by night. We have other demons specially mentioned, viz. Lilu and liltu, the demons of night (see art. DEMON), the gallu that attacks the hand, the rabiṣu and labartu, demons of nightmare, Namtar and ašakku, plague demons. We find some of them pictured on the boundary stones. These are the demons of the field, who will inflict punishment on the trespasser or any one who will invade proprietary rights, and whose power the owner invokes to defend them. Students of Is $13^{21ff.}$ $34^{13f.}$ should take note of the fact

One series, consisting of sixteen tablets, known by the natural name of evil demon, contained protective incantations against various classes of evil spirits. Another is called the series of 'head sickness,' which covered nine tablets. Two others have lately been the subject of careful investigation,—the Šurpu series by Zimmern, and the Maḳlû series by Tallqvist. Both expressions signify 'burning,' since in both the subject dealt with is the burning of images of sorcerers and the incantations recited when this symbolical act was performed. These incantations were of superior force, intended to countervail and overpower the baleful influence of the spells used by the hostile sorcerer. Symbolical loosening of knots counterworked the symbolic tying of the same. Sometimes we have the symbolical peeling of several skins of an onion. As night was the time chosen by sorcerers and witches for their work, the three divisions of the night, evening, midnight, and dawn, corresponding to the temple watches, were the times chosen for the countervailing incantations and symbolic acts.

The Šurpu and Maḳlû series formed incantation rituals. Certain formulas were found to be effective, and were therefore preserved for use; but since a certain formula only availed for a particular set of circumstances, it was necessary to preserve as many formulas as possible to meet every case with which the professional exorcizer might be confronted. This exorcizer naturally plays a great part as a controller of the destructive spirits. One citation, modified from M. Jastrow's recent work, may suffice. It is taken from the Maḳlû series. First the sufferer describes his troubles (Tallq. ii. col. iii. 148 f.)—

'They have used all kinds of charms
To entwine me as with ropes (?)
To catch me as in a bird's snare,
To tie me as with cords,
To overpower me as in a net,
To throttle me as with a noose,
To tear me as a fabric.'

After which the exorcizer says—

'But I, by the command of Marduk, lord of charms,
By Marduk, the master of bewitchment,
Both the male and the female sorcerer,
As with ropes I will entwine,
As in a bird's snare I will catch,
As in a net I will overpower,
As in a noose I will throttle (apattil),
As a fabric I will tear.'

The byplay of action that accompanied each phrase of the incantation must be supplied by the reader's imagination. These acts were symbolically performed by the exorcizer on an image of the witch made of bitumen and pitch, of clay or wax. Sometimes the sufferer had been bewitched by concoctions of herbs. In this case other herbs or potions are concocted by the exorcizing priest as a counter charm.

In the lines repeated by the exorcizer above quoted we notice as significant the appeal to Marduk. The invocation of the greater deities was the leading characteristic of these counter-spells. Demons were related to the gods as inferiors to superiors. Doubtless, in some cases, the dividing line was slight, but that the mastery belonged to the Great Gods is clear. Those invoked were chiefly Šamaš, who, as the rising sun, was supposed to scare away the haunting spectres of the night; Sin, the guardian and illuminator of the darkness; Ištar and her consort Tammuz. But the most important place in these incantations was held by the magical triad Ea, Marduk, and Gibil (as well as Nusku). Here the two points to be noticed are, (1) the appeal to the gods of light, Marduk, Šamaš, and Sin, as opposed to darkness, and the works of sorcery carried on in darkness (cf. Ps $91^{5.13}$). (2) Water and fire, as the two purifying elements, are summoned to the magician's aid through the gods whom he invokes. Observe that it is in fire the images of the witches were burned, while the cleansing and healing properties of water were recognized even in those primitive times. Ea was the Babylonian god of water as well as of wisdom, the city of Eridu being the ancient seat of his cult. He is the lord of all secrets, whose name was awful, ineffable, and disguised in ciphers. His wonder-working name was inscribed on the sacred brazen vessels. But he stood on too lofty an eminence to be practically useful. In his place Marduk,* god of the sun as he rises from the ocean and brings with him the water of purification, is usually invoked by the exorcizing priest. On the other hand, Gibil and Nusku were invoked as representing the sacred element of fire. The following incantation—

'Nusku, great God, counsellor of the Great Gods,
Guarding the sacrificial gifts of all the heavenly spirits,
Founder of cities, renewer of sanctuaries, . . .
I prostrate myself before thee;
Burn the sorcerer and the sorceress;
May the life of my sorcerer and sorceress be destroyed'— was recited in a whisper before the wax image of the sorcerer or witch. A noticeable feature of these invocations of the fire-deity is the lofty language in which they are expressed. We conclude with the following (Tallq. Maḳlû, i. 130 f.)—

'The witch who has charmed me,
Through the charm with which she has charmed me, charm her;
Those who have made images of me, reproducing my features,
Who have taken away my breath, torn my hairs,
Who have rent my clothes, have hindered my feet from treading the dust,
May the fire-god, the strong one, break their charm.'

We have no space to refer to many other interesting features of this great subject of Babylonian magic, more especially to the ethical ideas that occasionally appear in the Šurpu texts. These must be studied in the attractive pages of Morris Jastrow's work from which quotation has been made. The importance of Babylonia in its relation to Greek and Roman culture must not be forgotten, and in the realm of astrology and magic this especially holds true. In the early days of the Roman empire the mathematici or 'astrologers' were also called Chaldæi (cf. Gell, i. 9). Far more potent was the influence of Babylonia upon Israel. The influence of Egypt over the ancient Hebrews is by no means so definite.† Certainly no inference confirmatory of such influence can be drawn from the post-exilian passage, Ex 7^{10} (P). The Piel partic. of כשף, there used to characterize the magicians and their practices, is connected by Semitic philologists with the Arabic root كسف 'cut off' (used of an eclipse). The Ethpa. of the same root, employed in Syriac in the sense of 'pray' (cf. ܟܽܘܫܳܦܳܐ 'prayer'), is combined in Gesen. Heb. Lex.[12] with 1 K 18^{28}, where reference is made to the self-mutilation of the devotees of Baal. But this is a highly precarious speculation, and we are on a safer path if we go to the ancient Semitic Babylonian for light. Kašâpu in Assyrian means 'to bewitch,' and kišpu means sorcery.

that the demons were always endowed with some animal or human shape. Frequently they are embodied in serpents, scorpions, or other monsters. Comp. WAI iv. pl. 5, and Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. of Art in Chaldæa and Assyria, i. pp. 61, 62, ii. p. 81.

* We cannot fail to note the corresponding rôle in comparison with Ea played by Marduk in the cosmogonic legend. See COSMOGONY.

† The influence exercised by Egypt was far more definite and powerful from the 3rd cent. B.C. onwards, when Alexandria became a centre where Greek and Oriental culture met. We see this in the later Jewish literature, from which Blau gives copious citations (Das alt-Jüdische Zauberwesen, p. 38 f.). Thus in Kiddushin 49*b* we read that out of the ten measures (קבין) of sorcery which descended into the world, Egypt claimed for itself as many as nine. In Menachoth 85*a* we find an interesting reference to Jannes and Mambres (Johana and Mamra), the heads of the Egyptian magicians (cf. 2 Ti 3^8). Blau thinks that the Egyptian potion זיתום המצרי, to which Pesach. iii. 1 refers, was a magical healing draught. Among the Greeks and Romans Egypt was regarded as the classical land of magic and medicine. Yet this is more true of the later than of the earlier Greek history, and it is obvious that the Jewish Midrash read the conceptions of its own time into OT passages. Thus in 1 K 4^{30} the 'wisdom of the sons of the east,' which Solomon's wisdom exceeded, is interpreted to mean the wisdom of the Egyptians.

Here, as in the case of אַשָּׁף (Dn 1^{20} $2^{2.\ 27}$ 4^{7} 5^{15}, cf. Assyr. ašipu), we have probably Babylonian loan words. We have already indicated (art. DEMON) that the Heb. שֵׁד (with its Aramaic equivalent) was of like origin. In earlier days than the Exile, especially in the 15th and previous centuries, Canaan was largely under Babylonian influence. From Is 2^{6} we are disposed to conclude that Babylonian magic and other foreign superstitions prevailed in Israel in the days of Ahaz, if the reading מִקֶּדֶם (LXX ἀπ' ἀρχῆς) is to be accepted as sound. The validity of this reading most recent commentators, including Dillm. and Duhm, admit, though with the addition of קֶסֶם or קֹסְמִי before מִקֶּדֶם to make better structure and rhythm: 'They are full of soothsaying from the East.' Similarly Cheyne in SBOT. It is true that Balaam came from Pethor (Dt 23^{4} [^{5} Heb.], cf. Nu 22^{5}), the Pitru of the Assyrians, on the western bank of the Euphrates, and that he was regarded as a soothsayer (Nu 22^{7}). Yet it must be admitted that the insertion of קסם here is mere hypothesis. How deeply soothsaying and magic had infected Judah a century later is shown by Jer 27^{9}. The prevalence of the magical arts in early pre-exilian times is clearly evidenced in the most primitive code of Hebrew legislation, which strictly prohibited such practices, and regarded them as closely connected with heathen worship. It is, moreover, significant that in Ex 22^{18}, the passage referred to, it is a woman professor of these arts, מְכַשֵּׁפָה or 'sorceress,' who was not to be permitted to live. Similarly in Islam both the witch and the sorcerer were punished with death. The punishment of drowning was inflicted on the witches of Kufa by the Khalif Valid I.; see Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heidenth.^{2} p. 160.

In the list of prohibited practices in Dt 18^{11} the מְכַשֵּׁף or magician is coupled with those who worked spells (חֹבֵר חֶבֶר) by tying knots, whereby the victim was bound by an evil charm. Illustrations of these customs have been already given in the account of Babylonian practice. Closely associated in the Deuteronomic passage with the magician (מְכַשֵּׁף) and the sorcerer who binds the knots, are the soothsayer (מְנַחֵשׁ) and the necromancer, and those who inquire by familiar spirits. On these subjects, nearly allied to magic and sometimes included in it, the reader is referred to the separate articles, DIVINATION, SOOTHSAYING, and SORCERY. In Ps $58^{4.\ 5}$ and Jer 8^{17} we find interesting parallels which show that serpent-charming was practised as a mode of conjuring the demons, which the ancient Hebrews like the Arabs considered to reside in serpents. Illustrations of this popular superstition may be found in Baudissin, Stud. zur Semit. Relig. i. p. 279 ff.; W. R. Smith, RS p. 120, n. 1, and p. 133. The root לחשׁ used in the Piel of the serpent-charmer (Ps 58^{5}) is probably a mimetic word meaning to hiss or whisper,[*] and thus to conjure serpents. See W. R. Smith, Journ. of Phil. xiv. p. 122 ff. Lagarde, indeed, would be disposed to connect נחשׁ and לחשׁ, and derive the latter from the former. The Assyrian parallel Pael form luḫḫušu is obscure as to meaning.

Is 47 is a song (arranged in strophes) concerning the fall of Babylon. Its value for the student of history is the clear evidence it affords that by the Jews of the 6th cent. Babylonia was regarded as the land where magic had been practised from time immemorial (מִנְּעוּרַיִךְ v.^{12}). The prophet utters his warning in the words (vv.$^{9-12}$)—

'Yea there shall come over thee both these . . . childlessness and widowhood in their full measure though thy magic arts (כְּשָׁפַיִךְ) be many, though thy spells (חֲבָרַיִךְ) be very potent . . . Abide by thy spells [*] and thy many incantations whereby thou weariest thyself.—Perhaps ye are able to obtain advantage, perhaps ye scare away [the foes].'

The references to popular magic in the OT are not infrequent. The דּוּדָאִים of Reuben of which Rachel made use (Gn $30^{14\text{ff.}}$ J) seem to be a reminiscence of some magic superstitions connected with the worship of the deity דודה, which the Moabite Stone (line 12) would lead us to regard as a deity of love belonging to the tribe of Gad. There can be little doubt that the earrings buried by Jacob as idolatrous were magical amulets inscribed with words or tokens to avert the evil eye or other disasters (Gn 35^{4}). Similarly the 'crescents' or 'little moons,' μηνίσκοι (שַׂהֲרֹנִים), of which Isaiah speaks in 3^{18-23} (Cheyne and Duhm make the passage post-Isaianic), may be compared with the hilâlât or crescents adorning a modern Arabian maiden. Similar crescents were worn on the camels' necks (Jg 8^{21}) of the Midianite kings, and were undoubtedly employed as amulets or charms (see Delitzsch on Is 3^{18}). Lane, in his Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, observes that horses often wear appendages consisting of a few verses of the Koran enclosed in cases of metal. That the lady of fashion in Jerusalem, whose attire is described by Isaiah, wore crescents as a charm, is shown by the subsequent mention of the amulets (לְחָשִׁים). See chs. xi. xii. in Lane's work on Ḥejâbs (charms) and Magie.

An obscure reference in the Bk. of Job (3^{8}), in which the speaker, cursing the night of his birth, exclaims—

> 'May those who curse the day, curse it, has been considered to refer to the mythical dragon who was believed to seize upon the sun or moon when eclipsed. The magician's power was supposed capable of compelling the dragon monster Leviathan to seize or give up his victim (cf. Is 27^{1}, Job 26^{13}).[‡] On Nu $21^{8\text{f.}}$ see SERPENT, and Dillm. ad loc.
> Who understand how to stir up Leviathan,' [†]—

The prophets habitually associate magic with idolatry (Mic $5^{11\text{ff.}}$, cf. 2 K 9^{22}, 2 Ch 33^{6}). Yet the history of Israel constantly reveals the continuance of popular superstition and practice even after legislation had long pronounced them unlawful. In the later days of Judaism learned Rabbis did not forbid the study of magical arts, though the practice of these arts was not permitted. Of one it is even said that he considered the knowledge of magic to be essential to any member of the Sanhedrin in order that he might be capable of pronouncing an opinion upon it (Blau, Zauberwesen, p. 20). The fact that the practice of magic was forbidden does not by any means imply that the Jews did not believe in its power. The truth is precisely the reverse. They believed in magic as the inevitable result of their belief in demons, but regarded it, just as St. Paul himself did, as bound up with idolatry and the realm of darkness, and therefore to be shunned. It comes within the circle of the ἐνέργεια τοῦ Σατανᾶ.[*]

[*] The presence of the significant sibilant שׁ in all these words אשׁף, כשׁף, לחשׁ, נחשׁ, suggests an ultimate mimetic origin connected with the sound of hissing or whispering. Cf. צִפְצֵף in Is 10^{19} 29^{4}.

[*] The word חֶבֶר (pl.) 'magic art' or 'spell' probably refers to the binding of the knots. The same root occurs in Assyrian. The Pael of אבר ubburu is used of binding under the spell of the sorceress (WAI iv. 49, 5*a*; 50, 52*b*; Delitzsch, Handwört. sub voce). In v.^{11} we have an interesting word שַׁחְרָהּ ('evil which thou knowest not) to avert by incantations,' Piel infin. with suff. of the root which in Arabic (سحر) is constantly employed in the sense of using magic spells (see Wellhausen, Reste^{2}, p. 159).

[†] Gunkel's reading of יָם for יוֹם in the first line, and rendering 'may those who keep the sea under a spell curse it,' etc. (Schöpfung u. Chaos, p. 59), are far-fetched though ingenious. Gunkel holds that ארר and עֹרֵר refer to spell and counter-spell, a view which does not appear to us at all warranted.

[‡] There possibly lurks a reference to a demon in the עֲלוּקָה of Pr 30^{15} and some magic ritual connected with it, to which all clue has been lost. See Baudissin's art. 'Feldgeister in PRE^{3} vi. p. 6, and Wellh. Reste Arab. Heidenth.^{2} p. 149.

As a matter of fact, however, the mass of the people could not be delivered from the influences of their time, and troubled themselves little about the religious scruples of their teachers, and, like the Greeks and Romans, Egyptians and Babylonians, were delivered up to the superstitious tendencies and practices of their age. Hence the Mishna, Sota ix. 13, deplores that jealousy and magic were ruining society. Indeed we even hear of distinguished Rabbis practising magic, e.g. Eliezer, son of Hyrcanus, who at the request of Akiba was able, through a charm, to fill an entire field with gourds, and by means of another formula to transfer them to a single place (Sanhedrin 68*a* in Blau, p. 26). Jesus Christ was regarded by His countrymen as a magician, and was called by them Bal'am, Sanh. 106*b*, Sota 47*b*. According to the Gospel narrative (Mt 12$^{24ff.}$), He was even called a sorcerer who worked His wonders in league with Beelzebub. Tobit, ch. 6, clearly illustrates how thoroughly demonology and magic practices had taken hold of the Jewish people. This tradition even influenced dress (see FRINGES, PHYLACTERIES, and cf. Lk 8^{44}); also dwelling-houses (mĕzûzôth, Dt 6$^{8.9}$, see Driver, ad loc.).

We have no space to describe with any fulness of detail the great world of Jewish magic and the spells which were employed. These consisted of special formulæ in which certain names were recited (see AMULETS, DEMON, EXORCISM, and Brecher's Das Transcendentale, Magie u. mag. Heilarten im Talmud). Certain magical practices were forbidden as heathenish (Brecher, p. 192 ff.); on the other hand, special formulæ, involving the invocation of angels and the pronunciation of words, whereby certain evils were counteracted or diseases healed, were not only permitted but even recommended. The personal names of the celestial hierarchy which are most potent are given on p. 21 ff. of Brecher's treatise. We cite the translation of one formula among the large number given by this writer and Blau. It is a remedy against an ulcerous swelling. The original may be found in Brecher, p. 198 ff.: 'Baz Bazia, Mas Masia, Kas Kassia, Sharlai and Amarlai [cf. p. 38, and Shabb. 67*a*], the angels which came from the land of Sodom to heal painful sores. May the colour not become redder, not extend further; may the seed be absorbed in the belly. And as a mule does not propagate itself, so may the evil not propagate itself in the body of N., son of N.'

Against possession by devils: 'Cursed, broken in pieces and conjured be the demon named Bar Ṭîṭ, Bar Tamâ, Bar Tînâ,' etc.

Most potent of all names in these spells was that of God, expressed in every conceivable form, sometimes as הַשֵּׁם, sometimes as the tetragrammaton itself. This subject, as well as the great variety of modes in which the sacred Hebrew name appears in Egyptian magic papyri, will be found fully set forth in Blau's instructive work, pp. 117–144.

The survey of this strange world of abject superstition and triviality enables us to realize in some measure the nature of those methods whereby the Pharisees professed to exorcize demons in the days of our Lord (Mt 12^{27}), and of those arts which Elymas[†] the sorcerer employed (Ac 13^{8}) and Simon Magus (Ac 8^{9}). In Ephesus the Apostle Paul was confronted with this realm of magical superstition in its most aggravated form, for Ephesus was the greatest centre of Græco-Oriental life in Asia Minor. From this city came the famous Ἐφέσια γράμματα, frequently employed in conjurations.[*] Probably these and a vast number of other magic formulæ of incantation, resembling those found in recently discovered Egyptian papyri, were recorded in the magic treatises, worth 50,000 drachmas, which were publicly burned in Ephesus through the influence of St. Paul's preaching (Ac 19^{19}). Deissmann in his Bibelstudien, p. 26 ff., has published a long inscription of singular interest engraved on a leaden tablet (of which he gives a facsimile) discovered in 1890 in the necropolis of the ancient Hadrumetum, in which a spirit is conjured by Domitiana, daughter of Candida, to cause Urbanus to be united to her in marriage speedily. The most remarkable characteristic of this long document of 47 lines is that we have not a single heathen deity invoked, but only Jehovah under the forms Jao, Aoth, and Abaoth, and many others.[†] The origin of the first form Ιαω as an abbreviation of יהוה can hardly be doubted in this case and in those of the Abraxas[‡] gems and amulets. Aoth and Abaoth are obviously abbreviations taken from the name צְבָאוֹת (see Blau, p. 102 ff.).

Another remarkable feature in this and in other documents is the powerful influence exercised by Judaism and afterwards by Christianity on the Hellenistic and Roman heathen world. In an instructive chapter on this subject in Schürer's GJV^{3} iii. p. 297 ff., useful citations may be found (n. 86) from Origen, c. Cels. iv. 33, to prove that in the closing years of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd cent. A.D., nearly every one (σχεδὸν καὶ πάντας) who used spells and incantations invoked the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in order to avert the power of demons. From Hippolytus, Philosophumen. iv. 28, we learn that the magicians made use of Hebrew words as well as Greek, stress being evidently laid on the original form of the name or word, no translation having any efficacy. Further illustrations of this literature will be found in Schürer (see esp. the citation from Kenyon's Greek papyri in the British Museum, and from the Carthage tablets on p. 298, footn. 88). Jewish literature of the Christian era abounded in magical works. In the Book of Jubilees, ch. 10, mention is made of a pseudepigraphic treatise by Noah on healing, and Gaster's recently published magical book, The Sword of Moses, is another striking illustration. The name of Solomon is constantly associated with magic prescriptions and formulæ (comp. Kohut, Jüdische Angelol. p. 81 ff., and Joseph. Ant. VIII. ii. 5), and this tradition survived to the Middle Ages. We find an echo of it in Goethe's drama, in the words addressed to Faust's poodle—

> 'On this mongrel brood of Hell
> The charm of Solomon worketh well.'

Will magic ever die? Lehmann's instructive treatise exhibits its present wide prevalence. Even with the marvellous advance of modern culture, its power does not disappear as rapidly as might be expected. In pre-Christian times the growth of civilization only produced more highly developed forms of magic. Religion and religious philosophy were accompanied by hosts of γοῆτες. Modern spiritualism points to a factor in human life which nothing will eradicate unless man is to become ultimately an acquiescent machine. As long as he continues to live, he will attempt to defy the limitations that surround him. It is this very sense of limitations that stimulates these abnormal endeavours to transcend them in modes that lie beyond the ascertained lines of cause and effect.

'The magi bid those possessed with demons recite to themselves and name the Ephesian formulæ.' Hesych. says respecting these: 'They were once [six] in number, but subsequently others were deceptively added. It is said that these are the names of the first: ἄσκι, κατάσκι, αἴξ, τετράξ, δαμναμενεύς, αἴσιον.' Explanations of these names follow, based evidently on etymological guesswork.

[†] The names of the patriarchs occur under the forms Αβρααν, Ιακου, Ισραμα.

[‡] This refers to a special series of amulets inscribed with the word Αβρασαξ or Αβραξας, either alone or in combination with others. On this subject the student should consult Drexler's elaborate article in PRE^{3}, vol. i. s. 'Abrasax.'

MAGISTRATE.—This word is used several times in AV, where it represents different words in the original. At Jg 18^{7}, where it is said of Laish, 'there was no magistrate in the land that might put them to shame in anything' (וְאֵין־מַכְלִים דָּבָר בָּאָרֶץ יוֹרֵשׁ עֶצֶר), the meaning of the expression has been much discussed and is confessedly obscure; but it probably denotes, not any particular office, but the more general idea of 'some one possessing power of restraint,' or as in RV 'possessing authority.'* At Ezr 7^{25}, where Ezra is directed to appoint 'magistrates and judges,' the first word (שָׁפְטִין) is the Aram. form of what is in Hebrew the usual expression for 'judges' (shōphĕṭîm, which reappears in the Carthaginian sufetes). At Lk 12^{11} 'magistrates' represents the general word (ἀρχαί) for 'ruling powers,' and is better rendered as in RV 'rulers'; while at Lk 12^{58} the 'magistrate' (ἄρχων) to whom it pertains to receive a complaint appears to denote a local authority of somewhat higher position than the 'judge' (κριτής) to whom he remits the case. At Tit 3^{1} the phrase 'to obey magistrates' represents the compound verb πειθαρχεῖν, which may probably be better rendered as in RV by the simple 'to be obedient.' But the principal use of the word 'magistrates' is in Ac 16, where it denotes the chief authorities of the Roman colony of Philippi. When Paul and Silas were dragged into the market-place before the 'rulers' (ἄρχοντας, i.e. the local city-judges), the charge against them resolved itself into one of political disturbance, conflicting with the allegiance due to Roman authority, and the accused were brought unto 'the magistrates' whose duty it was to deal with it (the στρατηγοί, $16^{20. 22. 35. 36. 38}$). These were the duumviri or prætores,† as they were called in towns which were colonies. They had officers in attendance on them to execute their orders, called 'serjeants' (EV) or 'lictores'; but in this case they exceeded their powers, and when they were made aware that the prisoners whom they had ordered to be scourged were entitled to the privileges of Roman citizens, they were glad in turn to become suppliants that the released captives might leave the city.

MAGNIFICAL.—The old adj. 'magnifical' is retained by AV in 1 Ch 22^{5} from the Geneva version, and it is still kept in RV—'the house that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnifical'—though the word has long since been displaced by 'magnificent.' The adv. occurs in Rhem. NT, Lk 16^{19} 'There was a certaine riche man, and he was clothed with purple and silke: and he fared every day magnifically.'

MAGOG (מָגוֹג, Μαγώγ).—Enumerated among the sons of Japheth between Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes) in Gn 10^{2}. Ezekiel (38^{2}) calls Gog 'the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' of 'the land of Magog.' In Rev 20^{8}, Gog and Magog are alike made representatives of the northern nations. If Gog is Gyges of Lydia, Magog would be Lydia, and we should have to explain Magog as signifying 'the country of Gog' (but see Dillm. on Gn 10^{2}, where this explanation, which is that of Ed. Meyer [Gesch. § 464], is emphatically rejected). It is noteworthy that môys meant 'land' in the Lydian language, and that the Assyr. inscriptions give the name of a district in Armenia as indifferently Ma-Zamua and Zamua. In any case, as Meshech and Tubal were nations of E. Asia Minor, Magog would seem to have been in the same part of the world, and its association with Gomer in Gn 10^{2} would be explained by the Cimmerian settlements in Asia Minor. Cappadocia is even called Gamir by Armenian writers. Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 1) identifies Magog with the Scythians; but the term Scythian was used vaguely to denote almost any northern population about which little was known.

The prophecy of Ezk 38^{2}–39^{6} was the source of the constantly recurring notion in Apocalyptic literature that Israel's enemies would be finally destroyed at the advent of the Messiah (see Literature below, and cf. Rev 20^{2}). In the Assumption of Moses, where there is no mention of the Messiah, this final destruction is the work of God Himself, as it is also in Enoch, where the Messiah appears after the judgment. Gog and Magog not only meet us in Rev, but recur constantly in the 'antichrist-Apocalypses' (see Bousset, Antichrist, Index, s. 'Gog u. Magog').

Jer 20^{4} explains, 'For thus saith J", Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself and all thy friends.' The phrase occurs also (not as a name) in Ps 31^{13}, Jer 6^{25} 20^{10} 46^{5} 49^{29}, La 2^{22}; where LXX has similar translations to the above, except Jer 49^{29} ἀπώλειαν. MAHALALEL (מַהֲלַלְאֵל* 'praise of God,' cf. the name יְהַלֲלְאֵל Jehallelel, 'he shall praise God'; Μαλελεήλ).—1. Son of Kenan and great-grandson of Seth, Gn $5^{12. 13. 15. 16. 17}$ (P)=1 Ch 1^{2}. The name corresponds to Mehujael (מְחוּיָאֵל) in J's list, Gn 4^{18}. See Mehujael. 3^{37}, RV has Mahalaleel, AV (following the Greek, Μαλελεήλ) Maleleel. 2. The son of Perez, who dwelt at Jerusalem after the Captivity, Neh 11^{4} (B Μαλελήμ).

MAHALATH (מַחֲלַת).—1. (Μαελέθ) A daughter of Ishmael, and wife of Esau, Gn 28^{9} (P). In Gn 26^{34} (also P) a 'Hittite' wife of Esau is mentioned whose name was Basemath, and in 36^{3} (prob. R) this Basemath is called daughter of Ishmael (Sam. has here and throughout ch. 36 מחלת, which, however, may be a harmonistic correction). The whole subject of Esau's marriages is wrapt in obscurity (see Comms. of Dillm. and Holzinger, and art. ESAU in vol. i. of this Dictionary, p. 734^{a}, note). 2. (Μολ(λ)άθ) Wife of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 11^{18}. She was the daughter of Jerimoth, one of David's sons, and hence a cousin of Rehoboam.

MAHANAIM (מַחֲנַיִם 'two camps' or 'hosts' (?); the LXX renders by Παρεμβολαί Gn 32^{2}, 1 K 2^{8}, ἡ παρεμβολή 2 S 2^{29}; in Jos, B has Βαάν (Μαάν), Μαανά, Καμέιν, A Μανάιμ; in 2 S, B A Μανάεμ, Μανάειμ, Μααναειμ (17^{24} A Μανάειν); 1 K 4^{14} B Μααναιεῖον, A Μαανάιμ; 1 Ch 6^{80} B Μαανάιθ, A Μαανάιμ).—An important city on the E. of Jordan, of which the exact site is unknown. The above explanation of the name is due to J, whose narrative (Gn 32^{3-13a}, esp. vv.$^{7-10}$ 'two companies,' and v.^{13a} 'and he lodged there that night') indicates that it originally contained an explanation of the manner in which the place obtained its name: probably this was omitted as inconsistent with v.^{2}. In E, on the other hand, nothing is known of the dual meaning of the word, the forms Maḥanaim, Maḥaneh (מַחֲנַיִם, מַחֲנֶה) being used indifferently (32^{2} 'This is God's host' (maḥaneh), v.^{21} 'and he himself lodged that night in Maḥaneh (not as RV 'in the company')).* According to Gn $32^{1f.}$ (vv.$^{1.2\ 13b ff.}$ E, vv.$^{3-13a}$ J) Jacob was here confronted by a vision of angels after he had parted from Laban on the mountain range of Gilead. No further mention is made of Mahanaim until after the conquest of Palestine by Joshua, when it is described as lying on the border between Gad and Manasseh (Jos $13^{26.30}$). According to Jos 21^{38} it was one of the cities of Gad assigned to the priestly family of Merari.

It was, however, more especially during the early period of the monarchy that Mahanaim came into prominence. Owing possibly to the timely assistance which Saul had rendered to the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead at the commencement of his reign (1 S $11^{1f.}$), the country E. of Jordan long remained faithful to the house of its deliverer. Hence it was that, after the death of Saul, Abner established Ishbaal (Ishbosheth) as king of Israel at Mahanaim, in opposition to David, who reigned over Judah in Hebron (2 S $2^{8f.}$). From Mahanaim Abner started on the expedition to Gibeon, which, resulting in the defeat of the Israelite forces at the hand of Joab and his Benjamite followers, proved to be the turning-point in the struggle between the rival kings. In their flight it is stated that Abner and his men passed through the Arabah along the right side of the Jordan, and thence made their way across Jordan and up the gorge (RV 'Bithron') to Mahanaim. Despite this reverse the war between the house of Saul and David still continued until the murder of Ishbaal, which followed soon after the defection and death of Abner, left David in sole command. Presumably, the tribes on the E. of Jordan joined in the universal recognition of David as king and acknowledged his rule. That they proved faithful to the new monarch is shown by the fact that David, when driven from Jerusalem by the rebellion of Absalom, at once directed his flight to the capital of his former rival and was there royally received by the chief men of the country, among whom was a son of his former ally, Nahash the Ammonite (2 S 17^{24-27}). The encounter between the forces of David and those of Absalom took place in the Forest of Ephraim (which see), apparently the wooded district of Gilead which lay opposite to Ephraim on the E. of Jordan.* Information of the defeat of Absalom's army was conveyed to the king, who had remained in Mahanaim, by Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, who, running by the way of the plain (הַכִּכָּר=the circle of Jordan, Smith, HGHL p. 505), outstripped the previous messenger who had been sent by Joab (2 S 18^{23}). Apart from a possible reference in Ca 6^{13} (RVm 'of two companies,' LXX τῶν παρεμβολῶν), Mahanaim occurs only once more, as the dwelling-place of one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4^{14}).

From the above sketch of the history of Mahanaim it will be seen that the biblical narrative affords but little assistance in identifying its exact site. From Gn 32 it seems clear that it lay somewhere near the Jordan to the N. of the Jabbok and of the great gorge (or Bithron, 2 S 2^{29}). According to Jos 13 it was situated on the border of Gad and Manasseh, a position which agrees with the history of the monarchy. Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 179 ff.) places it near el-Buḳeï'a, to the E. of es-Salt; but this is too far south. More probable is the view of Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 433 ff.), who identifies Mahanaim with Khurbet Suleikhat, at the entrance of the Wady Suleikhat, 3 miles N. of the Wady 'Ajlun. He points out that the present ruins stand some 300 feet above the plain, and command an extensive view across the valley to the W., and down the valley almost to the juncture of Wady Zerḳa (Jabbok) with the Jordan. This situation agrees admirably with the details supplied in 2 S 18, according to which the watchman of Mahanaim discerned the Cushite and Ahimaaz from a considerable distance (v.$^{24ff.}$) It also throws light on the statement of v.^{23} ('Then Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain'), the point being that Ahimaaz chose the longer but more level route along the plain, and so outstripped the Cushite, who made his way across the intervening hilly country. Earlier travellers (Seetzen, Reisen, i. 385; Robinson, Phys. Geogr. p. 78 f.) place Mahanaim at the modern Maḥne, which according to the old Jewish traveller Parchi (Benj. of Tudela, ii. 408) lay about half a day's journey due E. of Bethshean. The latter statement is certainly erroneous, but in any case Maḥne is too far from the Jordan, and its position in the midst of the mountains of Gilead does not suit the narrative of 2 S. Buhl, however (GAP p. 257), seems to place Maḥne (or Miḥne) considerably farther S., slightly to the N. of the Wady 'Ajlun; the latter he would then identify with the gorge (or Bithron) of 2 S 2^{29} (ib. p. 121). J. F. STENNING.

* It seems probable that Mahanaim is yet another instance of a place-name with an apparently dual termination which has arisen from a later expansion of the original termination in -ām and -ēm (or -ān and -ēn). The most striking instance of this change is יְרוּשָׁלַםִ (Jerusalem), which represents the Ḳerê perpetuum for an original יְרוּשָׁלֵם (Aram. יְרוּשְׁלֶם). Similarly in Aramaic we find שָׁמְרָן=שָׁמְרַיִן for the Heb. שֹׁמְרוֹן (Samaria), while the Mesha inscription affords several examples of the termination in ָן (-ān), which in Hebrew is represented by ַיִם (-aim). Other cases in Hebrew are Dothain (דֹּתַיִן Gn 37^{17}) and Dothan (דֹּתָן 2 K 6^{13}); Ḳartan (קַרְתָּן Jos 21^{32}) and Ḳiriathaim (קִרְיָתַיִם 1 Ch $6^{76\,(61)}$), and Enam (הָעֵינָם Jos 15^{34})=Enaim (עֵינַיִם Gn 38^{21}). * It is noteworthy that Luc. gives Μααινάν, i.e. Maḥanaim instead of Ephraim, but this may be only a correction; see Smith, HGHL p. 335^{2}; Buhl, GAP p. 121; Budde, Ri. u. Sam. p. 34 ff.

MAHANEH-DAN (מַחֲנֵה־דָן, παρεμβολὴ Δάν).—The name occurs twice: in Jg 18^{12} of a place 'behind,' i.e. W. of Kiriath-jearim, in Jg 13^{25} of a place between Zorah and Eshtaol, where Samson began his work. Whether one identifies Kiriath-jearim (which see) with Khirbet 'Erma or with Abū Ghōsh, it is scarcely possible to take both these references to be to the same place. Nor has the name been found. It is true that Williams (Holy City, i. 12, note) had a site pointed out to him, north of Wady Ismail, as bearing the name Beit Mahanem. Both name and situation are tempting, but the statement lacks confirmation. Guérin (Judée, i. p. 62 ff.) places the Mahaneh-dan of 18^{12} near 'Abou-Goch,' but he ignores the other. Moore on Jg 13^{25} accepts the position assigned to Mahaneh-dan in 18^{12}, and thinks there is no support for the supposition that there were two camps of Dan. It seems probable, however, that the name, since it was never attached to a town, was floating rather loosely in this quarter of Palestine. The author of 13^{25} then understood it to refer to the original war-camp which the Danites occupied at the time of the conquest, before their permanent settlement; the author of the clause in 18^{12} took it to be the name of the first camp which the 600 Danites occupied outside their own territory when they marched northward to attack Laish. (Cf. ZDPV x. p. 137 with Guthe's note). A. C. WELCH.

MAHARAI (מַהֲרַי; B Νοερέ, Νεερέ, Μεηρά; A Μαεραεί, Μοορά, Μοοραί).—A native of Netophah in Judah, the modern Beit Nettîf (Buhl, GAP p. 194), in the Wady es-Sunt, or Vale of Elah, the third of the five valleys which, cutting right through the Shephēlah, connected the Philistine plain with the hill-country of Judæa. Maharai was one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{28}, 1 Ch 11^{30}), and according to 1 Ch 27^{13} was of the family of Zerah, and captain of the temple guard for the tenth monthly course. J. F. STENNING.

MAHATH (מַחַת).—1. The eponym of a Kohathite family, 1 Ch 6^{35} [Heb.^{20}] (B Μέθ, A Μαάθ), 2 Ch 29^{12} (B Μαάθ, A Μαέθ), perhaps to be identified with Ahimoth (אֲחִימוֹת 'my brother is death') of 1 Ch 6^{25} [Heb.^{10}], B Ἀλειμώθ. See Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 281, note 1. 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Ch 31^{13} (B Μαέθ, A Ναέθ).

MAHAVITE, THE (הַמַּחֲוִים).—The designation in 1 Ch 11^{46} of Eliel, one of David's heroes. The MT is unintelligible and certainly corrupt. Bertheau proposes to emend to הַמַּחֲנַיְמִי 'the Mahanaimite'; Kittel, following the Vulg. Mahumites, reads הַמַּחוּמִי. LXX B has Μιεί, A Μαωείν.

MAHAZIOTH (מַחֲזִיאוֹת and מַחֲזִיאֹת 'visions'; B Μελζώθ, A Μααζιώθ).—The Hemanite chief of the 23rd course of singers, 1 Ch $25^{4.\,30}$. On the extraordinary conglomeration of names in v.^{4} and the supposition that they are really a fragment of a hymn, see W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 143, note 1, and art. GENEALOGY, vol. ii. p. 124^{b}.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (מַהֵר שָׁלָל חָשׁ בַּז 'spoil speedeth, prey hasteth'; LXX, v.^{1} τοῦ ὀξέως προνομὴν ποιῆσαι σκύλων, v.^{3} ταχέως σκύλευσον ὀξέως προνόμευσον; Is $8^{1.\,3}$).—A symbolical name given to one of Isaiah's sons to signify the speedy destruction of the power of the allied kings Rezin and Pekah by the king of Assyria. The prophecy was fulfilled in the invasion of the North in the following year (734) by Tiglath-pileser, who entirely crushed Rezin, and took many cities of Israel and devastated the country (2 K 15^{29} 16^{9}), though the actual capture of Samaria did not take place till 13 years later (721). F. H. WOODS.

MAHLAH (מַחְלָה; as a proper name it is thus vocalized in order to distinguish it from the common noun מַחֲלָה 'sickness'; but some of the LXX forms show that this distinction was not observed in the living language, and doubtless the meaning is identical; LXX Μαλά, Μααλά, Μαελά, Μοολά).—1. In Nu 26^{33} 27^{1} 36^{11}, Jos 17^{3}, the name of one of the five daughters of the Manassite Zelophehad. Probably she was the eldest, for the MT always puts her at the head; and although B of the LXX reverses the order in Nu 36^{11}, A and F retain the ordinary arrangement. P, to whom all the passages in question belong, states that Zelophehad left no sons, and consequently the daughters came before Moses and claimed their father's inheritance, lest his name should become extinct. By the divine direction their claim was allowed, the only condition being that they were obliged to marry within the limits of their tribe. Accordingly Mahlah and her sisters married their cousins. The narrative illustrates the well-known Israelite law that property was inherited in the male line, and could descend to females only if they married within tribal limits. This has been variously accounted for, by some on the ground that women were incapable of performing one of the duties which property involved, that of offering sacrifice to dead ancestors (Schwally, Leben nach dem Tode, Stade, Geschichte, i. 388–391), by others in accordance with the Arab maxim that 'none can be heirs who do not take part in battle, drive booty, and protect property' (W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage). In the Midrash Rabba on Numbers the conduct of Mahlah and her sisters serves as a text for the doctrine that 'the women of that generation builded up what the men broke down,' the two other instances being that the women took no part in making the golden calf, and that they did not share the pusillanimity of the men after the alarming report of the spies had been received.

2. In 1 Ch 7^{18} the RV has Mahlah, the AV Mahalah. The former is correct, the Heb. being מַחְלָה as above. The Vulg., which has Maala for Zelophehad's daughter, here employs Mohola or Moola. Most likely the Mahlah of this passage is a female name. The Chronicler is dealing with the genealogy of Manasseh's descendants, tracing them, unlike Nu, along the female line, and stating that Hammolecheth, granddaughter of Manasseh, bare 'Ishhod and Abiezer and Mahlah.' Ishhod and Abiezer are names of men: for this and other reasons it is impossible to identify the Mahlah of Nu with the same name in Chronicles. J. TAYLOR.

MAHLI (מַחְלִי 'a sick or weak one,' from חלה; LXX Μοολεί, Μοολί, Μολί, Μολεί, Μοολλεί; Vulg. Moholi, Mooli).—1. In Ex 6^{19} (AV Mahali), Nu 3^{20}, 1 Ch $24^{26.\,28}$, it is the name of a son of Merari, Levi's youngest son. 2. In 1 Ch 23^{23} 24^{30} a son of Mushi, Mahli's brother, bears the same name. Ezr 8^{18} informs us that whilst Ezra was waiting beside the river Ahava, he secured for the service of the house of God, amongst others, 'a man of discretion, of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi . . . and Sherebiah,' etc. 1 Es 8^{47} drops the 'and,' thus identifying this son of Mahli with Sherebiah. It is more likely, either that the name has dropped out, or that it was something like Ish-sechel (rendered in our versions 'a man of discretion or understanding'). See ISHSECHEL.

Mahlites (הַמַּחְלִי).—In Nu 3^{33} (Vulg. Moholitæ) 26^{58} (Vulg. Moholi) Mahli's descendants are called 'the family of the Mahlites.' According to 1 Ch

23^{22} these Mahlites were descended from the daughters of Eleazar, the elder son of the Mahli mentioned in Ex 6^{19}. Eleazar left no male offspring. Their cousins, the sons of Kish, therefore took them in marriage, and prevented the extinction of their father's name. It is a little curious that in the enumeration of the families derived from Levi, Nu 26^{58}, the LXX omits 'the family of the Mahlites.' J. TAYLOR.

MAHLON.—See CHILION.

MAHOL (מָחוֹל, A Μαούλ, B Μάλ, Luc. Μααλά, Ἠμάων, Jos. Ant. VIII. ii. 5).—Named in 1 K 4^{31} [Heb. 5^{11}] as the father of certain sages with whom Solomon is compared. The expression 'sons of Mahol' has been referred to the four sages, Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, as well as to the last three or the last two only. The Midrash to the Bk. of Proverbs gives it an independent application (Wünsche, Bibl. Rabb. p. 2). It is improbable that all the typical wise men whose names occur to the writer should be regarded as the sons of one man. The Lucianic Sept. (and B ?) reads, 'D. son of Mahol.' But this may not be original. In 1 Ch 2^{6} Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda are sons of Zerah. Unless 'son' be taken in the general sense of descendant (see DARDA), this conflicts with the statement in Kings, whether that be limited to Darda or not. It may be supposed that the Chronicler inferred the ancestry of Zerah (זֶרַח) from the expression Ethan the Ezrahite (הָאֶזְרָחִי), i.e. directly or indirectly from this passage. This is, perhaps, evidence that the phrase 'sons of Mahol' was not in his text of the verse. The appellative significance of Mahol suggests an explanation of its appearance. The word is late rather than early, and means 'dance.' St. Jerome's rendering chorus (Lag. Onom. Sac.^{2} p. 73) should be interpreted in this way, and not in its musical acceptation. The intimate connexion of the temple ritual with the names Ethan and Heman permits a conjecture that the expression 'sons of dance' was originally a note applying to Ethan and Heman. Dancing was part of the worship of J", and מָחוֹל is twice used in the Bk. of Psalms in a ritual sense (149^{3} 150^{4}). Such a note when inserted in the text might readily be given its present position. W. B. STEVENSON.

MAHSEIAH (מַחְסֵיָה).—A priest, grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah, Jer 32^{12} 51^{59} (AV Maaseiah). He is called in Bar 1^{1} Maaseas (Μαασαίας).

MAIANNAS (Μαιάννας, AV Maianeas), 1 Es 9^{48} = MAASEIAH, Neh 8^{7}.

MAID, MAIDEN.—Several words, easily distinguished in Heb. and Gr., are rendered 'maid' or 'maiden' in AV. 1. נַעֲרָה na'ărâh, a girl, is tr^{d} 'maid' in 2 K $5^{2.\ 4}$, Est $2^{7.\ 9.\ 12}$ 4^{4} (all 'maiden' in RV), Am 2^{7}; and 'maiden' in Ex 2^{5}, Ru $2^{8.\ 22.\ 23}$ 3^{2}, 1 S 9^{11}, Est $2^{4.\ 8.\ 9\ \textit{bis}\ 13}$ 4^{16}, Job 41^{5}, Pr 9^{3} 27^{27} 31^{15}, all retained in RV. 2. עַלְמָה 'almâh, a young woman (see under IMMANUEL, vol. ii. p. 454), is rendered 'maid' in Ex 2^{8}, Pr 30^{19}. 3. בְּתוּלָה bĕthûlâh, a virgin, is tr^{d} 'maid' in Ex 22^{16} (RV 'virgin'), Job 31^{1}, Jer 2^{32} 51^{22}, La 5^{11} (RV 'maiden'), Ezk 9^{6} (RV 'maiden'), Zec 9^{17}; and 'maiden' in Jg 19^{24}, 2 Ch 36^{17}, Ps 78^{63} 148^{12}, Ezk 44^{22} (RV 'virgin'). Also לֹא מָצָאתִי לָהּ בְּתוּלִים is tr^{d} in AV 'I found her not a maid' in Dt $22^{14.\ 17}$. 4. אָמָה 'âmâh, a maidservant, is often rendered 'handmaid' or 'maidservant,' but also simply 'maid' in Gn 30^{3}, Ex 2^{5} (RV 'handmaid') $21^{20.\ 26}$, Lv 25^{6}, Ezr 2^{65} (RV 'maidservant'), Job 19^{5}, Nah 2^{7} (RV 'handmaid'). 5. שִׁפְחָה shiphḥâh, a maidservant, female attendant, is tr^{d} 'maid' in Gn $16^{2.\ 3.\ 5.\ 6.\ 8}$ $29^{24.\ 29}$ $30^{7.\ 9.\ 10.\ 12}$, Is 24^{2}; and 'maiden' in Gn 30^{18}, Ps 123^{2}, Ec 2^{7}: RV has 'handmaid' for 'maid' in all the passages except Is 24^{2}, but retains 'maiden' except in Gn 30^{18} ('handmaid').

Notice also the obsol. expression 'maid child' for נְקֵבָה in Lv 12^{5}, retained in RV. It comes from Tindale, who has the similar rendering in Ex 1^{16} 'When ye mydwive the women of the Ebrues and se in the byrth tyme that it is a boye, kyll it. But if it be a mayde, let it lyve.'

In Apocr. and NT we find the following words translated maid: 1. κοράσιον, a girl, To $6^{12.\ 13}$, Sus $^{15.\ 19}$, Mt $9^{24.\ 25}$ (both 'damsel' in RV). 2. παιδίσκη, a young woman, a maidservant, To 3^{7} $8^{12.\ 13}$ (RV all 'maidservant'), Jth 10^{10} (RV 'handmaid'), Sir 41^{22}, Sus ^{36}, Mk $14^{66.\ 69}$, Lk 22^{56}; παιδίσκη is also rendered 'maiden' in Lk 12^{45} (RV 'maidservant'). 3. παῖς, a young person, usually male, also used for a servant or attendant, is tr^{d} 'maid' in Lk 8^{54} (RV 'maiden'), and 'maiden' in 8^{51}. 4. παρθένος, a virgin, is tr^{d} 'maid' in Jth 9^{2} (RV 'virgin'). 5. ἅβρα, a maidservant, is tr^{d} 'maid' in Jth $10^{2.\ 5}$ 13^{9} 16^{23}, Ad. Est 15^{7}. 6. δούλη, a female slave, is rendered 'maid' in Jth 12^{19} (RV 'servant').

We thus see that AV, according to its principle, varies the words indefinitely and almost indifferently. RV lays down the principle that as far as possible the same word in Heb. or Gr. should be rendered by the same word in Eng., but the only case in which a serious effort is made to carry it out is in the rendering of shiphḥâh. Except in three passages, that word is rendered 'handmaid.' One of the exceptions is Is 24^{2}, where the assonance between 'mistress' and 'maid' is allowed to stand; the other two are particularly unfortunate, since there is little reason for departing from the rule of uniformity in Ps 123^{2} and less in Ec 2^{7}, and especially since the word 'maiden,' which is retained, is no longer used for a servant. Even Shakespeare, who uses 'maiden' freely in the sense of 'virgin,' never has it in the sense of 'servant.' J. HASTINGS.

MAKAZ (מָקַץ, Μαγχάς Luc.; Μαχμάς A and Μαχεμάς B are probably erroneous forms due to confusion with the more familiar name Michmash, which the Sept. transliterates by Μαχμάς or Μακμάς).—One of five places (MT four) which compose, or identify, the second of the 12 Solomonic prefectures (1 K 4^{9}). The probable identifications of (Shaalbim) Bethshemesh and Elon (= Aijalon) show that it was situated on the western slopes of Judah, but the exact site remains uncertain. Two of the towns in the same group are elsewhere assigned to the territory of Dan. The spellings Μακές (Euseb. in Lag. Onom.^{2}) and Macces or Maces (Vulg., Jerome) may be compared with Jerome's derivation (de fine) from קֵץ a boundary (Lag. Onom. Sac.^{2} p. 73). W. B. STEVENSON.

MAKE.—The verb to 'make' is used in AV both transitively and intransitively, and is so retained in RV, though the intrans. use is now obsolete. In both forms it has some constructions and meanings that need attention.

1. With the meaning of to cause it is followed by the infin., sometimes with and sometimes without to:* 2 Ch 7^{20} 'This house, which I have sanctified for my name, will I cast out of my sight, and will make it to be a proverb and a byword among all nations' (RV 'I will make it a proverb'); 8^{8} 'them did Solomon make to pay tribute'; Jer 34^{17} 'I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth'; and Dn 7^{4} 'it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man' (RV 'made to stand'). Cf. Shaks. Comedy of Errors, II. i. 26, 'This servitude makes you to keep unwed'; Hamlet, III. iii. 186, 'Make you to ravel all this matter out'; and (without to) Tempest, I. ii. 172—

> 'Here
> Have I, thy schoolmaster, made thee more profit
> Than other princesses can that have more time
> For vainer hours and tutors not so careful.'

2. 'Make' was once common in the simple sense of 'do.' There is a single example in AV, Jg 18^{3} 'What makest thou in this place?' (מָה־אַתָּה עֹשֶׂה בָּזֶה; RV 'What doest thou in this place?' Wyc. [1382] 'What here dost thow?' [1388] 'What doist thou here?' Cov. 'What makest thou here?'). Cf. Spenser, FQ VII. vi. 25—

> 'Whence art thou, and what doost thou here now make?
> What idle errand hast thou earths mansion to forsake?'

3. In Jn 8^{53} 'Whom makest thou thyself?' (ποιεῖς), and 19^{7} 'he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God' (ἐποίησεν), the meaning is 'claim to be,' almost 'pretend to be.' This meaning of 'pretend' or 'feign' is seen in Jos 8^{15} 'Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten'; 9^{4} 'They did work wilily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors'; and Lk 24^{28} 'He made as though he would have gone further.' But even without 'as if' the verb is once used in this sense, 2 S 13^{5} 'Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick' (הִתְחָל; LXX μαλακίσθητι; Vulg. languorem simula; Wyc. 'feyn sijknes'; Cov. 'make the sicke'; RV 'feign thyself sick'; cf. v.^{6} 'So Amnon lay down, and made himself sick,' RV 'and feigned himself sick'). With Lk 24^{28} cf. Ps 28^{1} Cov. 'thinke no scorne of me, lest (yf thou make the as though thou herdest not) I become like them, that go downe in to ye pytte'; and with 2 S 13^{5} cf. Shaks. Two Gent. I. ii. 102—

> 'She makes it strange; but she would be best pleased
> To be so anger'd with another letter.'

4. There are some phrases: (1) Make ado, Mk 5^{39} 'Why make ye this ado, and weep?' Cf. Nu 16^{7} Tind. 'Ye make ynough to doo ye childern of Levi.' See ADO. (2) Make away=destroy, Dn 11^{44} 'he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many' (לְהַשְׁמִיד וּלְהַחֲרִים רַבִּים; LXX ἀφανίσαι καὶ ἀποκτεῖναι πολλούς; Vulg. ut conterat et interficiat plurimos; Wyc. [1382] 'for to breke to gydre, and slea ful manye,' [1388] 'to al to-breke, and to sle ful many men'; Gen. 'to destroy and roote out many'; Dou. 'to destroy and kil very manie'); 1 Mac 16^{22} 'he laid hands on them that were come to destroy him, and slew them; for he knew that they sought to make him away' (αὐτὸν ἀπολέσαι; RV 'to destroy him'). Cf. Dt 32^{26} Tind. 'I have determened to scater them therowout the worlde, and to make awaye the remembraunce of them from amonge men'; Mt 27^{20} Rhem. 'But the cheefe Priestes and auncients persuaded the people, that they should aske Barabbas, and make Iesus away'; Spenser, On Ireland, 'Clarence . . . soon after, by sinister means, was clean made away'; and Shaks. As You Like It, v. i. 58, 'I kill thee, make thee away, translate thy life into death.' (3) Make for=help, Ezk 17^{17} 'Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army and great company make for him in the war' (יַעֲשֶׂה אוֹתוֹ בַמִּלְחָמָה; LXX ποιήσει πρὸς αὐτὸν πόλεμον; Vulg. faciet contra eum prœlium; Wyc. 'make batayle agens hym'; Cov. 'maynteyne him in the warre,' after whom the correct translation is found, except Dou. 'make battel agaynst him'); Ro 14^{19} 'Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace' (τὰ τῆς εἰρήνης; Vulg. quæ pacis sunt; Wyc. 'tho thingis that ben of pees': we owe the idiomatic tr. 'which make for peace' to Tindale). Tind. in a note to Lv 13 says, 'This chapter maketh not for confession in the eare, but is an example of excommunicacion off open sinners.' The phrase is not obsolete, it occurs in M. Arnold's famous definition (Lit. and Dogma, i.) 'The not ourselves which is in us and all around us became to them adorable eminently and altogether as a power which makes for righteousness,' but no doubt this is a recollection of Ro 14^{19}. In older Eng. the phrase was often make to, as Udal's Erasmus' NT, ii. fol. 283, 'those thinges that are availeable to the life of heaven, and make to the glory of Christ'; and Davenant (Fuller's Life, 314), 'I shewed no letter or instructions, neither have any but these generall instructions, which King James gave us at our going to Dort, which make little or nothing to this business.' (4) Make up=put together, complete, Ezr 5^{3} 'Who hath commanded you to build this house, and to make up this wall?' (RV 'to finish this wall'); Ezk 13^{5} 'Ye have not gone into the gaps, neither made up the hedge'; Mal 3^{17} 'And they shall be mine, saith the LORD of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels' (וְהָיָה לִי . . . לַיּוֹם אֲשֶׁר אֲנִי עֹשֶׂה סְגֻלָּה; LXX Καὶ ἔσονταί μοι . . . εἰς ἡμέραν ἣν ἐγὼ ποιῶ εἰς περιποίησιν; Vulg. Et erunt mihi . . . in die qua ego facio, in peculium, whence Wyc. 'And thei shuln be to me . . . in the day in whiche Y shal make, into a special tresoure,' and Cov. 'And in the daye that I wil make . . . they shalbe myne owne possession,' and that is no doubt the correct rendering; so RV 'And they shall be mine . . . in the day that I do make, even a peculiar treasure,' or more clearly in marg. 'in the day that I do this,' which is the tr. of the Geneva Version *); 2 Co 9^{5} 'and make up beforehand your bounty' (προκαταρτίσωσι). Cf. Shaks. Rich. III. I. i. 21—

> 'Sent before my time
> Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
> And that so lamely and unfashionable
> That dogs bark at me as I halt by them';

Timon, V. i. 101—

> 'Remain assured
> That he's a made-up [=perfect] villain';

and in a slightly different sense, Knox, Hist. 177, 'oppress the inhabitants thereof, and make up strangers with their lands and goods.'

5. Among the archaic uses of 'make' we find it followed by a subst., the two together expressing no more than a verb formed from the subst. would express, as 'make request'=request, 'make provision'=provide. In almost every instance the Heb. or Gr. is a verb and no more. Thus (1) make account, Ps 144^{3} 'Lord, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him! or the son of man, that thou makest account of him!' (וַתְּחַשְּׁבֵהוּ; LXX ὅτι λογίζῃ αὐτόν). So Shaks. Rich. III. III. ii. 71—

> 'The princes both make high account of you';

Milton, PR ii. 193—

> 'Among the sons of men,
> How many have with a smile made small account
> Of Beauty and her lures, easily scorn'd
> All her assaults, on worthier things intent!'

(2) Make confession, as Dn 9^{4} 'And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession' (וָאֶתְוַדֶּה, RV 'made confession'). (3) Make count, Ex 12^{4} 'Every man according to his eating shall make your count for the lamb' (תָּכֹסּוּ). (4) Make an end, Jg 3^{18} 'And when he had made an end to offer (RV 'an end of offering') the present, he sent away the people that bare the present' (כִּלָּה); Is 33^{1} 'When thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously' (כַּהֲתִימְךָ); 38^{12} 'From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me' (תַּשְׁלִימֵנִי); Jer 4^{27} 'Yet will I not make a full end' (וְכָלָה לֹא אֶעֱשֶׂה). (5) Make inquisition, Dt 19^{18} 'And the judges shall make diligent inquisition' (וְדָרְשׁוּ הֵיטֵב). (6) Make mention, as Ps 87^{4} 'I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me' (אַזְכִּיר). (7) Make matter, Gal 2^{6} 'whatsoever they were it maketh no matter to me' (οὐδέν μοι διαφέρει). Cf. Holland's Livy, p. 247, 'What makes matter, say they, if a bird sing auke or crow cross?' Tindale, Expositions, p. 81, 'Thou wilt say, What matter maketh it if I speak words which I understand not, or if I pray not at all, seeing God knoweth my matter already?' (8) Make merchandise, Dt 21^{14} 24^{7} 'If a man be found stealing any of his brethren of the children of Israel, and maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him, then that thief shall die' (הִתְעַמֶּר־בּוֹ; RV 'deal with him as a slave,' RVm 'as a chattel'); 2 P 2^{3} 'And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you' (ἐμπορεύσονται). Cf. Shaks. Merch. of Venice, III. i. 134, 'Were he out of Venice, I can make what merchandise I will.' (9) Make provision, 1 K 4^{7} 'Each man his month in a year made provision' (יְכַלְכֵּל); Ro 13^{14} 'Make not provision for the flesh' (πρόνοιαν μὴ ποιεῖσθε). (10) Make riddance, Lv 23^{22} 'thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest' (לֹא־תְכַלֶּה; RV 'thou shalt not wholly reap'); Zeph 1^{18} 'he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land' (כָּלָה; RV 'he shall make an end, yea a terrible end'). MAKEBATE.—There was an old Eng. word bate (from Old Fr. batre, to beat) which signified strife, discord. Thus Shadwell, Am. Bigot, i. 1, 'I'll breed no bate nor division between young people.' Sometimes it is a shortened form of 'debate' (from Old Fr. debatre), but more often it is a distinct word. 'Makebate' is a compound of this word, and means a maker of strife. It occurs in the plural in AVm of 2 Ti 3^{3}, Tit 2^{3}, as an alternative tr. of διάβολοι, text 'false accusers'; RV 'slanderers,' which is as old as Wyc. (1388) at Tit 2^{3}. The tr. 'false accusers' is from Tindale. Hall (Works, ii. 74) says of the Pharisees, 'When these censurers thought the Disciples had offended, they speake not to them but to their Master, Why doe thy Disciples that which is not lawfull? Now, when they thought Christ offended, they speak not to him, but to the Disciples. Thus, like true make-bates, they goe about to make a breach in the family of Christ, by setting off the one from the other.' J. HASTINGS.

MAKED (Μακέβ, Μακέδ).—A 'strong and great' city in Gilead (1 Mac $5^{26.\,36}$). The site is unknown.

MAKHELOTH (מַקְהֵלֹת, Μακηλώθ, Luc. Μακηδώθ, Maceloth, Nu $33^{25.\,26}$).—One of the twelve stations in the journeyings of the children of Israel, following Haẓeroth, which are mentioned only in Nu 33. Nothing is known about it. The word occurs Ps 68^{27} [Eng. ^{26}], where it is translated 'congregations.' The occurrence of Ḳeheláthah (a name of similar meaning) in v.^{22} should be noted.

MAKKEDAH (מַקֵּדָה; Μακηδά [in Jos $10^{28.\,29}$ 15^{41} B has Μακηδάν]; Syr. Mokor; Vulg. Maceda).—A royal city of the Canaanites, situated in the Shephēlah or lowland of Judah, mentioned (Jos 15^{41}) with Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah in the list of cities allotted to Judah. The last three are perhaps to be identified with the modern villages of Katrah, Dajûn, Nâ'aneh, and Maḳḳedah with el-Mughâr—all lying in the vicinity of Ludd (Lydda, Diospolis) and Yebnah (Jabneel). It is mentioned ten times (Jos $10^{10\text{ff.}}$ 12^{16} 15^{41}) in connexion with Joshua's great victory in the day when the Lord fought for Israel. Maḳḳedah is first mentioned (Jos 10^{10}) with Azeḳah as one of the two points to which the allied forces were followed by the victorious host of Israel, and they were not necessarily near each other: in the list of cities allotted to Judah they are both stated to be in the Shephēlah, but Azeḳah is in one group of fourteen cities, while Maḳḳedah is in another group of sixteen cities. Azeḳah is mentioned with Adullam, Socoh, and Jarmuth, which have all been found together about 14 miles S.E. of Maḳḳedah.

When the battle had reached these points, it is related (Jos 10^{15}) that Joshua returned and all Israel with him unto the camp to Gilgal, and then the narrative of the battle is resumed and other victories of Joshua recorded, and then again it is stated (v.^{43}) that Joshua returned to Gilgal in the same words. The LXX omits (vv.$^{15.\,43}$) all mention of the return of Joshua to Gilgal, and some commentators propose that at least v.^{15} should be omitted, or even that it should be treated as part of the quotation from the Bk. of Jashar and not as part of the narrative, so that the action of Joshua after leaving Gilgal until the taking of Maḳḳedah is continuous, and occurred on the great day when the sun stood still in the midst of heaven. It appears clear, however, that the passage is composite, the narrative of JE being interrupted by comments and generalizations of D^{2} (see Driver, LOT^{6} 108).

Joshua was in his camp at Gilgal (Jos 10^{6}) in the plains on the east border of Jericho when he received a pressing message from the men of Gibeon, urging him to come up and save them from the kings of the Amorites. Now Gibeon was in the hill-country (present el-Jeb), 3400 ft. above Gilgal and 10 miles distant as the crow flies, but by the rugged devious mountain passes a stiff uphill march of 16 to 18 miles. Joshua went up from Gilgal all night, he and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour, and coming upon the Amorites suddenly and unexpectedly, probably at early dawn while they still slept, he slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them by the way of the pass of the Upper and Lower Beth-horon as far as Azeḳah and Maḳḳedah, over a rough country, a distance of at least 25 miles from Gibeon as the crow flies.

It may have been somewhere in the upper portion of the pass of Beth-horon that Joshua said in the sight of all Israel, 'Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Aijalon.' The expression 'upon (בְּ) Gibeon' rather indicates an early hour when the sun would be rising over the ridge and hills where Gibeon was situated, but Stanley (S. and P. 210) considers that the emphatic expression that the sun stayed in the midst of heaven seems intended to indicate noonday. On the other hand, the geographical conditions, Gibeon being to S.E. and Aijalon to S.W. of the Upper Beth-horon, would indicate some hour midway between sunrise and noon, according to the time of year; while the view also is held by many that the account of the miraculous standing still of the sun, being derived from the poetical Bk. of Jashar, is not to be considered as part of the historical narrative of the Bk. of Joshua (Speaker's Com. Add. notes on Jos $10^{12\text{-}15}$, and Dillmann, in loc.).

It is evident from our present knowledge of the surrounding country, that if the attack of Joshua took place at early dawn, and the flight of the Amorites immediately followed, consequent on their being taken by surprise, the force of Joshua may have been at Beth-horon two hours after sunrise and at Maḳḳedah from eight to ten hours after sunrise, so that the circumstances related as having taken place on the great day may have occurred within the limits of an ordinary day at any time of the year.

On arrival at Maḳḳedah, Joshua was told that the five kings of the Amorites were hid in the cave (בַּמְּעָרָה, so correctly RV) at Maḳḳedah. This cave is mentioned eight times in the Bk. of Joshua always with the article as 'the cave'; it was evidently a well-known cave close to the city Maḳḳedah, and probably near to a grove of trees (cf. Jos 10^{26}).

Joshua did not stop the battle tide, but, ordering great stones to be rolled to the mouth of the cave and setting a guard there, caused the pursuit to be continued until the children of Israel had made an end of slaying the enemy with great slaughter and returned to the camp at Maḳḳedah. Then the cave was opened, and the kings of the Amorites, after the ceremonial degradation, were smitten by Joshua, and were hanged on five trees until sundown. At sunset (cf. Dt 21$^{22f.}$) the five kings were taken down off the trees and cast into the cave wherein they had been hid, and great stones were laid at the cave's mouth.

In the PEF survey of Western Palestine the present village of el-Mughâr ('the caves') was adopted by the surveyors, who found that at this site alone, of all the possible sites for Maḳḳedah in the Philistine plain, do caves still exist. The following points are in favour of this site. It is on the northern border-line of Judah immediately south-west of Ekron, opposite to Katrah (Gederoth) and near to Dajûn (Beth-dagon) and Nâ'aneh (Nâ'amah). It is an ancient site, as evidenced by the rock-quarrying and the rock-cut tombs with loculi. There are caves of various sizes, in front of which the houses are built, and small caves exist in the cliffs north of the village. It is on the northern side of the valley of Sorek (Wady Surâr), in the lowlands about 4 miles from the sandy dunes bordering on the seashore. It is situated on a sort of promontory stretching into the valley of Sorek, divided into three plateaus; on the lower of these to the south is the modern village of el-Mughâr, built in front of the caves which are cut out of the sandstone. The city of Maḳḳedah was probably to the north of these caves. The surrounding country is very fertile.

MAKTESH (הַמַּכְתֵּשׁ 'the mortar' [Pr 27^{22}]; ἡ κατακεκομμένη; Aq. εἰς τὸν ὅλμον; Theod. ἐν τῷ βάθει; Vulg. Pīla).—The name of a locality mentioned in Zeph 1^{11} 'Howl, ye inhabitants of the Maktesh; for all the people of Canaan (or, the merchant people; cf. Ezk 17^4, Pr 31^{24}) are undone, all they that were laden with silver are cut off.' The context shows that it was in Jerusalem; it is also evident that it was a locality in which traders dwelt—perhaps, in particular, that, as Ewald conjectured, it was the 'Phœnician quarter' of the city. From the meaning of the word,—it is used in Jg 15^{19} of the 'hollow place' out of which the spring of Ha-Ḳōrē issued forth,—it may be inferred that it denoted some basin-like hollow or depression. The Targ. understands by it the Kidron valley, which, it is true, forms a deep depression on the E. and S.E. of the city: but it is more probable that some locality within the city itself is intended; and it is a plausible suggestion that it was the name of the upper part of the Tyropœon valley (between the E. and W. hills of Jerusalem). The Maktesh may have been mentioned in particular by Zeph. on account of the omen of the name (Jer. 'quod scilicet, quomodo frumenta feriente desuper vecte, contunduntur').

MALACHI (מַלְאָכִי, Μαλαχίας in the title only).—The last in the Canon of the OT prophets.

i. NAME OF THE BOOK.—If the title contained in the opening verse be accepted as original, Malachi may be taken as the personal name of the prophet. In that case it is generally understood as a contraction of מַלְאָכִיָּה Malachiyah, and as meaning 'the messenger of J''.' This translation, however, presents difficulty,* and the word as a personal name does not occur elsewhere. Or the word may be regarded as the official title of the prophet, and be rendered 'my, i.e. J'''s messenger.' The LXX so understood it in 1^1,† but, by using Μαλαχίας as the head title, preserved both interpretations. The Targum of Jonathan ben-Uzziel added at 1^1 'whose name is called Ezra the scribe'; and Jerome‡ gave this last addition as a current belief among the Jews of his time. If, however, Ezra was the author of the book, it is difficult to understand why his history contains no hint of its existence. And the fact that tradition also attaches the book to the names of Nehemiah and Zerubbabel strengthens the supposition, that, in a period which had forgotten the author's name, the close correspondence between the aims which the prophet desired and which the legislator accomplished led to their identification.

Many modern commentators (e.g. Wellhausen, Nowack, Kuenen) regard 1^1 as a late addition. Emphasizing the similarity of this title to those which precede Zec 9^1 12^1, and noting the prominence of the word מַלְאָכִי 'my messenger' in 3^1, they have concluded that the compiler of the separate volume of the twelve minor prophets found this book without an author's name, and, borrowing a name from the body of the work, prefixed the entire title as it stands at present. The opinion is plausible, and enjoys this advantage, that, as it is not based on facts but on several large suppositions, it is incapable of disproof. Nothing is known of the personal history of the author, for the tradition of pseudo-Epiphanius (de vitis Proph.), which calls him a man of Sopha in the tribe of Zebulun, is so late as to be valueless.

ii. DATE.—The general period in which the book was written is easy to determine. The Exile is so far in the past that it is not even mentioned. The temple, to the rebuilding of which Haggai needed to exhort the people, is already restored: the sacrificial ritual is being carried on within it (1^{10} 3$^{1.10}$). The offenders whom Malachi rebukes are the laity who do not support the established ritual (3$^{7ff.}$), and the priests who bring it into contempt through their carelessness (1$^{6ff.}$). On the other hand, Judah is still under the civil government of a Persian satrap (פֶּחָתְךָ 'thy governor,' 1^8, cf. Hag 1^1, Neh 5^{14} 12^{26}), and the title 'great king,' which Malachi applies (1^{14}) to J'', may be borrowed from the official style of that court. A comparison of the abuses which the book attacks, and the reforms which it advocates with those which are mentioned in the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah, clearly proves a very similar condition of affairs in the community. Legislators and prophet have alike to protest against such abuses as neglect of the sacred dues, irregular sacrifices, and intermarriage with foreign women.* So similar is the whole situation that Malachi must have been nearly contemporaneous with those reformers.

---

* For the contraction it is possible and customary to appeal to the fact that the name of the mother of Hezekiah is given as אֲבִי Abi in 2 K 18^2, and as אֲבִיָּה Abijah in 2 Ch 29^1. But, since Abijah must be translated 'J'' is father,' this by analogy would require that Malachi should be rendered, not 'the messenger of J'',' but 'J'' is messenger.'

† Its reading is ἐν χειρὶ ἀγγέλου αὐτοῦ, the word of J'' 'by the hand of His messenger.'

‡ 'Quem Esdram scribam, legisque doctorem, Hebræi æstimant' (Præfatio in duodecim prophetas).

Opinion, however, is still divided as to whether Malachi prepared the way by word for the later legislative acts of Ezra and Nehemiah, or whether he supplemented and enforced the work which these began. In the former case, the book must have been written before B.C. 458, the date of Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem; in the latter, either shortly before or after B.C. 432, when Nehemiah's second visit to that city took place. The question cannot be decided with certainty. But the manner in which intermarriage with foreigners is condemned as a sin, not against the strict letter of the law, but against J‴s relation as Father to His people ($2^{10ff.}$), agrees best with a time before Ezra had legislated on the subject (cf. OTJC^{2} p. 427, n. 2). Malachi also connects those foreign marriages with the prevalence of divorce, as though the one caused the other. Such a connexion seems more likely at a time when foreign intermarriage, being novel, was causing many to put away their native wives, than at the period when Ezra found it a settled practice among his people. The terms also in which the governor is alluded to (1^8 ye treat J″ as ye would not treat the Persian satrap) lose half their force if the position was occupied not by a foreigner but by Nehemiah.

A more uncertain means of dating the book is found in its information about the details of ritual. Thus the priests are regarded as the sons of Levi ($2^{4.8}$ 3^3), not of Aaron. This would seem to imply that the book was written from the standpoint of D, and before the Priestly Code had degraded the Levites into a subordinate position towards the sons of Aaron. On the other hand, the command to offer tithes in the temple (3^{10}), presumably for the support of the officiating Levites, agrees more closely with the rule of P (Nu $18^{21ff.}$) than with that of D (Dt $14^{22ff.}$), which commands the giver to share them at home with the Levites and the poor. This may mark the transition from the earlier to the later practice—a transition which was made easier by the fact that, when the community was the city, all the Levites were attached to the temple. The priest is still the exponent of the law (2^7); after the promulgation of P he was only its servant.† Were we less ignorant of the history of Edom at this period, the opening section (1^{2-6}), with its reference to the condition of that people, would furnish the best means of determining the exact date.

iii. CONDITIONS PRESUPPOSED BY THE BOOK.—The condition of the people was enough to cause grave anxiety. They had suffered from drought and locusts ($3^{10f.}$). The revolts of Egypt against Persia, which were quickened by news of Persia's waning strength in Asia Minor, must have entailed heavy military requisitions on Palestine for the support of the armies which were sent against the rebels. Men were losing heart. They had sacrificed something when, at the bidding of their religious leaders, they returned from Babylon. They had expected that the holy land would repay those sacrifices, and instead it was demanding larger. The glowing visions of Deutero-Isaiah, some of which were dangerously material in themselves, and were further materialized in the popular mind, did not correspond with the stern realities of Jerusalem. Haggai had believed ($2^{10ff.}$) the cause of their misery to be their negligence in the restoration of the temple, and had promised J‴s return on the completion of the work. But the temple was rebuilt, and everything remained as before, which, to men who had hoped for so much, must have appeared worse than before. Men were beginning to ask for proofs of that divine love of which they heard so often, but of which they thought that they saw so little (1^{2-6}). They were debating, though not yet openly, whether it were not better, after all, to become like the heathen among whom they lived (3^{13-18}). And, where such ideas were even being debated among the better minds of the nation,* the less religious must have already begun to show their discouragement, and to cast off those distinctive forms which separated Judah from the other nations. The priests, as a rule, were slovenly in their performance of the ritual. That it was a weary form (1^{13}) they expressed by their carelessness of its requirements more eloquently than by words. The laity, miserable, heartless, and copying their religious leaders, were inclined to stint their sacrifices (1^{14}), and to withhold their dues ($3^{7ff.}$). And the increasing practice of intermarriage with foreign women (2^{10-16}), itself both sign and cause of a slackening devotion to the God of Israel, was sapping their family life and helping to merge the people into the surrounding paganism. It is this condition which Malachi faces; and he is prophet enough to see the root from which all the rest springs. Their religious life is weak, their spiritual vision dim. And this weakened religious life is affecting their moral and social condition, as well as their religious practice. It is causing them at once to make light of marriage, and to neglect ritual. The people must return to J″ (3^7). They need a quickened sense of the worth of the divine favour. For that would bring with it a different judgment of life. To be written in God's book of remembrance, to belong to God, would make many ills in life tolerable ($3^{16ff.}$). To return to J″ would make impossible their frequent divorce, which at present is rendering God deaf to their prayers (2^{13}). If the prophet seems to write as though the whole content of repentance consisted in the due payment of Levitical tithes (3^7), and so makes the return to J″ shallow, one must join with that his idea of the priesthood in itself and in its work. The glory of the priests of olden time was in his eyes their moral dignity. His representation of that past may be very far from what the historical books and the earlier prophets show it to have been. But this only makes Malachi's ideal (2^6) the more striking. And he expects that, when J″ has purified the recreant class, the first result will be that they will offer offerings in righteousness (3^3). The priests represent to him a moral and spiritual force in the community. That men starve them by withholding their tithes, is a proof that they are not interested in the ideals which the priests represent. That the clergy in any community are underpaid, does often mean that men are not interested in religion. And a prophet may point to the outward fact as a sign of the inward cause. What redeems Malachi from even the suspicion of formalism in this respect is his high appreciation of the services offered to J″ beyond the limits of Palestine (1^{11}). On any interpretation† that verse implies that temple and priesthood, sacrifice and tithes, are not an essential to a spiritual worship. But the prophet has to deal with the facts before him. He is a man to whom the essence of all religion consists in its spiritual and ethical elements. But he not only finds a sacramental system in existence among his people; he also recognizes its power as a factor in the religious life of any people. Such a system both represents and educates their spiritual life. And Malachi is one among the many who have tried to correlate those two truths, instead of denying one in the interests of the other.

iv. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE BOOK; ITS ATTITUDE TO RITUAL, ETC.—Undoubtedly, what characterizes this book as contrasted with the earlier prophetic literature is the high value which it sets upon a correct observance of ritual.

But it has never been sufficiently recognized that Malachi's attitude to the priestly ritual differs from that of the earlier prophets, just because the work of these had not failed to produce some result. It may still be considered a question open for further discussion, how far the rites with which Hosea found himself face to face in Israel were the outcome of a faith which, though once purer, had degenerated through contact with a heathen surrounding, and how far they were the natural expression of the faith of a people which was still at a low stage of religious development. In either case that system, because it embodied and so perpetuated a debasing idea of J″, was abhorrent to the prophet, who himself held a purer faith. And he called on his people before all else 'to take with them words.' He urged them to realize that higher conception of J″ which he himself had won. The first effect of such a thought of their God would be to make impossible some of the grosser elements in their ritual. Men who thought of God as Hosea did, would give up kissing calves as a means of worship. But, as a second effect, whether the prophet recognized it or not, a people who had gained this clearer thought of J″ would embody it in a ceremonial which would be competent to express it. Israel went into exile and so lost the position in which this might have been done. But Judah did in some measure accept the prophetic teaching about J″ and their relation to Him. And in the law and the ritual they sought to embody and perpetuate those ideas. Ezekiel, himself a prophet, formulated a legislation. It may be impossible to determine which forms in the ritual are common to heathenism and to Judaism. What is certain is that all the forms were remoulded and coloured by the spirit of Judah's religion. Now to a law and a ceremonial, which were framed to express, however inadequately, such ideas, a later prophet like Malachi was compelled, by his very vision of the truths which forms express, to assume an attitude different from the attitude which the earlier prophets assumed to the ritual of their time. Any neglect on the part of the people to fulfil the demands of this law, unless that neglect was due to the people finding the law inadequate to express their religious faith, must appear to the prophet a failure to appropriate through obedience to the ritual that understanding of J″'s will which the ritual conveyed to the worshippers. As Malachi is diligent to show, the disobedience of his time was the outcome of a lowered morality, not of a clearer spiritual vision. And he maintained the worth of the temple-service in the interests of the spiritual religion of which that service was the expression.

The prophet, however, is no creator. Satisfied with the ideas in which he had been educated, and their stereotyped expression in the ritual, he models his very style on that of earlier prophets. He is the preserver of the past rather than a creator for the future. By his whole mental attitude he represented what was necessary for the period in which his activity falls. He belongs to an age which had to retain rather than to create, to impress on men, through institutions and ritual, ideas which had been conceived in the sore travail of preceding controversies. Ideals in this world of men need to be expressed in institutions as well as in words, if they are to influence not only a select few but a whole generation, and, above all, if they are to be transmitted to the following generations. And, since men are influenced by unconscious habits as well as by conscious convictions, great religious truths must create forms which touch the whole life of a community. Probably, at that period of the national history, when Judah had been reduced to a community of humble men, and when so many of its purely secular hopes had disappeared, the utmost it could accomplish was to maintain the ground already won, to cling to the ideas already learned, and to continue institutions which were fitted to be the home of souls in the after generations, the birthplace for larger ideals in more fruitful years. To undervalue the law is easy; to appraise it is a much harder task. Yet the law kept a kingless people together through several centuries. The truths it embodied made Judæa almost unique in resisting the disintegrating influence of the Hellenic spirit. The ideals which it represented produced men who were capable of accepting the higher ideals of Jesus Christ, and of becoming the founders of His Church. At the period when his countrymen ran grave risk of losing their hold on this ritual and all it contained for them and their descendants, Malachi lent his whole influence to maintain its power. To him, however, it continued to be valuable because of the expression it gave to spiritual realities and the support it afforded the moral life. And if the Judaism of the silent centuries grew often formal in its reverence for the law as law and for the ritual as ritual, this was due as much to their forgetfulness as to their memory of the message they had received from the prophet. The exhortation which falls near the end of the book, 'to remember the law of Moses,' became dangerous so soon as the minds of men grew unspiritual; but what truth is not dangerous?

This attitude to the law explains in part the high value which Malachi sets on the priesthood. It is no longer the prophets but the priests who are the messengers of J″ (2^7). It is they who must first be purified by J″'s visitation, in order that they may then direct the people ($3^{3f.}$). Their office and work are set in an ideal and beautiful light. But the prophetic period is so far behind this teacher, and its fresh creative life so dead, that, when he thinks of the possibility of a new revelation of J″, the medium of that revelation is no longer a man whose lips God should touch with pure fire. It is that one of the prophets of the past who did not die, and whom J″ should restore to His people's necessity ($4^{5f.}$). But this expectation has a deeper root than the higher estimate of ritual and so of priesthood can explain. It is allied to the hope which the prophet cherished for the future, in which he diverged most widely from the early prophets. When Judah became a dependent satrapy, and its royal house fell into insignificance, the Messianic figure of the Davidic king naturally and inevitably disappeared. But the 'suffering servant' has also passed out of sight; the priestly figure has equally gone. Judah has lost confidence in her destiny and her mission.

etc., are really offered to the one and only God. According to another, it refers to the already widely scattered Jews of the dispersion, who, in the many lands of their exile, are offering to J″ sacrifices, which are pure though beyond the holy land.

It is not out of the people itself that any deliverer or new spring of life is expected, even by its prophets. Malachi believes that a deliverer shall come, that Judah still has a mission, that J″ has not forsaken His people. But he expects that the messenger of the covenant, who can hardly be distinguished from J″ Himself, shall appear in the temple to renew all things. The Messiah is not thought of as having his roots in the soil, he has lost all essential relation to the people whom he comes to deliver, he is less a gift than an emanation from J″.

This altered hope witnesses to an altered conception of God and of His relation to men. That hard deism, into which Hebrew theology was always liable to degenerate, is showing itself afresh, and now in the minds of the prophets. Persian thought, with its dualism and its idea of the impurity of matter, fostered the tendency. The popular conception of the connexion between guilt and physical calamity ministered to it in a community which was always in distress. J″ was conceived as so far separated from men that any revelation from Him was increasingly thought of as ab extra, and not through the inner life of man. He must send His angels or Elijah, if the people's life is to be guided by Him. Such a conception was certain to have further results. So long as prophecy lived with its witness to the God, who is not only beyond all men's thought but who is present with and in their highest thought, so long as prophecy founded the appeal of religion on the moral and spiritual instincts of men, by which they were related to their God, there was little danger from sacerdotalism. The ritual existed, but it was construed as the outward expression and satisfaction of those instincts. But when the people, impotent, conscious of guilt, came to think of J″ as so far removed from them that any message from Him must be an importation from without, and must be guaranteed, when old and long present by tradition, when new by miracle, they were sure to fall into a material idea of divine grace.

It is only the beginning and the first causes of such a state of things which are to be found in Malachi. The conflicting ideas seem to struggle in his mind. He can write of J″ as receiving an acceptable worship beyond the limits of the holy land, and so can forecast the worship 'in spirit and in truth.' But already the people are no longer thought of as the children of J″: only a select class among them dare so to think of themselves ($1^{6f.}$). And, though that class ought to be moral and spiritual guides to the people, it is not this qualification but their being descendants of Levi which gives them that position. Now the more that idea gained on men's minds, the more also would the ritual be thought of as able of itself to maintain divine favour. The grace of J″ which men need, and the covenant which is life and peace, must be mediated to them through a system which was wholly outside of them, and which based its validity less on its appeal to their spiritual nature, and more on its being an arbitrary regulation from which they did not dare to deviate. Again, it was only when this conception of the relation between God and man formed the medium through which men approached it, that the command to remember the law of Moses ($4^{4f.}$) grew dangerous. The living word of prophecy, with its underlying conviction of God's presence in and with the soul of man, was delivered from literalism. One great prophet could and did criticize the doctrine of another, and in the interests of the spirit could dare to touch the letter of the word. Micah could urge how the temper of the people of Jerusalem made them grossly abuse Isaiah's promise of the security of Mount Zion. A prophet could base his appeal on the witness of the spirit in those to whom he spoke. But, when the soul of man was thought of as wholly alienated from God, with no essential relation to Him, and only brought into relation with divine truth by an outward mediation, there grew up a hard theory of inspiration. The revelation from God was a deposit of faith and a rule of practice which could not change. The law of Moses became the mediator between God and man; and the prophet was transformed into the scribe. An especial interest must always attach to the Book of Malachi; because both conceptions of God and His dealing with man are there, and the prophet seems hardly conscious of their antagonism. But the less spiritual one was the easier to hold, and was favoured by many circumstances. Despite several protests from Judaism itself, of which the Book of Jonah is the most beautiful example, it triumphed over the higher. And Malachi stands at the beginning of that long and swift decline, which finally separated J″ and His people by so wide a gulf that official Judaism ended by rejecting the very idea of the Incarnation as blasphemy against God.

The literary style of the book is peculiar to itself among the prophetic literature. Malachi does not attempt the rhetorical development of a great principle, in the way which is so characteristic of Deutero-Isaiah. In part this is caused by the difference in subject and in aim. The writer is applying principles to the details of life. But the style is strictly dialectic. The writer states his thesis, a principle or an accusation. Over against that he sets an objection, which he may have heard urged against it, or which from his knowledge of the people he believes to be present in their minds. After this he proves and elaborates the truth of what he began by asserting. If these addresses were ever delivered in public, the audiences must have been very dissimilar to those which faced the herdsman of Tekoa. On the ground that the style seems that of a man who developed his ideas in writing, several editors of the book have concluded that the author from the first circulated his message to his people by writing. A more accurate description would be to name it the style of the schools, and to see in it the beginning of the method of exposition, which afterwards became universal in the schools and synagogues of Judaism.

v. ANALYSIS OF THE CONTENTS.—The book is divided into four chapters in the English version, which in this respect follows the printed editions of the LXX, Peshiṭta, and Vulgate; the Hebrew text unites the third and fourth chapters into one. According to its subject-matter it falls into the following seven sections:—

(1) 1^{2-5}. Men are asking for the proof of the reality of J‴s love toward their nation. Malachi finds the proof in history, and especially in the differing histories of Edom and Judah. Because Jehovah hated Edom, that nation has suffered and will suffer more in the immediate future, so that Judah through seeing their fate will learn to acknowledge the sovereign love of their God.*

(2) 1^{6}–2^{9}. J″ had a right to expect a return for His love (1^{6}). Instead, those who were nearest Him among the people, the priests, offer a scant and weary worship, the perfunctoriness of which proves their indifference to His claim ($1^{7-9.\ 12f.}$). The result is that the laity are offering their worst at the altar instead of their best (1^{14}). The whole ritual has grown valueless; but, though it should cease, a worship acceptable to J″ will not come to an end ($1^{10f.}$). For their neglect punishment will fall on the priesthood; it has already begun to fall † (2^{1-3}). Their indifference to ritual was at once sign and cause of a moral corruption. The priests were appointed to be examples of righteous life, and so guides to the people. But they have abused their position, to the ruin of many. And their office has already become contemptible (2^{4-9}).

(3) 2^{10-16}. The guilt of those who marry foreign women.

---

* Contrast Am 3^{2}.

† The terms of that punishment are not quite clear in 2^{3}.

Such a marriage is a profaning of J″'s holiness. It has brought about an increase of divorce, with the misery and moral laxity which that produces. Because of this, their prayers are unheard, though they entreat the favour of Jehovah with tears.

(4) 2^{17}–3^{5}. Men are doubting whether there is any righteous governor of the world (2^{17}). Malachi prophesies the appearance of J″'s messenger to prepare His way, and of the messenger of the covenant (who may be J″ Himself) (3^{1}). But the coming of the LORD, for which the people long, will be a coming to judgment in Judah (3^{2}). He must begin His sifting work among the temple priesthood ($3^{3f.}$), and from them pass to judge the moral errors of the nation (3^{5}).

(5) 3^{6-12}).* The people are now more directly addressed. They are suffering from famine, drought, and locusts. These are the judgments of J″ on them for having withheld His dues. If they bring their tithes, He will certainly pour out on them the abundance they have lacked.

(6) 3^{13}–4^{4}. The prophet returns to the root of all other laxity, to the complaint that it is useless to serve J″, because He does not care for His servants. Prosperity is not following devotion. Even the best of the people are beginning to whisper among themselves doubts like these (3^{13-16a}). They need not despair. J″ is regarding them, and before Him the names of those who fear Him are inscribed for eternal remembrance (3^{16-18}). The day of sifting is again promised, though here it is uncertain whether the sifting is within the nation between the righteous remnant and the apostatizing, or whether by the ungodly are meant those who are beyond Judaism (4^{1-4}). The prophet adds a Deuteronomic exhortation to remember the Mosaic law (4^{4}).

(7) $4^{5f.}$. The promise is added that Elijah will reappear on earth to heal the divisions among the people, especially to fill the cleft between the ideals of the old and new generations. By his means the threatened curse will be averted.†

The Book of Malachi is directly or indirectly quoted in the NT in the following passages: Mk 1^{2} $9^{11f.}$, Lk 1^{17}, Ro 9^{13}.

MALACHY.—The form adopted by both AV and RV in 2 Es 1^{40} for the name of the prophet MALACHI.

MALCAM (מַלְכָּם).—1. The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 8^{9} (B Μελχάς, A Μελχάμ). 2. 'Malcam' occurs as a proper name in RVm of 2 S 12^{30}, where David 'took the crown of מַלְכָּם (AV and RV 'their king') from off his head.' LXX B has Μελχόλ τοῦ βασιλέως αὐτῶν, A om. Μελχόλ. Wellh. and Driver consider that the true reading is prob. מִלְכֹּם Milcom, the suffix ָם 'their' having no proper antecedent in the context (but see Kirkpatrick in Camb. Bible, ad loc.).

In Zeph 1^{5} ('that swear by the LORD and that swear by מַלְכָּם') AV and RV both give 'Malc(h)am' as a proper name, RVm has 'their king.' Here, again, in all probability, we ought to point מִלְכֹּם (so Wellh. and Nowack, following Luc. Μελχόμ). Davidson, upon the whole, prefers the spelling מַלְכָּם 'their king,' but adds that 'it is possible that Malcham is merely another pronunciation of Milcom, meaning Molech.'

In Am 1^{15} both AV and RV (without any marginal alternative) read 'their king (מַלְכָּם) shall go into captivity' (LXX οἱ βασιλεῖς αὐτῆς), but Aq., Symm., Theod., Pesh., and Vulg. all imply a reading מִלְכֹּם, which both Driver and Nowack are inclined to adopt. This verse from Amos is borrowed by Jeremiah, practically unaltered, in a prophecy against the Ammonites, Jer 49^{3}, where AV has 'their king,' AVm 'Melcom,' RV 'Malcam,' RVm 'their king.' Here, as well as in v.^{1}, where texts and margins of AV and RV are the same as in v.^{3}, we ought probably to point מִלְכֹּם. In both verses of Jer the reading of B is Μελχόλ, in v.^{3} A has Μελχόμ. See, further, art. MOLECH.

J. A. SELBIE.

MALCHIAH (מַלְכִּיָּה and מַלְכִּיָּהוּ 'J″ is king,' see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 118 ff.; Μελχίας).—1. A priest, the father of Pashhur, Jer 21^{1} 38^{1}, same as Malchijah of 1 Ch 9^{12}, Neh 11^{12}. 2. A member of the royal family, to whom belonged the pit-prison into which Jeremiah was let down, Jer 38^{6}.

MALCHIEL (מַלְכִּיאֵל 'El is king'(?)).—The eponym of an Asherite family, Gn 46^{17}, Nu 26^{45} (Μελχιήλ), 1 Ch 7^{31} (B Μελλειή, A Μελχιήλ). The gentilic name Malchielites (הַמַּלְכִּיאֵלִי) occurs in Nu 26^{45}.

G. Buchanan Gray (Heb. Proper Names, p. 206) thinks that מַלְכִּיאֵל, judged by the probable history of the similar name מַלְכִּיָּה, was perhaps not created or adopted by the Hebrews earlier than the 7th cent., but notes that it was in very early use (c. B.C. 1500) in Canaan, being found repeatedly in the Tel el-Amarna letters. (See 'Milkili' in Petrie, Syria and Egypt from the Tell El Amarna Letters, p. 143, and cf. Jastrow, JBL xi. 120, and Hommel, AHT 231, 233 f. 260 n.).

J. A. SELBIE.

MALCHIJAH is the form preferred by RV as transliteration of מַלְכִּיָּה, although in two instances it has Malchiah (wh. see).—1. A descendant of Gershom, 1 Ch 6^{40} [Heb.^{25}]. 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur, 1 Ch 9^{12}, Neh 11^{12}, same as Malchiah of Jer 21^{1} 38^{1}. 3. Head of the 5th course of priests, 1 Ch 24^{9}, perhaps the same as the preceding. 4. 5. Two of the sons of Parosh who had married foreign wives, Ezr $10^{25\,bis}$, called in 1 Es 9^{26} Melchias and Asibias respectively. 6. One of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{31}. In Neh 3^{11} he is mentioned as taking part in the repairing of the wall. He is called in 1 Es 9^{32} Melchias. 7. Malchijah the son of Rechab repaired the dung-gate, Neh 3^{14}. 8. One of the guild of the goldsmiths who helped to repair the wall, Neh 3^{31}. 9. One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand at the reading of the law, Neh 8^{4}. 10. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{3}, probably the same as No. 2. 11. A priest who took part in the ceremony of dedicating the wall, Neh 12^{42}.

J. A. SELBIE.

MALCHIRAM (מַלְכִּירָם 'Melech is exalted' [?], see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 147; B Μελχειράμ, A Μελχιράμ).—Son of Jeconiah, 1 Ch 3^{18}.

MALCHI-SHUA (מַלְכִּישׁוּעַ 'the king is wealth' or possibly 'Melech is wealth,' Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, p. 146 f.; in 1 S, B Μελχεισά, A Μελχισοῦε, Μελχιροῦε, AV Melchi-shua; in 1 Ch, B Μελχεσοῦε, Μελχεισοῦε, A Μελχισοῦε; 1 Ch 10^{2} ℵ Μελχισέδεκ).—The third son of Saul (1 S 14^{49}), who was slain by the Philistines at Mt. Gilboa (1 S 31^{2}, 1 Ch 10^{2}). In the genealogical lists given by the Chronicler Malchi-shua's name occurs in each case immediately after that of Jonathan, but though 1 S 14^{49-51} is clearly the work of a later hand (R^{D}) the balance of evidence seems in favour of its tradition.

J. F. STENNING.

MALCHUS.—The name of the man whose right ear Peter cut off when Jesus was arrested (Jn 18^{10}, cf. Mt 26^{51}, Mk 14^{47}, Lk 22^{50}). He was the personal servant (τὸν δοῦλον) of the high priest (i.e. probably of Caiaphas, cf. Jn $18^{13.\,24}$), and had accompanied the soldiers and Jewish officials (v.^{12}) under the lead of Judas. He had a kinsman in the same service (Jn 18^{26}). The fact that St. John alone names Malchus, as well as Peter, accords with the evangelist's apparent claim ($18^{15.\,16}$) to have been known to the high priest, and is one of many minute historical details which appear in his Gospel. Some have thought that prudential motives kept the earlier evangelists from giving the names of the parties, but this explanation is unnecessary and improbable. The servant was evidently eager to carry out his master's wish to secure Jesus, and was therefore struck at by Peter. The stroke missed, and only cut off Malchus' ear (ὠτίον (Mt), ὠτάριον (Mk, Jn), and οὖς (Lk) are synonymous; cf. Lk 22^{50} with ^{51}; and consult Lobeck, ad Phryn. p. 211). It could not have been entirely severed, since Jesus 'touched it and healed him.' Jesus' words (Lk 22^{51}), 'Suffer ye thus far' (ἐᾶτε ἕως τούτου), have been supposed by some to have been addressed to the arresting party as a request not to bind Him until He had repaired the injury. But that they were addressed to Peter appears from the preceding word 'answered,' and from the fuller account in Mt and Jn (see Meyer, ad loc.). It has been noted that St. Luke the physician alone records the healing.* The name Malchus (Μάλχος, a grecised form from the root מָלַךְ) was common in different forms among the Hebrews and neighbouring peoples. Cf. מַלּוּךְ, 1 Ch 6^{44}, Neh $10^{4.27}$ 12^{2}, Ezr $10^{29.32}$; LXX Μαλώχ or Μαλούχ. There were Nabatæan kings (Euting, Nab. Inscr. 63, 81 ff., 91) of this name, which is written by Josephus Μάλχος or Μάλιχος (= מָלִיךְ, Dalman, p. 104). It was the name also of the philosopher Porphyry, a Syrian by birth (cf. Del. Zcit. f. Luth. Th. 1876).

* The uncertainty of meaning in 3^{6} makes it a little doubtful to which section that verse should be assigned.

† It is a recent suggestion of Nowack that these last verses are a later addition to the original prophecy.

G. T. PURVES.

MALEFACTOR.—The Gr. word κακοποιός occurs in Jn 18^{30} (TR, but edd. κακὸν ποιῶν), where it is rendered in AV 'malefactor'; also in 1 P $2^{12.14}$ 4^{15}, where it is 'evil doer.' RV gives 'evil-doer' in all the passages. Again, κακοῦργος is in AV rendered 'malefactor' in Lk $23^{32.33.39}$, but in 2 Ti 2^{9} 'evil doer'; RV 'malefactor' everywhere. There is no difference in meaning between κακοποιός and κακοῦργος, and there is none between 'malefactor' and 'evil-doer,' but this is a good example of the care of the NT Revisers to express the same Gr. word always by the same Eng. word. Fuller, Holy State, 203, says, 'Thus Cranmer (who subscribed to Popery) grew valiant afterwards, and thrust his right hand which subscribed first into fire, so that that hand dyed (as it were) a malefactour and all the rest of his body dyed a martyr.'

J. HASTINGS.

MALICE, MALICIOUSNESS.—Both 'malice' and 'maliciousness' have become restricted in meaning since 1611 to a special form of wickedness. In AV of NT the only word they translate is κακία, i.e. wickedness of any kind, 'the vicious character generally,' as Lightfoot says, or as Wilson (Christian Dictionary, 1616) describes it, 'the whole pravity and naughtines of sin.' Other words are translated 'malice' in the Apocr. as μῆνις (Sir 27^{30}, RV 'wrath'), ἔχθρα (1 Mac 13^{6}, RV 'hatred'), but the same general meaning attaches to the word there also. RV generally retains 'malice' and 'maliciousness,' but prefers 'wickedness' to 'malice' in 1 P 2^{1}, and to 'maliciousness' in 1 P 2^{16}; and wherever in the Apocr. the Gr. is κακία (Wis $12^{10.20}$ 16^{14}, 2 Mac 4^{50}) RV has 'wickedness.' The Douay Bible translates Is 40^{2} 'Speake to the hart of Ierusalem, and cal to her; because her malice is accomplished, her iniquitie is forgiven'; and cf. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v., App. 1, 'It hath been ever on all sides confest that the malice of man's own heart doth harden him and nothing else.' Tindale's tr. of Ja 1^{21} is 'Wherfore laye a parte all fylthynes, all superfluite of maliciousnes'; and Hall, Works, ii. 17, says, 'Doe thou that in us, which was done to thee for us; cut off the superfluitie of our maliciousnesse, that we may be holy, in, and by thee, which for us wert content to be legally impure.'

The adj. malicious occurs in 3 Jn ^{10} 'I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words' (λόγοις πονηροῖς, RV 'with wicked words'); and a few times in Apocr. (Ad. Est $13^{4.7}$, Wis 1^{4}, 2 Mac 5^{23}). Cf. Hos 6^{8} Cov. 'Galaad is a cite of wicked doers, of malicious people and bloudshedders.' For the adv. 'maliciously,' which is found in Sus $^{43.62}$, 2 Mac 14^{11}, cf. Cotton, Calvin's Isaiah on Is 40^{1}, 'Now the Prophet enters upon a new argument, for he lets the people alone, which made no use neither of admonitions nor threatenings whatsoever, in regard they were become maliciously desperate.'

J. HASTINGS.

MALLOTHI (מַלּוֹתִי).—A son of Heman, 1 Ch $25^{4.26}$. There is reason to believe that this and five of the names associated with it are really a fragment of a hymn or prayer (see GENEALOGY, III. 23 n.; and cf. Kittel in SBOT, and W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 143 n.). In v.^{4} LXX B has Μανδει, A Μεαλωθι; in v.^{26} B Μεθαθει, A Μελληθι.

MALLOWS (מַלּוּחַ mallûaḥ, ἄλιμα, ℵA ἄλιμμα, herbæ et arborum cortices).—Two names of plants in Arab. are derived from the same root as mallûaḥ: (1) Melûkhîyeh, the 'Jews' mallow,' Corchorus olitorius, L. This is an annual herb of the order Tiliaceæ, with oblong-ovate, serrate leaves, the lower teeth of the leaves tipped with long bristles. It bears pods 3 to 4 in. long. The mature stem furnishes the fibre so well known in commerce as 'jute.' The immature stem and leaves are tender and succulent, and have a mucilaginous juice, which is nutritious like that of the mallow. They are extensively used in the East as a pot-herb. This plant grows only in well-watered ground. As the context of the only passage in which mallûaḥ occurs (Job 30^{4}) refers to desert places and plants, and to the food of the very poorest of the people, this is not likely to be the plant intended. (2) Mallûkh. This word is identical with mallûaḥ in form. In some places the allied form mûllâḥ is used. Both are popular names for the Sea Orache or Sea Purslane, Atriplex Halimus, L. RV tr. it 'saltwort.' It is a perennial shrub, of the order Chenopodiaceæ, with silvery-white, ovate, obtuse leaves, and densely spiked flowers in a thyrsoid-pyramidal panicle. The plant grows in salt marshes along the seacoast and in the interior. The leaves are sour; and Dioscorides says that they were cooked as vegetables. They would certainly be the food of none but the poorest, and well suit the context.

MALLUCH (מַלּוּךְ).—1. A Merarite, ancestor of Ethan, 1 Ch 6^{44} [Heb.^{29}], LXX Μαλώχ. 2. One of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{29} (B Ἀλούμ, A Μαλούχ), called in 1 Es 9^{30} Mamuchus. 3. One of the sons of Harim who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{32} (LXX Μαλούχ). 4. 5. Two of those who sealed the covenant, Neh $10^{4.27}$ (LXX Μαλούχ). No. 4 is probably identical with Malluch of Neh 12^{2}, called in 12^{14} Malluchi.

MALLUCHI (מְלוּכִי Kethîbh; מְלִיכוּ Ḳerê, followed by AV Melicu; LXX Μαλούχ; Vulg. Milicho).—The eponym of a priestly family who returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12^{14}, probably the same as Malluch of Neh 10^{4} 12^{2}.

MALLUS (Μαλλός, 2 Mac 4^{30}) rebelled (along with Tarsus) against Antiochus Epiphanes about B.C. 171. According to Heberdey, the latest explorer, the city was situated on the river Pyramos, about 150 stadia from its mouth: at the mouth was situated Magarsa (called Antiocheia in the 3rd and 2nd cents. B.C.). The Pyramos had two mouths in ancient time, of which the principal joined the sea a little to the west of the modern village called Kara-Tash, in which many inscriptions both of Antiocheia and of Mallus have been found; but this branch is now almost completely dried up. Kara-Tash is situated on a low range of hills along the coast between the Pyramos arms: the eastern arm is rapidly filling up the bay of Ayash (into which it flows): in ancient times this branch was quite secondary. According to Heberdey, the site of Mallus was between the fork of the two branches, as coins show the goddess of the city sitting between two river-gods; but the marshy nature of the soil prevents exploration at that point.

* On the difficulty of admitting the historicity of Luke's narrative, see Expos. Times, x. 139, 188.

The serious difficulties in this theory are—(1) Strabo, our best authority, says that Mallus was situated on a height (p. 675), not in a low marsh; (2) the Stadiasmus implies that Mallus was not 150 stadia up the river, but close to the sea 150 stadia east of Antioch-Magarsa; (3) the presence of so many inscriptions of Mallus at Kara-Tash. Perhaps the correct view is that Mallus was beside Kara-Tash, east of the Pyramos, while Magarsa was west of the river, and the distance stated in the Stadiasmus is over-estimated like many others. Thus, when Mallus was beside Kara-Tash (probably on its eastern side), while Magarsa lay to the west, inscriptions from both cities should be brought to the modern village: the old bed of the Pyramos, being dry in modern times, would not prevent transport.

Mallus (originally Marlos) was an ancient and wealthy city, with a rich coinage. Magarsa was a comparatively unimportant place, which struck no coins; and probably it was subject to Mallus, serving as its harbour from being closer to the river.

W. M. RAMSAY.

MALOBATHRON (RVm for EV text Bether, הָרֵי בָתֶר Ca 2^{17}; AVm 'division'; LXX ὄρη κοιλωμάτων; Theod. θυμιαμάτων; Aquila and Symm. Βαθήρ, Βαιθήρ).—The leaf of the Cassia lignea tree, Cinnamomum Cassia, Blume (Laurus malabathrum, L.), known in the old Materia Medica as tamalapatra or 'Indian leaf,' a lofty tree cultivated in China and Java. Its leaves are 10 in. or more long, and 6 to 8 broad. It was formerly used as a stomachic, sudorific, and a remedy for headache, and as an ingredient of mithredate and theriaca. A macerate in oil, and a vinous tincture, were used by the ancients as a perfume. Notwithstanding the authority of Wellhausen (Prol.^{2} 415), it is certain that this spice did not grow wild on any of the mountains of Pal., and therefore no mountains in this land would have been likely to have derived their name from it. Even had it been cultivated in the botanical gardens of Solomon, it is improbable that any mountain, much less 'mountains,' would have taken their name from this circumstance. It seems better, therefore (although the rendering malobathron is adopted by Reuss, Baethgen, Budde, Siegfried, and nearly all modern commentators), to retain the proper name Bether (wh. see), as in text of both VSS.

MALTANNEUS (B Μαλταννaῖος, A 'Αλτ-, AV Altaneus), 1 Es 9^{33}.—A son of Asom or Hashum, one of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. Called MATTENAI (מַתְּנַי, B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθαναί) in Ezr 10^{33}.

MAMDAI (B Μαμδαί, A Μανδ-, AV Mabdai), 1 Es 9^{34}.—The same as BENAIAH, Ezr 10^{35}.

MAMMON (μαμωνᾶς [μαμμωνᾶς only in cursives]; Vulg. mammona; Syr. måmunå; AV and RV 'mammon').—A common Aram. word for riches (Aram. מָמוֹנָא, rarely מָאמוֹנָא), used in Mt 6^{24} and Lk $16^{9.11.13}$, in the latter case in the parable of the Unjust Steward. LXX translates אֱמוּנָה in Ps 37^{3} by πλούτῳ, and possibly in Is 33^{6} by θησαυροῖς; it may have read a Heb. equivalent for מָמוֹנָא in one or both passages. The spelling מָאמוֹנָא suggests a derivation from אמן 'to be firm, steadfast,' Hiph. 'trust,' hence 'that which is trusted in'; but in NT it has simply its Aramaic sense. According to Augustine (On the Sermon on the Mt. ii. 14, 47), 'Lucrum Punice mammon dicitur.' ממון occurs in Sir 31^{8}, מ׳ דִּשְׁקַר 'm. of falsehood' often in Targg., e.g. 1 S 8^{3}, 2 S 14^{14}, Hos 5^{11}, Am 5^{12}, Is 33^{15}; also מ׳ דִּרְשַׁע 'm. of wickedness' in Hab 2^{9}. The phrase 'mammon of unrighteousness' occurs in the Book of Enoch (lxiii. 10), probably a post-Christian reference to the NT passages. Mammon is personified in Lk 16^{9-13}, but there is no reason to suppose that there was a Syrian deity Mammon in NT times. Such an idea owes its currency to Milton. Ges. (Thes.) derives from Heb. maṭmon, 'treasure,' and טמן 'to hide'; but no example of the assimilation of Teth (ט) is cited. Lagarde thinks ממון is by elision for מעמון, which would be the Aram. form of the Arabic maḍmun, 'contents,' e.g. of a book.

MAMNITANEMUS (A Μαμνιτάναιμος, B Μαμτ-, AV Mamnitanaimus), 1 Es 9^{34}.—Corresponds to the two names Mattaniah, Mattenai in Ezr 10^{37}, of which it is a corruption.

MAMRE (מַמְרֵא; Μαμβρη).—Mentioned (a) in the expression 'terebinths of Mamre' (אֵלֹנֵי מ׳) Gn 13^{18} (+ אשר בחברון 'which is [or are] in Hebron'), 18^{1} (both J), and 14^{13} (+ האמרי 'the Amorite'), from an independent source; (b) in P, in the expression 'which is before Mamre,' in descriptions of the cave of Machpelah, or of the field in which it was. Gn $23^{17.19}$ (+ הוא חברון 'that is Hebron') 25^{9} 49^{30} 50^{13}, and in 35^{27} 'to Mamre, to Kiriath-arba, that is Hebron'; (c) in Gn 14^{23} as the name of one of Abram's allies, in his expedition for the recovery of Lot. In (b) M. is an old name either of Hebron or of a part of Hebron; in Gn $14^{13.23}$ it is the name of a local sheikh or chief, the owner of the 'terebinths' called after him; in Gn 13^{18} 18^{1} it is not clear whether it is the name of a person or of a place. The 'terebinths of M.' are the spot at which Abraham pitched his tent in Hebron.

The site of Mamre is uncertain. 'Before' (על פני) in topographical descriptions generally, though not, it is true, universally, means to the east of. The traditional site of Abraham's sepulchre is in the mosque at the S.E. of the modern city: so that Mamre would, in the first instance, be looked for to the W. of this, and at no great distance from it (for it is described as being 'in' Hebron). Sozomen (HE ii. 4) says that the oak by which Abraham dwelt still existed in the time of Constantine, 15 stadia N. of Hebron; and Jerome (Onom. 114. 17) says that it continued to be shown till the time of his youth. The site where this oak stood would agree with that of Râmat el-Khalîl (or, more briefly, er-Râmeh), 1¾ mile N. of the mosque (see the plan of the environs in PEF Mem. iii., after p. 352); and a spot ¾ mile N. of this, with a fine spring-well, is still called by the Jews Beit el-Khalîl, or 'Abraham's House' (Rob. BRP i. 216; Thomson, L. and B., S. Pal. 304–6, with view; PEF Mem. iii. 316, 322 f., also with view). For some time past, however, perhaps from the 12th cent., a large and beautiful oak (Sindiân), 1½ mile W.N.W. of the mosque, has been shown as the oak of Abraham (Rob. ii. 72, 81; Thomson, l.c. 282 f., with illustration; PEF Mem. iii. 308; Bäd. Pal.^{2} 173 f.). Neither of these spots seems sufficiently near to Hebron to be a probable site for Mamre. Dillm. thinks of the height, with accompanying spring, of Nimre, 1 mile N.N.W. of the mosque; but this also is more distant than would be expected. Josephus (BJ IV. ix. 7) says that a very ancient terebinth was shown in his day only 6 stadia from the city; but he does not indicate in which direction it lay.

Sozomen adds some remarkable particulars respecting the tree, which show that it was venerated as a sanctuary. He says that an annual fair and feast was held at it in the summer, which was largely attended by Jews, heathen, and Christians (cf., more briefly, the Onom. 114. 19 f., 249. 29 f.). There was also a well beside it; and the heathen visitors not only offered sacrifices beside the tree (§ 3), but illuminated the well with lamps, and cast into it libations of wine, cakes, coins, myrrh, and incense (§ 5; cf. RS 177, 193). These observances were suppressed by Constantine, as superstitious; and a church was built there (§§ 6–8; Euseb. Vita Const. iii. 51–53; cf. SP 143).

MAMUCHUS (Μάμουχος), 1 Es 9^{30}.—The same as MALLUCH, Ezr 10^{29}. The original LXX form was probably Μάλλουχος; ΛΛ would readily be corrupted into M.

MAN.—One of the peculiarities of the Hebrew language is the disinclination to form adjectives, or rather the love of placing substantives in such relation as in Western languages would be expressed by a subst. and an adjective. Thus 1 K 20^{31} AV and RV 'merciful kings,' Heb. מַלְכֵי חֶסֶד = 'kings of mercy.' See Davidson, Heb. Syntax, p. 32 ff.; Gesenius-Kautzsch, Heb. Grammar (Eng. ed. by Collins and Cowley, 1898, p. 437 ff.). This form of expressing attributive ideas is especially common with the words אִישׁ 'man,' בַּעַל 'master,' 'owner,' בֶּן־ 'son,' and their feminines.

With the first of these words, with which we have to do at present, the Eng. VSS deal variously. (1) Sometimes they ignore the Heb. idiom entirely: 1 S 31^{12} and 2 S 24^{9} Heb. 'man of might,' AV and RV 'valiant man'; 1 K 1^{42} Heb. 'man of might,' AV 'valiant man,' RV 'worthy man'; 1 S 17^{4} Heb. 'man of the space between' (אִישׁ־הַבֵּנַיִם), AV and RV 'champion' (see CHAMPION); 1 K 20^{42} Heb. (אִישׁ חֶרְמִי) 'man of my ban,' AV 'man whom I appointed to utter destruction,' RV 'man whom I had devoted to destruction'; Pr 15^{18} Heb. 'man of wrath,' AV and RV 'wrathful man.' (2) Sometimes the Heb. idiom is recognized in the margin: 2 S $16^{7.8}$ AV 'bloody man,' AVm and RV 'man of blood' (cf. Ps 5^{6} 'The Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man,' AVm 'the man of bloods and deceit,' RV 'the blood-thirsty and deceitful man'); 1 K 2^{26} 'thou art worthy of death,' AVm and RVm 'thou art a man of death'; Is 40^{13} 'his counseller,' RV 'his counsellor,' AVm 'man of his counsel'; 2 S 18^{20} 'Thou shalt not bear tidings,' AVm 'be a man of tidings,' RV 'be the bearer of tidings'; Ps 140^{11} 'An evil speaker,' AVm and RVm 'a man of tongue'; Ex 4^{10} 'I am not eloquent,' AVm and RVm 'a man of words'; Job 11^{2} 'a man full of talk,' AVm and RVm 'a man of lips'; Job 22^{8} 'the mighty man,' AVm and RVm 'the man of arm'; Pr 3^{31} 'oppressor,' AVm and RV 'man of violence'; 18^{24} 'A man that hath friends,' RV 'He that maketh many friends,' RVm 'a man of friends.' (3) Sometimes the Heb. idiom is preserved in the Eng. text: Gn 6^{4} 'men of renown'; Pr 24^{5} 'a man of knowledge'; so frequently 'man of Belial' (for which see BELIAL).

Perhaps the most frequent expression of this kind is man of war, which occurs 42 times in AV text, and always signifies a soldier or warrior. In Ex 15^{3} J″ is called 'a man of war'; see Montefiore, Hibbert Lect. p. 39 f., and art. LORD OF HOSTS.

The expression man of God (אִישׁ אֱלֹהִים), to designate one acting under Divine authority and influence, is used in Jg $13^{6.8}$ of an angel; in Dt 33^{1}, Jos 14^{6} al. of Moses; in 2 Ch 8^{14} al. of David; in 1 S 2^{27} 9^{6-10}, 1 K $13^{1ff.}$ al. of prophets, as a title for whom it appears to have come into use in the N. kingdom in the time of Elijah. See, further, OLD PROPHET.

J. HASTINGS.

MAN.—i. WORDS.—1. אָדָם. For derivation and original meaning see ADAM (LXX usually ἄνθρωπος, Vulg. homo). The most frequent use of this word as a common noun is for mankind generally (Gn 6^{3}), or for any member of the human race (Gn 5^{2}), but occasionally it stands for a man in distinction from a woman (Gn 2^{22}). It is used especially when the sinfulness, frailty, or mortality of the race is referred to (Job 5^{7}). 2. אִישׁ (LXX mostly ἀνήρ, Vulg. vir). Del. compares Assyr. isanu, 'strong.' A name for man in his vigour or valour; for a masculine member of the race, thus standing for 'husband' (Gn 3^{6}), and even applied to the male of lower animals (Gn 7^{2}). While אָדָם often refers to the race as a whole, אִישׁ points to the individual. By a common Heb. idiom it is employed for 'any one' (=Gr. τις, Fr. on, Ex 21^{14}), and so gives rise to a similar idiom in NT Gr. (1 Co 4^{1}). 3. אֱנוֹשׁ, simply man, with perhaps some reference to his mortality (mostly poetical, 18 times in Job, 13 times in Ps). 4. גִּבּוֹר (from גָּבַר 'to be strong') 'a mighty man,' 'a warrior.' The cognate גֶּבֶר is used for a man as opposed to the weaker one, woman (Dt 22^{5}). 5. [מַת] common in Eth., only found in pl. (מְתִים defect. מְתִם), except in compound pr. n. Methusael, Methuselah. The word stands for men as distinguished both from women and from children (Dt 2^{34}).

In NT ἄνθρωπος and ἀνήρ are used with the distinctions of meaning found in classic Greek. ἄνθρωπος stands for a human being, whether male or female, and is sometimes used with the association of weakness or imperfection (1 Co 3^{4}). The twofold nature of man is expressed by ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος and ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος (2 Co 4^{16}). Ἄνθρωπος is employed in the Heb. idiom as the equivalent of τις, for 'anybody' (e.g. Mt 17^{14}, Mk 12^{1}, Lk 13^{19}). In AV, however, τις is sometimes rendered 'man' (Mt 8^{28}). Ἀνήρ stands for a man as distinguished from a woman. It is also used in pl. as a title of honour, equivalent to our word 'gentlemen' (Ac 2^{14}). In AV ἄρρην and ἄρσην, 'male,' are translated 'man' (Ro 1^{27}, Rev 12^{5}).

ii. ORIGIN.—According to both accounts of his origin, Gn 1^{27} (P) and Gn 2^{7} (J), man was made by God and through an act of Divine will. P states that God 'created' man; J indicates that he was formed out of previously existing matter ('the dust of the ground'), but that he received his life immediately from God—J″ breathing into him the breath of life. The doctrine of the pre-existence of souls cannot be discovered in OT, although 1 S 2^{6}, Job 1^{21}, and Ps 139^{15} have been thought by some to imply it. The first of these passages refers only to natural birth and death. Whatever the second may mean, it would appear from Job $10^{8ff.}$ that the author of the poem held the genesis of the personality to be contemporary with that of the body in the womb. The expression in Ps 139^{15} 'when I was curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth' comes nearer to the idea of pre-existence; but the context points to the embryonic development of the body, and therefore it is reasonable to suppose that the phrase is an imaginative allusion to that process (see Schultz, OT Theol. (Eng. tr.) vol. ii. p. 250 ff.). The doctrine of pre-existence appears in Alex. Judaism and is met with in Apocr. (Wis $8^{19ff.}$). It is distinctly set forth by Philo (de Somn. i. 22). It is not taught in NT, although it was held by contemporary rabbis (see Lightfoot, ii. p. 569), and the disciples may refer to it with regard to the man born blind (Jn 9^{2}).

iii. NATURE.—In the Bible man is treated as a creature sharing the nature of the world around him. A common Heb. name for mankind is 'flesh,' a term which expresses at once the materiality and the frailty of the race. The latter quality is much insisted on; compared with God, man is but 'dust and ashes' (Gn 2^{7} 3^{19} 18^{27}). Nevertheless, in both accounts of his creation (P and J), while man is associated with the universe around him he is described with separate statements that indicate a unique nature. According to P, man was made 'in the image of God' (Gn $1^{26.\,27}$). This phrase, taken in connexion with P's doctrine of the spiritual existence of God, must refer to mental and moral faculties, not to physical form, i.e. to intellect, affections, will, moral personality (Delitzsch). In Ps 8^{5} man is described as 'made to lack but little of God,' a passage in which, while the high endowments of the race are gratefully acknowledged in daring language, it is to be observed that the word for God is אֱלֹהִים (softened in LXX to ἀγγέλους), not יהוה, and that this is mentioned in the third person though the psalm is addressed to J″ (Schultz, OT Theol. vol. ii. p. 254). It has been suggested on the ground of Gn 1^{27} that P teaches that mankind was originally androgynous, and on the ground of Gn 2^{21} that J contains the same idea; but this is more ingenious than reasonable.

iv. UNITY OF THE RACE.—This is implied in the accounts of the Creation, the Deluge, and the tower of Babel, and in the genealogies of Genesis. It has been asserted that Gn $6^{1.\,2}$ points to two distinct species of mankind (Keil); but elsewhere in OT the expression 'the sons of God' (בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים) invariably stands for angels (Job 1^{6} [see Dav.] 2^{1} 38^{7}; cf. בְּנֵי אֵלִים Ps 29^{1} 89^{6}; בַּר אֱלָהִין 'a son of gods' Dn 3^{25}). So LXX of Gn $6^{1.\,2}$ and Philo on this passage; also Josephus (Ant. I. iii. 1). Moreover, there is nothing to indicate that the phrase 'the daughters of men' could refer to the women of one race to the exclusion of others (Delitzsch, in loc.). The development of monotheistic ideas tended to deepen the sense of the unity of mankind, and so to correct any influences in the opposite direction that might arise from the exclusiveness of Jews with regard to Gentiles and that of Greeks in their view of primitive races or even of foreigners generally (βάρβαροι). This unity is distinctly affirmed in St. Paul's speech on the Areopagus with an emphasis which indicates that it might not be fully acknowledged by his audience (Ac 17^{26}). It is taken for granted in the NT statements of the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ (e.g. Jn 3^{16}). While it is at the foundation of St. Paul's universalism, it is never contradicted by his Judaizing opponents.

v. DESTINY.—It is the teaching of OT as well as NT that God has a great future in store, first for His elect, and then through them for the race. This is to be preceded by a 'day of the Lord,' in NT the Parousia, which ushers in the glory through terrible judgments. The grounds of hope for the future are all found in the mercy and the faithfulness of God, whose own glory is realized in the ultimate well-being of His creatures. While the end of the physical universe is contemplated, that of the race of man is not predicted—whatever may be the fate of individuals. On the contrary, OT points to a boundless future of peace, and NT to the final establishment of the kingdom of God. See ESCHATOLOGY. On the whole subject see, further, under ADAM and COSMOGONY; and for the Psychology of Man see PSYCHOLOGY.

MAN OF SIN AND ANTICHRIST (ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀνομίας, ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, ὁ ἀντίχριστος, ὁ ἀντικείμενος, ὁ ἄνομος).—There are three principal sources in the NT whence we derive our knowledge of the beliefs of the 1st cent. concerning the Antichrist and Man of Sin, viz. 2 Th, 1 and 2 Jn, and the Apocalypse.

i. The Pauline account (2 Th 2) is this, that the final coming of Christ is to be preceded by (1) the falling-away (ἡ ἀποστασία). (2) After this, the revealing of the Man of Sin, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, giving himself out that he is God. He has power to do miracles which are lying miracles. The Lord will come and destroy him with the breath of His mouth. There is something, described first as a thing (neuter, τὸ κατέχον), then as a person (masc., ὁ κατέχων), which prevents the appearance of the Man of Sin for the time being. St. Paul reminds the Thessalonians that he used to tell them these particulars when he was with them (ἔτι ὢν πρὸς ὑμᾶς ταῦτα ἔλεγον ὑμῖν, v.^{5}).

ii. In the Epistles of St. John we have little but the name of Antichrist (which occurs nowhere else in NT). In 1 Jn 2^{18} occur these most important words: 'Little children, it is the last hour: and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time.' From this we gather, as from 2 Th, that the belief in Antichrist was one familiar to the Christians of the time. The name occurs again in 2^{22} 4^{3} ('this is that matter of Antichrist'—τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρ.—'whereof ye have heard that it should come'), 2 Jn^{7}. St. John, then, alludes to a popular belief, and spiritualizes it, applying it to tendencies already at work.

iii. In the Apocalypse a far more complex state of things is found. It is necessary briefly to sketch the characteristics of the various evil powers (Beasts) which appear in it.

(a) First in 11^{7} we have, suddenly introduced without any previous description, 'the Beast that cometh up out of the abyss.' Of him it is only said that he slays the Two Witnesses, and we gather that his seat is at Jerusalem. In connexion with him we find mention of a period of 42 months or 1260 days (=3½ years), of which more will be said.

(b) Next in ch. 12 appears the Great Red Dragon in heaven, who is expressly identified with Satan. He persecutes the woman clothed with the sun, and is cast out of heaven.

(c) In ch. 13 a Beast with seven heads and ten horns, crowned, comes up out of the sea. One of his heads is wounded to death and is revived. And the Dragon (cf. 12) gives to him his power.

(d) In 13^{11} another Beast comes up out of the earth, which has two horns like a lamb (evidently, therefore, is a rival and counterpart of the Lamb), and speaks like a dragon (being in reality Satanic and not divine). This being is afterwards (19^{20} etc.) called the False Prophet. His function is to support the former Beast by lying miracles, and induce mankind to worship him. The former Beast is accordingly worshipped as God, and sets a mark upon his adherents; and his name is indicated by the mystic number 666 (or 616). The principal Beast and the False Prophet appear again in chs. 19 and 20, where they make a final assault on the saints, and are vanquished by Christ.

(e) Lastly, in ch. 17 another Beast, scarlet, with seven heads and ten horns, appears, upon which the woman (Babylon) is seated. This Beast is explained to the seer: it is said that it 'was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the abyss and go into perdition.' Its heads are seven hills, and seemingly also seven kings (five past, one present, one to come), and its horns are ten kings (all future).

Of this exceedingly complicated series of images it would be absurd to attempt to give all the solutions which have been suggested. W. Bousset in his recent commentary on the Apoc. gives a view which commends itself as nearest to the truth of any. It is shortly this:—The Beast of ch. 11 is the Antichrist of current belief, taken over by the author of the Apocalypse together with the other traditional image of the Witnesses. The Beast of ch. 12 is perhaps an ancient mythical personification of some natural force (see below) identified by the Apocalypse with Satan. The Beast of ch. 13 is Rome, and its slain head which is revived is Nero redivivus. Certain of its characteristics are derived from the popular conception of Antichrist. Its number 666 is taken to mean Nero Cæsar. It derives its power from Satan. The False Prophet of ch. 13 is in many respects the Antichrist of popular belief, posing as a counterpart of the Lamb, and able to work wonders. But here it is in a subordinate position to Rome: the apocalyptist borrows the figure from the beliefs of his time: by it he probably intends the heathen priesthood, especially in its relation to the worship of the Cæsars. The Beast of ch. 17 is, as we have seen, a complex image. It is partly representative of an individual who was, and is not, etc.—Nero redivivus; partly of a polity—that of Rome.

iv. With these notices from the Epistles and Apocalypse we must couple a few of less certain import from the Gospels. (a) In Mt 24^{24}, Mk $13^{6.\ 22}$, Lk 21^{8} our Lord predicts the coming of false Christs and false prophets. In Mt and Mk there is also mention of the 'abomination of desolation' in the Holy Place, coupled with an injunction that when this appears they that are in Judæa are to flee to the mountains. This is the sequel to a 'great tribulation,' of which the duration will be shortened by God for the sake of the elect. And upon this follow portents in heaven, and the coming of the Son of Man. This 'abomination of desolation' is very plausibly interpreted by many modern critics of the session of Antichrist in the temple as God. And some critics suppose that this portion of our Lord's eschatological discourse has been influenced or interpolated in accordance with current beliefs. See, further, art. ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. (b) Lastly, in Jn 5^{43} our Lord says, 'I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive.' Many commentators, e.g. Chrys., Cyr., Theod. Mops., explain this 'other' to be Antichrist.

Such are the passages of the NT which throw light upon the subject of Antichrist: and we gather from them unmistakably that teaching concerning Antichrist was orally current at a very early time. Did it originate with Christianity, or is it a pre-Christian Jewish idea?

In Jewish apocalyptic literature we find undoubted evidence of this belief. In the Book of Daniel are certain passages which bear on the question. (α) In ch. 7 appear four beasts, the last of which has a 'little horn' which makes war against the saints. This horn, it is explained to the seer, is a king who will war against God and the saints for a period expressed as times, a time and half a time (3½ years): upon his fall follows the judgment. (β) In ch. 8 out of one of the four horns of the he-goat (Greece) comes a little horn which waxes great and casts down some of the stars of heaven, and magnifies himself even to the prince of the host, and takes away the daily sacrifice. In connexion with him is mentioned, but obscurely, the abomination that maketh desolate. This lasts for 2300 half-days, or 1150 days. In the interpretation this horn is said to represent a king of fierce countenance understanding dark sentences, who stands up against the Prince of princes, and is 'broken without hand.' (γ) In ch. 9 the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the 'abomination' takes its place for half a week (3½ years). (δ) In chs. 11. 12 is a long prophecy of a king of the north who will oppress Judæa, take away the daily sacrifice, and set up the abomination that maketh desolate. He comes to a sudden end, and then follows the great tribulation, and then a resurrection of the dead.

It is agreed that these predictions, while partly applicable to a historical person, Antiochus Epiphanes, do not apply to him in full. Those who regard the book as written during his persecution, take the view that the seer anticipated the end of all things to happen immediately upon the fall of Antiochus, and that he wrote shortly before that event. It is at least clear that parts of this picture, as of so many others in the Bk. of Daniel, were used by the author of the NT Apocalypse: notably the casting down of the stars from heaven (Rev 12), and the length assigned to the reign of the wicked king (see the 42 months and the 1260 days of Rev $11^{2.\ 3}$).

In the third Book of the Sibylline Oracles (c. B.C. 170) is a prediction that Beliar will come in the last days, ἐκ Σεβαστηνῶν, which according to Bousset means 'of the race of Augustus'; while others, comparing the Ascension of Isaiah, interpret it as 'from Samaria.' Note that the final adversary is here no other than Satan, apparently in the form of man. To this Sib. Orac. ii., originally a Jewish composition but extensively Christianized, adds that Elias (alone) will come as a witness, and that Beliar will do many signs.

In 4 Ezra ($5^{4.\ 6}$) are traces, though obscured and corrupted, of the belief. We read, among a list of the signs of the end: 'thou shalt see the kingdom that is after the third (i.e. the power of Rome) shaken,'* and also 'he shall reign whom they look not for who dwell on the earth.'

In Apoc. Bar (ch. 40) is a prediction of the destruction of the last leader of the enemies of Israel by the Messiah on Mount Sion.

In Asc. Isa. (ch. 4) are clear predictions of the advent of Antichrist, who is identified with Nero redivivus, and of his reign for the traditional period of 3½ years. But this cannot safely be regarded as pre-Christian.

From this evidence, and from an examination of a number of patristic documents, Bousset (Der Antichrist, 1895) has concluded, and as it seems to us rightly, that there was among the Jews a fully developed legend of Antichrist—perhaps oral, but more probably written—which was accepted and amplified by Christians; and that this legend diverges from and contradicts in important points the conceptions we find in the Apocalypse. As formulated by Christians of the 1st cent. its main features are—

That Antichrist would not appear before the fall of Rome; that he would then appear among the Jews, proclaim himself as God, and claim to be worshipped in the temple at Jerusalem; that Elias would appear and denounce him, and be slain by him; that he would be born of the tribe of Dan: this idea being due to an interpretation of Gn 49^{17}, Dt 33^{22}, Jer 8^{16}—a tradition known to the apocalyptist, who omits Dan from the list of the tribes; that his reign would last for 3½ years; that the believing Jews (or all the Church) would flee into the wilderness, whither Antichrist would pursue them; that he would then be destroyed by the Lord with the breath of His mouth (a conception derived from Is 11^{4}).

It will be seen that there is here a considerable disagreement with the Apocalypse. In that book the principal beast is Rome, and there are two witnesses, not one. The first point is very important: the Apocalypse is anti-Roman. The current belief expressed by St. Paul regarded the Roman power as a bulwark against Antichrist.

---

* 'Post tertiam turbatam' is taken as the equivalent of an original Greek τὴν μετὰ τὴν τρίτην (sc. βασιλείαν) θορυβουμένην. The old reading was 'post tertiam tubam.'

In later times the mass of conflicting traditions about Antichrist led to the idea of a twofold Antichrist—one for the Jews and one for the world at large. This is seen with the greatest clearness in the writings of the 3rd cent. poet Commodian, especially in his Carmen Apologeticum, where Nero redivivus appears as the antichrist of the Gentiles ('nobis Nero factus antichristus, ille Judæis'). Of the ultimate source of this belief it is not possible to speak with certainty.

Gunkel, in a recent work (Schöpfung und Chaos), has struck out a line of interpretation which has already been fruitful, and promises to be more so in the future. He regards the conceptions of the Apocalyptic beasts as survivals of ancient mythological beliefs to which the Apocalyptic writer gave new life and meaning. The primeval dragon of the deep (Tiamat in Babylonian mythology), which opposed the Creator in the beginning, and was overcome and bound by him, would, it was thought, in the last days rear up its head again and break out in a final rebellion, to be vanquished this time for ever. And it is at least a plausible—to the mind of the present writer a more than plausible—theory that beliefs of this kind belonging to the common Semitic stock, and refreshed in the recollection of the Jews during the Exile, should in their later literature once again appear in the guise of 'ancient wisdom,' with a new and loftier spiritual meaning read into them.

Antichrist—the Antichrist believed in by the Jews—passes through several stages. He is perhaps originally a natural force personified, representing Chaos as opposed to order, Darkness as against light. He is then identified with Satan, the great adversary of God in the moral world. The Antichrist of the Sibylline Oracles is, as we have seen, Beliar. And, lastly, he is thought of as a man in whom Satan's power is concentrated, as the power of God is concentrated in the Messiah.

In the New Testament St. Paul adopts, and St. John in the Epistles alludes to, a conception of Antichrist which had been coloured largely by the identification (in the Book of Daniel) of Antichrist with a historical person (Antiochus Epiphanes). In the Apocalypse the traditional Antichrist appears for a moment (in ch. 11); and thereafter his characteristics are divided between the Beast of ch. 13, who is Rome, headed by Nero redivivus, claiming divine worship, and the False Prophet who parodies the Lamb and performs the lying wonders.

The wish to identify the Antichrist of tradition with definite contemporary personalities (as Antiochus and Nero) is very largely responsible for the confusion which surrounds the whole subject.

A word as to later Jewish beliefs. The destruction of Jerusalem by Rome operated largely upon Jewish minds. Whereas to them Rome had been the bulwark against Antichrist, it now took the place of Antichrist in Jewish thought; and accordingly in such late compositions as the Book of Zerubbabel (as well as in the earlier Targums) the name of Antichrist is Armillus (=Romulus=Rome). But, in spite of the adverse view of the Apocalypse of John, the Christian Church continued to regard Rome as the protector of the world against Antichrist, and to pray for its preservation accordingly.

The clearest of the utterances of our Lord and of St. John point rather to a plurality of antichrists who are to appear in different ages of the Church's growth—rather to movements and tendencies of a kind hostile to Christianity, than to any one well-defined personality.

LITERATURE.—The most important sources of knowledge on the subject of Antichrist are given in full in Bousset's excellent monograph, Der Antichrist, which has been copiously used in the body of this article. Besides those already named, the following may be mentioned here: Hippolytus, de Antichristo—sermons attributed to Ephraem Syrus (Latin and Greek); Victorinus Petabionensis on the Apocalypse; Lactantius (a very important authority); the pseudo-Methodius, de principio et jure sæculi; the tract of Adso (printed among Anselm's works), de Antichristo. Of Apocryphal documents, the following contain interesting details: the Coptic Apocalypse of Elias (Christian, in its present form), recently edited by Steindorff in 'Texte und Unters.' (Neue Folge); the Syriac Book of Clement or Testament of the Lord, coupled with a Latin fragment found by the present writer at Treves; the late Greek Apocalypses of Esdras and of John (these four will be found collected in Apocrypha Anecdota, i.); the various forms of the Apocalypse of Daniel (see Bousset, and Vassiliev's Anecdota Byzantina, and Klostermann's Analecta zur LXX). An Armenian prophecy of St. Nerses, published by F. C. Conybeare (Academy, 1895), and an interesting Latin document attributed to St. John in Roger Hoveden's Chronicle (Rolls Series), should be added to Bousset's stock of documents.

A principal feature in the later Apocalyptic literature is the description of Antichrist's personal appearance, which is described as very unpleasing. It is curious to note that several traits of this are borrowed in the Greek Acts of St. Christopher (Analecta Bollandiana), and attached to that saint before his conversion.

M. R. JAMES.

MANAEN (Μαναήν, Gr. form of מְנַחֵם Menaḥem, LXX Μαναήμ, 'consoler,' 2 K 15^{17}), one of the 'prophets and teachers' in the Church of Antioch at the time of St. Paul's departure on his First Missionary Journey (Ac 13^{1}),* and σύντροφος of Herod the tetrarch, i.e. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great (Lk 3$^{1.19}$ 9^{7} etc.). σύντροφος may mean either collactaneus, 'foster-brother,' 'nursed along with' Herod (Walch, Ols., de Wette, Alf., Words.; cf. Xen. Mem. ii. 3. 4), or merely contubernalis, 'brought up in the same household,' or 'on intimate terms with' him (Eras. Luth. Calv. Grot. Baumg. Ew.; cf. 1 Mac 1^{29}). Walch, recalling that the brothers Antipas and Archelaus were brought up together (Jos. Ant. XVII. i. 3), argues for the closer (without excluding the more general) relationship, on account of the tetrarch † alone being here mentioned.

It is highly probable that this Manaen was related to an older Manaen referred to by Josephus (Ant. XV. x. 5) as a notable Essene who, about B.C. 50, met Herod, afterwards the Great, then a schoolboy, and saluted him as future king of the Jews (Antipater, the father of Herod, was then chief minister of the Hasmonæan prince Hyrcanus). When the anticipation was afterwards realized (B.C. 37), Herod sent for this older Manaen, treated him as a friend (δεξιωσάμενος), and thenceforth honoured the whole Essene sect. A Talmudic authority ‡ identifies the same Manaen with a leading Rabbi who entered the household service of the king. When Antipas was born, some years later, Herod may very naturally have selected, as the child's foster-brother and youthful companion, a grandson § or grandnephew of the senior Manaen, who would thus be honoured in the person of the boy.‖ As σύντροφος (in either sense) the younger Manaen would receive a place at the royal table, be educated along with Antipas, and probably accompany him and Archelaus when the two princes were sent to complete their education at Rome (Jos. Ant. XVII. i. 3). When Antipas became tetrarch (he was called 'king' only by courtesy) on his father's death, Manaen would naturally have some position in the 'royal' household; and, assuming that St. Luke and Manaen afterwards became acquainted at Antioch, with which both were connected,* it would most probably be from Manaen that St. Luke derived his knowledge of many facts concerning Antipas, his household, and other members of the Herodian family (Lk $3^{1.19.20}$ 8^3 9^{7-9} $13^{31.32}$ 23^{8-12}, Ac 12).

* The arrangement of the conjunctive particles suggests that the first three mentioned were prophets, the last two (Manaen and Saul) teachers. See Meyer, in loc.; cf. Xen. Mem. ii. 3. 19.

† Antipas is the only Herod whom St. Luke elsewhere (Lk 3$^{1.19}$) calls 'Herod the tetrarch,' although Philip (Lk 3^{1}) and, up till A.D. 52, Agrippa (Ac 25^{13}) might also have been so called. Agrippa, however, was only about seventeen at the time Manaen is designated as a teacher; Antipas would be over sixty.

‖ Cf. Chimham's reception into the royal household as a token of honour to his father Barzillai (2 S 19^{37}).

The time, occasion, and instrumentality of Manaen's becoming a follower of Christ are unknown. He may have been drawn to the Master simultaneously with Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk 8^3), or with the Herodian nobleman (βασιλικός, i.e. courtier) whose son was healed by Jesus (Jn $4^{46.53}$). The ministry of the Baptist,† which notably influenced Herod himself (Mk 6^{20}), may have been blessed to one whose Essene origin might predispose him towards our Lord's ascetic forerunner. His discipleship need not have involved departure from Herod's court; but the separation must have taken place, if not earlier, in A.D. 39, when the tetrarch, instigated by his ambitious wife, left Palestine for Rome, in order to obtain royal dignity, but was condemned by Caligula to perpetual exile (Jos. Ant. XVIII. vii. 2). About the time of Antipas' removal, or soon after, the Gentile Church of Antioch was founded by Jewish Christians who had left Judæa after Stephen's martyrdom (Ac 11^{20}). From his subsequent position as a prominent Christian teacher at Antioch, we may assume as highly probable that Manaen was one of these founders. At all events, he had a leading share (1) in building up a mother Church in the third city of the empire, (2) in propagating successfully the pure Christian faith and life in a city whose moral corruption was proverbial, (3) in establishing the great truth, then but dimly discerned even by apostles, that the Gentiles were fellow-heirs, on equal terms with the Jews, of the divine promise of salvation.

MANAHATH (מָנַחַת, Μαχαναθ(ε)ί, Manaoth).—1. Mentioned only in 1 Ch 8^6 as the place to which certain Benjamite clans were carried captive. Targ. adds 'in the land of the House of Esau,' and Syr. and Arab. VSS borrow a word from the next verse and translate 'to the plain of Naaman.' The town is probably identical with that implied in Manahethites (wh. see), with the Μανοχώ of the Greek text of Jos 15^{59}, where the LXX preserves a list of towns which had been lost from our Heb. text; and if the text in Jg is correct, with the Menuhah (wh. see) of Jg 20^{43} RVm. The site of the city is unknown. Conder (PEF Mem. iii. 21, 136) suggests Mâlha, 3 miles S.W. of Jerusalem. The text of 1 Ch 8^6 is probably corrupt.

2. (Μαν(ν)αχά(θ), Μαχανάμ, Μαναχάμ, Manahat(h)).—Gn 36^{23} (P), 1 Ch 1^{40} 'son of Shobal, son of Seir, the Horite,' i.e. eponymous ancestor of a clan of Edom, or of the earlier population conquered and absorbed by Edom. See, further, art. MANAHETHITES. W. H. BENNETT.

MANAHATHITES.—See MANAHETHITES.

MANAHETHITES stands in AV for מְנֻחוֹת (A Ἀμμανίθ, B Μωναιώ, RV Menuhoth) in 1 Ch 2^{52} '(These were the sons of Caleb . . . Shobal) And Shobal the father of Kiriath-jearim had sons, Haroeh, half of the Menuhoth'; and also for מָנַחְתִּי (A Μανάθ, B Μαλαθεί, RV Manahathites) in 1 Ch 2^{54} '(These were the sons of Caleb . . . Salma) The sons of Salma; Beth-lehem . . . and half of the Manahathites, the Zorites.' The Vulgate translates 'rest' (dimidium requietionum (or -is)) in both verses. We should read (with Kittel, SBOT) מָנַחְתִּי 'Manahathites' in both verses. The genealogy is to be interpreted as meaning that the city Manahath, occupied by portions of two sections of the Edomite clan Caleb, came to be reckoned to Judah. See art. MANAHATH. W. H. BENNETT.

MANASSEAS (Μανασσῆας), 1 Es 9^{31}=MANASSEH, Ezr 10^{30}.

MANASSEH (מְנַשֶּׁה).—1. A king of Judah. He was the son of Hezekiah and father of Amon. His mother's name was Hephzi-bah (2 K 21^1). He probably came to the throne B.C. 686. He is said to have been twelve years old on his accession. The length of his reign is given as fifty-five years; but this should, it seems, be reduced to forty-five, in which case he died B.C. 641. Of the actual history of this long reign we know very little, the attention of the author of the Book of Kings being fixed on the condition of religion. The reign was probably peaceful and prosperous, at any rate we have no indication to the contrary in our oldest source. But in the matter of religion it was quite otherwise. During the reign of Hezekiah those who attached themselves to the higher teaching of the prophets had formed a powerful party which had great influence over the king, who seems to have done something towards a religious reformation (2 K 18^4). But there was always a strong party which resented reform, and on Hezekiah's death it improved its opportunity by capturing his successor. All the superstitious cults and practices of the time of Ahaz came back, and were established with the royal sanction (2 K 21^3). But they did not come back alone. The most important feature of M.'s reign is its religious syncretism, the blending of foreign worships with the popular religion of Israel. Especially significant is the worship of the host of heaven (v.^{5}), which shows the influence of Assyria and Babylon. The Baal and Asherah cults were probably revivals of old Can. worship. Mention is also made of dealings with familiar spirits and wizards (v.^{6}). It is not unlikely that we should connect with this the shedding of innocent blood (v.^{16}), with which the king is also charged. This points to a systematic religious persecution. The time was, accordingly, one of religious reaction—not of reaction only, however, but of syncretism, of gloomy superstition and cruel fanaticism. Out of it sprang, according to the teaching of the prophets (2 K $23^{26.27}$ 24^{2-4}), the destruction of Jerus. and the Exile, which even the piety of Josiah and the Deuteronomic Reformation were unable to avert.

In Chronicles it is said that, in consequence of his sin, M. was taken by the Assyrians in fetters to Babylon (2 Ch 33^{11}). There he humbled himself before God, and was restored to his kingdom, whereupon he cleansed Jerus. and the temple of idols, and strengthened the fortifications of the city (v.$^{12\mathrm{ff.}}$). The silence of Kings is very strong evidence against the story; for if M. had been really taken into captivity, repented, and on his return sought to undo the evil he had wrought, the writer in Kings would not have left the impression of unbroken idolatry and sin. (Contrast the case of Ahab, 1 K 21^{27-29}). That the Assyrians should have taken a prisoner to Babylon is not in itself very suspicious. But the mention of it probably gives a clue to the origin of the story. The Bab. exile was traced by the prophets to the sin of

* Eus. (HE iii. 4) affirms St. Luke's Antiochene parentage, and the numerous references to Antioch in Ac suggest the familiarity of the writer with this city.

† From Manaen St. Luke may have obtained the information about the Baptist not given by the other evangelists (Lk 1^{57-80} 3^{7-14}).

M., and the Chronicler would feel it a fit thing that the author of this calamity should himself experience a captivity in Babylon. There was this further reason for the story. The long and peaceful reign of so wicked a king called for explanation. And this was accounted for by the story of his penitence and reformation. It is a characteristic example of the Chronicler's method of rewriting history. See, further, Driver in Hogarth's Author. and Archæol. pp. 114–116, where the archæological data bearing on the question are fully discussed, and the conclusion is reached that while the inscriptions do not decide the question, they fail to neutralize the suspicions attaching to the Chronicler's narrative.

2. Manasseh in Jg 18^{30} is a correction for Moses, since it seemed derogatory to the reputation of the latter that his grandson should have been the first priest at the sanctuary of Dan. The correction was made by inserting the letter נ above the line, thus changing the word into Manasseh (cf. Moore, ad loc.). 3. 4. Two contemporaries of Ezra who had married foreign wives (Ezr $10^{30.\ 33}$). 5. See next article.

A. S. PEAKE.

MANASSEH (מְנַשֶּׁה,—according to the etymology given in Gn 41^{51}, 'making to forget,' from נָשָׁה 'to forget'; LXX usually Μανασσῆ), the elder son of the patriarch Joseph by his Egyptian wife, Asenath, and also the name of the tribe reputed to be descended from him. Of Manasseh as the son of Joseph, nothing more is stated than what is recorded in Gn 48, where Jacob (1) blesses his two grandsons, giving Ephraim, against their father's desire, the first place (vv.$^{1-2.\ 8-20}$ JE), and (2) adopts them, placing each on the same level with his own sons (vv.$^{3-7}$ P). Both these transactions have manifestly a tribal significance; they are traditional explanations of the relations existing subsequently between the two tribes Manasseh and Ephraim themselves, and between these two and the other tribes. In Gn 50^{23} it is also stated that the children of MACHIR, the son of Manasseh, were 'born upon Joseph's knees,' i.e. he survived their birth, and was able to recognize them as his descendants (cf. 30^{3}; Odyss. xix. 401; Stade, ZAW, 1886, 146 f.).

Manasseh as a tribe is, however, more important than Manasseh as an individual. i. History of the tribe. All that the oldest tradition of the Exodus (JE) says about the tribe is, that after Moses had allotted inheritances on the E. of Jordan to Reuben and Gad (Nu 32), particular families of Manasseh took possession of districts in the same neighbourhood,—the children of Machir, the (eldest) son of Manasseh, occupying Gilead generally, Jair, 'son' (i.e. descendant) of Manasseh, occupying the district in it called afterwards HAVVOTH-JAIR (which see), and Nobaḥ occupying Ḳenath, with its 'daughters,' or dependent villages, vv.$^{39.\ 41.\ 42}$.* The oldest parts of the Hex. thus recognize only two trans-Jordanic tribes as receiving their territories from Moses:† different Manassite clans conquer territories N. of these for themselves. Whether these statements, exactly as they stand, are historical, is doubtful: it is remarkable that in Jg 10^{3-5} the 'tent-villages of Jair' are represented as deriving their name from Jair, a Gileadite, who was one of the Judges: hence it is very probable that the conquest of Jair is ante-dated in Nu 32; and in fact, if v.^{40} (see note * above) be disregarded, we have in vv.$^{39.\ 41.\ 42}$ (Dillm.) 'a good historical account of the gradual advance of Manassites into the territory E. of Jordan, though not under, but after Moses.' By the Deut. writers, a large part of the territory E. of Jordan, viz. 'the rest of Gilead (i.e. the half of Gilead N. of the Jabbok*), and all Bashan, even all the region of ARGOB' (Dt 3^{13}†), is said to have been given specifically by Moses to 'the half-tribe of Manasseh' (cf. Dt 29^{8}, Jos 12^{6} $13^{8.}$ [LXX, Dillm.] ^{30} 18^{7} 22^{7}:‡ for Bashan, also, as belonging to Manasseh, Dt 4^{43}, Jos 20^{8} $21^{6.\ 27}$). The same half of the tribe is in Jos 1^{12} 4^{12} (D^{2}) also represented as crossing over Jordan, together with Reuben and Gad, to assist the other tribes in the conquest of Canaan:§ Jos 22^{1-6} describes the blessing with which Joshua sent them away to their homes, when they had discharged this task. According to Jos 22^{9-34} (probably from a special source, allied to P), the half-tribe took part with Reuben and Gad in building the altar by Jordan, which so nearly led to a rupture between the E. and W. parts of Israel.

All these statements relate to the part of the tribe settled E. of the Jordan. There was, however, another part settled W. of the Jordan; and J's description of the territory belonging to this, and of the manner in which it enlarged the lot originally assigned to it, is preserved (imperfectly) in Jos $17^{1b.\ 2.\ 8.\ 9a\beta.\ 10b-18}$ (taken in connexion with $16^{1-3.\ 9-10}$). In J's account of the conquest, the two divisions of the tribe, Ephraim and Manasseh, are treated as one (16^{1} 17^{17} 18^{5}, Jg $1^{22.\ 23.\ 35}$, where note the expression 'House of Joseph'); they receive accordingly a single 'lot' (16^{1}; cf. 17^{14}), the borders of which are defined in 16^{1-3}: the N. border—which would be the N. border of Manasseh—is now missing. Jos 17^{1b-2} describes how the Manassite clans were distributed: Machir had Gilead and Bashan; the other clans (Abi'ezer, Ḥeleḳ, Asriel, Shechem, Ḥepher, and Shemida') were settled (it is implied) in W. Palestine. Vv.$^{8.\ 9a\beta.\ 10b-13}$ || are fragments of J's account of the cities of W. Manasseh: all, however, that these fragments state is that Tappuaḥ, on its S. border, belonged to Ephraim, and that on the N. the towns of Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor,¶ Taanach, and Megiddo, though actually in the territories of Issachar and Asher, belonged in fact to Manasseh, but that the Canaanites maintained their ground in them (vv.$^{11-13}$, with verbal differences, = Jg 1^{27-28}). The historical significance of this statement is that on the N. Manasseh was confined to the mountains and 'cut off from the fertile plain of Esdraelon and the tribes which struggled for a foothold beyond it in Galilee by a chain of fortified cities guarding the passes,'—Beth-shean being in the Jordan Valley on the east, Ibleam, Taanach, and Megiddo in the centre, where the central highlands slope down into the plain, and Dor on the seacoast, about 15 miles S. of Carmel. There follows (vv.$^{14-18}$) the curious narrative describing how the children of Joseph (i.e. Ephraim and Manasseh together), finding the hill-country insufficient for them, and being unable to make their way into the plain on the N. on account of the Canaanites, with their 'chariots of iron,' com-

* V.^{40} must be a later addition: not only is it out of place after v.^{39}, but 'their tent-villages' (חוותיהם) in v.^{41}, which can refer only to the 'Amorites' of v.^{39}, shows that once v.^{41} must have immediately followed v.^{39}. The intention of the addition is evidently to legitimize the conquest of Machir, by representing it as sanctioned by Moses.

† V.^{33}, in which, for the first time in the chapter, the 'half-tribe of Manasseh' is mentioned, seems plainly to be a later addition, made for the purpose of harmonizing the passage with the representation of Dt and P.

* Cf. Jos $12^{2.\ 15}$ 13^{31}: the other, southern 'half,' belonged to Gad (Dt 3^{12}).

† Vv.$^{14.\ 15}$ are repetitions (in substance) of Nu $32^{41.\ 40}$, and are, indeed, most probably a later insertion in the original text of Dt (see Dillm.).

‡ So also in P, Jos 13^{29} 14^{3}.

§ In Nu 32 the command to do this is laid upon Reuben and Gad; but nothing is said about its being laid upon the half-tribe of Manasseh.

|| On vv.$^{5.\ 6}$ see Dillmann.

¶ The clause relating to En-dor is, however, omitted in LXX and in Jg 1^{27}; and its originality is questioned by Dillm., Budde, Ri. u. S. p. 13; Moore, Judges, p. 46.

plain to Joshua; and are advised by him in reply, if they are the great people that they claim to be, to go up into the mountains and cut down the forest there—i.e., apparently, augment their available territory by clearing the large thickly wooded areas which it still contained (Stade, Gesch. i. 163; Dillm.)—and (v.^{18b}) apply themselves more vigorously to expel the Canaanites. Fragmentary, and in parts obscure, as these notices of JE are, they nevertheless show clearly how imperfectly, for long after the Israelites first entered into Canaan, the W. half of Manasseh—in this respect, indeed, not differing from many of the other tribes (Jg 1)—obtained possession of its territory.

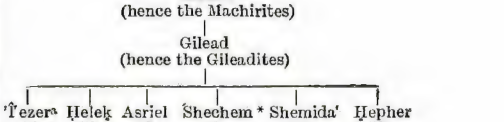
The passage is undoubtedly obscure; and Budde (ZAW, 1887, p. 123 ff. = Ri. u. S. 1890, pp. 33 ff., 87), questioning this explanation of the 'forest,' and developing further the opinion already expressed by previous scholars (e.g. Ewald, Hist. ii. 281, 299 f., 307, 321, 322;* Wellh., Hist. 445; Stade, Gesch. i. 149), that the E. half of Manasseh was really, at least in part (Ewald), a colony thrown out by the W. branch of the tribe, after its settlement in Canaan, conjectured that Jos 17$^{14-18}$ referred originally to this undertaking, and that v.^{18} read originally 'but the hill-country of Gilead shall be thine,' urging in support of this view that the children of Joseph could not have complained that they had only 'one lot,' if besides their W. territory they had already received from Moses a territory E. of Jordan; and afterwards (ZAW, 1888, p. 148, Ri. u. S. pp. 38 f., 60, 87) adopted the suggestion of Valeton that Nu 32$^{39.41.42}$ once followed Jos 17$^{14-18}$, and described how the permission then given by Joshua was acted upon. The conjecture is an attractive one, but too bold, esp. in the transposition assumed for Nu 32$^{39.41.42}$, to be accepted with any confidence: had this, moreover, been the original sense of the passage, some allusion to crossing the Jordan ('get thee over' rather than 'get thee up' in v.^{15}, for instance) might have been expected (cf. also HGHL p. 577 n.). Nevertheless, whether Budde's view of these passages be accepted or not, Jg 5^{14} (see the last paragraph of this art.) undoubtedly lends probability to the opinion that the Manassites on the E. of Jordan were really immigrants from the West.

Of the later history of the tribe little specific is known. It played no prominent or distinctive part in the history of the nation. From the wild and exposed character of the district which the E. half of the tribe occupied, it may be inferred that its members were a brave and hardy race, able to maintain their own in the face of opposition (cf. Jos 17^{1}, Machir a 'man of war,' and 1 Ch 5$^{18-22}$, the narrative of a successful enterprise in which the E. Manassites took common part with Reuben and Gad against the Hagrites and other neighbouring tribes). Gideon in W. Manasseh (Jg 6^{15}, cf. v.^{35}), and (probably) Jephthah in E. Manasseh (Jg 11^{1}, cf. v.^{29}), were brave and distinguished members of the tribe. The strong Israelitish feeling which characterized 'Gilead' (including E. Manasseh), and the keen sense of common interests which bound it closely together with its brethren W. of Jordan, are well brought out by G. A. Smith (HGHL 578 ff.). 'The story of Jephthah throbs with the sense of common interest between Gilead and Ephraim.' Jabesh-gilead, romantically connected with the history of Saul (1 S 11. 31), was in all probability in E. Manasseh (about 20 m. S. of the Sea of Galilee). The tribe is specified by name in the Blessing of Moses, though characterized as less numerous than Ephraim (Dt 33^{17}, the 'ten thousands of Ephraim,' and the 'thousands of Manasseh'). Different districts of Manasseh (both E. and W.) are mentioned in 1 K 4$^{11-13}$ as supplying provision for Solomon's court during three months of the year. One city of refuge, Golan, was in E. Manasseh (Dt 4^{43} al.). The tribe suffered severely during the Syrian wars (Am 1^{3}, 2 K 10^{33}; cf. 8^{12} 13^{7}). It is implied in 2 K 15^{29}, and stated expressly in 1 Ch 5^{26}, that the E. Manassites were included among the trans-Jordanic Israelites transported by Tiglath-pileser to different places in the Assyrian empire. The statements in P respecting the numbers of the tribe at the time of the Exodus (32,200 at the first census Nu 1^{35}, and 52,700 at the second census Nu 26^{34}), and (Nu 2^{20}) its position in the camp (W. of the tabernacle, between Ephraim and Benjamin), and on the march (behind the tabernacle), have no historical value; the numbers of the Manassite warriors who, according to 1 Ch 12$^{31.38}$, attended at the time of David's coronation at Hebron, are equally unhistorical. For other scattered notices of the tribe, see Is 9^{21}, Ps 60^{7}=108^{8}, 1 Ch 9^{3} (in the post-exilic community) 26^{32} 27$^{20.21}$, 2 Ch 15^{9} 30$^{1.10.11.18}$ 31^{1}.

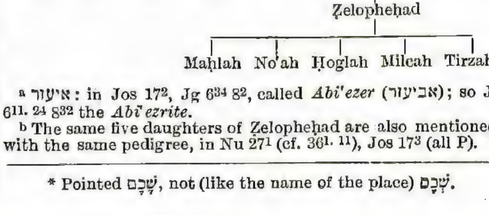
ii. The borders of the territory occupied by either the W. or the E. half of Manasseh cannot be fixed with precision. Of the W. half, the N. boundary seems to have been approximately the imperfectly defined line, where the hills slope down into the plain of Esdraelon, touching Asher and Issachar (Jos 17^{10b}); on the W. the border was the sea; on the S. it began (on the W.) with the Wâdy Kanah, perhaps (but see KANAH) a wâdy running up from the W. in the direction of Shechem, at about 32° 8′–10′ N., then, crossing this wâdy to the S., it passed along by Tappuaḥ (unknown) and Michmethath 'in front of (i.e. E. of) Shechem' to Asher, according to the Onom. (222. 93), a village 15 miles N.E. of Shechem, on the road to Beth-shean, thence (to judge from 16$^{6.7}$) it turned back sharply to the S. and passed down by Taanach-shiloh (7 miles S.E. of Shechem) and Naarah (in the Jordan Valley, 5 miles N. of Jericho), as far as Jericho itself; the E. border was the Jordan. The E. half of the tribe possessed, starting from the border city Mahanaim (ib. vv.$^{26.30}$, site uncertain; but near the Jordan, and probably not far N. of the Jabbok Gn 32^{2}, cf. vv.$^{10.22}$), 'half-Gilead' (Jos 13^{31}), i.e. the half N. of the Jabbok (see above) and all BASHAN—the whole comprising the well-wooded and (especially in its N. part) remarkably fertile tract of country stretching out northwards nearly to Hermon (the kingdom of Og, Jos 12$^{1b.5}$; cf. 1 Ch 5^{23}).

iii. The clans and subdivisions of Manasseh.—In the enumeration of these there is much diversity; the different schemes will be apprehended most clearly if presented in tabular form.

1. In J, then, we have the following genealogy (Jos 17^{1b-2})—



2. But in P the genealogy is as follows (Nu 26$^{28-34}$)—



[a] איעזר: in Jos 17^{2}, Jg 6^{34} 8^{2}, called Abi'ezer (אביעזר); so Jg 6$^{11.24}$ 8^{32} the Abi'ezrite.

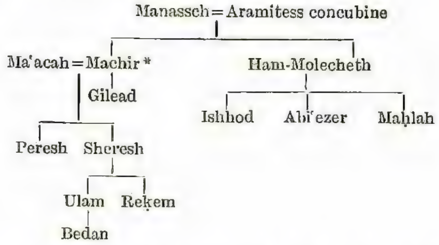
[b] The same five daughters of Zelopheḥad are also mentioned, with the same pedigree, in Nu 27^{1} (cf. 36$^{1.11}$), Jos 17^{3} (all P).

---

* Jg 12^{4} is, however, an uncertain passage to rely upon in support of this opinion; see Moore, ad loc.

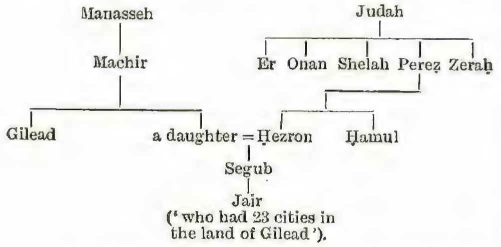
* Pointed שֶׁכֶם, not (like the name of the place) שְׁכֶם.

3. We have also (1 Ch 7$^{14-19}$)—



Ẓelophehad is also mentioned as the 'second' son of some one, whose name does not appear, and it is said that he had daughters: the sons of Shemida' are also enumerated, viz. Ahian, Shechem, Likhi, and Ani'am; but the text is evidently either corrupt or defective; and what place Ẓelophehad and Shemida' held in the genealogy is not clear, though Berth. and Kuenen think that Ẓelophehad is meant to be the second son of Manasseh.

4. There is, lastly (1 Ch 2$^{21-23}$)—



It is impossible to harmonize these conflicting schemes: it is manifest that they are different attempts to correlate and account for the principal clans of Manasseh, or for the names of districts colonized by it.[†] Gilead is 'son' of Machir, simply because the country was occupied by Machirite clans. Abi'ezer is mentioned in Jg 6$^{11. 24. 34}$ 8$^{2. 32}$ as the family, or clan, to which Gideon belonged: the other names, Ḥeleḳ, Asriel, etc., do not occur except in the passages cited. The only point on which the schemes all agree is in representing Machir as 'son' of Manasseh, and as 'father' of Gilead. In other respects the conspicuous difference is that, according to J, Machir is the eldest son of Manasseh, and the other clans, Abi'ezer etc., are coordinated with him as his brethren; whereas in P Machir is Manasseh's only son, and the six clans, Abi'ezer, etc., are represented as being his descendants, and in fact descended from him through his son 'Gilead.' Thus, as regards Machir, three stages seem to be discernible in the manner in which he was viewed. (1) In Jg 5^{14} he represents the West half of Manasseh. (2) In J (Jos 17^{1b-2}, Nu 32^{39}) he is the ancestor of the principal part of the East half of Manasseh, his brother clans being located, it is implied, on the W. of Jordan. (3) In P (Nu 26$^{28ff.}$) he is the ancestor, through his son 'Gilead,' of all the Manassites, Eastern and Western alike.

Accordingly, Jos 13^{31b} ('even for,' etc.), restricting what is said in v.^{a} of all the Machirites to half of them, is (Kuen., Dillm.) a correction of v.^{31a}, made for the purpose of harmonizing it with the representation of P (according to which, as Machir was Manasseh's only son, the E. half of the tribe could form only a part of his descendants).

It is hardly possible to interpret with confidence the historical significance of these variations; but it is possible that the variation between Jg 5^{14} and 1 may point to the fact that between the age of Deborah and that of J Gilead had been conquered by immigrants from the tribe of Manasseh settled on the W. of Jordan;[*] and that the representation of P may imply that (vol. ii. p. 129^{b}), 'holding Gilead to have been first conquered, as represented in the Hex., he regarded the W. Manassites as offshoots of the E. Manassites.' In 3 the statement that Manasseh's concubine was an Aramitess may be an indication that there was an admixture of Aramæan blood in the tribe, especially in its Eastern half; Ma'acah, Machir's 'wife' (1 Ch 7^{16}), also suggests some connexion with the Aram. tribe of Ma'acah, in the same neighbourhood (Dt 3^{14}, Jos 13^{13}, 2 S 10^{6} al.). In 4 the connexion with a clan of Judah, assumed for Jair, is remarkable.

MANASSES (Μανασσή B, -ῆς A).—1. 1 Es 9^{33} = MANASSEH, No. 4. 2. Judith's husband, Jth 8^{2}. 3. An unknown person mentioned in the dying words of Tobit as one who 'gave alms and escaped the snare of death' set for him by Aman (To 14^{10}, AV and RV, following LXX B Μανασσῆς). The text of ℵ, ἐν τῷ ποιῆσαί με (sic) ἐλεημοσύνην ἐξῆλθεν, κ.τ.λ., where the subject understood is Achiacharus, maintains the parallelism with the preceding clause, from which it repeats also the name Ναδάβ instead of Ἀμάν of A, or Ἀδάμ of B (cf. 11^{18}, where B reads Νασβᾶς, ℵ Ναβάδ, as the name of the ungrateful nephew of Achiacharus). Cosquin in Rev. Biblique, Jan. 1899, p. 52 f., argues strenuously in favour of the reading of ℵ in To 14^{10}, holding that Μανασσῆς is due simply to a scribal error. MANASSES (PRAYER OF).—In place of the remote threats against Manasseh in 2 K 21$^{11-15}$ we have in 2 Ch 33$^{11-13}$ an account of his just punishment for his sins by captivity, his repentance and restoration; and in vv.$^{18. 19}$ the statement that other details of his life and his prayer were recorded in the Acts of the Kings of Israel, and in the History of Hozai (or the Seers). Does the Greek Prayer of Manasses of our Apocrypha go back to this Prayer in the lost sources (or source) of Ch as its Hebrew original; or is it a free Greek composition suggested by Ch? Budde, after Ewald, argues for the former view (ZAW, 1892, p. 39 f.), and Ball (in Speaker's Com.) thinks it probable. Fritzsche (Exeg. Handb. zu d. Apok. i. 157) favoured the latter view, on the ground that the Greek is not a translation (so Schürer).

The Prayer stands among the Canticles appended to the Psalter in some MSS of LXX. Swete (iii. 802 ff., cf. ii. pp. ix, xi) prints A with variants of T (Psalterium Turicense). It is never found in LXX of 2 Ch, and is often missing in Greek Psalters which include the Canticles. It is found in the Apost. Const. ii. 22. Nestle (Septuaginta Studien, iii. 1899) argues that the text of our MSS A and T comes from the Apost. Const. or from its original, the Didascalia, and that the Prayer is not, as hitherto supposed, cited in these works from a MS of LXX. It appears in the Const. in connexion with the entire story of Manasseh as 'written in 4 K and 2 Ch.'[*] We read that Manasseh was bound with iron in prison, that bread made of bran and water mixed with vinegar were given him in scant measure, and that in such straits he humbled himself before God and prayed. After the Prayer the narrative proceeds: 'And the Lord heard his voice and had compassion upon him. And there came a flame of fire about him, and all the irons which were about him were melted: and the Lord healed Manasseh from his affliction,' etc. Julius Africanus knew that 'while M. was saying a hymn his bonds burst asunder, iron though they were, and he escaped' (John Damasc. Parall. ii. 15). He may therefore have read the Prayer in this setting.[†] If it was written in this connexion, its author showed more liturgical sense than historical imagination; for the allusions to Manasseh's situation are hardly more explicit than might be found, for example, in Ps 107$^{10-16}$.

[*] Asriel in v.^{14} seems to be a corrupt anticipation of the following words, אשר ילדה (Berth., Kittel, Oettli, al.).

[†] Ẓelophehad and his daughters, who play such an important part in the law of Hebrew inheritance, are, no doubt, historical personages; but among their ancestors there appears, in P, the name of a country (cf. Jg 11^{1b}).

[*] So Ewald, Wellh., Stade, and Budde, as cited above; Moore, Judges, pp. 150 f., 274 f.; Kittel, Gesch. ii. 69 [Eng. tr. ii. 76 f.]; see also art. HAVVOTH-JAIR.

Jewish traditions show no knowledge of our Prayer, though they add details to the story of Ch. Manasseh was put into an iron mule, beneath which a fire was kindled. He prayed to the idols which he had served, and at last to the God of his fathers. 'Lord of the universe, wilt thou allow the man who has served idolatry and put an idol in the court of the temple to repent?' God answered, 'If I do not receive his repentance that will shut the door to all penitents' (Jerus. Sanhed. x. 2. See also Midr. rab. Dt 2 and Midr. rab. Ru 2^{14}; cf. Midr. rab. Lv 30). The story of Manasseh's conversion was rather a problem than a comfort to the Rabbis, and the Mishna (Sanhed. x. 2) decides that he was restored only to his kingdom, not to his part in the world to come (but cf. Gemara). So in Apoc. Bar 6^{4}, where the tradition is already known that 'he was cast into the brazen horse, and the horse was heated'; though 'his prayer was heard,' yet the fire from which God then delivered him was only a sign of the fire with which the same God would afterwards torment him.

Does our Prayer itself contain any evidence which indicates a Hebrew or a Greek original, an early or a late date?

The petitioner calls on the Lord almighty, heavenly (cf. 3 Mac 6^{28}), 'the God of our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of their righteous seed,' who created heaven and earth and bound and sealed the ocean (cf. Job 38$^{8-11}$ etc.), whose glory all things fear, and whose anger is toward sinners (vv.$^{1-5}$); who is yet a God of compassion and repents of evils (=Jl 2^{13b}, Jon 4^{2b}). [In his goodness he has appointed to sinners repentance unto salvation (Swete (AT) omits)]. But 'the God of the righteous has not appointed repentance to the righteous, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who have not sinned,' but 'to me the sinner' (vv.$^{6-8}$). He confesses his sins, for which he is bowed down by many an iron band (cf. Ps 107^{10}), especially his setting up abominations and multiplying offences. With humble confession he prays for forgiveness and salvation from death, since God is 'the God of the penitent,' and can show all His goodness only toward the unworthy (vv.$^{9-15}$).

This is a fine penitential prayer, deserving its ancient place in the Christian Psalter, casting a favourable light on the age and community that produced it. That it is Jewish there can be no doubt [but see Swete in Expository Times, xi. (1899) p. 38 f.]. But the Greek nowhere requires a Hebrew original, though it cannot be said to exclude its possibility. The belief that through repentance a sinner can gain forgiveness is contained as clearly in the story of Manasseh in Chron. as in the Prayer, and does not point to a time 'not long before the Christian era' (Westcott in Smith's DB). It has, indeed, deep roots in the OT. There the hope for forgiveness and grace sometimes rests on the forgiving nature of God as Ex 34$^{6.7}$ proclaims it,[*] sometimes more directly on the merit of the fathers, or God's promises to them.[†] The efficacy for sinners of the merit of the righteous was early disputed (Gn 18$^{23ff.}$, Jer 15^{1}, Ezk 14$^{14.20}$), but the tendency of rabbinical Judaism was to put chief stress upon it (cf. Mt 3^{9}; Weber, Die Lehren d. Talmud, § 63; Ass. Mos. 3^{9} 4$^{2-5}$ 11^{17}), while Hellenistic Judaism was less national and more ethical in character.

This suggests a test by which our Prayer may be judged. It is a mistake to find in it an appeal to the merit of the patriarchs. They are simply the righteous, toward whom and toward their righteous seed, God is only just. The sinner cannot appeal to them, but only to that quality of the Divine nature, compassion, which has no application to the righteous. It is only as a repentant sinner, not as a Jew, that the petitioner appeals to God. The only distinction recognized is that between the righteous and sinners, but God is believed to be 'the God of the penitent' as well as 'the God of the righteous.' It was Hellenistic Judaism that regarded the patriarchs chiefly as examples of righteousness (4 Mac 2$^{2.17-19}$ 3$^{6ff.}$ 16$^{20-22}$; Philo, de Abra. etc.; see also contrast between Sir 44–49 and Wis 10–19). The Book of Wisdom bases forgiveness only on the nature of God (11^{23}–12$^{2.10.11.15-19}$); and a book in which rabbinical and Hellenistic elements are united expresses just the thought of our Prayer, 'because of us sinners thou art called merciful,' etc. (2 Es 8$^{20-36}$). These considerations favour the view that our book is not a translation of the old Hebrew prayer in the source of Chron., but a Hellenistic composition. The date cannot be determined, but the eschatology of the expressions, 'Do not condemn me in the lowest parts of the earth'; 'I will praise thee always in the days of my life,' seems early rather than late.

The Prayer was not revised by Jerome, and is not in the Vulgate canon. According to Nestle, it may be said to owe its rank as a semi-biblical book to Luther, since before him it appears in no list of canonical or apocryphal books. It is not found in many editions of the LXX. Details in regard to texts and editions are given by Nestle. Cf. APOCRYPHA.

MANDRAKE (דּוּדָאִים dûdâ'îm, μῆλα μανδραγορῶν, μανδραγοραl, mandragoræ).—The Heb. word (in Gn 30$^{14ff.}$, Ca 7^{13}) means 'love-plants.' The ancient VSS agree in translating the word 'mandrake.' Numbers of other plants have been suggested, as bramble-berries, Zizyphus Lotus, L., the sidr of the Arabs, the banana, the lily, the citron, and the fig. But none of these renderings is supported by satisfactory evidence. The mandrake, Mandragora officinarum, L., is a plant of the order Solanaceæ, called by the Arabs luffâḥ, or beiḍ el-jinn (i.e. 'genie's eggs'). The parsley-shaped root is often branched. The natives mould this root into a rude resemblance to the human figure, by pinching a constriction a little below the top, so as to make a kind of head and neck, and twisting off the upper branches except two, which they leave as arms, and the lower, except two, which they leave as legs. This root gives off at the surface of the ground a rosette of ovate-oblong to ovate, wrinkled, crisp, sinuate-dentate to entire leaves, 6 to 16 in. long, somewhat resembling those of the tobacco-plant. There spring from the neck a number of one-flowered nodding peduncles, bearing whitish-green flowers, nearly 2 in. broad, which produce globular, succulent, orange to red berries, resembling small tomatoes, which ripen in late spring. The ancients used the mandrake as a love philtre (Gn 30$^{14-16}$). They believed that he who incautiously touched a root of it would certainly die. Josephus (BJ VII. vi. 3) gives the following directions for pulling it up. 'A furrow must be dug around the root until its lower part is exposed, then a dog is tied to it, after which the person tying the dog must get away. The dog then endeavours to follow him, and so easily pulls up the root, but dies suddenly instead of his master. After this the root can be handled without fear.' The ancients also believed that this root gave a demoniacal shriek as it was pulled up. The 'smell' of the mandrakes (Ca 7^{13}) is the heavy narcotic odour of the Solanaceous plants. The allusion to it in this connexion doubtless refers to its specific virtues. G. E. Post.

MANEH.—See Weights and Measures.

MANES (Μάνης, AV Eanes, due to a misprint 'Ηάνης for Μάνης in the Aldine ed.), 1 Es 9^{21}.—One of those who agreed to put away their 'strange' wives. RVm identifies the name with Harim in Ezr 10^{21}; more probably, perhaps, it takes the place of the two names Maaseiah, Elijah.

MANGER.—The NT tr. of φάτνη in three places out of the four where the word occurs (Lk 2$^{7, 12, 16}$), and in RVm of the fourth (Lk 13^{15}, where 'stall' is in the text). The chief OT Eng. equivalent is 'crib,' Heb. 'ēbûṣ (fattening-place), LXX always φάτνη (Job 39^{9}, Pr 14^{4}, Is 1^{3}); while φάτνη is also the LXX rendering (once in each case) of 'urwah ('collecting-place' or 'collected herd'), AV and RV 'stall,' 2 Ch 32^{28}; of repheth (not occurring except at Hab 3^{17}, but probably=Arabic raffat, 'herd' or 'stall'), AV and RV 'stall'; and, possibly, of bĕlîl ('food'), AV and RV 'fodder,' Job 6^{5}, if the Heb. be not represented rather by the otherwise superfluous βρώματα. It seems clear (from such a parallelism as in 2 Ch 32^{28} 'stalls for all manner of beasts and folds (lit. treasure-houses) for flocks,' and likewise from such companionship as in Pr 14^{4} 'where no oxen are, the crib is clean'), that, like the Latin præsepe and our crib, φάτνη in the LXX signified not only, as in classical Greek, a manger, but also, metonymically, the stall containing the manger; an extension due immediately, perhaps, to some of its Heb. originals.

This ambiguity in the meaning of φάτνη would be of small moment but that it affects the story of the Nativity. Did the mother of our Lord lay her babe in a manger or in a stall? And is the very early tradition that the birth took place in a cave inconsistent with the NT narrative? These questions cannot be decisively answered either (as has been shown) from the word itself, or from the context, or from our knowledge of the customs of the time. There is an ambiguity about κατάλυμα, 'the inn' (AV and RV), as well as about φάτνη. This was not an inn in the modern sense of the term, nor apparently even such an approximation to it as the more regularly organized πανδοχεῖον of Lk 10^{34}, with its πανδοχεύς, host or managing attendant, who provided necessaries and was paid for them. All that we can be sure of as to κατάλυμα is that it was a resting-place where animals were relieved of their packs (καταλύω, 'I let down'), and where travellers ungirded their garments. But Lk 22^{11}, Mk 14^{14} (cf. Swete), bring the word before us in another sense—that of a guest-room ('My κατάλυμα,' said Jesus, according to Mk), one of the rooms commonly and hospitably lent, perhaps, for the occasion, to parties of strangers visiting Jerusalem for the passover. For this the 'master of the house' seems to have substituted, in the case of Jesus and His disciples, the more private and fully furnished ἀνάγαιον, upper chamber (Lk 22^{12}). When, therefore, it is said (Lk 2^{7}), '[She] laid [the babe] in a φάτνη, because there was no room for them in the κατάλυμα,' our ignorance of the exact meaning of κατάλυμα deprives us of its guidance to the exact meaning of the alternative φάτνη; while the absence (according to the best documents) of the article with φάτνη leaves us at liberty to believe that the φάτνη was not connected with the κατάλυμα. At first sight the antithesis seems to require that the φάτνη should be a kind of room corresponding to the superior κατάλυμα, though of course the sentence may be elliptical and the manger may be picked out as the special feature in the corresponding room not itself mentioned.

But, if the κατάλυμα was anything like the modern khan, it was a rest-house like those existing in the East, outside towns, as unfurnished places of gratuitous lodgment during the night for strangers, and containing (as to the ruder sort) two contiguous portions not very distinctly divided —the one for the travellers, and the other for their animals; and (as to the better sort) a central (usually roofless) court, with cells for travellers opening out upon it, and, beyond these, just within the outside wall, stalled places for the beasts of burden. If this be so, then Joseph and Mary, finding the travellers' portion full, probably abode in one of these stalled places, and the babe was laid either in the stall or in the manger belonging to the stall. Or, as Tristram suggests (Land of Israel, p. 73), they took refuge in some poor cottage close by, similar to one wherein he himself had seen a community of shelter for man and beast, the dwelling portion (to which, for one reason or another, Joseph and Mary were not invited) being an upper platform ascended by a few steps; and the lower portion being half granary half stable, and containing a long earthen trough which served for a manger. Tristram's suggestion has this additional element of probability, that, if the rest-house was full, the stalled places attached to it were likely to be full also.

The tradition that Jesus was born in a cave near Bethlehem is at least as early as the first decade of the 2nd cent., and is found in Justin (Trypho, 78), in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy (c. 2, p. 181, Tisch.), in Origen (c. Cels. i. 51),—who says that the cave and the manger were shown in his day,—in Epiphanius (Hær. li. 9) and in Eusebius (Vita Constant. iii. 43, Dem. Ev. vii. 2). The cave as the place of birth is mentioned also in the Protevangel of James (c. 18), but in c. 22 the swaddling and the 'crib for oxen' are referred to the time of the massacre of the Innocents, and the crib (the Babe's hiding-place) is not connected in any way with the cave, while neither here nor in the Gospel of the Infancy is the cave connected with an 'inn.' Eus. and Epiphan. (see Nestle, Vitæ Prophetarum, p. 8) both affirm that the cave story appears in Luke, while Anastasius of Sinai (Viæ dux, c. 1, p. 6) assigns it to 'unwritten tradition. Resch (Texte, x. 3) sees in the unanimity of the cave tradition a sign that it belongs to the original source of the Infancy history, and from the varieties of phraseology in the Greek narratives he conjectures that this source was Hebrew. It has been suspected (with what probability it is impossible to say) that the cave story grew out of the prophecy, Is 33^{16} ('He shall dwell in a lofty cave,' LXX), just as the prophecy in regard to Shiloh, Gn 49^{11}, led to the later addition in Lk 19^{30} ('a colt tied to a vine'). See Justin, Apol. i. 32. Thomson, Land and the Book (vol. on Central Palestine and Phœnicia, p. 35) says that many inns or khans have caverns below them, where cattle are sheltered, and where, built along the walls, are stone mangers which, 'cleaned out and whitewashed as they often are in summer when not required for the animals, would make suitable cribs in which to lay little babies.' He does not, however, say that he ever saw any little babies in them except his own. Over such a grotto, near Bethlehem, called the Grotto of the Nativity, now stands the Church of St. Mary; and the grotto contains a manger; but (adds Thomson) 'the real manger was transported to Rome.'

J. MASSIE.

MANI (Μανί), 1 Es 9^{30}=BANI, Ezr 10^{29}, as he is called in 1 Es 5^{12} (Βανεί).

MANIFEST.—The verb to 'manifest' is used actively, passively, and reflexively. The active use is seen in Ec 3^{18} (the only occurrence of the word in OT), 'I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts' (לְבָרָם, RV 'that God may prove them'); and Jn 17^{6} 'I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world' (ἐφανέρωσα; RV 'I manifested'). In Jn 2^{11} AV has 'manifest forth' ('manifested forth his glory') for the same verb, RV 'manifested.' It is a favourite verb with St. John, occurring 9 times in the Gospel and 9 times in the First Epistle, which are nearly half its occurrences in NT. The AV usually renders it 'manifest' or 'make manifest,' but also 'appear' (Mk $16^{12.14}$, 2 Co 5^{10} 7^{12}, Col 3^{4}, He 9^{26}, 1 P 5^{4}, 1 Jn 2^{28} 3^{2}, Rev 3^{18}), 'shew' (Jn 7^{4} 21^{1}), and 'manifestly declare' (2 Co 3^{3}). RV everywhere has either 'manifest' or 'make manifest.' The reflexive use of the verb 'to manifest' is found in Jn $14^{21.22}$; the passive is more common. The past ptcp. is twice 'manifest' instead of 'manifested,' viz. 1 Ti 3^{16} 'God was manifest in the flesh' (θεὸς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκί; RV, reading ὅς for θεός, 'He who was manifested in the flesh'); and 1 P 1^{20} 'who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you' (φανερωθέντος, RV 'was manifested'). The meaning is not exactly the same as now, if indeed we use the verb 'to manifest' at all. It is to uncover, lay bare, reveal. Cf. Cromwell (in Prolegomena to Tindale's Pent. by Mombert, p. xlii), 'The Kinge highnes therfor hathe commaunded me to advurtyse you that is plesure ys, that ye should desiste and leve any ferther to persuade or attempte the sayde Tyndalle to cum into this realme; alledging, that he perceyving the malycyous, perverse, uncharytable, and indurate mynde of the sayd Tyndall, ys in man[er] with owt hope of reconsylyacyon in hym, and is veray joyous to have his realme destytute of such a person, then that he should retourne into the same, there to manyfest his errours and sedycyous opynyons.' An earlier meaning—'detect,' 'disclose'—is seen in Rhem. NT, Mt 8^{heading} 'beyond the sea he manifesteth the devil's malice agaynst man in an heard of swine.'

The adj. 'manifest' signifies 'open to sight, uncovered' (not 'evident to reason,' as now). Thus Wis 12^{17} 'thou makest their boldness manifest' (τὸ θράσος ἐξελέγχεις; RV 'puttest their boldness to confusion'); He 4^{13} 'Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight' (ἀφανής); 9^{8} 'the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest' (μήπω πεφανερῶσθαι); 1 Jn 3^{10} 'In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil' (φανερά ἐστι τὰ τέκνα). Cf. Shaks. I Henry VI. I. iii. 33, 'Stand back, thou manifest conspirator.'

The adv. manifestly means openly, visibly, 2 Es 14^{3} 'In the bush I did manifestly reveal myself unto Moses' (revelans revelatus sum); 2 Mac 3^{28} 'manifestly they acknowledged the power of God' (φανερῶς). Cf. Dt 27^{8} Tind. 'And thou shalt write uppon the stones all the wordes of this lawe, manyfestly and well'; and Rhem. NT, Lk 8^{heading} 'He preacheth to the Iewes in parables because of their reprobation; but to the Disciples manifestly, because he wil not for the Iewes incredulity have his cumming frustrate.'

Manifestation occurs but rarely, Wis 1^{9} 'the sound of his words shall come unto the Lord for the manifestation of his wicked deeds' (εἰς ἔλεγχον; AVm 'for the reproving,' RV 'to bring to conviction'); Ro 8^{19} 'For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God' (τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν, RV 'the revealing'); 1 Co 12^{7} 'the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal' (ἡ φανέρωσις), and 2 Co 4^{2} 'by manifestation of the truth' (τῇ φανερώσει, RV 'by the manifestation'). So Lk 1^{80} Rhem., 'And the childe grew, and was strengthened in spirit, and was in the deserts until the day of his manifestation to Israel.'

J. HASTINGS.

MANIFOLD is properly 'of many kinds,' 'various,' as Howell, Letters, iv. 47, 'The Calamities and Confusions which the late Wars did bring upon us were many and manifold.' And so it is used sometimes in AV: Wis 7^{22} 'in her is an understanding spirit, holy, one only, manifold' (πολυμερές, Vulg. multiplex); 1 P 1^{6} 'Ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations' (ἐν ποικίλοις πειρασμοῖς);* 4^{10} 'as good stewards of the manifold grace of God' (ποικίλης χάριτος); Eph 3^{10} 'the manifold wisdom of God' (ἡ πολυποίκιλος σοφία, the only occurrence of this word in NT. See Abbott, in loc.). But elsewhere the word means no more than 'many,' Neh $9^{19.27}$ 'manifold mercies' (רַבִּים, LXX πολλοί); Am 5^{12} 'manifold transgressions' (רַבִּים, LXX πολλοί); Ps 104^{24} 'How manifold are thy works' (מָה־רַבּוּ; LXX ὡς ἐμεγαλύνθη; Vulg. quam magnificata); Sir 51^{3} 'from the manifold afflictions which I had' (ἐκ πλειόνων θλίψεων).

In Lk 18^{30} 'manifold' is an adv., 'There is no man that hath left house . . . who shall not receive manifold more' (πολλαπλασίονα, Vulg. multo plura; Wyc. 'many mo thingis'; Tind. 'moche moore,' and all VSS till the Bishops 'manifold more'). The adv. 'manifoldly' is used in Rhem. NT,

---

* The adj. attached to these temptations, says Salmond (Pop. Com. on NT, iv. 158), is used in the classics to describe the many-coloured leopard or peacock, the colour-changing Proteus, the richly-wrought robe or carpet, the changeful months, the intricate oracles. What a picture does this epithet 'manifold,' which is applied by St. Peter also to the grace of God (4^{10}), by St. James again to temptation (1^{2}), and elsewhere to such things as the divers diseases healed by Christ (Mt 4^{24}), present of the number, the diversity, and the changefulness of these trials!

Mt 27$^{\text{heading}}$ 'The chiefe of the Iewes accuse him to Pilate (his betrayer, and the Iudge, and the Iudge's Wife, testifying in the meane time manifodly (sic) his innocencie).' J. HASTINGS.

MANIUS, AV MANLIUS (Μάνιος A and V, Syr.; Μάνλιος al., Manilius Vulg.).—According to 2 Mac 11$^{34-38}$ Quintus Memmius and Titus Manius were two Roman legates (πρεσβῦται) in the East, who sent a letter to the Jews after the first campaign of Lysias (B.C. 163), confirming the concessions made by the Syrian chancellor. But there are many reasons against accepting as genuine either this letter or the three others contained in the same chapter. From 1 Mac 4$^{26-35}$ it appears that the first expedition of Lysias took place in B.C. 165, before the re-dedication of the temple and the death of Antiochus Epiphanes. No mention is there made of negotiations between the Jews and Lysias, who is simply stated to have returned to Antioch to collect new forces. The supposed concessions seem to rest upon a confusion of this expedition with a second, which took place about three years later. The names given to the Roman commissioners raise further difficulties. Polybius records the names of several Roman legati in Asia about this period, but neither Q. Memmius nor T. Manius is to be found among them. Possibly one of the persons intended was Manius Sergius, who, with C. Sulpicius, was sent to Syria shortly before the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (Polyb. XXXI. ix. 6, cf. xii. 9, xxiii. 9). It is, moreover, a suspicious circumstance that the date of the supposed Roman letter should be exactly the same as that of the letter of Eupator (15th of Xanthicus, v.^{33}), and that the year should be given according to the Seleucid era. Finally, we learn from 1 Mac 8 that Judas Maccabæus first entered into communication with the Romans after the landing of Demetrius (B.C. 162) and the death of Nicanor. It is, no doubt, possible that some foundation of fact underlies the correspondence contained in 2 Mac 11, but in their present form and present connexion none of the letters can be regarded as historical. (Cf. Rawlinson and Zöckler, ad loc.).

MANKIND.—In Lv 18^{22} 20^{13} 'mankind' means men as opposed to women, the male sex. Cf. Shaks. Timon of Athens, IV. iii. 491—

> 'I love thee,
> Because thou art a woman, and disclaim'st
> Flinty mankind.'

MANLY, MANLINESS.—'Manly' occurs once as an adj. (2 Mac 7^{21} 'with a manly stomach,' ἄρσενι θυμῷ, RV 'with manly passion'), and once as an adv. (2 Mac 10^{35} 'Twenty young men . . . assaulted the wall manly,' ἀῤῥενωδῶς, RV 'with masculine force'). 'Manliness' is used in 1 Mac 4^{35}, 2 Mac 8^{7} 14^{18} of the valour of soldiers in battle.

MANNA (מָן mân; LXX μάννα; Vulg. man, manhu, manna).—A substance which fell along with the dew, or was rained around the Hebrews' camp during their 40 years' wilderness life. It was in flakes or small round grains, like hoarfrost, white, in appearance like coriander seed or bdellium, and in taste was like thin flour-cakes with honey, or like fresh oil (Ex 16$^{14.\,15.\,31}$, Nu 11$^{7.\,8}$). It was gathered every morning except on Sabbath, and a double portion on Friday morning. If kept overnight it became corrupt, and bred worms, except on the Sabbath day. The supply continued until they came to a land inhabited, to the border of Canaan, Ex 16^{36} (P); or until they reached Gilgal, in the plain of Jericho, and ate the old corn of the land, Jos 5^{12} (JE). During this time it was the chief part of their diet, but not their only food (Lv 8$^{2.\,26.\,31}$ 9^{4} 10^{12} 24^{5}, Nu 7$^{13.\,19\text{ff.}}$, Dt 2^{6}, Jos 1^{11}). It is said to owe its name to the question מָן הוּא mān hū, 'what* is it?' v.^{15} (E), asked by the people when it fell. For Egyptian affinities of the word, see Brugsch, HWB vi. 606; Ebers, Gosen, 236. As a perpetual memorial of this provision, Aaron was told to place a ẓinẓeneth (pot or basket) full of it before the Testimony (Ex 16^{33}), which was in the ark (25^{16}). This vessel was of gold, He 9^{4}, but was not itself in the ark as there stated (see 1 K 8^{9}). The manna is mentioned also in Neh 9^{20}, and in Ps 78^{24}, where it is called the 'corn of heaven' and the 'bread of the mighty.'

Our Lord speaks of the manna as typical of Himself, the true bread from heaven, conferring immortality on those who spiritually become partakers of His grace, Jn 6$^{31.\,33-63}$. St. Paul calls it 'spiritual meat,' and seems to regard it and the stream from the smitten rock as a type of the Eucharist (1 Co 10$^{3\text{f.}}$). The 'hidden manna' is one of the rewards of 'him that overcometh,' Rev 2^{17}.

A sweet, semifluid substance called mann or mann es-samâ ('heavenly manna') exudes in drops from the tārfâ tree (Tamarix mannifera, Ehr.), the אשל of the Hebrews, when it is punctured by an insect, Gossyparia mannipara (Hardwicke, Asiat. Research, xiv. 182, also Ehrenberg, but doubted by Ritter). This is collected in the desert by Arabs, and sold to pilgrims. A second kind, the terengabina of Ibn Sina, is yielded by a thorny leguminous shrub, Alhagi Camelorum, Fisch., and other allied species in Arabia and neighbouring countries. A third sort, the Sirachosta of the Arabians, is yielded by Cotoneaster nummularia in Herat (Haussknecht). Niebuhr describes a kind found on oaks, called 'afs or ballôt, at Mardîn in Digarbekr. This oak-honey is mentioned by Hesiod, Op. et Di. v. 230 f., and Ovid, Met. i. 112. For stories of manna found on the ground in open places, not dropping from plants, see Athenæus, Deipnos. xi. 102, and Wellsted, Arabia, ii. 409.

The manna of commerce (not now in the Pharmacopœia) is a sickly-smelling, sweet, laxative exudation from the flowering ash Fraxinus Ornus, L., and F. rotundifolia, and mostly comes from Calabria. None of these could be the manna of Exodus, which was a miraculous substance. These only flow in small quantities, and all the tamarisks in the desert could not have yielded the daily provision of more than 300 tons. They only flow at special seasons—May to August (Burckhardt), or August and September (Breydenbach, Reissbuch, i. 193). They are physiologically insufficient as food, can keep indefinitely, and could not be cooked as the manna was. The Sabbatic intermission and final cessation likewise show that it was not a natural substance; besides, while it could be ground in mills, beaten in mortars, seethed in pots, or baked by artificial heat into cakes, yet, if not gathered, it volatilized in the heat of the sun.

LITERATURE.—The old authors are quoted and summarized in Fabri, Historia Mannæ, in Fabri and Reiske's Opusc. Med. Arab. 1776, p. 83, and Reinke, Beiträge zur Erklärung d. Alt. Test. v. 305. See also Rosenmüller, Alterthumskunde, iv. 316, and Curmann's account given by Oedmann, Vermischte Sammlungen aus der Naturkunde, vi. 7; cf. also Wellsted, Burckhardt, Ehrenberg (who figures the tarfâ), and Forskål.

A. MACALISTER.

MANNER.—The word 'manner,' to be traced back to Lat. manus, the hand, may be said to be originally the way of handling or managing a thing. Its uses in AV are sometimes obsolete, more often archaic and misleading.

---

* Properly 'who'?, as is pointed out by Dillm.-Ryssel, Ex-Lv, p. 189, and Hommel, AHT 276^{a}. The argument of the latter, that mān (Arab. مَنْ) hū proves that the early Hebrews spoke a pure Arabian dialect, is dealt with in Expos. Times, ix. p. 478, by Ed. König, who doubts whether mān hū was originally meant to be a question. It might be an imitation of an Egyp. word mannu (so Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai^{2}, 236 f.).

1. Method of action, way, as Mt 6^{9} 'After this manner therefore pray ye' (οὕτως); Lk 6^{23} 'In the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets' (κατὰ ταῦτα, edd. κατὰ τὰ αὐτά); He 1^{1} 'in divers manners' (πολυτρόπως).

2. Habitual method of action, custom, as Ru 4^{7} 'This was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming' (RV 'custom'); Am 8^{14} 'They that swear by the sin of Samaria, and say, Thy god, O Dan, liveth; and, The manner of Beer-sheba liveth' (דֶּרֶךְ בְּאֵר־שָׁבַע; RV 'the way of Beersheba,' RVm 'the manner'); * 2 Mac 4^{13} 'Such was the height of Greek fashions, and increase of heathenish manners' (πρόσβασις ἀλλοφυλισμοῦ, RV 'an advance of an alien religion'); 6^{9} 'Whoso would not conform themselves to the manners of the Gentiles should be put to death' (μεταβαίνειν ἐπὶ τὰ Ἑλληνικά; RV 'go over to the Greek rites').

3. Sometimes it is custom in its origin, the regulation, or ordinance that afterwards becomes fixed as habit. Thus מִשְׁפָּט is often tr. 'manner,' when RV prefers 'ordinance' in Lv 5^{10} 7^{23} 9^{16}, Nu 9^{14} $15^{16.\,24}$ $29^{6.\,18.\,21.\,24.\,27.\,30.\,33.\,37}$, 1 Ch 24^{19}, 2 Ch 4^{20}, Neh 8^{18}; 'order' in 2 Ch 30^{16}; 'judgement' in Ezk $23^{45\,bis}$; and leaves the rest unchanged (Gn 40^{13}, Ex 21^{9}, Lv 24^{22}, Jos 6^{15}, Jg 18^{7}, 1 S $8^{9.\,11}$ 10^{25}, 1 K 18^{28}, 2 K 1^{7} 11^{14} $17^{26\,bis.\,27.\,33.\,40}$, Jer 30^{18}). See also 2 S 7^{19} 'And is this the manner of man, O Lord God?' (תּוֹרַת הָאָדָם, AVm 'the law of man,' RV 'and this too after the manner of men,' RVm 'and is this the law of man?') †; Est 2^{12} 'according to the manner of the women' (כְּדָת הַנָּשִׁים, RV 'according to the law for the women'); Ac 22^{3} 'Taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers' (κατὰ ἀκρίβειαν τοῦ πατρῴου νόμου, RV 'according to the strict manner of the law,' lit. 'the strictness of the law'; it is the only occurrence of ἀκρίβεια in NT). Cf. Tindale's tr. of Nu 15^{24} 'All the multitude shall offer a calfe for a burntofferynge to be a swete savoure unto the Lorde, and the meatofferynge and the drynkofferynge there to, accordynge to the maner'; and of 19^{10} 'And this shalbe unto the childern of Israel and unto the straunger that dwelleth amonge them, a maner for ever.'

4. Personal behaviour, conduct, as Sir 31^{17} 'Leave off first for manner's sake' (χάριν παιδείας); 2 Mac 5^{22} 'He left governors . . . at Jerusalem, Philip . . . for manners more barbarous, than he that set him there' (τὸν δὲ τρόπον, RV 'in character'); Ac 13^{18} 'And about the time of forty years suffered he their manners in the wilderness' (AVm 'Gr. ἐτροποφόρησεν, perhaps for ἐτροφοφόρησεν [bore or fed them] as a nurse beareth or feedeth her child, Dt 1^{31}'; RVm 'many ancient authorities read bare he them as a nursing-father in the wilderness, see Dt 1^{31}') *; 26^{4} 'My manner of life from my youth . . . know all the Jews' (βίωσις); 2 Ti 3^{10} 'But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life' (ἀγωγή, RV 'conduct'). In this sense RV uses 'manner of life' as the tr. of ἀναστροφή in most of its occurrences for AV 'conversation' or the like. Cf. Jg 13^{12} Cov. 'What shal be the maner and worke of the childe?'

5. There are two passages in which the meaning is more clearly ethical conduct, morals, 2 Es 9^{19} 'Now the manners of them which are created in this world that is made are corrupted' (corrupti sunt mores eorum); 1 Co 15^{33} 'Evil communications corrupt good manners' (ἤθη χρήσθ' [χρηστά]). Cf. Knox, Hist. 318, 'And wonder not, Madame, that I call Rome an Harlot; for that Church is altogether polluted with all kinde of Spiritual Fornication, as well in Doctrine, as in manners'; and Calderwood, Hist. 107, 'Their [the Elders'] office is as well severally, as conjunctly, to watch diligently over the flock committed to their charge, both publickly and privately, that no corruption of Religion or manners enter therein.'

6. A thing which is done in a certain way is of a certain kind, and the commonest meaning of 'manner' in AV is sort or kind, as Gn 25^{23} 'Two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels'; Ex 22^{9} 'For all manner of trespass . . . or for any manner of lost thing . . . he shall pay double unto his neighbour'; Jg 8^{18} 'What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor?' Dn 6^{23} 'no manner of hurt was found upon him'; Sir 37^{18} 'Four manner of things appear: good and evil, life and death'; 2 Co 7^{9} 'ye were made sorry after a godly manner' (RV 'after a godly sort'); 1 P 1^{11} 'Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify'; 2 P 3^{11} 'what manner of persons ought ye to be'; 1 Jn 3^{1} 'what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us.' So Berners' Froissart, xviii., 'The king gave licence to all manner of people, every man to draw homeward to their own countries'; Tindale, Pent. (Prologe to Lv) 'The popettes and xx maner of tryfles which mothers permitte unto their yonge children be not all in vayne'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 383, 'Experience whereof commeth wysedome is in two maner of wise.' In all these examples 'manner' is sing., being used as the words 'kind' and 'sort' are used still. Cf. Shaks. Lear, II. ii. 96, 'These kind of knaves.' For there is a doubt in the mind whether the word is a subst. or an adj. Hence the connecting word 'of' was frequently omitted, as in Tindale's tr. of Gn 2^{19}, 'And after that the Lorde God had make of the erth all maner beastes of the felde and all maner foules of the ayre, he brought them unto Adam to see what he wold call them'; and of Lk 4^{36} 'And feare came on them all, and they spake amonge them selves sayinge: what manner a thinge is this'; and on 1 Jn 4^{18} he says, 'John speaketh not generally of all manner fear, but of that only

---

* This passage is obscure. The Heb. word is the usual one for a way or path, and so Driver takes it here, quoting from G. A. Smith and Doughty as to the Arabic custom of swearing by the way to a place. This is apparently the tr. of Vulg. Vivit Deus tuus Dan et vivit via Bersabee, and of Wyc. 'the waye of Bersabe lyveth,' and of Douay. Coverdale and the Bishops follow the LXX (καὶ ζῇ ὁ θεός σου, Βηρσάβεε), thus Cov. 'as truly as thy God lyveth at Bersaba.' The AV tr. is from the Gen. version, which has the marg. 'That is, the commune maner of worshiping and the service or religion there used.' Thus the meaning of AV is 'manner of worship,' 'cult,' and that meaning W. R. Smith favours, though doubtfully (*RS*² 182), 'In Am 8^{14} there is mention of an oath by the way (ritual?) of Beersheba.' See BEERSHEBA. The Heb. word derek is frequently trd 'manner' in AV, in the sense of custom, once in Amos (4^{10} 'I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt').

† Kirkpatrick (Expos. iii. [1886] 358 f.) explains the AV text, 'Thou dost condescend to speak familiarly with me, as man speaks to man.' It is the rendering of Ges. and others. But there is no other passage in which tôrāh has the meaning of 'manner.' The literal tr. is given in AVm, and is found in Wyc. and Cov. The Gen. and Bish. have 'Doeth this apperteine to man?' Driver says that as the text stands the best explanation is that of Hengst. and Keil, 'to evince such regard for me is in accordance with the law prescribed by God to regulate men's dealings with one another; displayed by God it argues unwonted condescension and affection.' But he considers the text probably corrupt (Notes on Sam. p. 213), and H. P. Smith counts it certainly corrupt (Intern. Com. on Sam. p. 302).

* The TR ἐτροποφόρησεν is best attested (ℵBC²DHLP, as against AC¹E for ἐτροφοφόρησεν). In the original passage Dt 1^{31} there is also uncertainty of reading. The decision between the two readings, though they yield such different meanings, must be mainly due to the view taken of the context. Page and Rendall take opposite sides—the former thinking that the apostle is dwelling, not on the perversity of Israel, but on the care and affection of God for them, so that ἐτροφ. is clearly required here as well as in Dt 1^{31}; the latter holding that ἐτροπ., correctly rendered 'suffered their manners,' agrees entirely with the context and the circumstances, 'for it exactly describes God's longsuffering with a perverse and rebellious generation.' Perhaps the strongest argument against ἐτροφ. is that it is doubtful if τροφοφορεῖν means simply 'carry.' It is rather 'give suck.' Rendall further urges that in Dt 1^{31} we should expect τέκνον, not υἱόν.

which the conscience of sin putteth a man in.' So Spenser, FQ II. xii. 70—

> 'Right hard it was for wight which did it heare
> To read what manner musicke that mote bee.'

In AV 1611 this construction occurs in Lv 7^{23} 'Ye shall eat no maner fat of oxe'; 14^{54} 'This is the law for all manner plague of leprosie and skall'; and Rev 18^{12} 'all maner vessels of Yuorie, and all maner vessels of most precious wood'; but modern editions have retained it only in the last passage.

The phrase 'in a manner' is found in 1 S 21^{5} 'the bread is in a manner common.' The passage is a particularly difficult one. W. R. Smith (RS^{2} 455) translates: 'Nay, but women are forbidden to us as has always been my rule when I go on an expedition, so that the gear (clothes, arms, etc.) of the young men is holy even when it is a common (not a sacred) journey; how much more so when [Pr 21^{27}] to-day they will be consecrated, gear and all.' Driver (Notes on Samuel, p. 138 f.), on the whole, favours the rendering of AV, which makes the 'vessels' to be the wallets or utensils in which they carried food, and represents David as saying that these vessels being ceremonially clean could not defile the sacred bread put into them. But he does not regard the interpretation as certain, or the text as free from suspicion. H. P. Smith (Intern. Com. on Sam.) is more suspicious of the text. He agrees with others that to David war was sacred, peace secular ('common'), but he sees no occasion David had for saying that now he was on a peaceable expedition. Rather, David says his men and their vessels were consecrated for war, and therefore, even if the bread were common, it would be consecrated by the vessels into which it was to be put. For the Eng. phrase, which means 'in some respect,' 'to a certain extent,' cf. Shaks. K. John, V. vii. 89—'Nay, it is in a manner done already'; and Beaumont and Fletcher, Laws of Candy, i. 1—

> ''Tis not a time to pity passionate griefs,
> When a whole kingdom in a manner lies
> Upon its death-bed bleeding.'

More obscure is the phrase 'with the manner' found in Nu 5^{13} 'If a man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him . . . and there be no witness against her, neither she be taken with the manner' (RV 'in the act'). The RV gives the modern equivalent of the phrase, which is a legal one. In Old Eng. the word is in this phrase spelt mainour (from Fr. manier, to take with the hand), and for a thief to be 'taken with the manner' is with the stolen goods about him. The phrase in AV comes from Tindale, who also uses it in Expositions (Prol. to 1 Jn), p. 142, 'Ye have corrupt the open scripture before our eyes, and are taken with the manner.' So Shaks. I Henry IV. II. iv. 347—'O villain, thou stolest a cup of sack eighteen years ago, and wert taken with the manner, and ever since thou hast blushed extempore'; and Love's Labour's Lost, I. i. 205, 'The manner of it is, I was taken with the manner.' Sometimes the phrase is 'in the manner,' as Hall, Works, ii. 190, 'But, O foolish sinners, all your packing and secrecy cannot so contrive it, but that ye shall be taken in the manner.' J. HASTINGS.

MANOAH (מָנוֹחַ, Μανῶε, Μανώχης [Jos.], Manue).—A native of Zorah, of the Danites, whose wife had no children (Jg 13^{2}). When it had been revealed to her by the angel of the LORD that she should have a son, who was to be brought up as a Nazirite, and to be a saviour for Israel from the Philistines, she told her husband of the vision, and of the instructions of the messenger (vv.$^{3-8}$). Upon Manoah's entreaty, God sent the angel again to his wife as she sat in the field. She at once ran and fetched her husband, who received the same instructions about the child as his wife had done. Manoah invites the angel to stay and eat. He declines, but tells them to offer a burnt-offering to the LORD. Manoah did not know that he was an angel of the LORD, and asks him his name, but he will not reveal it, 'seeing it is ineffable' (vv.$^{9-18}$). The offering is offered on the rock, and a wondrous sign is at once given.* The angel ascends in the flame of the sacrifice. Thereupon Manoah and his wife fall on their faces to the ground, and Manoah realizes that he has seen an angel of the LORD. Manoah is greatly alarmed, but his wife comforts him (vv.$^{19-23}$).

Josephus (Ant. V. viii. 1–3) decorates the narrative, but adds nothing to our knowledge. When the promised son has grown up, he asks his father as well as his mother to obtain for him as his wife a woman of Timnah, but they are much displeased; still Samson persists in the request to his father, who was the proper person to make the proposal for the marriage (see Gn 34^{4}). Overruled by him, they went down to Timnah, and some time later Manoah accompanied his son to the wedding-feast.

Manoah seems to have died before his son, and 'the burying-place of Manoah' is mentioned as the place of burial of Samson (Jg 16^{31}). It has been questioned whether Manoah really after all took part in the marriage of Samson, and some have looked upon this as an interpolation (see Moore's Judges, pp. 329, 330). The 'Menuhoth' and 'Manahathites' of 1 Ch 2$^{52-54}$ are connected with Manoah, the latter being called also Zorites.

H. A. REDPATH.

MANSION (Lat. maneo to stay, mansio a staying, place of abode, Old Fr. mansion a dwelling-place, abode; 'manse' and 'manor' are of the same origin, the one directly from Lat., the other through the Fr. manoir).—A mansion is primarily any kind of dwelling-place, as in Milton, Il Pens. 92—

> 'To unfold
> What worlds or what vast regions hold
> The immortal mind, that hath forsook
> Her mansion in this fleshly nook.'

Especially a place to abide in permanently, as T. Adams on 2 P 1^{4} 'Worldly things are but a tabernacle, a movable; heaven is a mansion.' Cf. Shaks. Timon, V. i. 218—

> 'Timon hath made his everlasting mansion
> Upon the beached verge of the salt flood.'

Later it came to signify a house of some grandeur, which is its modern meaning.

In AV 'mansion' occurs only Jn 14^{2} 'In my Father's house are many mansions' (μοναί, RVm 'abiding places'). The tr. is Tindale's (perhaps suggested by Vulg. mansiones; but neither Wyc. nor Rhem. uses the word); Cov. chose 'dwellinges' (which was Wyclif's word), the Gen. and the Bishops' Bible 'dwelling places,' but the rest followed Tindale. It is curious, however, that in 14^{23}, the only other place in NT where μονή is found, no version gives 'mansion'; some tr. by a verb 'dwell,' others use 'dwelling,' Rhem., AV, and RV 'abode.'

What is the μονή? It is clear that in both passages its meaning is the same, and the simplest meaning is the best—an abode or dwelling. In Jn 14^{23} Jesus says, 'If a man love me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.' Where the man may be is of no account. Wherever he is and loves, there the Father and the Son have their abode παρ' αὐτῷ beside him—in his conscious presence. Cf. Lk 1^{30} 'Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God' (παρὰ τῷ θεῷ). That after Tindale's tr. the word should be applied to heaven was natural, since that is the meaning that has been almost always given to 'my Father's house.' But there is nothing in the word or in the context to suggest rooms in heaven; still less Westcott's idea of 'stations' or temporary resting-places on a road. For the application of the word 'mansion' to heaven see Rhem. NT, note on Lk 16^{9} 'yea and that they be in such favour with God, that they may and doe receive their frendes which were once their benefactors, into their mansions in heaven, no less then the farmers whom the il steward pleasured, might receive their freend into their earthly houses'; and Adams, Works, i. 68, 'It is small comfort to the harbourless wretch to pass through a goodly city, and see many glorious buildings, when he cannot say, Hæc mea domus, I have a place here. The beauty of that excellent city Jerusalem, . . . affords a soul no comfort, unless he can say, mea civitas, I have a mansion in it.' But the word was still free enough to let Milton use it of hell, as in PL i. 268—

---

* In v.^{19} the MT וּמַפְלִא לַעֲשׂוֹת, from which it is impossible to obtain the EV tr^{n}, 'and (the angel) did wondrously,' is manifestly corrupt. While B reads καὶ διεχώρισεν ποιῆσαι, A has τῷ θαυμαστὰ ποιοῦντι Κυρίῳ (cf. Vulg. Domino mirabilia facienti). Perhaps we ought to restore the text accordingly, לַיהוה הַמַּפְלִא לַעֲשׂוֹת, 'to J″ who worketh wonderfully' (so Moore).

> 'But wherefore let we then our faithful friends,
> The associates and co-partners of our loss,
> Lie thus astonished on the oblivious pool,
> And call them not to share with us their part
> In this unhappy mansion, or once more
> With rallied arms to try what may be yet
> Regained in Heaven, or what more lost in Hell?'

MANSLAYER.—In Nu $35^{6.12}$ AV uses 'manslayer' for the person who unwittingly causes another's death. Elsewhere for the same Heb. and in this sense (רוֹצֵחַ or רֹצֵחַ, ptcp. of רָצַח to murder) AV gives 'slayer' or 'murderer,' RV always 'manslayer.' The word 'manslayer' is used also in 1 Ti 1^{9} as tr. of ἀνδροφόνος in its only occurrence. The mod. word is 'homicide,' but there was no difference in meaning between 'manslayer' when it was in use and 'murderer.' Thus Jn 8^{44} Wyc. 'ye ben of the fadir, the devel, and ye wolen do the desyris of youre fadir. He was a mansleere fro the bigynnyng'; and Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase, ii. fol. 278, 'Whosoever hateth hys brother is a man slear. And ye knowe that no man slear hath eternal life abiding in hym.' Other forms were mankiller, as the Rhem. tr. of Jn 8^{44} 'he was a mankiller from the beginning,' and of Ac 3^{14} 'But you denied the holy and the just one, and asked a mankiller to be given unto you'; and manqueller: thus, the marg. note in Matthews' Bible to Dt 19^{4} is, 'Here are shewed ii maner of manquelling, one done wyllyngly and of set purpose, the other unwyllinglye; for even he that kylleth with the hande maye before God be no manquellare: and agayne he that is angrye and envyeth althoughe he kyll not wyth the hande, cannot but be a manslear before God: because he wylleth hys neyghboure evyll.' See GOEL, REFUGE (CITIES OF).

Manslaughter is perhaps more general, but not, as now, carefully distinguished from murder: 2 Es 1^{26} 'ye have defiled your hands with blood, and your feet are swift to commit manslaughter' (homicidia); Wis 14^{25} (φόνος, RV 'murder'). Cf. Milton, PL xi. 693—

> 'To overcome in battle, and subdue
> Nations, and bring home spoils with infinite
> Man-slaughter, shall be held the highest pitch
> Of human glory.'

J. HASTINGS.

MAN-STEALING.—In Ex 21^{16} (Book of the Covenant, JE) the law is laid down, 'he that stealeth a man (גֹּנֵב אִישׁ) and selleth him, or (וְ) if he be found in his hand, shall surely be put to death.' In Dt 24^{7} this enactment is repeated in Deuteronomic language, and the general term אִישׁ is restricted to Israelites (נֶפֶשׁ מֵאֶחָיו מִבְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל), a restriction which is introduced even in Ex by Targ. Onk. and LXX (τινὰ τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ). The penalty of death is to be inflicted in either of two events,—if the kidnapped Israelite is retained as a slave by his fellow-countryman, or if (which would happen more frequently) he is sold into slavery in a foreign land (cf. the story of Joseph, Gn $37^{25b.26.27.28b}$ [J]). The LXX and Vulg., indeed, understand the words וְנִמְצָא בְיָדוֹ in Ex 21^{16} differently from EV, rendering respectively καὶ ἐὰν εὑρεθῇ ἐν αὐτῷ, and convictus noxæ, but there can be little doubt that 'if he be found in his hand' is the correct sense. This is confirmed by Dt 24^{7} וְהִתְעַמֶּר־בּוֹ, 'if he play the master over him' (Driver); LXX καὶ καταδυναστεύσας.

The aggravated nature of the offence of one Israelite selling another into foreign slavery is insisted upon by Philo (de Leg. Spec. ii. 338, ed. Mang.). The facilities afforded for the slave trade (the Edomites, the Philistines, the Phœnicians, the Greeks, etc., were ready purchasers, cf. Ezk 27^{13}, Am 1^{6}, Jl 3^{4-6}), and its lucrative character, necessitated the prohibition of kidnapping a fellow-Israelite on pain of death (inflicted, according to Sanhed. xi. 1, by strangulation). A similar law was in force amongst the Athenians (Xen. Mem. I. ii. 62: ἐάν τις φανερὸς γένηται ἀνδραποδιζόμενος, τουτῷ θάνατον εἶναι τὴν ζημίαν).

In the list of those for 'whom the law is made' (1 Ti $1^{10f.}$) are specified men-stealers (ἀνδραποδισταί).

MANTELET (סֹכֵךְ, AV 'defence'; LXX τὰς προφυλακάς; Vulg. umbraculum).—The only occurrence of this word is in Nah 2^{5} [Heb. ^{6}], in the (ideal) description of the siege and fall of Nineveh. The Heb. term comes from the root סכך 'to cover or protect' (hence AVm 'covering'). In all probability Nahum refers to some engine of war, such as a siege tower or a vinea or testudo under cover of which the battering-ram (which see) was worked. The context appears to require that the סֹכֵךְ belong to the assailants, not to the defenders. See Wellh., Nowack, and especially A. B. Davidson, ad loc.

The Eng. word is formed by adding the dimin. suffix et to the word 'mantel,' which in that spelling is now used for the shelf over a fireplace, but it is really the same word as 'mantle,' a cloak. The origin is unknown, but the meaning is always 'covering.' J. A. SELBIE.

MANTLE.—1. אַדֶּרֶת* 'addereth, from a root [אדר] 'to be wide,' wideness being apparently the characteristic feature of this article of attire, which is rarely mentioned, and generally, if not always, as a robe of office or state. On its possible form (which there are not sufficient data in Scripture to determine) see art. DRESS in vol. i. p. 625^{b}. The name is used 5 times (1 K $19^{13.19}$, 2 K $2^{8.13.14}$) of Elijah's 'mantle' (AV, RV), which was probably of hair,† and appears to have been copied by succeeding prophets‡ (cf. Zec 13^{4} [אַדֶּרֶת שֵׂעָר § 'a hairy mantle'; AV 'a rough garment'], and what we are told in Mt 3^{4}, Mk 1^{6} of John the Baptist). A Babylonish mantle (lit. 'mantle of Shinar' אַדֶּ׳ שִׁנְעָר) was one of the articles appropriated by Achan from the spoil of Jericho, Jos $7^{21.24}$. See BABYLONISH GARMENT. The king of Nineveh laid aside his אַדֶּרֶת and put on sackcloth when the news of Jonah's proclamation reached him, Jon 3^{6}.

2. מַעֲטָפוֹת once only, Is 3^{22} (where both AV and RV have 'mantles'). The article of dress referred to is probably (Dillm. compares Arab. 'iṭâf, mi'ṭaf) an upper wide tunic (kĕthôneth) with sleeves (so Siegfried-Stade—'die obere Tunika').

3. מְעִיל 1 S 15^{27} 28^{14}, Ezr $9^{3.5}$, Job 1^{20} 2^{12}, Ps 109^{29}. In all these passages AV has 'mantle'; in the first two RV has 'robe,' which is read in the whole of them by Amer. RV, and is generally given elsewhere by AV as tr^{n} of מְעִיל (e.g. Ex $28^{4.31.34}$ and oft., Lv 8^{7}, 1 S 18^{4}, Ezk 26^{16}). This article of dress is fully described in vol. i. p. 625^{a}.

---

* אֶדֶר in Mic 2^{8} may be a textual error for אַדֶּרֶת, the ת having been lost before the following ת (so Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade). Wellh. and Nowack pronounce the text hopelessly corrupt.

† The LXX has in Kings μηλωτή, 'sheepskin'; in Zec 13^{4} δέρρις, 'leathern coat'; in Gn 25^{25}, Mic 2^{8} δορά, 'hide'; in Jos 7^{21} ψιλὴ ποικίλη; in Jon 3^{6} στολή.

‡ In Zec 11^{3} it is uncertain whether אַדֶּרֶת should be taken in the sense of 'glory,' 'magnificence' (cf. its use in Ezk 17^{8}, unless here it is an adjective fem. from אַדִּיר, and the use of אֶדֶר in Zec 11^{13}), or of 'mantle,' the shepherds being false prophets. Nowack emends אַדַּרְתָּם to מַרְעִיתָם 'their pasture.'

§ The same Heb. expression is used in Gn 25^{25}, where Esau's appearance is compared to that of a hairy mantle (AV and RV 'garment').

4. שְׂמִיכָה (B ἐπιβόλαιον, A and Luc. δέῤῥις) occurs once only, Jg 4^{18}, of the article with which Jael covered Sisera. AV has 'mantle,' RV 'rug,' AVm 'rug or blanket.' Either 'rug' or 'tent-curtain' is probably the meaning. See notes of Moore and Budde, ad loc.

In addition to the above, RV introduces 'mantle' in (a) Ru 3^{15} (AV 'vail'; AVm 'sheet or apron') as tr^{n} of מִטְפַּחַת, which in the pl. מִטְפָּחוֹת is rendered by AV 'wimples' and RV 'shawls' in Is 3^{22}, the only other occurrence of the Heb. word. The root [טפח] means 'to extend or spread.' Dillm. (on Is 3^{22}) and Bertholet (on Ru 3^{15}) give 'shawl'; Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'cloak'; Siegfried-Stade 'plaid'; LXX has in Ru περίζωμα. See also art. DRESS in vol. i. p. 627^{b}.

(b) The 'veil' of AV (so also RVm) is changed by RV into 'mantle' in Ca 5^{7}, although it translates the same Heb. word רְדִיד 'veil' in Is 3^{23}, its only other occurrence. LXX has in Ca 5^{7} θέριστρον, which denotes a light kind of veil. Budde and Siegfried (in their Comm. on Ca) both think that an 'Ueberwurf' rather than a veil suits the context. The bride in escaping leaves her רְדִיד in the hands of her captors (cf. Mk $14^{51.\,52}$). But see art. DRESS in vol. i. p. 627^{b}.

(c) In Dn 3^{21} RV tr. כַּרְבְּלָתְהוֹן 'their mantles' (AV 'hats'). See HAT.

(d) In He 1^{12}, which is a quotation from Ps 102^{26} [Heb. and Gr. ^{27}], RV substitutes 'mantle' for AV 'vesture' as tr^{n} of περιβόλαιον, which in the LXX answers to לְבוּשׁ of MT. The Heb. word is rendered by both AV and RV 'vesture.' The only other NT occurrence of περιβόλαιον is 1 Co 11^{15}, where it is used of the 'covering' or 'veil' which nature supplies to a woman in her hair.

Once more, Amer. RV tr. מְעִיל in Is 59^{17} by 'mantle' (AV and RV 'cloke').

MANUSCRIPTS.—See TEXT.

MAOCH (מָעוֹךְ; in 1 S, B Ἀμμάχ (= עמך by transposition for מעך), A Μωάβ; in 1 K, B Ἀμησά, A Μααχά).—The father of Achish king of Gath, under whom David took service when his life was threatened by Saul (1 S 27^{2}). He is probably to be identified with Maacah (wh. see), the father of Achish king of Gath, who is mentioned at the beginning of Solomon's reign (1 K 2^{39}). In favour of this view is the fact that the Peshiṭta reads ܡܥܟܐ (= Maacah) in both passages, while the Targum of Jonathan in each case preserves the shorter form מעוך (= Maoch).

J. F. STENNING.

MAON, MAONITES (מָעוֹן).—Mentioned among the oppressors of Israel before the time of Jephthah in Jg 10^{12}, a late passage, probably due to the post-exilic editor. For Ma'on LXX reads Midian (Pesh. Ammon, Vulg. Chanaan, Targ. = MT). Though accepted by many critics, the correction is suspiciously obvious; and it does not materially relieve the anachronisms that remain in the verse. The editor included Maon in his list of representative oppressors as being an enemy familiar to later times. Hommel (AHT 251, 272) suggests that the LXX reading is an explanatory gloss on Ma'on. In 1 K 11^{18} Thenius reads Ma'on for Midian; so Stade, GVI i. 302, but without sufficient reason, and with no support from the Versions.

The Maonites (Maon) are usually regarded as the same as the Meunim, 1 Ch 4^{41} (Me'ûnim Ḳerê), 2 Ch 20^{1} (for Ammonites read Me'ûnim, LXX) 26^{7}. Their headquarters have been sought in Ma'ôn (Arab. Ma'ân), 4 hours S.E. of Petra, on the ancient caravan road from Damascus to Mecca; but all that can be gathered from the references above is that they inhabited the Edomite country, and were regarded by the Chronicler as Edomites. 2 Ch $20^{10.\,23}$ refers to them as 'inhabitants of Mt. Seir': this would favour a connexion with Ma'ân. On the other hand, 1 Ch $4^{40.\,41}$ rather points to a situation on the western side of Edom, where the country corresponds to the description in v.^{40}. Buhl, Gesch. der Edomiter, 42, n. 1, suggests a connexion between the Meunim and Mâyên, a place of wells, on the S.W. corner of the Edomite plateau. The Meunim are met with again among the Nethinim who returned from exile with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{50} (LXX 1 Es 5^{31} υἱοὶ Μανεί, A Μααννί) = Neh 7^{52} (LXX 2 Es 17^{52} υἱοὶ Μεσεινώμ, A Μεεινώμ); it has been suggested that these were captives taken from the Meunim after their defeat by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch $20^{1.\,22}$) or Uzziah (2 Ch 26^{7}), and relegated to menial service in the temple.

In Ch the LXX renders Meunim by Μ(ε)ιναῖοι (1 Ch 4^{41} Luc. Κιναῖοι), cf. also Job 2^{11} Σωφὰρ ὁ Μειναίων βασιλεύς. The Alexandrian translators probably intended to identify * the Meunim with the Arab tribe whom Pliny mentions as merchants in spices and incense (Hist. Nat. xii. 30), with their principal home in S. Arabia (Ḥaḍramaut). They are mentioned also by Eratosthenes (in Strabo, p. 768,† ed. Casaub.), in whose time they were the most northern of the four nations of Arabia, with their home by the Red Sea. This rendering of the LXX has suggested the theory that the Meunim belonged to the ancient kingdom of the Minæans, or more correctly Mainites, whose chief city was Ma'in in S. Arabia. So Halévy, Glaser (Gesch. u. Geogr. Arabiens, ii. 450), Hommel (Aufsätze u. Abhandl. 3, 5, and AHT 251, 272). See art. ARABIA in vol. i. p. 133. But the great antiquity of the kingdom of Ma'in (B.C. 1000) seems not to agree with the fact that in the OT the Meunim are found only in late writings. It may be that the Meunim were survivors of the kingdom of the Mainites, dwindled to a single tribe; but on the whole it seems safer to regard the Meunim simply as an Edomite tribe, and their connexion with the Mainites as not yet sufficiently established. See Sprenger, ZDMG xliv. 505; Buhl, Gesch. d. Edomiter, 40 ff.; Kittel, 'Chronicles' in SBOT 59.

The name Maon was given to several places in S. Palestine. Besides Maon near Petra, there was Maon near Hebron, Jos 15^{55}, 1 S $23^{24\text{ff.}}$ 25^{2} (Smith, HGHL 316), and [Beth]-baal-Meon on S.E. of Jordan, Nu 32^{38} (perhaps מען for בען Nu 32^{3}), Jos 13^{17}, Jer 48^{23}, Ezk 25^{9}, 1 Ch 5^{8}, Moabite Stone, ll. 9, 30. See Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 126 f. Hommel (AHT 273 f.) makes the suggestion that these places were named after the ancient Arabic kingdom of Ma'in, and marked the extent of its northern frontier.

MAR.—To 'mar' (from Anglo-Sax. merran, root MAR, seen in Gr. μαραίνω, to waste) is to damage or disfigure. It is the opposite of to 'make,' in opposition to which it is used still and is frequent in Shakespeare. Thus Timon, IV. ii. 41—

> 'For bounty, that makes gods, does still mar men.'

It is used in AV of land spoiled by mice (1 S 6^{5}),‡ and by stones (2 K 3^{19}), of a path or road destroyed (Job 30^{13}, RVm 'break up'), and of vine shoots spoilt by trampling down or plucking off (Nah 2^{2}). The potter's clay-vessel was marred in the turning (Jer 18^{4}), and old wine-skins are marred by pouring new wine into them (Mk 2^{22}, ἀπολοῦνται, RV 'perish'). Jeremiah's girdle was marred by being put into a damp hole (13^{7}), an illustration of the way in which J″ will disfigure the pride of Judah and Jerusalem (13^{9}). The visage of the servant of the Lord 'was so marred more than any man.' Cf. Milton, PL iv. 116, 'Which marred his borrowed visage,' and better, Shaks. Jul. Cæsar, III. ii. 201—

---

* Μιναῖοι can hardly be a transliteration. Gentilic names in -αῖοι are formed from place-names in -α, e.g. Σαβαῖοι, Γεῤῥαῖοι. Thus Μιναῖοι presupposes Μινά, which can hardly be a transliteration of Ma'ôn.

† κατοικεῖ δὲ τὰ μέγιστα τέτταρα ἔθνη τὴν ἐσχάτην λεχθεῖσαν χώραν, Μιναῖοι μὲν ἐν τῷ πρὸς τὴν Ἐρυθρὰν μέρει, πόλις δ' αὐτῶν ἡ μεγίστη Κάρνα ἢ Κάρνανα; cf. p. 776.

‡ Cf. Tindale's tr. of Ex 8^{24} 'The londe was marred with flyes.'

> 'Kind souls, what, weep you when you but behold
> Our Cæsar's vesture wounded? Look you here,
> Here is himself, marr'd, as you see, with traitors.'

The Israelites were forbidden to mar the corners of their beard (Lv 19^{27}: it is Tindale's tr. 'Ye shall not rounde the lockes of youre heedes, nether shalt thou marre the tuftes of thy beerde'). The next of kin was afraid that if he married Ruth he should mar (the same Heb. as of the marring of the land by mice, and the taking down of Judah's pride) his inheritance (Ru 4^{6}). The full force of the word as used in AV will be seen from Ex 32^{8} Tind. 'the people which thou broughtest out of the lande of Egipte have marred all'; Jg 2^{19} Cov. 'Nevertheles, whan the judge dyed, they turned backe, and marred all more then their fathers'; and Rutherford, Letters, No. xxx. 'Madam, many eyes are upon you, and many would be glad your Ladyship should spill a Christian, and mar a good professor. Lord Jesus, mar their godless desires, and keep the conscience whole without a crack.'

J. HASTINGS.

MARA (מָרָא or מָרָה [so corrected by Ḳerê]; B Πικρά, A Πικρία).—The name which Naomi claimed for herself: 'Call me not Naomi ('pleasant'), call me Mara (i.e. bitter): for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me' (Ru 1^{20}). The Latin is able to retain the play upon the words by the use of Mara (id est amaram). H. A. REDPATH.

MARAH (מָרָה).—The first station of the Israelites after crossing the sea, mentioned only Ex 15^{23} and Nu $33^{8.9}$, from which passages it appears that it was distant three days' journey from the place of crossing. The difficulty of locating the latter has been pointed out under EXODUS, vol. i. p. 803. If we assume that the passage was in the neighbourhood of Suez, then Wâdy Hawarah, about 15 to 16 hours' camel-ride from 'the Wells of Moses' (nearly opposite Suez on the E. side of the Gulf of Suez) on the route to the convent of St. Katharine (the traditional Sinai), is a suitable identification. Wâdy Amara, about 1½ hour N. of this, or Wâdy Ghurundel, about 2 hours to the S., have also been suggested, though the last is generally considered to be Elim. If, on leaving Egypt, the Israelites went by the present haj route towards 'Akabah, then Marah must be somewhere on the plateau of the Tih (see EXODUS, ii.). If a more northerly position (near the Bitter Lakes) be assumed for the passage, then the position of Marah would not be far from the 'Wells of Moses,' and 'Ain Nâba or Gharkadeh, about 1 hour to the N. of these wells, has been proposed. Brugsch's theory would place Marah in the neighbourhood of the Bitter Lakes. In the present state of our knowledge no identification can be made with any degree of probability. Descriptions of some of these sites are to be found in Robinson and Palmer.

The LXX gives for Marah in Ex 15^{23} Μερρά twice, but renders the word on its third occurrence by Πικρία, endeavouring to indicate the meaning of the Hebrew word (cf. Thiersch, de Pent. Vers. Alex. 31 ff.). In Nu $33^{8.9}$ it adopts the form Πικρίαι. The manner in which the Vulg. employs amarus is worth quoting: 'eo quod essent amara, unde et congruum loco nomen imposuit, vocans illum Mara, id est amaritudinem.'

A. T. CHAPMAN.

MARALAH (מַרְעֲלָה; B Μαραγελδά, A Μαριλά, Luc. Μαραλά).—A place on the west border of Zebulun, Jos 19^{11}. The Pesh. has Râmath-ta'le', 'height of the fox.' The site is quite uncertain. For conjectures see Dillm. ad loc. C. R. CONDER.

MARANATHA.—An expression used by the Apostle Paul in 1 Co 16^{22} 'If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema maranatha.' It has somewhat perplexed the interpreters from early times quite down to the present. They have been puzzled to determine its connexion, its composition, and its significance. The early Greek expositors who attempt to explain it (as Chrysost. Hom. 44 on 1 Co, Migne, 61, x. col. 377; Theodoret in Migne, 82, iii. 373; John of Damascus, Migne, 95, ii. 705; Theophylact, Migne, 124, ii. 793, etc., down to Euthym. Zig. ad loc. vol. i. 369, Athens, 1887), together with the early lexicographers (as Hesychius, ed. Schmidt, iii. 71; Suidas, ed. Gaisford, 2397, etc.), generally agree in translating it 'The (or 'our') Lord came' or 'has come.' This rendering is corroborated by marginal annotations in one or two of the later MSS (see Tisch. Nov. Test. Gr., ed. octava crit. maior, ad loc.); and with it agree, though amid some vacillation, the leading Lat. expositors also (as Jerome, ad loc., Migne, 30, xi. 772; August., Migne, 33, vol. ii. 1161; Pseudo-Ambros. ad loc., Migne, 17, iv. 276).

But the association of the expression with 'anathema' seems to have led gradually to a minatory interpretation of it, so that the phrase thus formed came to be regarded as a kind of reduplicated commination, or a curse reinforced by a prayer. Traces of its official use in this sense may be found as far back at least as the 7th cent. (see F. Kober, Der Kirchenbann, Tübingen, 1857, p. 40 f.; du Cange, Gloss. med. et infim. Lat., ed. L. Favre, 1885, vol. v. s.v.; compare Tertull. de Pudicitia, § 14, where, however, the reading is doubtful); indeed, a still earlier instance of this use is afforded by one of the two or three occurrences of the term which are all that have yet been met with in extra-biblical Greek. A sepulchral inscription, believed to be of the 4th or 5th cent., from the island of Salamis (referred to by Schmiedel in the Hand-Commentar on Cor. l.c., 2nd ed. ii. 208 sq., and given in the CIG vol. iv. p. 475, inscr. 9303, Berlin, 1877), which marks the 'eternal home' of the 'reader' Agathon and his wife, for each of whom a separate compartment has been prepared, closes as follows: 'But if any private man or any other person dare to deposit a body here besides our two, let him give account to God, and be anathema maranathan' (sic). The Pauline order is deviated from here in the Greek, so that maranatha is separated by one word from anathema; but the maledictory import is plain. This imprecatory use of the expression was thought to be substantiated by its assumed correspondence to the third or highest degree of Jewish excommunication, the Shammatha. The word Shammatha (variously interpreted, see Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. etc. 2466) was held by some to mean 'The Lord cometh' (שֵׁם, the name, being taken as a substitute for the tetragram), and thus to furnish an analogy which had been followed by the Apostolic Church. For this view the authority of such eminent Jewish scholars as Rabbi Solomon Ha-Levi, known among Christians as Paulus Burgensis (15th cent.), and Elias Levita in his Tishbi (16th cent.), has been unwarrantably claimed (cf. e.g. Leigh, Critica Sacra, s.v. Μαραναθά). For Elias makes no mention of maranatha, and follows Rab in the Talmud (Moed Ḳaṭan, 17*a*; see Buxtorf, u.s.) in taking 'shammatha' as equivalent to sham metha, 'there's death'; while Paulus Burgensis (in Lyra, vi. 61*a*, Basel, 1508) finds in 'anathema maranatha' a combination of the three alleged forms or grades of Jewish ecclesiastical censure, maranatha being a (post-apostolic) corruption from a mutilated 'macharam' (maran) and 'shammatha' (atha). Echoes, however, of the Talmudic interpretation of shammatha meet us, apparently, in Luther's 'accursed to death' ('maharam motha'), and the 'Let him be had in execration, yea, excommunicate to death' of the Genevan version of 1557; while W. Mace, in his NT Greek and English, 1729, gives simply 'Let him be accurst' as the rendering of the entire phrase. This imprecatory sense of the Pauline term, which was thus linked to supposed Jewish precedent, though without warrant either in philology or in fact (see John Lightfoot, Works, etc., ed. 1684, ii. 796 f., or Horæ in Acta apost. etc., Amst. 1679, p. 107 f.; Schürer, HJP II. i. 60 ff.), received, nevertheless, the endorsement of such names as Beza, Bibliander, Bullinger, Capito, Calvin (cf. Suicer, Thesaurus, etc. i. 604; Pfeiffer, Dubia Vexata, etc. 4th ed. 1699, p. 944 sq. for references), and others too numerous to catalogue here. Illustration of its prevalence and persistency is afforded by its adoption in our English Bibles (with the single exception of the Rhemish) from Tindale's to the Authorized Version. Indeed, although a comma seems to have been inserted between 'anathema' and 'maranatha' as early as the Cambridge folio of 1629, it was removed again in Blayney's standard ed. of 1769, and is wanting in not a few modern editions (see Scrivener, Cambridge Paragraph Bible, Introd. p. lxxxii, reprinted under the title The Authorized Edition of the English Bible, Cambr. 1884, p. 191). Other isolated instances occur of dissent from the prevalent theory that the words should be combined into a malediction. For example, in Robert Stephens' edd. of the Gr. text issued in 1549 and 1551 a colon (or stop) is inserted after anathema, as also in the Elzevir edd. of 1624 and 1633; an English Bible, also, bearing the imprint of Henry Hills, London, 1660, although it puts no stop after anathema, adds at maranatha the marginal note, 'That is, The Lord is come.' Nevertheless, the compound imprecatory interpretation has lived on quite to modern times, and has even found its way into popular literature.

This opinion, however, may be said to be at length extinct in scholarly circles. It is not only confessed to be without intrinsic or historic foundation, but it conflicts with the intimations afforded by the independent use of the word in early Christian documents. The earliest is that in The Teaching of the Apostles, a document belonging to the early part of the 2nd cent. or possibly even to the 1st. The thanksgiving in connexion with the Eucharist, as there given ch. 10^6, closes as follows: 'May grace come and may this world pass away. Hosanna to the God of David. If any man is holy, let him come; if any man is not, let him repent. Maranatha. Amen.' Plainly, then, the term has an inherent meaning wholly detached from an anathema; and the preceding words here, though permitting this meaning to be admonitory, are remote from any suggestion of imprecation. But in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 26, p. 209, 26, ed. Lagarde), where the same thanksgiving is substantially reproduced and expanded, any thought of malediction is conspicuously out of place: . . . 'Gather us all together into thy kingdom which thou hast prepared. Maranatha. Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh,' etc.

But the acknowledgment that the term must be taken and interpreted by itself has rather increased than diminished the perplexity respecting its composition and meaning. Passing over attempts to analyze it which have found little favour, we may say that scholars now almost unanimously agree that the first part of the expression is the Aramaic word for 'Lord'; though as to whether the n is a formative appendage (cf. rabban), or belongs to the pronominal suffix 'our,' they are not so harmonious. That it should be connected with the first half of the word and not the last is supported not only by the earliest MSS that divide the term, but by the use of marin by Philo (in Flaccum, § 6, ed. Mang. ii. 522, 47) as the current Syrian appellation for 'Lord,' as well as by extant Aram. inscriptions (see Nöldeke in ZDMG for 1870, p. 101). The chief problem, accordingly, lies in the last part of the term. If the second half of the compound is held to be atha, the Fathers were right in taking it as a past tense (ἦλθεν, ἥκει, etc.: 'the' or 'our Lord has come'), and understanding the advent in the flesh as referred to. But the explanations they give of the apostle's reference to this past event are far-fetched and unsatisfying; such as, 'whoever does not love him waits in vain for another,' or 'he has come; hence the folly of opposing him'—the words being assumed to be addressed to Jews: if spoken to Christians, they were thought to be designed to shame them for withholding love from one who has so humbled himself on their behalf, etc.

The obvious inappositeness, however, of an allusion to the past early began to tempt expositors to force the verb into a future reference, viz. to the final coming in judgment. This result has ordinarily been reached, at least in later times, by taking the past tense as 'prophetic,' i.e. as an emphatic declaration of the certainty of the future event by representing it as having already occurred: 'has come,' i.e. 'most certainly will come.' The incipient stage of this opinion appears in the 'in adventu domini' of certain Latin texts, and the 'donec adveniat' (or 'redeat') of Augustine and some later Fathers. But a prophetic or anticipatory past tense here is more than questionable grammatically; and its inappropriateness is indirectly conceded by modern expositors, who, as with one consent, substitute for it a present or a future in their translations: 'Our Lord cometh,' 'is at hand,' 'will come,' etc. Under these circumstances, certain Aramaic scholars have proposed to restrict the verbal part of the expression to the final syllable 'tha,' and understand the whole as an ejaculation: 'Our Lord, come!' Compare ἔρχου Κύριε Ἰησοῦ, Rev 22^{20}; and the Amen bo of the Jewish liturgies. See C. Taylor, The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, p. 77 ff. One of the first to make this suggestion seems to have been Gustav Bickell of Innsbruck in the Ztschr. f. Kath. Theol. for 1884, vol. viii. p. 403, n^3. During the same year, however, this opinion was shown by Halévy in the Rev. des études Juives, vol. ix. p. 9, to have the support of sundry inscriptions from Arabia, and was also advocated by Nöldeke in the GGA p. 1023 (in a review of Kautzsch's Grammatik, u.s.w.), where Wellhausen is cited as making the same suggestion (yet cf. GGN, 1895, p. 3, n. 2). Siegfried, also, in reviewing Kautzsch's work in Hilgenfeld's ZWTh., compares the frequent phrases תא חזי 'come and see,' תא שמע 'come and hear,' and proposes to take μαραναθά as equiv. to μαρανθά, signifying 'O (or 'our') Lord, come!' This supplicatory sense has been accepted by G. Wohlenberg (Die Lehre der Zwölf Apostel, u.s.w. 1888, p. 82 sq.), Arnold Meyer (Jesu Muttersprache, 1896, p. 50), who compares (p. 156 f.) Marna or Marnas (מרנא 'our lord'), the name of the chief deity of Gaza (cf. the new edition of the deacon Marcus' life of Bp. Porphyrius of Gaza, Leip. 1895; also Stark, Gaza, u.s.w. 1852, pp. 576–583); and is sustained by G. Dalman in his Grammatik des Jüd.-Paläst. Aramäisch, 1894, pp. 120, 297, cf. 162.* It will doubtless prevail.

* Dalman (Worte Jesu, i. 269) calls מָרַנָא the earlier and fuller form. See Zahn, Einl. in das NT, i. § 18, Anm. 11.

To the question why the apostle deserts the Greek for the Aramaic language here, many conjectural answers have been given: such as, to humble the pride of his Corinthian converts by reminding them that the gospel did not originate with them; to affect the more readily his Jewish opponents by a phrase from their vernacular; to suggest that Christ will judge all nations and tongues, and the like. These may pass for what they are worth. The expression, as embodying the consummation of Christian desire and aspiration, may have become a current ejaculation among the early disciples (cf. 'Abba,' Mk 14^{36}, Ro 8^{15}, Gal 4^{6}), and as such would doubtless be intelligible to the Christians of Corinth. This supposition gains plausibility from the recurrence of the term, in varied connexions, in the Teaching and the Apostolic Constitutions. Its specific tone it takes from its context: in the Ep. to the Cor. it is admonitory; in the Apostolic Constitutions it is jubilant.

Whether it is a fragment of some confession, creed, or hymn (cf. Het NT . . . op nieuw uit den Grondtekst overgezet, De Nederlandsche Bijbel-Compagnie, 1868, ad loc.), or is a germ of some early liturgical formulary, this is not the place to consider (see Bickell, 'Die Lehre d. Apostel u. d. Liturgie,' in the Ztschr. f. Kath. Theol. as above; Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, ii. 286; Spitta, Zur Gesch. u. Lit. des Urchristentums, i. 256 f., 1893; Th. Zahn, Forschungen z. Gesch. u.s.w. iii. 1884, p. 294 f.).

LITERATURE.—Some of the more extended discussions of the term are by Anthony Leger in Hase and Iken, Thes. Nov. Theol.-Philol. (1732), vol. ii. 879–883; A. Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltexte (1883), 220–246; G. Wohlenberg, as above, pp. 78–85; and especially N. Schmidt in the Journ. Bibl. Lit. for 1894, pp. 50–60; cf. the same Journ. for 1896, p. 44, n14. Moreover, Schmiedel's note in the Hand-Commentar, as above, should not be overlooked.

MARBLE (שַׁיִשׁ, שֵׁשׁ, μάρμαρος) denotes, strictly speaking, limestone (carbonate of lime), which is sufficiently hard and close-grained to be capable of receiving a polish. It is valuable both as an ornamental building stone and as a material for sculpture. The most famous kinds are those associated with classic statuary and architecture, such as the Pentelic and Parian marbles of Greece and the Carrara marble of Italy. The purest marble is white, but many coloured varieties are found, and some of these were highly valued in ancient times. Among them may be mentioned the 'Breccia di Verde,' which varies from all shades of green to a purplish red, the 'onyx' marble, and the so-called 'Oriental alabaster.' All these are Egyptian stones. The last named is quite different from true alabaster (sulphate of lime), being a carbonate of lime of stalagmitic origin and of an amber colour. The famous obelisk of Shalmaneser II., found by Layard at Nimrûd, is of black marble (Hull, Building and Ornamental Stones, 148–152).

In 1 Ch 29^{2} 'marble stones in abundance' are mentioned among the materials prepared by David for the building of the temple. The Heb. is שַׁיִשׁ (B πάριον, A πάριος). According to Josephus, Solomon's temple was built of white stone (λευκὸς λίθος, Ant. VIII. iii. 2), quarried and prepared in Lebanon (ib. VIII. iii. 9). The OT narrative (1 K $5^{17.18}$) does not expressly state the locality from which the stone came. Hard white limestone is found in Lebanon, and has been used in the temples of Baalbek (Robinson, BRP iii. 508; Thomson, Land and Book, iii. 341, 342). But the stones in the foundation walls of the temple, as seen at the Jews' Wailing Place, appear to have been brought from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The limestone found in the quarries under Bezetha is 'hard, compact, and delicately variegated, and is capable of being cut as marble into objects of ornament and use, and of receiving a polished surface' (Hull, SWP 59; Warren, Underground Jerusalem, 60; King, Recent Discoveries on Temple Hill, ch. i.). Josephus (Wars, V. v. 2) says that the pillars of Herod's temple were μονόλιθοι λευκοτάτης μαρμάρου. Some of the marble used in Roman and post-Roman buildings in Palestine, and found still in their remains, may have been imported from abroad.

In Est 1^{6} the palace of Ahasuerus at Shushan (Susa) is described as having 'pillars of marble' (עַמּוּדֵי שֵׁשׁ, LXX στύλοι πάρινοι), while in the same verse the pavement of the palace is said to have been of 'red, blue, white, and black marble' (AV), or 'red, white, yellow, and black marble' (RV). Of the four words thus translated the second is שֵׁשׁ (LXX πάρινος λίθος), and this was evidently understood as 'white marble' in AV as well as in RV, in spite of the transposition which has taken place in the former, since 'marble' is the second word in the alternative rendering in the margin. The other three words are בַּהַט, דַּר, and סֹחָרֶת, and they occur only in this verse. LXX renders the first by σμάραγδος or σμαραγδίτης λίθος, the second (apparently) by πίννινος, and does not translate the third. AVm and RVm give 'porphyre (porphyry), alabaster, and stone of blue colour.' Oettli (Kurzgef. Comm.) translates שֵׁשׁ by 'Marmor,' and has for the other three words 'Alabaster und Perlmutterstein und Fleckmarmor.' The LXX rendering of בַּהַט suggests some green stone, and that of דַּר some stone with a pearly lustre. Malachite (a green mineral) is found in Persia, as is also the stone called 'Yezd marble.' The latter is described as a stalagmitic carbonate of lime resembling the Egyptian stone known as 'Oriental alabaster,' except that the colour is greenish-white instead of yellow (Blaneford in Eastern Persia, ii. 486). Marble capitals and broken shafts were found in the ruins of Susa by Layard (Early Adventures, ii. 296). The palace of the Shah at Ispahan has columns of Tabriz marble, while white and coloured marbles are profusely used in the interior of the building (Hull, Building and Ornamental Stones, 152).

In Ca 5^{15} there occurs the simile, 'His legs are as pillars of marble' (עַמּוּדֵי שֵׁשׁ, LXX στύλοι μαρμάρινοι).

In Apocr. μάρμαρος occurs only once (Ep. Jer ^{72}). Here it is said that the idols of the heathen shall be known to be no gods ἀπὸ τῆς πορφύρας καὶ τῆς μαρμάρου τῆς ἐπ' αὐτοὺς σηπομένης. The context seems to make it necessary to understand μάρμαρος here in its root meaning of 'sparkling,' or 'brilliance,' and so both AV and RV render τῆς πορ. καὶ τῆς μαρ. by 'bright purple.'

In NT μάρμαρος also occurs once, being named as part of the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon (Rev 18^{12}).

MARCHESHVAN (מַרְחֶשְׁוָן, Mish. Taanith, i. 3, 4; Μαρσουάνης, Jos. Ant. I. iii. 3).—See TIME.

MARCUS (Μάρκος, or, perhaps more accurately, Μᾶρκος; see MARK [JOHN], p. 245^{b}).—This form of the name of St. Mark (wh. see) occurs in AV of Col 4^{10}, Philem ^{24}, 1 P 5^{13}. RV has 'Mark' in every instance.

MARDOCHEUS (Μαρδοχαῖος Mardochæus).—1. The name of MORDECAI, the uncle of Esther, appears in this form in the apocryphal additions to the Book of Esther (Ad. Est 10^{4} $11^{2.12}$ $12^{1.4-6}$ 16^{13}). In 2 Mac 15^{36} the 14th of Adar, that is, the first day of the feast of Purim, is called 'Mardocheus' day' (ἡ Μαρδοχαικὴ ἡμέρα, RV 'the day of Mordecai'). 2. In 1 Es 5^{8}, for MORDECAI, one of the leaders of the Jews, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Joshua; cf. Ezr 2^{2}, Neh 7^{7}.

MARESHAH (מָרֵאשָׁה and מָרֵשָׁה).—1. The 'father' of Hebron, 1 Ch 2^{42} (B Μαρεισά, A Μαρισά). Perhaps we may gather from this passage that Mareshah, which is really the city of Jos 15^{44}, colonized Hebron. 2. A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^{21} (B Μαιχά, A Μαρησά). See next article, and GENEALOGY, IV. 2. 29.

MARESHAH (מָרֵשָׁה, in Jos 15^{44} מָרֵאשָׁה).—A city in the Shephēlah of Judah, near Keilah and Achzib (Jos 15^{44}; B Βαθησάρ, A Μαρησά); fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11^{8}; B Μαρεισά, A Μαρισά); the scene of the encounter between Asa and Zerah the Ethiopian (2 Ch 14$^{9.10}$; B Μαρισήλ, Μαρείσῃ, A Μαρησά); the birthplace of Dodavah the father of the prophet Eleazar, 2 Ch 20^{37} (B Μαρείσῃ, A Μαρίσῃ); mentioned also in Mic 1^{15} (where see Nowack's note). On 1 Ch 2^{42} 4^{21} see the preceding article. The Valley of Zephathah (Wâdy es-Sâfieh) was to the 'north' of Mareshah (κατὰ βοῤῥᾶν M.) according to the LXX version of 2 Ch 14^{10}. In Mic 1^{15} there is a play on the name as if meaning 'inheritance.'

Outside the canonical Scriptures, Mareshah plays an important part. It was plundered by Judas Maccabæus (Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6, after whom we ought certainly to correct Σαμαρίαν of 1 Mac 5^{66} to Μαρίσαν; cf. 2 Mac 12^{35}), subdued by John Hyrcanus (Ant. XIII. ix. 1, x. 2), freed by Pompey (ib. XIV. iv. 4), and finally destroyed by the Parthians (ib. XIV. xiii. 9).

In the 4th cent. A.D. the site was known (Onomast. 279. 139) as being 2 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), which is a somewhat overstated distance. The present ruin Mer'ash, in spite of its guttural, no doubt represents Mareshah (see Onomast. s. 'Marsa'). There are some remarkable rock-chambers, with flights of steps, close by, which seem to have been granaries or reservoirs. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xx.

C. R. CONDER.

MARIMOTH (Marimoth), 2 Es 1^{2}=MERAIOTH, an ancestor of Ezra (Ezr 7^{3}). Also called MEREMOTH, 1 Es 8^{2}.

MARISA (Μαρίσα, Maresa).—The Greek form of the name MARESHAH. It occurs only in 2 Mac 12^{35}, but should be read also in 1 Mac 5^{66}, where all Greek MSS wrongly have 'Samaria'; but Old Lat. Marisan, Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6 Μαρίσα. The false reading 'Samaria' is found in 2 Mac 12^{33} in four cursives and Syr.

MARISH.—This old form of 'marsh' has been allowed to remain in modern editions of AV. It is still occasionally seen in poetry, as Tennyson, Dying Swan—

> 'And far through the marish green and still
> The tangled water-courses slept.'

It occurs in Ezk 47^{11}, 1 Mac 9$^{42.45}$. Cf. Berners' Froissart, 37, 'True it was that some of the knights of Scotland did ever the annoyance they could to the Englishmen, and kept them in the wild country among marishes and great forests, so that no man could follow them.' The word is also an adj., as Bacon, Essays, p. 142, 'in Marish and unwholesome Grounds.'

J. HASTINGS.

MARK.—1. מַטָּרָה 1 S 20^{20}, Job 16^{12}, and מַטָּרָא La 3^{12}, a target, a butt. As 1 S 20^{20} 'I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark.' Cf. Shaks. Venus, 941—

> 'Thy mark is feeble age, but thy false dart
> Mistakes that aim and cleaves an infant's heart.'

2. σκοπός, a mark to keep the eye on, in shooting or running; Wis 5^{12} 'Like as when an arrow is shot at a mark' (ἐπὶ σκοπόν); 5^{21}, Ph 3^{14} 'I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (κατὰ σκοπόν; RV 'towards the goal,' but it is not a technical word in the race-course; in class. Gr. it is a target, here like 1 Co 9^{26} οὐκ ἀδήλως, 'not in the dark,' or as Moule, 'with my goal clear in view'). Cf. Pref. to AV 'We never thought from the beginning that we should need to make a new Translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one . . . but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones, one principall good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our indeavour, that our mark'; Shaks. Love's Labour's Lost, IV. ii. 115—

> 'If knowledge be the mark, to know thee shall suffice.'

3. מִפְגָּע, place of striking or impinging, i.e. a butt or mark: Job 7^{20} 'why hast thou set me as a mark against thee?' RV 'as a mark for thee.' AV understands Job to be a target for the arrow of God's displeasure, RV that he is an object over which God stumbles. 'Job,' says Davidson, 'feels that he is continually in the way of God, an obstacle against which the Almighty is always of set purpose striking Himself. The thought is one of unprecedented boldness.'

4. אוֹת sign, token: Gn 4^{15} 'And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him,' RV 'appointed a sign for Cain.' 'A mark set upon Cain would have distinguished him, so that all who met him might know him. This would be no pledge of security, no consolation to the guilty man. But when we see that the Lord appointed a sign for Cain, so that, looking upon it, he might be reminded of the divine protection, the words of the passage become easy to understand'—Ryle in Expos. Times, iii. 211; and Early Narratives, 70; also Sayce in Expos. Times, vii. 367.

5. קַעֲקַע a puncture, tattoo: Lv 19^{28} 'Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you.' Driver and White (in SBOT) tr. 'You shall not make any incisions in your skin for the dead; nor shall you tattoo any marks upon you,' and explain that the tattooing here alluded to implied probably dedication to a deity. Cf. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, 212 ff., and RS 334; also Stade, ZATW xiv. 250 f.

6. תָּו tâw, the letter T, the last of the Heb. alphabet, which in the old Phœnician characters had the shape of a cross. See ALPHABET. Ezk 9$^{4-6}$, the mark set on the forehead of those that bewailed the abominations in Jerusalem. The Vulg. tr. of 9^{4} is signa thau super frontes virorum gementium, to which Tindale refers when he speaks (Expositions, 13) of 'the sign Thau, that defendeth us from the smiting and power of the evil angels.' In Job 31^{35} the word is used of a person's signature: cf. Shaks. II Henry VI. IV. ii. 110, 'Dost thou use to write thy name? or hast thou a mark to thyself, like an honest plain-dealing man?'

7. χάραγμα (fr. χαράσσω, to cut, engrave), a stamp or brand. This word is used in Ac 17^{29} of sculptured work, and tr^{d} in EV by the verb 'graven.' Elsewhere it is found only in Rev (13$^{16.17}$ 14$^{9.11}$ 16^{2} 19^{20} 20^{4}; TR and AV add 15^{2}, omitted by edd.) of the brand (EV 'mark') by which the followers of the Beast were known. The brand was on the right hand or on the forehead (13^{16}). See MAN OF SIN. The tâw of Ezk is in the writer's mind.

8. μώλωψ, weal, quoted in 1 P 2^{24} from Is 53^{5} and tr^{d} 'stripe,' is in Sir 23^{10} rendered in AV 'blue mark,' 'a servant that is continually beaten shall not be without a blue mark' (RV 'shall not lack a bruise').

9. στίγμα (from στίζω, to prick; connected with Eng. 'sting'), brand, scar: Gal 6^{17} only, ἐγὼ γὰρ τὰ στίγματα τοῦ [Κυρίου] Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματί μου βαστάζω (edd. omit Κυρίου of TR after best text); Vulg. 'Ego enim stigmata Domini Iesu in corpore meo porto'; Wyc. 'For I bere in my bodi the tokenes of oure Lord Jhesu Crist'; Tind. 'For I beare in my bodye the markes of the lorde Jesu,' so succeeding VSS including AV; RV 'for I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus'). The reference is to the suffering which the apostle had endured in the service of Christ, of which he gives a rapid account in 2 Co 11$^{22-27}$, and which, whether Jewish whipping, or Roman flogging, or more barbarous mob violence, must have left scars on his person, some of them no doubt visible. But why does he call them the scars or brands of Jesus? Two explanations have been given. (1) The marks which were left in the body of Jesus by the nails and the sword are reproduced figuratively in the apostle's body. Cf. 2 Co 4^{10} 'always bearing about in the body the dying (RVm 'putting to death') of Jesus' (παντότε τὴν νέκρωσιν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματι περιφέροντες); also 2 Co 1^{5}, Col 1^{24}; and especially the references to his crucifixion with Christ, Ro 6^{6}, Gal 2^{20}. This interpretation is forcibly illustrated by the stigmata of St. Francis of Assisi, to whom the word (left untranslated in the Lat. versions) 'suggested, whether by a more or less distant association, the idea which took so strong a hold upon his mind, that in a moment of extreme spiritual tension the actual marks of the Passion seemed to imprint themselves upon his body'—Sanday, NT Com. for Eng. Readers. Among recent commentators Moule (Camb. Bible) considers that there is 'something to be said' for this explanation, and Huxtable (Pul. Com.) argues ably and at length in its favour. (2) The marks identify the apostle as belonging to Jesus. This receives the nearly unanimous consent of modern expositors, and is actually introduced into the translation of the RV, on which Westcott (Lessons of the RV of NT, 130) comments, 'the addition of the word branded—I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus—points the reference to the slaves who bore the names of the deities to whose service they were consecrated.' (Cf., further, art. CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, vol. i. p. 538^{b}). But even on this interpretation the question remains, Does St. Paul refer to the custom of marking the devotees of a deity, or to the custom of branding deserters and evil-doers as a sign of degradation? Lightfoot (Com. on Gal.) refers the metaphor to the practice of branding slaves and other persons who were devoted to the service of some deity, and considers that 'such a practice at all events cannot have been unknown in a country which was the home of the worship of Cybele.' But the verb used (βαστάζω, which implies at least that the thing carried is easily seen, cf. Ac 9^{15} 'a chosen vessel unto me to bear my name before the Gentiles,' βαστάσαι . . . ἐνώπιον ἐθνῶν), and the apostle's glorying in being regarded as περικαθάρματα τοῦ κόσμου, πάντων περίψημα, 'the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things' (1 Co 4^{13}), make the reference most probable to such stigmata as (now also in the modern use of the word) carried punishment and degradation. These are the only marks that would involve at once much suffering at the time of their infliction and much courage to carry afterwards.

MARK (JOHN).—In this art. the identity of the John Mark of the Acts with the Mark of the Pauline Epistles (Col, Philem, 2 Ti), with the Mark of 1 P, and with Mark the Evangelist, mentioned in early Christian literature, is assumed. This identification is confirmed by the link between the Acts and the Pauline Epistles supplied by Col 4^{10} ('cousin of Barnabas'), and by the fact that the name Mark does not appear to have been common among the Jews.

1. NAME.—The Hebrew name of this companion of the apostles was Ἰωάνης; it appears without addition in Ac 13$^{5.\ 13}$. To it the Roman prænomen Marcus was added (Ἰωάνου τοῦ ἐπικαλουμένου Μάρκου, Ἰ. τὸν ἐπικληθέντα M., Ac 12$^{12.\ 25}$), just as the Roman cognomen Paulus was added to the Hebrew name Saul. The name Marcus was that by which its bearer was commonly known among those for whom the Acts was written (*τὸν Ἰ. τὸν καλούμενον Μᾶρκον, Ac 15^{37}); so Col 4^{10}, Philem ^{24}, 2 Ti 4^{11}, 1 P 5^{13}. For the accentuation Μᾶρκος, see Blass, Gram. NT Greek, § 4. 2; the form Μάαρκος is found in CIG, 5644, 6155. For the frequency of such double names among the Jews, see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 181 ff.; and for the common use of the name Marcus 'among Greek-speaking peoples from the Augustan age onwards,' see the inscriptions quoted by Swete, St. Mark, p. ix. There is no evidence, however, that it was common among the Jews; the only Jew of this name mentioned by Josephus is the nephew of Philo (Ant. XVIII. viii. 1, XIX. v. 1).

2. FAMILY AND POSITION.—The father of Mark is not mentioned in the NT or by any reliable tradition. His mother bears the common Hebrew name Mary (Ac 12^{12}). She appears as a woman of some wealth, the possessor of a house with a πυλών and with a room large enough to contain many (οὗ ἦσαν ἱκανοὶ συνηθροισμένοι), the mistress, it would seem, of a household, the duty of one παιδίσκη—bearing a Greek name (see Blass on Ac 12^{13})—being to keep the door (cf. Jn 18^{17}). Her house is one of the centres of the life of 'the brethren' at Jerusalem. St. Peter goes there as a matter of course directly he has escaped from prison, and is well known there (v.^{14}). It is a natural conclusion that 'the house of Mary' had become the home of St. Peter, and that the guest was in a sense the head of the household (cf. 1 P 5^{13}). Again, in Col 4^{10} Mark is spoken of as 'the cousin' (ὁ ἀνεψιός, see Lightfoot's note) of Barnabas (on the name, see especially Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 175 ff.), the Joseph Barnabas of Ac 4$^{36f.}$, of the tribe of Levi, born in Cyprus, a man of substance, and from almost the earliest days a leader among 'the brethren.' It is not improbable, in view of the later history, that Mark too was by birth or previous residence connected with the Jewish colony in Cyprus (Schürer, HJP II. ii. p. 221 f.), and, if we may assume that the cousins were the sons of two brothers, we learn that he was a Levite (see below, 4 (i.)). There is every reason to think that he, like Saul, was a 'Hebrew of Hebrews' (Col 4^{11}; cf. Gal 2^{12}, Tit 1^{10}).

In Ac 13^{5} we read of Barnabas and Saul that at Salamis in Cyprus κατήγγελλον τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς τῶν Ἰουδαίων· εἶχον δὲ καὶ Ἰωάνην ὑπηρέτην.† All writers, it would seem, take the last clause to mean that the apostles 'had John as minister,' i.e. as their assistant in their evangelistic work (cf. 10^{48} προσέταξεν). A different interpretation seems to the present writer to be at least possible. The clause stands in close connexion with the mention of 'the synagogues.' Further, if ὑπηρέτην were a predicate, the more natural order would have been ὑπηρέτην δὲ εἶχον καὶ Ἰωάνην. A Jewish epitaph found at Rome Φλάβιος Ἰουλιανὸς ὑπηρέτης (see Schürer, Gemeindeverfassung der Juden in Rom, pp. 28, 39; cf. HJP II. ii. p. 67) suggests that ὑπηρέτης here is John's official title—'And they had with them also John, the synagogue minister' (cf. Lk 4^{20}). The article in such a case would be omitted (cf. e.g. CIG, 9906, Ἰουλιανὸς ἱερεὺς ἄρχων . . . υἱὸς Ἰουλιανοῦ ἀρχισυναγώγου and inscriptions passim, also Winer-

3. Mark in the Apostolic History of the NT.—Mark is one of those minor characters, a careful study of whose movements throws considerable light on the relation to each other of the apostolic leaders. In the NT he stands in close connexion with Barnabas, St. Peter, St. Paul.

(i.) The first notice of Mark in the Acts is at the time of the famine in Judæa, some 15 or 16 years after the day of Pentecost. He is at Jerusalem, and Barnabas and Saul, returning thence to the Syrian Antioch, take him with them as their companion (συνπαραλαβόντες 12^{25}; cf. 15$^{37f.}$, Gal 2^{1}). It is important to notice that Barnabas, Mark's cousin, still retains the leading position (Βαρνάβας δὲ καὶ Σαῦλος 12^{25}), that as yet there is no hint of any evangelistic work further afield than Antioch, and that there the Church had not spread beyond the 'Grecian Jews' (11^{20}). Some time—how long we have no means of discovering—after their arrival at Antioch a decisive summons comes. Barnabas and Saul, at the bidding of the Spirit, are solemnly set apart and dismissed to do 'the work,' the scope of which remains still undefined. With Mark they cross to Cyprus. After work among the Jewish settlers at Salamis, they journey westwards till at Paphos they meet the Jewish Magus among the comites of the Proconsul, and the encounter ends with the conversion of the Roman magistrate—the firstfruit of St. Paul's Gentile converts. From Paphos they cross to the mainland, and journey inland as far as Perga. Here, perhaps when his leaders were discussing or had already determined upon the plan of crossing the Taurus and penetrating into a wholly new district, Mark separates himself from them and returns to Jerusalem (13^{13}). His conduct, it is clear, made a deep impression on St. Paul. What were Mark's reasons for this act of seeming desertion? The conditions of their common work, it must be remembered, had altered since he left Jerusalem with them, in three important respects. (1) The call at Antioch had inaugurated a new epoch in the history of the Church, and as 'the work' advanced it became clear that it would lead the workers μάκραν (Ac 22^{21}). (2) There were already indications that 'the work' would include the Gentiles; and that this was a new departure appears from 14^{27}. (3) Barnabas is passing into the background, and Paul is taking his place as the acknowledged leader (note the very significant οἱ περὶ Παῦλον in 13^{13}). For these new conditions of service Mark was not prepared.

(ii.) Some three or four years pass before we meet Mark again in the history. The great controversy as to the freedom of the Gentile converts had been closed, outwardly at least, by the decision of 'the Council' at Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch. At Antioch (if without further discussion we may assume the identity of the visit to Jerusalem recorded in Ac 15 with that recorded in Gal 2) there took place the events which St. Paul briefly narrates in Gal 2$^{11ff.}$. St. Peter followed to Antioch the emissaries of the Church at Jerusalem, and proved himself loyal to the concordat of 'the Council.' But the arrival of 'certain from James' wrought a disastrous change. 'Fearing those of the circumcision,' he withdrew from full fellowship with Gentile believers. His example was the signal for a general revolt. All the Jewish Christians at Antioch (οἱ λοιποὶ Ἰουδαῖοι) joined in his time-serving policy, and the pressure of their opinion seduced even (καί) Barnabas, St. Paul's old and close companion. St. Paul's public rebuke of St. Peter and (by implication) of Barnabas and the rest closes the history, so far as he has chosen to reveal it. It has an obvious bearing on the relations of St. Paul with Mark. We know that Mark was at Antioch shortly after these events (Ac 15^{37}). The three leaders with whom he was most intimately associated, St. Peter, St. Paul, Barnabas, were there already. It seems an almost certain inference that Mark had come as the companion of one of them. If so, he was among οἱ λοιποὶ Ἰουδαῖοι, who proved traitors; and his example and opinion must have been conspicuous among the influences which led Barnabas astray. We can understand that to St. Paul's mind his later conduct set its seal upon his earlier. His loyalty to 'the truth of the gospel' was more than questionable, and his influence over Barnabas was harmful. When Barnabas proposed that Mark should again be their companion, an indignant reference to his former desertion of 'the work' (15^{38}) was sufficient answer. If we realize the significance, personal and doctrinal, of the history in Gal 2, we can understand the παροξυσμός which separated Barnabas from Paul. The notice that Mark with Barnabas sailed to Cyprus immediately after these events is the last reference to him in the Acts.

(iii.) After an interval of ten or twelve years we meet with Mark again in St. Paul's letters to the Colossians (4^{10}) and to Philemon (v.^{24}). Mark is at Rome. His presence there is 'a solace' to St. Paul. In both Epistles the apostle speaks of him as one of the few whom he can call 'fellow-workers' (contrast Ph 1$^{15f.}$). The happy change in the relations between St. Paul and Mark is an important indication of the triumph of St. Paul's 'catholic' views of Christianity among the higher type of Jewish Christians. It is clear from St. Paul's language that Mark had contemplated, and it appears was still contemplating, a journey to Asia; and the Asiatic Christians had already received from St. Paul a brief message commending him to them.

(iv.) Some three or four years later, St. Paul's last Epistle associates Mark with Timothy. The words (2 Ti 4^{11}) seem to imply that the two were no strangers to each other, and that Timothy was already acquainted with Mark's movements. Timothy, it seems probable, was still at Ephesus (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 437). He is bidden to come to Rome by the shortest route (v.^{9}), and to execute a commission at Troas on the way (v.^{13}). From Troas he was doubtless to cross to Neapolis, to travel along the Egnatian Road to Dyrrhachium, to cross to Brundisium, and to hasten to Rome by the Via Appia. At some point in the journey he is to 'pick up' Mark (v.^{11}). If that point was in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, the notice is perhaps an indication that Mark had carried out his purpose of visiting Asia (Col 4^{10}). If not, it cannot be a place which is otherwise associated with Mark either by history or by tradition. To this direction St. Paul, remembering the help rendered to him by Mark in his former captivity, adds the reason of it—ἔστιν γάρ μοι εὔχρηστος εἰς διακονίαν. The last three words, as Swete observes (p. xv), 'assign to Mark his precise place in the history of the Apostolic age.'

(v.) One more notice of Mark is found in the apostolic writings. In his First Epistle, written at Rome (see article BABYLON IN NT), St. Peter sends to the churches of Asia Minor the salutation of 'Marcus my son.' This greeting makes it probable that Mark had visited some of the churches to which the apostle is writing (see above (iii.) (iv.)). It is certain from these words that Mark was with St. Peter at Rome—an important point of contact between the NT and early Christian tradition. The tenderness of the phrase ὁ υἱός μου is explained by St. Peter's early intimacy with Mark in 'the house of Mary.'

* With this interpretation, as indeed with the common one (cf. Cod. E), though less conspicuously, εἶχον = εἶχον μεθ' ἑαυτῶν. This sense of ἔχειν is common (especially in the participle) in all Greek, e.g. Xen. Cyr. iv. 2. 29—'et sæpissime Thucydides ceterique omnes' (Stephanus, Thes., ed. Hase, iii. 2616). Here εἶχον takes up συνπαραλαβόντες, v.^{25}.

4. MARK IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION.*—(i.) Mark's position by birth.—The Preface to the Gospel found in MSS of the Vulgate contains the notice: 'sacerdotium in Israhel agens, secundum carnem levita' (Wordsworth-White, p. 171, cf. p. 173)—a mere deduction, it seems probable, from Mark's kinship to Barnabas. The remembrance of a personal deformity survives in an epithet well known at Rome early in the 3rd cent.—οὔτε Παῦλος ὁ ἀπόστολος οὔτε Μᾶρκος ὁ κολοβοδάκτυλος (Hipp. Philos. vii. 30).

A reference to this epithet is found in the Latin Prefaces to the Gospel (see below), and with these substantially coincide the notices in one or two later writers (see Lipsius, Die Apocr. Apostelgesch. ii. 2, p. 327; Zahn, Einl. ii. p. 211). Three explanations of the epithet 'stump-fingered' or 'mutilated in the finger(s)' have been suggested. (i.) Tregelles (Journal of Class. and Sacred Philol., 1855, p. 224 f.) thinks that the epithet stigmatizes Mark as 'pollice truncus,' 'the deserter' (Ac 13^{13}). (ii.) The Pref. to the Vulgate: 'Amputasse sibi post fidem pollicem dicitur ut sacerdotio reprobus haberetur' (so Isidore). (iii.) The Pref. to Cod. Toletanus: 'Colobodactilus est nominatus ideo quod a cetera corporis proceritatem digitos minores habuisset' (Wordsworth-White, p. 171). It is just possible, however, that the word may refer to some mutilation or malformation of the toes, resulting in lameness—an infirmity which would be more likely to attract attention than a deformity of the hand.

(ii.) Mark's relation to the Lord's ministry.—The words of Papias (ap. Eus. HE iii. 39), on the authority of 'John the Elder,' are explicit—οὔτε γὰρ ἤκουσεν τοῦ κυρίου οὔτε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ.

Do the words (clearly referring to Mark), with which the Muratorian Canon begins, suggest a qualification of the assertion of Papias? They run thus: quibus tamen interfuit et ita posuit. It is possible that the first word has been mutilated, and that we should restore aliquibus; but see below. The Canon is in full accord with Papias if, with, e.g., Lightfoot and Swete, we take the words to refer to Mark's presence at St. Peter's discourses. Zahn (Gesch. Kan. ii. pp. 17 f., 30, Einl. ii. pp. 200, 211), however, maintains that in the previous context of the Fragment it had been said that, speaking generally, Mark was not an eye-witness of the Lord's ministry, and that then the qualification is added: 'nevertheless he was present at some (events), and so recorded them.' If the Canon was written at Rome, and still more, if the writer was Hippolytus (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. p. 412 f.), it is clear that it might embody an independent and true tradition about Mark preserved by the Roman Church. On the other hand, in the succeeding context dealing with Luke (Lucas . . . cum eum Paulus . . . adsumisisset . . . conscripsit. Dominum tamen nec ipse uidit in carne, et idem prout assequi potuit, ita et a natiuitate Johannis incepit dicere), it is unsatisfactory to take nec (ipse) as referring to St. Paul, who has been only incidentally mentioned, as Zahn is obliged to do. The writer is clearly throughout (comp. the passages dealing with John and with Acts) comparing the Evangelists in regard to the power of giving a personal witness. Accordingly, both nec ipse and idem (αὐτός) bring out the parallel in reference to this point between Mark and Luke.† Further, in the case of Luke, who was not a personal disciple of Christ, the writer notes that he was a companion of St. Paul. There was clearly still more reason for noting that Mark was a follower of Apostles. We may conjecture, therefore, that the context immediately preceding the first sentence of the Fragment ran substantially thus: 'Mark was not a disciple of Christ. But he was a follower of Paul and also of Peter. He records in his Gospel what Peter preached. But he was not continuously a companion of Peter. Some, therefore, of his discourses he did not himself hear; but at others (οἷς δέ—literally translated by the quibus tamen of the Latin Fragment) he was present, and so set them down.' On the whole, therefore, Zahn's interpretation must be rejected, and with it goes any shred of reliable evidence that Mark had part in any events of the Gospel history.

Later traditions, however, give Mark a place in the history of the Lord's ministry. In the Dial. of Adamantius with the Marcionite, a work which cannot be placed earlier than the later years of Constantine (Hort in Dict. of Christ. Biog. i. p. 39 f.), the orthodox disputant obviously has a controversial reason for asserting that Mark and Luke were among the seventy-two disciples (ed. Wetstein, p. 8). Epiphanius (Hær. pp. 50, 428 ed. Petav.) gives the same piece of information, and further tells us that Mark was one of those disciples who turned back (Jn 6^{66}). For other references see Lipsius, p. 328 f. A more interesting tradition, which first appears in a writer of the 6th cent., Theodosius (de Situ Terræ Sanctæ 43, p. 20, ed. Gildemeister), identifies the Church Sancta Sion, mentioned by earlier writers as the scene of the Last Supper, of the meeting of the apostles (Ac 1^{13}), and of the events of Pentecost, with 'the house of Mark the Evangelist.' Another writer of the same cent. —Alexander (Laudatio Barnabæ 13 in Acta SS. Jun. ii. p. 440)—repeating the legend about Sancta Sion, adds a story learned from 'the aged,' which identifies Mark with the man 'bearing a pitcher of water' (Mk 14^{13}). For these references see Zahn, p. 212 f. The idea that the young man who followed and fled on the night of the betrayal (Mk 14^{51}) was Mark, is a modern but not improbable conjecture.

(iii.) Mark and St. Peter.—A constant tradition in the early Church, reaching back to the confines of the apostolic age and harmonizing with the notices of the NT, certifies us that Mark was a companion of St. Peter (i.e. in his missionary labours), was with him towards the end of his life, and wrote the Gospel to preserve his Master's teaching. The early authorities are these: (1) Asiatic and Western: Papias ap. Eus. iii. 39 (on the authority of 'John the Elder'); Iren. iii. l. 1, 10. 6; Canon Murat. (see above); Tert. adv. Marc. iv. 5. (2) Alexandrian: Clem. ap. Eus. HE vi. 14, Adumb. in Priorem Petri Ep. (Migne, Pat. Gr. ix. 732); Eus. ii. 15 (on the authority of Clement); Origen ap. Eus. HE vi. 25. For references to later writers see Lipsius, p. 322; Zahn, p. 216. The above classification of authorities is due to Swete (p. xviii f.), who notices that 'the Asiatic tradition goes behind St. Mark's work as an Evangelist, and describes the nature of his services to St. Peter. He had been the Apostle's interpreter.'

Some scholars maintain that the word ἑρμηνευτής (interpres) points rather to Mark as the scholar of St. Peter, through whom his Master's teaching reached a wider circle, with special reference to the composition of the Gospel. This is the view taken by Zahn (Gesch. Kan. i. pp. 878 ff., Einl. ii. pp. 209, 218 ff.), who urges that Papias uses the word in close connexion with Mark's composition of the Gospel, and that no early writer preserves any detailed notice of Mark as 'dragoman' of the apostle. On the other hand, the following considerations seem conclusive for the strict sense of the word. (1) Such is the usual sense of the word (see Swete, p. xix); the passages which Zahn (Gesch. Kan. p. 880 n.) adduces, in which poets and prophets are spoken of as ἑρμηνευταὶ τῶν θεῶν, are really instances of a metaphorical use of the term. (2) Papias himself uses the cognate verb (ἡρμήνευσε δ' αὐτὰ ὡς ἦν δυνατὸς ἕκαστος) in the strict sense. (3) Irenæus connects the word, not with the writing of the Gospel, but with Mark's previous relation to St. Peter, iii. l. 1. M., ὁ μαθητὴς κ. ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου καὶ αὐτὸς τὰ ὑπὸ Π. κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκεν, ib. 10. 6 M. interpres et sectator Petri [note the order] initium evangelicæ conscriptionis fecit sic. Zahn's position is criticized by Link in Studien u. Kritiken, 1896, pp. 405–436.

The ten or twelve years which elapsed between the last mention of Mark in the Acts and St. Paul's reference to his co-operation in Rome were probably the period in which Mark accompanied St. Peter. It may well be that the help which he rendered to the apostle when the latter first worked among Greek-speaking people gained for him the title of 'the interpreter of Peter.' There is no reason why we should infer that, at least at the end of his life, St. Peter could not speak Greek, still less that he could not write a Greek letter. Moreover, it must be remembered that the word 'interpreter' may have been used in reference to Latin rather than to Greek (so Lightfoot, Clement, ii. p. 494).

* Patristic passages dealing with the composition of the Gospel according to St. Mark are not discussed here: see the following article.

† This parallel is still more marked if we adopt Lightfoot's emendation of the words referring to Luke: 'et idem, prout assequi potuit, ita posuit. Ita et a natiuitate . . .' (Essays on 'Supernat. Relig.' p. 189 n.); comp. the 'ita posuit' in the account of Mark.

(iv.) Mark's connexion with Rome and Alexandria.—(a) Rome. For the evidence of the NT see above. The evidence that St. Peter at the close of his life, when Mark was certainly his companion, was at Rome, is overwhelming (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. pp. 493 ff.). Moreover, all the early writers who mention the place of its composition speak of the Gospel as written at Rome (Iren., Clem. Alex., Eus. HE ii. 15; for other references see Zahn, p. 215), the only exception being Chrysostom (vii. 7 B), who says that it was written in Egypt. (b) Alexandria. It is remarkable that the great Alexandrian Fathers, Clement and Origen, make no reference to any sojourn or work of Mark in that city. Their silence cannot but throw some suspicion on the notices of later writers. The earliest witness is Eusebius, HE ii. 16 (on ii. 24 see below), who records the tradition (φασίν) that Mark 'was the first to found churches in Alexandria itself.' After the time of Eusebius, notices of Mark's work in Egypt are frequent in Christian literature—(i.) Greek: Epiph. Hær. li. 6 (p. 428 ed. Petav.); Chrysost. l.c.; Constit. Apost. vii. 46. (ii.) Latin: Jerome, de Vir. Illustr. 8, Prol. ex Comm. in Matth. (Wordsworth-White, p. 12), Pref. to MSS of the Vulgate (Wordsworth-White, p. 173). (iii.) Syriac: Doctr. Apost. (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 33). For other references see Lipsius, p. 323 ff. To pass to the evidence as to the date of Mark's work in Egypt, Eus. HE ii. 16 (apparently), Jerome, de Vir. Illustr., and Epiph. place his journey there after the composition of the Gospel. On the other hand, the Chronicle of Eusebius (ed. Schöne, ii. pp. 152 f., 154 f.) places his arrival at Alexandria in the first (Arm.) or the third (Jer.) year of Claudius (A.D. 41–42 or 43–44),[*] the appointment of Annianus, his successor as bishop, in the eighth year of Nero (A.D. 62–63; so Eus. HE ii. 24).[†] It seems to be impossible to reconcile these dates with the statements of the NT. If we accept the tradition of Mark's work at Alexandria, we must apparently place it either in the ten or twelve years to which we have already assigned his journeys as St. Peter's 'interpreter,' or in the period after the death of that apostle.[‡]

The legends of Mark's mission to Aquileia and of the translation of his body to Venice belong to mediæval hagiology, and lie outside the scope of this article. See Lipsius, pp. 346–353.

(v.) The Acts of Mark.—The Greek text is given in Migne, Pat. Gr. cxv. 164–170. The document has been translated into Latin, Arabic, and Ethiopic. Lipsius (p. 345) assigns it to a date between the middle of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th century. Internal evidence shows that it was written at Alexandria. It is historically worthless, telling the usual story of a successful war against idolatry, a growing Church, persecution, martyrdom. The evangelist expires as he is being dragged through the streets by an infuriated mob, who burn his remains, but are at last dispersed by a tempest. Some forms of the Acts give a detailed account of his person, clearly in part a reminiscence of the portrait of St. Paul in the Acta Theclæ.

(vi.) Περίοδοι Βαρνάβα.—These Greek Acts are printed by Tischendorf in his Acta Apost. Apocrypha, pp. 64–74. The author writes in the name of Mark, who is made to describe himself before his conversion as a servant of a high priest of Zeus. The Acts are wholly unhistorical. The local colouring shows that the writer was a Cypriot. The aim of the document is, by asserting for the Church of Cyprus an apostolic origin and the possession of the tomb of Barnabas, to support her claim to be independent of the see of Antioch. Hence Lipsius places the date of its composition late in the 5th cent., probably 485–488.

(vii.) Martyrdom.—Early writers are silent as to the time and manner of Mark's death. The statement of Jerome, de Vir. Illustr. 8 (Mortuus est octauo Neronis anno et sepultus Alexandriæ) is obviously a mere inference from Eusebius' notice of the appointment of Annianus. It would seem that no document earlier than the Acts of Mark gives the evangelist the glory of martyrdom. In these Acts, as in the Menologium of Basil, and as in the later tradition of the Western Church, April 25 is fixed upon as the day of his death. The different texts of the Martyrium Hieronymianum mention May 18, Sept. 23, Oct. 3, 7 as Mark's memorial day (Lipsius, p. 326; cf. Dict. Chr. Antiq. p. 1089).

LITERATURE.—Swete, The Gospel according to St. Mark, 1898, has a full and suggestive chapter on the 'Personal History of St. Mark.' Exhaustive collections and discussions of Patristic and other authorities are to be found in Lipsius, Die Apocryphen Apostelgesch. u. Apostellegenden, 1884, ii. 2, pp. 321–353; Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, ii. (1899), pp. 199–220. Reference may also be made to Harnack's article 'Mark' (1883) in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Of the four canonical Gospels the one which has come down to us with the title 'according to Mark' is the simplest, the most pointed and concise. Its brevity was noticed by Jerome in the account which he gave of its composition (de Vir. Ill. c. 8); and the peculiarity of its narrative, in respect of things omitted, has been the subject of comment from ancient times. On all that concerns its origin it is resolutely silent. It has no such descriptive statement as is found in the opening paragraph of the third Gospel. It neither names nor indicates its writer. It gives not the remotest hint that could put us on his track, if we had nothing outside itself. All that we know of its authorship rests, in the first instance, on tradition. The question is whether that tradition is historically credible, and whether it tallies with the contents and character of the writing.

In the ancient lists of the New Testament books this Gospel does not always occupy the same place. In a considerable number of MSS, almost entirely Latin and Græco-Latin (D, a, b, e, f, ff, q, r), as well as in the Gothic Version, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the Latin Stichometry of Codex Claromontanus, it is placed last (with the variation third) in the number of Gospels. But in the great majority of Greek MSS, as well as catalogues and lists given in ecclesiastical writers, it has the second place. This second Gospel (see below, vi.) is seen at once to have a character of its own distinguishing it unmistakably from the first and third Gospels, not to speak of the Fourth. In ancient times its special worth and peculiar features were imperfectly recognized. The tendency was to give it a subordinate place, and to attach less value to it than to the other Gospels. Even the great Augustine fell into the mistake of speaking of Mark as the 'follower and abbreviator of Matthew' ('subsecutus tanquam pedisequus et breviator ejus'; cf. de Cons. Evang. i. 4). A curious epithet, of obscure origin and uncertain interpretation, Μᾶρκος ὁ κολοβοδάκτυλος, which is applied to the evangelist in the writings of Hippolytus (Phil. vii. 30), is supposed by some (e.g. Keim) to refer to the cropped, curtailed character of the narrative (but see the preceding article, p. 247ᵃ). The oldest Commentary (not to reckon certain Homilies supposed to belong to Jerome; cf. Anecdota Maredsolana, iii. 2, p. 319, etc.) which we possess on this Gospel, one ascribed to Victor of Antioch, is not older than the 5th or the 6th cent. (Harnack, Gesch. d. altchr. Lit. i. p. 389; Hort, Notes, p. 34; Burgon, Twelve Last Verses of St. Mark, p. 272, etc.). The author of that compilation states that he had entirely failed to find any commentary on Mark, although there were many expositions of Matthew and John, and not a few also of Luke (cf. Swete, Gospel acc. to St. Mark, p. xxix). And for a considerable period, as various things go to show, this Gospel was less regarded and less used than the others. One reason for this may have been the fact that it did not profess to be the immediate work of an apostle, and was not taken to be such. But there was probably a further reason in the difficulty which seems to have been felt in defining its proper function. How great this difficulty was may be seen perhaps by the variety of the symbols applied to it. In the distribution of the well-known evangelic figures no Gospel had so uncertain a position as this one. Each of the four symbols, the lion, the man, the ox, the eagle, was selected in one quarter or another as the best expression of Mark's distinctive place and purpose. And it may be said that, at least for the first five centuries, less was made of this Gospel than of the others, especially the First and the Fourth.

[*] The Chronicon Paschale (Migne, Pat. Gr. xcii. 559, cf. 546) places the foundation of the Church of Alexandria by Mark in the same year (A.D. 39) as the foundation of the Church of Antioch by St. Peter, adding that Mark presided over the former 22 years.

[†] The Armenian version puts Annianus' appointment a year earlier. For the emperors' regnal years see art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, i. p. 418^b.

[‡] With the belief that Mark founded the Church at Alexandria is connected the ascription to him of the Liturgy. In the Acts of Mark (c. 7) his enemies find him τὰς εὐχὰς τῆς θεϊκῆς ἀναφορᾶς ποιούμενον. According to Swainson (The Greek Liturgies, p. xxix), 'the first time that we hear of a Liturgy of St. Mark is in the 11th or 12th cent.' (cf. Brightman, Liturgies, p. lxvi).

But all is changed now. The genius of the second Gospel is better understood. Its peculiar value and its particular function in the holy quaternion of the Gospels are better appreciated. It is recognized to be of singular interest for the direct, simple, objective view which it gives of Christ and His ministry in deed and word. The spell of its vivid realism is felt as it never was before. The historical matter enshrined in it, which at first sight seems so limited as to give the book the aspect of an incomplete or abbreviated narrative, is seen to be of the first importance both in amount and in kind. The things which caused it to be less regarded in ancient times are the very things which attract special attention to it now—its shortness, its simplicity, the fact that it looks like a first, unstudied outline rather than a history, the character which belongs to it as the transcript of a disciple's notes rather than the direct work of an apostle. It is seen, too, to be at the basis of the whole problem of the origin and mutual relations of the canonical Gospels, and is believed by many to take us nearest the primitive form of the evangelic narrative. So it has become the subject of a quite peculiar interest, and engages the sedulous attention of students.

i. COMPASS AND CONTENTS.—The 'programme' of the second Gospel (Meyer) is given in Peter's statement of the apostolic preaching in his discourse before Cornelius (Ac 10^{36-40}). Mark keeps within the limits and answers to the character attributed there to the 'word published' by the apostles. He begins with the Forerunner's mission and ends with the Resurrection. The framework of the narrative and the course of events are to a very large extent the same as in Matthew and Luke. He has a brief introductory paragraph dealing with the ministry of John and the preparation of Jesus for His official work by His Baptism and Temptation (1^{1-13}); a large central section containing the main stream of narrative (1^{14}–15^{47}); and a conclusion relating to the Resurrection of Jesus (16^{1-8}). An additional paragraph gives details of His Risen Life, and a brief account of His Ascension (16^{9-20}); see below.

In the body of his Gospel Mark introduces us first to the Galilæan Ministry in the Eastern parts (1^{14}–7^{23}) and in the Northern parts (7^{24}–9^{50}); then to the Ministry in Peræa (10^{1-31}); and finally to the last Journey to Jerusalem and the closing events (10^{32}–15^{47}). The principal divisions of the narrative also have a certain order, and consist of certain distinct sections. The story of the Ministry in Eastern Galilee is given in three parts, viz.: (a) from the first announcement of the Kingdom and the call of the first disciples to the beginning of the conflict with the official classes (1^{14}–3^{12}); (b) from the call of the apostles to the rejection at Nazareth (3^{13}–6^{6}); (c) from the mission of the Twelve to the withdrawal to the borders of Tyre and Sidon (6^{7}–7^{23}). The story of the Ministry in Northern Galilee is given in two sections, viz.: (a) from the meeting with the Syrophœnician woman to the cure of the blind man, and the departure to the vicinity of Cæsarea Philippi (7^{24}–8^{26}); (b) from Peter's Confession to the second declaration of the Passion, and the words to the apostles on self-denial (8^{27}–9^{50}). The events of the last week of the Ministry are reported as they took place day by day—Sunday (11^{1-11}), Monday (11^{12-19}), Tuesday (11^{20}–13^{37}), Wednesday (14^{1-11}), Thursday (14^{12-52}), Friday (14^{53}–15^{47}).

The whole matter falls at the same time very obviously into two great blocks of narrative—the one occupied with the Galilæan Ministry (1^{14}–9^{50}), the other with the Last Week at Jerusalem (11^{1}–16^{8}). There is a difference also between the two. In the first the narrative, while always vivid and at some points full, is often compressed. In the second it is minute, circumstantial, and more of the nature of a journal. The intervening story, including the journeys in Peræa and Judæa, the words on divorce, reward, and the purpose of Christ's coming, the incidents of the blessing of the children, the question of the rich inquirer, the request of the sons of Zebedee, and the cure of Bartimæus, is rapidly disposed of.

There is more of a scheme in the second Gospel than is at first surmised. But it is a simple, natural scheme, corresponding with the earliest description which we have of this evangelist's method, viz. that given by Papias, which we shall afterwards consider. Christ's work is seen to follow a certain plan, beginning with the preaching of the largest truths of the kingdom, first in the towns in the vicinity of the Sea of Tiberias, and then throughout Galilee generally; moving on through intervals of seclusion and periods of decision; and fulfilling itself in the stated training of the Twelve for their future vocation and the final crisis. Christ's teaching is also seen to proceed by certain stages, first in the way of synagogue addresses and free discourse by the lake side or in the interior parts; then in the specific form of parabolic instruction; and, finally, in the communication to the Twelve of the deeper mysteries of the kingdom, especially those relating to the Passion.

ii. SELECTION AND ARRANGEMENT OF MATTER.—Like the other Synoptists, Mark carries us through the successive periods of our Lord's course and experience—His first popularity, with the shadow of opposition in its train; the formation of a body of apostles; the rising enmity of the ruling classes; the combination of hostile forces, and the result in the crucifixion. But he does this with a difference, which is due partly to his object and partly to his sources. He deals primarily with Christ's public ministry. He passes by, therefore, much that appears in the other Synoptists—the preliminary history, the genealogy, the circumstances of our Lord's birth, infancy, and years of privacy. He omits the greater discourses. He includes, indeed, the eschatological discourse (13^{1-37}), but he has no place even for the Sermon on the Mount, and does little more than mention the denunciations on the scribes and Pharisees. He is equally meagre in his report of the parables. Of the parables proper he records only four—the Sower (4^{3-8}), the Fruit-bearing Earth (4^{26-29}), the Mustard Seed (4^{30-32}), and the Wicked Husbandmen (12^{1-11}). He gives none, therefore, belonging to the intermediate period, and only one belonging to the later. Of the minor or germ parables also he has only about as many—the new patch on the old cloth (2^{21}); the new wine in the old skins (2^{22}); the kingdom and the house divided against themselves (3^{24-26}).

He is concerned with the acts rather than the sayings of Jesus, and especially with those which show Him in His power. He reports, therefore, a considerable number of the miracles. The instances which he gives are those of the demoniac in the synagogue (1^{23-28}), Peter's wife's mother ($1^{30.\ 31}$), the leper (1^{40-45}), the paralytic (2^{3-12}), the man with the withered hand (3^{1-5}), the stilling of the storm (4^{35-41}), the Gadarene demoniac (5^{1-17}), the woman with the issue of blood and the daughter of Jairus (5^{21-43}), the 5000 and the walking on the sea (6^{30-52}), the Syrophœnician woman's daughter and the deaf mute (7^{24-37}), the 4000 and the blind man at Bethsaida ($8^{1-9.\ 22-26}$), the lunatic boy (9^{17-29}), Bartimæus (10^{46-52}), and the withering of the fig-tree (11^{12-14}). Of these eighteen, most are of the class of healing miracles. Most also belong to the period before the Transfiguration.

In the construction of the narrative Mark appears to place some things in bold relief, particularly the crisis of the first intimation of Christ's destined death, and His various periods of retirement: His withdrawals to 'a solitary place' after the early cures (1^{35}), to 'desert places' after the cleansing of the leper (1^{45}), to the lake after the healing of the man with the withered hand (3^{7-13}), to the villages after His rejection at Nazareth (6^{6}), to 'a desert place' after the murder of the Baptist (6^{30-32}), to the borders of Tyre and Sidon after the opposition of the Pharisaic party (7^{24}), to the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi after the cure of the blind man (8^{27}), to the range of Hermon after the first open prediction of His Passion (9^{2}), to Bethany after the triumphal entry (11^{11}), and again after the cleansing of the temple (11^{19}), and yet again after the discourse on the end of things (14^{3}). The added paragraph on the Ascension also reads like the story of the last of His withdrawals (16^{19}).

While the mass of Mark's matter is also found in Matthew and Luke, there are some interesting paragraphs which he has in common with only one of the two. The incidents of the demoniac of the synagogue, the journey through Galilee, the prayer of the Gadarene demoniac, the complaint of John, the women bringing spices to the tomb, are given by Mark and Luke, but not by Matthew (Mk 1^{23-27}, Lk 4^{33-37}; Mk 1^{35-39}, Lk 4^{42-44}; Mk 5^{18}, Lk 8^{38}; Mk 9^{38}, Lk 9^{49}; Mk 16^{1}, Lk 24^{1}). While the peculiarity of Mark as compared with the other Synoptists is mostly in omissions, he has also certain additions. They are not many, but they are of importance. They include one of the parables, the Fruit-bearing Earth (4^{26-29}); two of the miracles, those of the deaf mute (7^{31-37}), and the blind man at Bethsaida (8^{22-26}); and such incidents or circumstances as the three questions about the dulness of the disciples ($8^{17.\ 18}$), the question about the disciples disputing (9^{33}), the young man with the linen cloth ($14^{51.\ 52}$), the smiting of Jesus by the servants of the chief priests (14^{65}), Pilate's wonder and his questioning of the centurion (15^{44}).

Besides these, there is much additional matter in the form of striking detail in the narrative that is common to Mark and the other two, or to Mark and one of the two. This is seen especially in such cases as those of the paralytic, the demoniac boy, the departure from Ephraim, the purgation of the temple, etc. In these Mark describes, as the others do not, the uncovering and breaking up of the roof (2^{4}); the pining and miserable condition of the boy, the question of Jesus, and the father's cry for faith (9^{17-26}); the walking of Jesus before His disciples (10^{33}); the prohibiting of the carrying of vessels through the temple courts (11^{16}).

While there are only four paragraphs (together with the opening verse) out of the 106 of which Mark's Gospel may be said to consist, that are not found at all in Matthew or in Luke, the quantity of matter proper to Mark is calculated to amount, when all kinds of additions to the common record are taken into account, to about a sixth of the book. But in the stricter sense of incidents or sayings reported by Mark and not found in any form in either of the other Synoptists the case is different. In this sense the matter peculiar to the second Gospel does not extend to more than from twenty-five to thirty verses.

In the arrangement of the narrative this Gospel follows in some respects a course of its own. As regards the connexion in which it gives the narrative that is common to the three, its two main sections differ widely. In the report of the ministry in Galilee (1^{14}–9^{50}), Mark's order of events diverges largely from Matthew's on to the story of Herod (6^{14}); after this point the disagreement disappears for the most part. In the case of Luke the difference is much less. The second and third Gospels observe much the same order, yet with some notable exceptions. The incident of the blasphemy of the scribes, e.g., is introduced by Mark (3^{22}) before the coming of the mother and the brethren of Jesus, but by Luke (11^{15}) after that; and the parable of the Mustard Seed is given by Mark (4^{30-32}) in connexion with that of the Sower, but by Luke ($13^{18.\ 19}$) after the healing of the woman with the spirit of infirmity. The visit to Nazareth which Mark records (6^{1-6}) would have to be added to these exceptions, if it were necessary to identify it with the visit reported by Luke (4^{16-32}). But, in placing the visit which he has in view at the beginning of the ministry, Luke is so far supported by Matthew (4^{13-16}); and the case recorded by Mark, which appears to be the same as is also given by Matthew at a later stage (13^{54-56}), is possibly different. In the second of the two main sections of his Gospel, from the journey to Jerusalem on to the Resurrection (10^{1}–16^{8}), Mark has generally the same order as the other Synoptists. There are some exceptions indeed, but they are of minor importance. Mark, e.g., reports the blasting of the fig-tree as witnessed the morning after the curse (11^{20}), while Matthew records the effect along with the pronouncement ($21^{18.19}$); and while Luke (22^{21}) gives our Lord's declaration of the traitor as made after the giving of the bread and the cup, Mark (14^{18}) introduces it before that.

iii. DICTION AND STYLE.—As might be expected from the measure of agreement in contents, Mark has much in common with the other Synoptists in diction. More than a sixth of his entire vocabulary is found also in Matthew and Luke, or in one of them, and nowhere else in the NT. The affinities with John are more limited. There are only 15 words peculiar to the second Gospel and the Fourth, and of these only a few are of distinct interest (e.g. ἀκάνθινος, ἐνταφιασμός, πιστικός, προσαίτης). Nor is the case much altered if we take words peculiar to Mark and John together with one or other of the remaining Gospels. There are only 7 words of all kinds peculiar to Mark with John and Matthew (ἐμβριμᾶσθαι, μοιχεία, ὄψιος, πλέκειν, ῥαββεί, σπόγγος, ὡσαννά), and only 5 peculiar to Mark with John and Luke (ἄρωμα, γαζοφυλάκιον, ἱμάς, κράβαττος, φανερῶς). The similarity between the second Gospel and the Pauline Epistles is somewhat more marked. The number of words peculiar to these writings, together with the Epistle to the Hebrews, is about 23; while the measure of resemblance becomes much greater if words peculiar to Mark and the Pauline Epistles, together with Matthew or with Luke, are taken into account. The linguistic affinity is smallest between Mark and the Apocalypse, and between Mark and the Catholic Epistles, the peculiar words in the former case being only 5 (δρέπανον, λευκαίνειν, μεγιστάν, χλωρός, χοῦς), and in the latter only 2 (δαμάζειν, δωρεῖσθαι).

On the other hand, there is a considerable number of words which occur only in Mark and the LXX. They amount to about 40, and most of them are words which are replaced by others in the parallel passages in Matthew and Luke. To the last-mentioned class belong such terms as ἀγρεύειν, ἀμφιβάλλειν, δύσκολος, ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι, ἐνειλεῖν, καταβαρύνειν, προσάββατον, στίλβειν, τρυμαλιά, etc. There are also some 38 words of various kinds (omitting proper names) which occur only in Mark, and neither in the other NT writers nor in the LXX. Among these are such terms as ἀλεκτοροφωνία, ἀλλαχοῦ, ἀνακυλίειν, ἄναλος, ἀπόδημος, ἀποστεγάζειν, ἀφρίζειν, ἐκπερισσῶς, ἔννυχα, ἐσχάτως, κωμόπολις, νουνεχῶς, παρόμοιος, προαύλιον, προμεριμνᾷν, πυγμῇ, στασιαστής, στιβάς, τηλαυγῶς, τρίζειν, ὑπερπερισσῶς. The number of words of all kinds peculiar to Mark among the NT writers amounts to somewhat less than a seventeenth of his entire vocabulary. Discounting proper names and transliterations like βοανηργές, ἐφφαθά, κορβάν, ταλειθά, κούμ, ῥαββουνεί, the proportion will be about 79 to 1270. The strictly distinctive element in Mark's vocabulary, though of great interest, is not particularly large. It is much smaller than is the case with Luke, who has about 250 ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, and also many words peculiar to himself and St. Paul.

There are certain words and phrases for which Mark has a peculiar fondness, and which are used much more frequently by him than by the other Synoptists. Of this class are these: ἐπερωτᾷν, διαστέλλεσθαι, εἰσπορεύεσθαι, παραπορεύεσθαι, περιβλέπεσθαι, εὐαγγέλιον, πρωΐ, φέρειν, ἐξέρχεσθαι ἐξ. Where Matthew and Luke have προσέχειν ἀπό, Mark has βλέπειν ἀπό; where these have Ἡρώδης ὁ τετράρχης, he has ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρῴδης; where Matthew has συμβούλιον λαμβάνειν, Mark has συμβούλιον ποιεῖν.

Mark has also a predilection for diminutives, such as θυγάτριον, κοράσιον, κυνάριον, ὠτάριον, πλοιάριον, παιδίον, ἰχθύδιον; and for accumulated negatives, e.g. οὐκέτι οὐ μή (14^{25}), μηδενὶ μηδέν (1^{44}), οὐκ οὐδείς (3^{27}), μηκέτι μηδέ (2^{2}), οὐκέτι οὐδείς (5^{3} etc.), μηκέτι μηδείς (11^{14}), μὴ μηδέ (3^{20}), etc. Latinisms, such as δηνάριον, κῆνσος, κεντυρίων, κοδράντης, κράβαττος, λεγίων, ξέστης, σπεκουλάτωρ, ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν, occur in larger measure in his than in the companion Gospels. Old dialectic forms, such as εἶτεν, παιδιόθεν, occasionally reappear in Mark. He has a particular liking for the use of εὐθύς (εὐθέως) in transitions. He has a disposition also to use full or pleonastic forms, especially in statements of time and place, and in the case of prepositions in composition, e.g. τότε ἐν ἐκείνῃ ἡμέρᾳ (2^{20} etc.), ἐκ παιδιόθεν (9^{21}), ἀπὸ μακρόθεν (5^{6} 8^{3} etc.), ἐξάγειν ἔξω, ἐκπορεύεσθαι ἔξω, ἐξέρχεσθαι ἔξω.

Further, Mark often adds to the force of his statements by the use of repeated, explanatory, or balanced expressions (e.g. 1^{42} 3^{26} 5^{12}). In construction he has a preference for the use of εἶναι and ἐλθεῖν with the participle; e.g. ἦν ἐνδεδυμένος . . . καὶ ἔσθων (1^{6}); ἦσαν καθήμενοι καὶ διαλογιζόμενοι (2^{6}); ἦν κράζων καὶ κατακόπτων (5^{5}). He is accustomed to heap participles together (as in $1^{21.41}$ 5^{25} 14^{67} etc.), and to use ἄν with the indicative (ὅταν αὐτὸν . . . ἐθεώρουν, 3^{11}; ὅταν ἐγένετο, 11^{19} etc.). He has a liking also for the use of the article with the infinitive (e.g. διὰ τὸ αὐτὸν . . . δεδέσθαι καὶ διεσπάσθαι, 5^{4} etc.). The 'historic present' is frequent (Hawkins, 113 ff.). Broken and irregular constructions are by no means unusual (cf. 2^{22} $3^{16\text{-}18}$ 8^{2} 9^{20} $13^{14.34}$ etc.).

The connexion of the sentences, again, is of the simplest, one being attached to the other usually by a καί or a δέ. There is a marked absence of such particles as οὖν. But there is considerable freedom in the use of prepositions, and there is more in the use of the tenses. The latter vary, often within the same sentence, so as to express changes in circumstance, position, or point of view (e.g. ἐγήγερται . . . ἠγέρθη, 6^{14}; ἐλύθη . . . ἐλάλει . . . διεστείλατο . . . διεστέλλετο, $7^{35.36}$; ἐξεθαμβήθησαν . . . ἠσπάζοντο, 9^{15}; cf. 5^{15} etc. 9^{34} etc. 15^{44} etc.).

The style has the constant qualities of life and force. When elaboration or repetition is needed in order to make his narrative distinct and vivid, Mark employs a copious phraseology, and adds word to word, e.g. 'he went out and began to publish it much and to blaze abroad the matter' (1^{45}); 'I know not neither understand I what thou sayest' (14^{68}); 'that sprung up and increased; and brought forth' (4^{8}), etc. But usually Mark's style is terse. It abounds in passages which are remarkable for the large amount of matter compressed within the narrowest limits. Examples of condensed yet singularly distinct narrative are found everywhere. They are particularly frequent in the earlier chapters (cf. 1^{13} 1^{27} 2^{7} etc.), but are by no means strange to the later (cf. 8^{29} $12^{38\text{-}40}$ etc.).

In much Mark's Greek is like that of the LXX, at once in vocabulary and in style. It differs both from that of Matthew and from that of Luke. It has a Hebraistic colouring. But it has less of that than Matthew, though more than Luke. It lacks the flow and the literary quality of the Greek of the third Gospel. It is the Greek of one to whom Greek is not his mother tongue, and who knows the language in its biblical, popular, and colloquial forms, not in its literary usage. The command of words is moderate, and the grasp of idiomatic expression is limited. But there is enough for the purpose—enough for simple, truthful narrative; not enough for a literary composition, but enough for the construction of a collection of notes and reminiscences.

iv. ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—From the earliest times to the present day the general opinion has been that the second Gospel was written originally in the language in which we now possess it. The testimony of antiquity is entirely in this direction. The Fathers either speak of Mark's Gospel as written in Greek, or proceed on the supposition, and betray no knowledge of any other view of it. And in the book itself there is little, if anything, to suggest aught else. It has been held by some, however, that the original language was Latin. This view found favour with Roman Catholic scholars of a former age, although it has been generally given up by their successors in our own time. It was upheld by Baronius (Ad ann. 45, No. 39) among others, and there were even those who thought that part of the Latin autograph was to be seen in the Library of St. Mark's, Venice. The document in question was found, however, to be simply a part of the Vulgate, and to belong to a Latin MS of the Gospels, another portion of which had found its way to Prague (cf. Dobrowsky, Fragm. Pragense Ev. St. Marci vulgo autographi; Simon, Hist. Crit. iii. 14; Gregory-Tischendorf, Proleg. p. 185).

It is true that the subscriptions of certain manuscripts (e.g. 160, 161) speak of this Gospel as written in Latin (ἐγράφη Ῥωμαϊστὶ ἐν Ῥώμῃ). But they are few in number and of relatively late date, not earlier in any case than the 10th century. It is true, too, that the same idea is conveyed in the subscriptions or marginal notes of certain versions — the Peshiṭta and Harcleian Syriac (Latine Romæ). But there is probably nothing more in this than a hasty inference that, if the Gospel was written in Rome or for Roman readers, it must have been written in the Roman tongue. There is absolutely nothing in Patristic testimony to support the theory of a Latin original. It is hard to believe that such an original could have perished so completely. It is true that there is the supposed parallel of a Hebrew original for Matthew's Gospel (see art. on latter). But in that case there is an early and considerable tradition at the basis of the theory, whereas in Mark's case the original, if it was in Latin, has disappeared without leaving a trace of itself. And further, if the second Gospel was meant specially for Roman Christians, the probability is all on the side of its being composed in Greek, as St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans in that tongue. Colloquial Greek would be a more natural medium of communication between the evangelist and Roman Christians than Latin.

It has also been held that this Gospel was written originally in Aramaic. Blass (cf. his Philology of the Gospels, p. 196, etc.) in advocating this view points to the condition of the text, which suggests, he thinks, the existence of a 'plurality of versions of a common Aramaic original.' But the data which he produces, though ingeniously presented, are neither numerous enough nor certain enough for the purpose. His argument in other directions is also mixed up with doubtful speculations. It implies that Papias mistook a translation for the original. It supposes that in the first part of the Bk. of Acts Luke followed an author who had written in Aramaic, and that this author was Mark. To say that Mark's Gospel had Aramaic sources is one thing, to say that it was written in Aramaic is a different thing. The theory in question makes the Mark which we have a translation, and the argument in view fails to account for the many things in the book, in its style and its strong individuality, which give it the character of a primary, not a secondary composition.

v. STATE OF TEXT AND INTEGRITY OF THE BOOK.—The text of the second Gospel, like that of the others, is in a satisfactory condition. It is attested by the Primary Uncials (including C, which gives chs. 1^{17}–6^{31} 8^{5}–12^{29} 13^{19}–16^{20}); by most of the later uncials which are of special interest in respect of age, completeness, or character of text, e.g. E, K, L, M, N, S, U, V, Δ, Π (complete, but having 16^{18-20} in a later hand), Σ (containing all but 16^{14-20}), Φ, etc.; by the mass of the cursives, among which are 1, 33, the Ferrar group, and others of critical importance; and by the best of the ancient versions—Latin (Old Lat. in its best MSS, and Vulg.), Syriac (Old Syriac, both Curetonian and Sinaitic, Peshiṭta, Harcleian, Palestinian), Egyptian (both Memphitic and Thebaic), Ethiopic, Gothic, Armenian; and by a large body of Patristic evidence.

It presents, nevertheless, not a few problems, of more or less importance, in textual criticism. The chief of these is the one raised by the existence of alternative endings. But there are others of smaller compass which are of interest. They are spread over most parts of the Gospel, and in many cases have a considerable bearing on the exegesis. Instances are found in 1^{1} (the τοῦ θεοῦ); 1^{2} (the reading ἐν τῷ Ἡσαΐᾳ τῷ προφήτῃ); 1^{4} (the point of the description of the Baptist being affected by the retention or omission of ὁ and καί); 1^{27} (the διδαχὴ καινή); 3^{18} (Καναναῖον); 4^{28} (πληρὴς or πληρὴ σῖτον); 5^{1} (Γερασηνῶν); 5^{36} (παρακούσας); 7^{3} (πυγμῇ); 7^{8} and 7^{26} (the omissions); 8^{22} (Βηθανίαν); 8^{24} (the graphic reading βλέπω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, ὅτι ὡς δένδρα ὁρῶ περιπατοῦντας); 9^{29} (the omission of καὶ νηστείᾳ); $9^{44.46.49}$ (the omission of the sentences ὅπου σκώληξ, etc., and καὶ πᾶσα θυσία ἁλὶ ἁλισθήσεται); $11^{8.26}$ (the στιβάδας in the former and the omission of the latter); 13^{14} (the omission of τὸ ῥηθέν, etc.); 14^{19} (the omission of καὶ ἄλλος, Μήτι ἐγώ); 14^{35} (προελθών); 15^{28} (its omission). Of special importance are these—the reading ἁμαρτήματος for κρίσεως in 3^{29}; the well attested ὁ τέκτων in 6^{3}; the ἠπόρει for ἐποιεῖ in 6^{20}; the puzzling αὐτοῦ for αὐτῆς, supported by ℵ, B, D, L, Δ, in the description of the damsel in 6^{22}; the καθαρίζων, attested by ℵ, A, B, L, and many cursives in 7^{19}.

The only case affecting the integrity of any considerable part of the Gospel is that of the concluding paragraph. It is also the great problem in the textual criticism of the book. The documents show three different forms for the close of the Gospel—(a) the longer form as given in TR, embracing 16^{9-20}; (b) the shorter form, ending with ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ in 16^{8}; (c) an intermediate form which runs (with some variations) thus—πάντα δὲ τὰ παρηγγελμένα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πετρὸν συντόμως ἐξήγγειλαν· μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐφάνη αὐτοῖς, καὶ ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς καὶ ἄχρι δύσεως ἐξαπέστειλεν δι' αὐτῶν τὸ ἱερὸν καὶ ἄφθαρτον κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας.

The intermediate form is found in 4 uncials (L, $ٵ^{12}$, ק, Ψ), the cursive 274 (in a footnote), the margin of the Harcleian Syriac (with a note), the margin of two good MSS of the Memphitic, and certain MSS of the Ethiopic (continuously with 16^{8}, and followed immediately, without note, by 16^{9-20}). In most cases it appears as an alternative to the longer form; but in the Old Latin codex k it is given alone. In style it resembles Luke rather than Mark. Neither in whole nor in part has it been found in any of the Patristic writings. It is probably due to a scribe or editor of early date, who found it difficult to believe that the Gospel could have terminated so abruptly as it does at 16^{8}, and there is no reason to suppose that it ever found a very extended acceptance.

The question is as to the comparative claims of the other two forms. The longer conclusion is supported by the vast majority of uncials, including A, C, D, E, F, G, H, K, M (N), S, U, V, X, Γ, Δ, Π, Σ, Ω, ב, by the cursives in a body, most of them giving the paragraph 16^{9-20} without note, 20 or more of them stating that it was found in the best manuscripts, though it was wanting in some; by all the Lectionaries for Easter and Ascension Day, by the Old Latin (c, ff, g, l, n, o, q) and Vulgate versions, the Curetonian, Peshitta, Harcleian and Jerusalem Syriac, the Memphitic or Bohairic, Gothic (in part), Ethiopic (as a secondary reading), and Armenian (in later MSS); and by many of the Fathers, including Justin (possibly), Hermas (doubtfully), Irenæus, Eusebius or his correspondent Marinus, Macarius as reporting an anonymous heathen writer, Epiphanius, Didymus, Nestorius, Chrysostom (doubtfully), Ambrose, Augustine, and most Latin writers after these, as well as by the Apostolic Constitutions, the Gesta Pilati, the Syrian Aphraates, etc. It is also urged in its favour that the competing conclusion is inconceivably abrupt.

On the other hand, the shorter ending is given in the two great uncials ℵ and B (the latter leaving a column blank), by L (as one of three endings), by the cursive 22 (with a note and as one of two endings), by k of the Old Latin (implicit), the margin of the Harcleian Syriac, the Sinaitic Syriac, the best MSS of the Armenian, and by the Ethiopic in some of its older MSS. It is also favoured by Eusebius (who speaks of vv.$^{9-20}$ as not found 'in all the copies' or 'in the accurate copies'), by Jerome (who probably repeats Eusebius, stating that the passage is found 'in few Gospels, almost all the Greek copies not having it'), by Victor of Antioch, and by the writer of the Oration on the Resurrection, wrongly attributed to Hesychius of Jerusalem or to Severus of Antioch. The lack of all reference to it in writers who might have had occasion to deal with it, such as Cyril of Jerusalem, Cyprian, Tertullian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Naz., Gregory Nyss., Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret, is also significant.

Internal considerations, too, are, on the whole, adverse to the longer conclusion. It is true that ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ makes an extremely abrupt termination. But such terminations, even where the last word happens to be a particle, are not unknown in Greek literature. It is true, too, that it seems strange that the evangelist should close his narrative with a single incident of the Lord's risen life, and that one in which we are left with the final impression of terror. But this may be due to the narrative having been left for some reason unfinished, or less probably to the loss of a leaf; while in point of fact the additional statement in 16$^{9-20}$ does not give the harmony and completeness which one expects. But, further, there is a marked difference between the two paragraphs in general character. It is easy indeed to make too much of matters of vocabulary and style where the area of comparison is so limited, and some of the alleged peculiarities of the longer ending may admit of explanation. The fact, however, remains, that in 16$^{9-20}$ there is an unusual number of words and phrases that are strange to Mark, e.g. θεάομαι, ἀπιστέω, μετὰ ταῦτα, πρώτῃ σαββάτου, ὁ κύριος as applied to Christ, πορεύεσθαι (three times in this section, and nowhere else), πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις, τὸν κόσμον ἅπαντα, παρακολουθέω, ἐπακολουθέω, βεβαιόω, etc.

The style, too, changes. It is less graphic, but more constructive. It drops the simple connexion by καί, and runs in terms of μετὰ ταῦτα, ὕστερον δέ, ὁ μὲν οὖν, ἐκεῖνος δέ, etc. There are peculiarities also in its matter. Mary Magdalene, who has been introduced in 16^{1}, is mentioned in 16^{9} as if for the first time, and gets a note of identification (ἀφ' ἧς ἐκβεβλήκει ἑπτὰ δαιμόνια). The motive of the paragraph seems not to be purely historical. The thing on which all turns in it is the passing of the apostles out of their first hopelessness, unbelief, and weakness into the certitude, the courage, and the power of faith. To exhibit this is perhaps the purpose for which it was written. In any case it is complete within itself. It is 'a condensed fifth narrative of the Forty Days' (Hort), a summary of the appearances of the risen Christ and their effect upon the apostles, concluding with His ascension, and their subsequent work.

The probability, therefore, is that these last twelve verses did not belong to the original form of the Gospel. This probability is strengthened both by the case of the intermediate ending, and by the consideration that there was an inducement to supplement the narrative so as to remove the strangeness of the shorter conclusion. In view of the peculiarities of style and connexion, it is difficult to suppose that it was added by the original hand. It must have been of very early date, however, and it is not the kind of addition that can be readily explained as a work of mere invention. It embodies a true apostolic tradition, and may have been written by some companion or successor of the original author. In an Armenian manuscript of the Gospels, which was discovered in 1891 in the Patriarchal Library of Edschmiatzin, and is stated to be written A.D. 986, the paragraph bears to be the work Of the Presbyter Ariston. It is suggested by Mr. F. C. Conybeare, the discoverer of the manuscript, that this Ariston may be the Aristion who is named by Papias (Euseb. HE iii. 39) among the disciples of the Lord, and that the question of the authorship of these twelve verses is thus solved (Expos. viii. [1894] p. 241, etc., and in Swete's St. Mark, p. ciii ff.).

The genuineness of the paragraph has been defended by R. Simon, Mill, Bengel, Wolf, Eichhorn, Storr, Kuinoel, Matthæi, Hug, Scholz, Guericke, de Wette, Olshausen, Bleek, Lange, Ebrard, Bisping, Hilgenfeld (in part), McClellan, Scrivener, Canon Cook, Dean Burgon, Morison, Wordsworth, G. Salmon, E. Miller, etc. It is contested by Michaelis, Fritzsche, Griesbach, Lachmann (although according to their method these two give it a place in their texts), Credner, Ritschl, Meyer, Ewald, Reuss, Holtzmann, Keim, Hofmann, Tischendorf, Zahn, Tregelles, Schaff, Weiss, Westcott and Hort, Alford, Swete, and most English scholars. Some (Scholten, etc.) have solved the difficulty by supposing that the Gospel had originally a different conclusion; and attempts have been made (by Ewald, Holtzmann, Volkmar, and Ritschl) to restore this hypothetical ending. But these have been more venturesome than convincing. (See the great critical editions by Tischendorf, Tregelles, and especially Westcott and Hort (Appendix, pp. 28–51); Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the NT; Burgon's *The Last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to S. vi. GENIUS OF THE GOSPEL.—The second Gospel has a noticeable individuality. Qualities which at once catch the eye distinguish it from its companions. One of its most marked characteristics is the simple objectivity of its narrative. It is not the product of reflection, nor does it give things coloured by the writer's own ideas. It has been called a 'transcript from life' (Westcott). It is in the main a simple and unqualified transcript. It has been described also as the realistic Gospel, and the description is just if it means that Mark brings things before us as they were, simply and entirely as they were, and as if one's own eye were on them. With this, too, it has the charm of a singular vividness. It is beyond the others graphic and dramatic, rich in pictorial effects and lifelike touches. This is true in some degree even of the discourses. It is pre-eminently true of the deeds and incidents. Examples are seen in the narratives of the storm (4^{36-41}), the demoniac (5^{1-20}), Herod's feast (6^{21-29}), the feeding of the 5000 (6^{35-39}), the blind man (8^{22-26}), the son with the dumb spirit (9^{14-29}), the rich young ruler (10^{17-22}), Bartimæus (10^{46-52}), etc. Often the effect is produced by a single word or phrase, e.g. the κύψας in 1^{7}; the σχιζομένους in 1^{10}; the ἐκβάλλει in 1^{12}, as compared with Matthew's ἀνήχθη and Luke's ἤγετο; the εὐθὺς ἄρας τὸν κράβαττον in 2^{12}; the ἐπέβαλλεν and the γεμίζεσθαι in 4^{37}; the περιπατῶν ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης in 6^{49}; the προσωρμίσθησαν in 6^{53}; the κράξας, σπαράξας, etc., in 9^{26}; the θερμαινόμενον in 14^{67} etc. It belongs to the same quality of vividness that the direct form of speech is so often chosen, e.g. 'Peace, be still' (4^{39}); 'Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit' (5^{8}); 'Send us into the swine' (5^{12}); 'Come ye yourselves apart' (6^{31}); 'Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him' (9^{25}).

So, too, Mark preserves notable words of Christ in the mother tongue (Boanerges, Talitha cum, Ephphatha, Corban, Abba), and delights to record His actual gestures and movements. Thus he tells us how He 'looked round about' on the men in the synagogue (3^{5}); how He 'turned him about in the press' (5^{30}); how He 'looked up to heaven' when He took the loaves and the fishes (6^{41}), and when He cured the deaf-mute (7^{34}); how He 'turned about, and looked on the disciples' (8^{33}); how He 'sat down and called the twelve' (9^{35}); how He took little children 'up into his arms, and put his hands upon them' (9^{36} 10^{16}); how 'beholding' the young ruler He 'loved him,' and 'turned about and looked on his disciples' ($10^{21.\ 23}$); how He 'looked round about upon all things' in the temple profaned (11^{11}).

Akin to this, too, is the quality of peculiar circumstantiality. Mark's is the Gospel of greatest detail. As a general rule, it is richer than the other Gospels in the particulars which go to give certainty and distinctness to narrative. It is copious in indications of time, place, number, situation, and the like. It tells us, e.g., that the swine which 'ran violently down a steep place into the sea' were 'about two thousand' (5^{13}); that the disciples were sent forth 'two and two' (6^{7}); that on the occasion of the miracle of the 5000 the people 'sat down in ranks, by hundreds and by fifties' (6^{40}); that Jesus went to pray, rising up 'a great while before day' (1^{35}); that it was 'the third hour' when they crucified Him (15^{25}); that it was 'very early in the morning, the first day of the week, . . . at the rising of the sun,' that the women came to the sepulchre (16^{1}). So, too, Mark explains how Jesus withdrew 'to the sea' (3^{7}); how He 'sat in the sea' (4^{1}); how He was in 'the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow' (4^{38}); how He sat 'over against the treasury' (12^{41}), and on the Mount of Olives 'over against the temple' (13^{3}); and how the healed demoniac preached 'in Decapolis' (5^{20}); how Peter 'went out into the porch' (14^{68}); how the centurion 'stood over against' Jesus (15^{39}); how the young man was seen 'sitting on the right side' in the sepulchre (16^{5}), etc.

'He is an author,' says Keim, 'in a flower-bedecked garment. . . . He makes the narratives more effective by the contrast between rapid progression—marked by the continually repeated "immediately"—and contemplative stillness, painting the scenery with a thousand touches, the house, the sea, the followers, the growing throng, the names of persons, the numbers of the men and of the animals and of the pieces of money, the greenness of the grass, the pillow in the stern of the boat on Gennesareth—all given with a preference for affectionate and familiar diminutives, and in the present tense' (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. i. pp. 128, 129.

It belongs also to its genius that it is distinctively the Gospel of action. It is this in a twofold sense. Its primary interest is in deed and incident rather than in discourse. It does not limit itself, it is true, wholly to the works of Christ. It gives a considerable place to dialogue, and records not a few of our Lord's briefer sayings. But these seem to be introduced mainly because of their connexion with the events and acts; while the longer discourses, which are characteristic of each of the other three evangelists in different ways, do not appear in Mark. The one great exception is the Eschatological Discourse in ch. 13. It is the Gospel of action, too, in the sense that its narrative of the deeds of our Lord is rapid, energetic, undisturbed by reflection, moving steadily and regularly to its goal. The only passage that is of the nature of an episode is the story of Herod (6^{17-29}). With the briefest possible preface it goes straight to its main subject, the official ministry of Christ; and it proceeds with that subject with a simple and rapid directness, passing from one thing in it to another often by abrupt transitions and without pausing to study form or artistic connexion. The same holds true of it when it goes beyond the function of a chronicle. It does not always confine itself to the simple report of what was done by Christ and others or what befell them. In not a few cases it records the impressions which were produced—the awe and wonder with which the crowds beheld Christ's works or heard His words ($1^{22.\ 27}$ 2^{12} 6^{2}); the eager anxiety of the multitudes to get near Him as they thronged and pressed Him, so that there was scarce room to stand, or sit, or leisure even to eat (2^{2} $3^{10.\ 20.\ 32}$ 4^{1} $5^{21.\ 31}$ $6^{31.\ 33}$ 8^{1}); the feelings of fear, sore amazement, astonishment, and the like, which overcame the disciples (4^{41} 6^{51} $10^{24.\ 26.\ 32}$). At times Mark even explains cases that he records, e.g. Herod's attitude to the Baptist (6^{19}); the terror of the disciples when they saw Jesus on the sea (6^{52}); the silence of the women (16^{8}), etc. He deals in the same way now and again with things which he reports Christ to have done (e.g. the 'knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him,' 5^{30}; the καθαρίζων πάντα τὰ βρώματα 7^{19} etc.). But all is done rapidly and by a few clear strokes. It is in harmony with this that Mark presents Christ so largely in the energy of His superhuman power. The prevailing aspect in which the second Gospel sets forth its Subject is not that of the Son of David and Abraham, in whom Matthew sees the fulfilment of OT prophecy; nor that of the Son of Adam, in whom Luke sees the Perfect Man, the Saviour for all mankind, the minister of love and compassion for the worst and most despised; nor the eternal Word, in whom John sees the fulness of the Godhead. It is that of the 'Son of God with power' (Ro 1^{4}), moving among men with His gift of miracle, and making the things of nature the servants of His grace. So Mark gives a large place to His mighty works, and exhibits Him in the majesty of His energy. He shows us how He used His miraculous power; how that power was felt and recognized by different classes; how the multitudes believed in it and made their appeal to it, and brought their sick to Him, confident that if they could secure His notice or even touch Him it would be enough (1^{32} 3^{10} 5^{28} 6^{56} etc.); and how resistless were the effects that were produced alike on people and on disciples by His wonderful works (1^{27} 2^{12} 7^{31} etc.).

Yet this is not due to any neglect of His true humanity. It is a remarkable fact that, while this Gospel depicts the Jesus of history so pre-eminently in His power, it records with literal faithfulness things which might seem so far to limit that power. It tells us how the unclean spirits first resisted (1^{24}); and how He could 'do no mighty work' in Nazareth (6^{5}). It describes with precise and vivid circumstance those miracles which were wrought not instantaneously and by word, but with comparative slowness and by the use of means (7^{31-35} 8^{22-26}). It is also rich in touches which speak to the identity of Christ's human nature with ours in feeling and in the experience of infirmity, revealing Him not only in His compassion (6^{34} 8^{2}), His love (10^{21}), His majesty and serenity (4^{37-40} 9^{2-9} etc.), but in His sense of hunger (11^{12}), His need of rest (4^{38}), His anger and displeasure (3^{5} 10^{14}), His sighing (7^{34} 8^{12}), His wonder (6^{6}), His grief (3^{5}), His longing for solitude (1^{35} 6^{30-32} etc.).

The peculiar place which the disciples have in this Gospel has also been noticed. They have a large place in all the Gospels, and much of each of the Gospels is given to the description of how the apostles were taught and trained by their Lord. But Mark appears to dwell with a special interest on all that belongs to the disciples—their intercourse with Christ, the way in which they became first attached to Him, the deepening of that attachment, the choice of Twelve from among them, the experience of the elect three, the things said and done by Christ with a particular reference to His immediate followers. So much is this the case that some would speak of it as distinctively the 'Disciple Gospel' (Weiss).

It has also been claimed for Mark that his is the chronological Gospel. But this is true only in a very qualified sense. His narrative is no more a history than are those of the companion Gospels, nor does it give events in strict chronological succession. There is at the same time a difference between Mark and his comrades in this respect as in others. Mark observes a certain order of a large kind in his report of Christ's teaching and in his account of His ministry. While he omits much, he gives what he includes in a certain connexion and sequence. The order which he exhibits, however, seems to be that in which facts came to him in the communications of his chief informant rather than that of actual occurrence. He does not follow the method of grouping words and events to the extent seen in Matthew, nor does he attempt the literary arrangement of the matter, as we observe it so far in Luke. It is by taking Mark's narrative, however, as the framework and adding to it from the other Gospels that we appear to come nearest the actual succession of events. His narrative, though not strictly chronological and by no means devoid of dislocations, is more continuous than those of the other Synoptists.

vii. HISTORICAL ATTESTATION.—The historical testimony to the early circulation and acceptance of this Gospel is sufficient. It is scantier, however, at the earliest point than might have been expected. There is scarcely any mention of the second Gospel in the Apostolic Fathers. In Clement of Rome there is one saying which looks like a reminiscence of Mk $4^{28.29}$ (1 Cor. 23), but it may come from another source. There are also two quotations (1 Cor. 15. 46) which are much in Mark's style. But they are scarcely sufficient to establish the fact of Clement's acquaintance with this Gospel (cf. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. i. in loc.). Nor is there anything in Ignatius, Polycarp, or Barnabas to point certainly to the existence of the written Gospel, although some find references to Mk 16^{14} in Barnabas, c. xv. 9, and to Mark 9^{35} in Polycarp, Philipp. v. Much the same is the case with the Didaché, the Epistle to Diognetus, the Martyrium Polycarpi, the so-called Second Clement. Nor is there any quotation from this Gospel, or reminiscence of it, in the fragments of Papias, although there is much about Mark and his writing (Euseb. HE iii. 39, etc.).

It is perhaps somewhat different with Hermas, in whom we have one or two sayings which remind us of expressions peculiar to this Gospel. Thus ἔνοχος ἔσῃ τῆς ἁμαρτίας in Mand. ii. 2 recalls Mk 3^{29}; and the sentence τοιοῦτοι οὖν δυσκόλως εἰσελεύσονται εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ . . . τοῖς τοιούτοις δύσκολόν ἐστιν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ εἰσελθεῖν points to the form in which Christ's declaration on riches appears in Mk ($10^{23.24}$) as distinguished from Mt and Lk. In Justin Martyr, again, there are several passages which have been thought to indicate an acquaintance with the second Gospel, e.g. Dial. 88 and Apol. i. c. 16, as compared with Mk 6^{3} 12^{30}; Dial. 106; also Apol. i. cc. 39, 45, 49, 50, and Dial. 32 as recalling perhaps Mk $16^{19.20}$. The most relevant of these are Dial. 88, where we have the phrase τέκτονος νομιζομένου applied to Christ, as Mark alone of the evangelists designates Him so; and Dial. 106, where mention is made of certain ἀπομνημονεύματα or Memoirs apparently of Peter, and the words Βοανεργές, ὅ ἐστιν υἱοὶ βροντῆς are given. These words occur in Mk alone of the Canonical Gospels, and there seems little reason for supposing (e.g. with Harnack, Bruchstücke d. Ev. d. Petrus, p. 37, etc.) that they are taken from the Apocryphal Gospel of Peter rather than from Mark.

We are on much more certain ground when we come to Irenæus. His testimony is as unambiguous as it is ample. He speaks of the 'fourfold Gospel' (τετράμορφον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, iii. 11. 8). He tells us both about Mark himself and about his Gospel. He quotes the opening words, Initium Evangelii Jesu Christi filii Dei, etc., expressly as Mark's (iii. 10. 6); and a number of passages are given by him in exact terms (e.g. 1^{24} in iv. 6. 6; 5^{31} in i. 3. 3; $5^{41.43}$ in v. 13. 1; 8^{31} in iii. 16. 5; 8^{38} in iii. 18. 6; 9^{23} in iv. 37. 5; 9^{44} in ii. 32. 1; 10^{38} in i. 21. 3; 13^{32} in ii. 28. 6. These quotations extend also to the disputed ending, 16^{19} being introduced thus—'in fine autem Evangelii ait Marcus Et quidem Dominus Jesus, postquam locutus est eis, receptus est in cœlum, et sedet ad dexteram Dei' (iii. 10. 6). A place in the line of historical witnesses may also be claimed for Athenagoras (Legatio, c. 33, though less definitely), the Muratorian Canon (in all probability), Hippolytus (especially Εἰς τὰ ἅγια Θεοφάνεια, Lagarde's Hippol. p. 38, where Mk $1^{7.8}$ is quoted, also Περὶ χαρισμάτων and contra Hær. Nocti, Routh's Opp. i. 80, 545, as compared with Mk $16^{17.19}$), Tertullian (on whom see Rönsch, Das NT Tertullians, p. 148, etc.), Clement of Alexandria (Adumbr. in Petr. p. 1007, Euseb. HE ii. 15, vi. 14), the Clementine Homilies (e.g. ii. 19, iii. 54, 55, 57, xix. 20), etc.

There is evidence also to show that the second Gospel was known in the earlier heretical circles, especially the Gnostic. Irenæus refers to a sect who separated Jesus from Christ, and preferred Mark's Gospel (iii. 11. 7; the reference, however, is not quite certain), and to a Valentinian School as using Mk 5^{31} (i. 3. 3). Clem. Alex. also (Strom. iv. 72, Exc. 85) reports Mk 8^{38} as quoted by Heracleon, and the statement about Christ being 'with the wild beasts' as quoted by certain Valentinians (cf. also Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, p. 177, etc.; Zahn, Gesch. d. NT Kanons, i. p. 741, etc.). References to our Gospel, especially to its last chapter, some doubtful, others more definite, are found in the Gospel acc. to Peter (on these see Zahn, Einleit. in d. NT, ii. p. 237, Das Ev. des Petrus, p. 53; Lods, L'évangile de St. Pierre, p. 64; Harnack, Bruchstücke des Ev. u. d. Apoc. des Pt. p. 33; Swete, Akhmîm Fragment, p. xl; Rohrbach, Der Schluss des Markusev. pp. 27–33, etc.).

To this it must be added that, as far back as we can trace the idea of a fourfold Gospel or the practice of harmonizing the Gospels, Mark forms one of the four. The idea of a fourfold Gospel, however, is probably of older date than Irenæus, some discovering indications of it a generation before the Bishop of Lyons (Taylor, Witness of Hermas, 1, etc.); and the practice of harmonizing, of which the first great evidence is Tatian's Diatessaron, is probably of earlier date than that work. It appears, therefore, that there is valid evidence to the fact that this Gospel was in circulation by the middle of the 2nd cent.; that by the last quarter of that century it had an established position; and that it became so generally recognized as to find a place in all the early lists of canonical books, whether of the Eastern Church or of the Western, in which the Gospels are given, and in all the great versions of the NT, including the Old Latin, the Egyptian, both Memphitic and Sahidic, and the Syriac in all its forms.

viii. AUTHORSHIP.—Ancient tradition connects the composition of this Gospel with two names—those of Mark and Peter. Much of the historical testimony, from Papias on to Jerome, which attests the early circulation and acceptance of the Gospel, also speaks to Mark as the writer, and this Mark is usually identified with the disciple of that name who appears in the NT in relation both to Paul and to Peter. This identification, indeed, has not been universally accepted. Some have taken the different accounts to point to several Marks. Hippolytus, e.g. (Fragment on the Seventy Apostles), distinguished between the cousin of Barnabas (bishop of Apollonia), John Mark (bishop of Biblioupolis), and the evangelist (bishop of Alexandria). On the ground that the earliest writers outside the NT do not call the person in question John, and represent him as the companion, not of Paul but of Peter, others (Grotius, Calovius, Schleiermacher, Tillemont) have held it necessary to affirm the existence of two Marks, a Pauline and a Petrine, and have ascribed our Gospel to the former (Kienlen). But the case is best satisfied by supposing, as most have done, that all the various references in Scripture and in tradition point to one and the same individual, especially as Barnabas makes the connecting link between Peter and Paul in the story of Mark.

The person to whom the preparation of this Gospel, therefore, is ascribed, is the disciple who in the NT is sometimes called simply Mark or Marcus (Ac 15^{39}, Col 4^{10}, 2 Ti 4^{11}, Philem ^{24}, 1 P 5^{13}), sometimes represented as having Mark for his surname, Ac $12^{12.25}$ 15^{37}, and sometimes called John (Ac $13^{5.13}$); while outside the NT he is spoken of as evangelist and as bishop of Alexandria, and in the later tradition as martyr (Euseb. HE ii. 16, iii. 39; Epiph. Hær. li. 6; Jer. de Vir. Ill. 8; Niceph. ii. 43). In the Gospel itself he does not appear, unless it be in the person of the young man who followed Jesus on the night of the betrayal, 'having a linen cloth cast about his naked body' (Mk $14^{51.52}$), or, as has also been conjectured, in the person of the 'man bearing a pitcher of water' whom the disciples were sent to meet in preparing for the passover (Mk 14^{13}). But elsewhere we see that he was a Jew by birth (Col $4^{10.11}$), the son of a certain Mary, a Christian lady apparently of some position and means, whose house in Jerusalem was a gathering point for believers (Ac 12^{12}), and cousin (ἀνεψιός) of Barnabas (Col 4^{10}). See preceding article.

In the NT the traditional author of the second Gospel is associated mostly with Paul. He is mentioned as returning to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas, after their visit to Jerusalem with the contributions of the Antioch Christians (Ac 12^{25}); as going with Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey, in the capacity of their ὑπηρέτης (Ac 13^{5}); as breaking away from them at Perga, and returning to Jerusalem (Ac 13^{13}); as causing a 'sharp contention' between the two friends when Paul proposed to revisit the Churches and declined to take him with them (Ac 15^{36-40}). He reappears, however, in Paul's company at the time of his first imprisonment, and sends salutations along with others through Paul (Col 4^{10}, Philem ^{24}). And he is referred to in appreciative terms by the great apostle in his second imprisonment in Rome as a friend whose presence he desired (2 Ti 4^{11}).

In the NT his association with Peter is quite subordinate. It is suggested in the notice of Mary his mother and Peter's reception in her house after his deliverance from prison (Ac 12^{12}), and it is implied in 1 P 5^{13}, where he is spoken of as Peter's convert (υἱός μου, however, not τέκνον μου). But this is all. In the non-canonical literature all is different. There the relation to Paul drops out of sight, and Mark is statedly associated with Peter. The tradition is both very ancient and remarkably continuous, beginning with Papias (reporting the Presbyter John, and giving also explanations of his own), and carried on by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Hippolytus, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, etc. In these writers it assumes different forms, but as regards the main points it is consistent.

In Papias (Euseb. HE iii. 39) the presbyter speaks of Mark as Peter's ἑρμηνευτής, a term which is understood by not a few to mean that Mark acted as interpreter or dragoman, translating Peter's Aramaic into Greek; some (e.g. Bleek) supposing him to have served as Latin interpreter. It is better taken, however, to express the fact that he did the part of amanuensis, committing to writing, with more or less freedom in the composition, the oral communications of Peter. The Elder further says of him that he wrote down accurately, not, however, in order (ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μέντοι τάξει), all the things that he remembered, both those said and those done by Christ; that he was not himself a hearer of the Lord, but was indebted for his matter to Peter's instructions, which were adapted to the needs of his hearers, and were not designed to give a connected account of the Lord's words (οὐχ ὥσπερ σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν ποιούμενος λόγων); and that he made no mistake, but made one thing his care, namely, neither to omit anything he had heard nor to set down anything false. It is to be noticed also that this statement defines the scope of Mark's work, or, as it is understood by Zahn and others, the extent of his dependence on Peter. What he is said thus to have written down is 'Some things as he remembered them' (οὐδὲν ἥμαρτε Μᾶρκος, οὕτως ἔνια γράψας ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευσεν).

If Justin's ἀπομνημονεύματα αὐτοῦ (Dial. 106) are taken in their most probable sense as Peter's memoirs, Justin also is a witness to the belief that Mark's Gospel was substantially Peter's. Irenæus likewise speaks of Mark as the μαθητὴς καὶ ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου, the interpres et sectator Petri, who 'committed to writing the things preached by Peter,' but adds that he did this after the decease of Peter and Paul (iii. 1. 1, 10. 6). Clement Alex. (Hypotyp., as in Euseb. HE ii. 14) enlarges the tradition, stating that when Peter had preached at Rome many who had heard him urged Mark to write down what had been spoken; that the evangelist did this; and that when Peter came to know it, he 'neither forbade nor encouraged it.' Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 5) says of the Gospel which Mark published that it 'might be affirmed to be the Gospel of Peter, whose interpreter Mark was'; and Origen (Euseb. HE vi. 25) speaks of Mark as having written 'as Peter directed him.' Eusebius himself, who has much to say on the subject, goes beyond Clement's negative position, and gives the report that the apostle confirmed or authorized Mark's writing at the request of the Churches (κυρῶσαί τε τὴν γραφὴν εἰς ἔντευξιν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις, HE ii. 15). And Jerome, who also speaks of Mark as Peter's disciple and interpreter (de Vir. Ill. c. 1), states in one passage that Mark wrote a short Gospel at the request of the brethren at Rome, and that Peter approved of it and authorized it to be read in the Churches (de Vir. Ill. c. 8), while in another (Ep. ad. Hedib. c. 2) he describes the Gospel as composed by Peter narrating and Mark writing ('habebat ergo Titum interpretem sicut et beatus Petrus Marcum, cujus Evangelium Petro narrante et illo scribente compositum est').

There are variations, therefore, in the traditions, particularly as to the time when the Gospel was written and the measure of its dependence on the apostle. In some forms it is represented as written during Peter's lifetime; in others, as composed after his decease. As time goes on, too, the tendency is to make Peter more and more responsible for it, until in Eusebius it is described as authorized by the apostle to be read in the churches, and in Jerome it is said to have been dictated as well as sanctioned and authorized by Peter. But the tradition is consistent all through in referring the authorship of the Gospel in one sense to Mark and in another to Peter. And the general view which it gives us of the Gospel is that of a composition embodying Peter's recollections of Christ's words and deeds, written by Mark from his notes of the apostle's discourses, and giving the substance of these discourses exactly as he heard them. The tradition is so ancient, so consistent in its main affirmations, and so widely extended, that only internal considerations of exceptional weight could justify its rejection. Does the Gospel as we have it, then, tally with it or not?

It has been contended by some that the second Gospel as we have it does not correspond with Papias' description, and cannot be the work which he ascribes to Mark (Schleiermacher, Weiffenbach, Beyschlag, S. Davidson, etc.). It is asserted that our Gospel is the composition of some unknown writer, who worked up into order and arrangement the unconnected notes which the evangelist had prepared. Mark's own work, it is held, cannot have been anything like a 'Gospel in the sense now understood, but something in the style of the Clementine Homilies—a κήρυγμα Πέτρου, in which Mark wrote down sayings, narratives, and teachings of the apostle Peter' (S. Davidson). Some (e.g. Wendt) have supposed that what Papias had in view was only a series of narratives, which are embodied in our present Gospel, and can be critically separated from it. And the hypothesis of an Urmarkus, a primitive pre-canonical writing, has been advocated in various forms (e.g. by Baur, Köstlin, S. Davidson, Jacobsen, etc.).

But there is no trace in ancient literature of this supposed Urmarkus. It has been thought, indeed, that we have a glimpse of it in a reference in Justin to a passage in Peter's ἀπομνημονεύματα, which is found only in the second Gospel (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 106; cf. S. Davidson's Introd. to the NT, i. p. 408). But this is utterly insufficient. There is no suggestion anywhere in early Christian literature of a substitution of a later writing for an earlier, or a transference of the name and authority of a preceding composition to our present Gospel. Nor is it easy to understand how a primitive writing by the evangelist Mark, giving an apostle's account of Christ's words and deeds, if it ever existed, could have been so absolutely lost and forgotten. And with regard to the evidence which is thought to be furnished by the Gospel itself as it exists, it is enough to say that it is of the most slender kind. It is urged, e.g., that a series of older narratives is presupposed in 'the account of the replies of Jesus to objections and questions, given in the two groups, Mk 2^{1}–3^{6} and $12^{13\text{-}37}$' (Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 21, Wilson's tr., cf. Lehre Jesu, i. pp. 9 ff., 25 ff.), and that in 12^{13} we have the narrative of 3^{6} resumed. This is perhaps the strongest case, but it is not sufficient to take us back to an Urmarkus. The things, indeed, which are held by some to indicate that the book as we have it is the product of a process of compilation or literary remodelling are few in number, and can all be otherwise explained.

Neither can it be said that the reasons advanced for the contention that our Mark does not correspond with the writing described by Papias, are of sufficient weight to discredit the tradition. The statement that Mark wrote 'not in order' is not inconsistent with the kind or measure of arrangement which may be discovered in our Gospel. For Mark comes short at any rate of recording things in each case in the succession in which they actually took place, and attempts no literary form. Nor can it be allowed that the occurrence of certain repetitions (such are alleged, e.g., in 6^{14} etc. 8^{28}; $4^{37\text{-}41}$ $6^{47\text{-}51}$), or the omission of some particulars bearing specially on Peter (e.g. the want of the word bitterly, which is given by Mt and Lk in their account of his repentance, and the fact that he is not named as one of the two sent to prepare for the Supper), are of much weight. Most of the reasons, indeed, which are urged in support of the position are highly arbitrary or hypothetical. The fact, e.g., that this Gospel gives the two distinct narratives of miraculous feedings is turned into an argument against its having derived its matter from an eye-witness. Much is made, too, of certain statements (e.g. $10^{2\text{-}8}$ 15^{38} as compared with 2 Co $3^{7\text{-}11.\ 18}$), which are declared to have 'passed through the mind of a Paulinist' (S. Davidson, Introd. to the NT, i. pp. 463–484).

On the other hand, the lifelike character of the narrative, its vividness and circumstantiality, and the peculiar fulness and certainty of knowledge which show themselves often in minute details, suggest that it is due, directly or indirectly, to an eye-witness. The difference between it and the apocryphal Gospel according to Peter in these and other respects is significant. There is much in it also to connect it with the apostle, as indicated by Papias and others. The great bulk of its narrative consists of things of which Peter might have personal knowledge. Peter's call, Peter's confession, the message of the risen Christ to Peter, are great turning-points in the story. There are many touches in the narrative (e.g. in $1^{16\text{-}20}$ 1^{29} 9^{5} $14^{54.\ 72}$ 16^{7}) which indicate first-hand knowledge, and that on the part of one like Peter. There are some things noticed in the other Synoptists which are unexpectedly omitted by Mark, e.g. Peter's walking on the water (Mt 14^{29}), his appearance in the incident of the tribute money (Mt $17^{24\text{-}27}$), Christ's statement that He prayed for him individually (Lk 22^{32}), the great word addressed to him as the Rock (Mt 16^{18}). On some occasions, too, his name is not given where it is introduced by Mt or by Lk (e.g. 7^{17}, cf. Mt 15^{15}; 14^{13}, cf. Lk 22^{8}).

The silence of this Gospel in matters honourable to Peter has been commented on from the time of Eusebius (Dem. Evang. iii. 5) onwards, and explanations of most of these cases of suppression may be suggested. On the other hand, there are reports of incidents which would come most naturally from Peter, and there are suggestive occasions on which Peter is introduced in this Gospel, and only in it. It is only Mark who records, e.g., that 'Simon and they that were with him followed after' Jesus when He departed into a solitary place at the beginning of His ministry (1^{36}); that he called Christ's attention to the withered fig-tree (11^{21}); that with his brother and the sons of Zebedee he questioned Jesus on the Mount of Olives about the destruction of the temple (13^{3}). It may be added that a comparison of the narratives which we have of the three scenes at which only Peter and James and John were present, the raising of the daughter of Jairus, the Transfiguration, and the Agony, will show that the versions given in the second Gospel have peculiar details and distinctive features which suggest not only that the writer had more immediate knowledge than Matthew and Luke, but that he had it from Peter. A certain likeness has also been observed between Mark and Peter in respect of style. Peter's First Epistle has at certain points a vividness that recalls Mark's way. His discourses as given in Acts show still more of the realistic faculty that is characteristic of Mark. It is noticed, e.g., that there is much the same wealth of picturesque detail in the account of the cripple healed by Peter (Ac 3^{1-11}) as in one of Mark's narratives (see Farrar, The Messages of the Books, p. 61).

The phenomena of the Gospel, therefore, are not inconsistent with its Marco-Petrine origin. Of themselves they are quite insufficient to lead us to definite conclusions as to the authorship. But they are in harmony, on the whole, with the account of the composition of the second Gospel, which has come down to us from the 2nd century.

ix. SOURCES.—The chief source of the second Gospel is those discourses of Peter of which tradition speaks. Most of its matter looks like the apostle's reminiscences as transcribed and put together in a connected but unstudied way. This is most evidently and continuously the case with the first great section of the Gospel,—the narrative of the Galilæan ministry. It is the case also with the short intermediate section dealing with the Judæan and Peræan journeys, though the indications of particular acquaintance with dates, localities, and circumstances are somewhat fewer. And in the second main section, the narrative of the Passion, we have much the same features as in the first, with a greater fulness of statement, and with more of the element of discourse.

These Petrine reminiscences, however, will not account for all that is in the Gospel. The difference between the two main divisions in style and proportion, the more compressed character of the narrative in the former, the greater fulness and variety in the latter, the different treatment of discourse and the like, can scarcely be accounted for simply by the difference in the subjects. They seem to point to the employment now and again of other sources. There are some things which are due probably to Mark himself, such as the explanations about the Jewish washings ($7^{3.4}$), the comment on Christ's word regarding defilement—'This he said, making all meats clean' (7^{19}), and the incident of the young man ($14^{51.52}$). The long eschatological discourse in ch. 13 seems to require for its explanation a written source (cf. especially 13^{14}). There are some paragraphs, too, which are of so distinct a style as to point to dependence on another source, perhaps a written document. To these belong in particular the episode of Herod in ch. 6 and the opening of ch. 14.

It is difficult to say whether the Gospel owes any part of its matter to an editorial hand. It is most difficult to determine whether the Logia must be reckoned among its sources. Some, especially Weiss and Titius (the latter in the Theologische Studien Herrn Prof. D. Bernhard Weiss zu seinem 70 Geburtstage dargebracht), are of opinion that its contents cannot be explained without the assumption of some written source such as the Logia. There are passages occupied with discourse or conversation, it is held, which cannot be referred to independent oral tradition (e.g. 3^{23-29} 6^{7-11} $10^{29-31.42-45}$). The opening quotations ($1^{2.3}$), the secondary form of the voice from heaven at Christ's baptism (1^{11}), the account of the Temptation ($1^{12.13}$), and other things of a similar kind, it is argued by Weiss, indicate acquaintance with an earlier writing, and that writing can only have been the original apostolic source to which the other Synoptists are indebted. On the other hand, it is to be noticed that Mark, who is usually sparing in his report of Christ's sayings, is now and again fuller than Mt and Lk in the matter of Christ's private instructions to the Twelve, and that in Mk there is only one instance of a doublet proper (9^{35} with $10^{43.44}$; cf. Hawkins' Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 73, 81, 178). These things rather tell against the idea of a written source additional to Mark's notes of Peter's reminiscences. At the most, the debt to the Logia can only be very limited, and the influence of such a source very occasional. But in a few passages, and especially in ch. 13, these may be recognized.

x. RELATION TO MATTHEW AND LUKE.—While the three Synoptical Gospels cover for the most part the same field, and have also a considerable measure of agreement, especially in their latter portions, in the arrangement of events, they have also notable differences in the amount, distribution, and connexion of their matter. Mk wants much that is found either in Mt or in Lk. Such sections, e.g., of Mt as chs. 1–2. 5–7, and of Lk such parts as chs. 1–2. 9^{51}–18^{14}, are entirely, or almost entirely, unrepresented in Mk. On the other hand, Mk has a small proportion of matter not found either in Mt or in Lk—amounting to about fifty verses. He has also a certain proportion of matter which is found either in Mt and not in Lk, or in Lk and not in Mt. Omitting the opening verse and the disputed conclusion, reckoning the second Gospel to consist of 106 sections, and deducting 5 as wholly peculiar to Mk, the result is that 93 are common to Mk and Mt and 8 not found in Lk, while 81 are common to Mk and Lk and 10 not found in Mt (Swete, Gospel acc. to St. Mark, p. lxiii).

Tried, again, by the test of characteristic words and phrases, and defining these as words and phrases which occur at least three times in Mk, and are not found at all in Mt and Lk, or occur in Mk oftener than in Mt and Lk together, Mk is seen to contain a comparatively small proportion of such—only some 37 in all; while in Mt the number is about 140, and in Lk about 86 (Hawkins, Horæ Synop. pp. 1–12). In arrangement, too, Mk differs considerably, as we have seen, from Mt and Lk—more especially from Lk—in the arrangement of the common matter on to the end of the ninth chapter; while from this point onwards there is general agreement, the main departures being in the cases of the withering of the fig-tree and the exposure of Judas.

But it has also to be noticed that in not a few passages, some brief and others of greater length, the second Gospel shows remarkable coincidences in word and phrase with Mt or with Lk. These are seen, e.g., in Mk $4^{3.4}$, Mt $13^{3.4}$; Mk $4^{5-9.19}$, Mt $13^{5-9.22}$; Mk 8^{27}–9^{1}, Mt 16^{13-28}; Mk 9^{2-9}, Mt 17^{1-10}; Mk $1^{24.25}$, Lk $4^{34.35}$; Mk $3^{4.5}$, Lk $6^{9.10}$; Mk 10^{14-19}, Lk 18^{16-20}. There are certain parts, again, in which Mk exhibits verbal agreement partly with Mt and partly with Lk, as, e.g., Mk 1^{40-44}, Mt 8^{2-4}, Lk 5^{12-16}; Mk 2^{13-22}, Mt 9^{9-17}, Lk 5^{27-39}. In what relation, therefore, does the second Gospel stand to these others? Is it independent of both and prior to them? Or does it occupy an intermediate position? Or is it dependent on both and posterior to them?

Ancient tradition is not in favour of the priority of Mk. It generally regards Mt as the first of the Gospels. Clement Alex. (Euseb. HE vi. 14) gives the tradition regarding the order of the Gospels. He reports it, according to Eusebius, as 'derived from the oldest presbyters,' and as being to the effect that the Gospels which contain the genealogies were written first. Augustine regarded Mk as dependent on Mt (de Cons. Evang. i. 2). And many in modern times have held Mk to be later than Mt, or than both Mt and Lk. Griesbach (Opusc. Acad. ii. p. 358, etc.) propounded the hypothesis that the second Gospel was derived from the first and third, partly by combination, and in larger measure by abridgment. In this he has been followed, with minor modifications, by Fritzsche, de Wette, Baur, Bleek, Delitzsch, Köstlin, Kahnis, and many more. In some cases Griesbach's view is followed, but with the additional supposition of a third written source, a proto-Mark (S. Davidson, etc.).

The arguments in support of the theory of Mk's dependence and posteriority are taken so far from the witness of tradition already referred to; from general considerations, such as the improbability that a Roman Gospel would precede a Palestinian; and from the evidence of quotations in ancient Christian literature, the attempt being made (but with doubtful success) to show that the earliest citations from the Gospels, particularly in writings like the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews, presuppose Mt and Lk, but not Mk. But the main arguments are based upon an analysis of the Gospel itself. It is held to be improbable that a Gospel which contains so little of the discourses of our Lord should be the earliest, and this improbability is thought to be confirmed by an examination of the contents of Mk, which discovers, it is held, many evidences of dependence, condensation, and alteration. Cases of incompleteness, obscurity, incongruous combination, and the like, are said to exist, which are explained, it is asserted, by haste, inattention, or lack of discernment in drawing from Mt and Lk. But surely incongruities of that kind are more likely to disappear than to persist when a writer is not first in the field and has the opportunity of consulting previous authorities.

Most of the instances, too, come to little. Why should it be necessary to suppose, e.g., that when Mk (5^{15}) speaks of the demoniac as 'clothed,' he must have Lk's statement in view that 'he ware no clothes' (Lk 8^{27})? Or why should the centurion's cry, 'Truly this was a Son of God,' in Mark's record (15^{39}), presuppose that the evangelist had before him Matthew's statement about the earthquake, the rending of the rocks, and the opening of the graves? Those peculiarly graphic descriptions, which are usually taken to indicate Mark's originality, are in many cases (e.g. 5^{1-17} 7^{24} etc.) strangely interpreted as due to pragmatism, design, reflectiveness,—things suggestive of dependence and comparative lateness. For reasons which are not easy to grasp, the historical, geographical, and archæological explanations in such passages as 2^{26} 7^{26} 8^{10} etc., are supposed to betray the secondary character of Mark. But it is entirely to misunderstand these to speak of them as 'unimportant, prosaic, unsuitable, and trifling' (S. Davidson, Intr. to NT, i. 494).

Opinion, however, has gone more and more in the other direction. The independence and priority of Mk have been accepted by some (e.g. Ritschl) who originally held the other view; and scholars of different tendencies (Weisse, Wilke, Lachmann, Reuss, Thiersch, Ewald, Volkmar, Holtzmann, Schenkel, Weizsäcker, Weiss, Meyer, etc., and most English authorities) have been led, though not always in the same way, to the common conclusion that Mk is the most primitive of the Gospels. It is also very generally held that our second Gospel, or a source corresponding substantially to it, forms the basis of the first and third Gospels.

Many considerations, not a few of them of great force, support this conclusion. The peculiar freshness and realism of the second Gospel, the vividness of its descriptions, its liveliness even in dialogue, its precision and circumstantiality in its notices of time, place, custom, situation, and the like, and the simple objectivity of its narrative, are not consistent with the idea that it is the laboured work of an epitomizer (as Augustine supposed), or of a compiler who produces his composition by selecting, curtailing, and combining. These are characteristics that speak of originality and priority. Nor is it easy to understand why a writer should have set himself to the task of constructing out of two larger Gospels, which nevertheless were neither of them very large, a smaller Gospel, following much the same plan, and having very little new matter by which to justify itself.

Further, if Mark had Mt and Lk before him, the use he has made of them is strange. His selection of matter is puzzling. An epitomist or a constructor of abstracts is expected to cultivate brevity. But Mk does not always do that. In many cases where he reports the same incidents as Mt or Lk his narrative gets enrichments peculiar to itself. Sometimes, too, we should have to suppose him preferring the fuller version of Lk to the briefer version of Mt. And why should he omit such passages as Mt 9^{27-31} 12^{22} etc., or 14^{28-32} 17^{24-37}, where Peter is introduced, and so much of the richest matter of Lk, while he takes over short and less significant sections, such as $6^{12.13}$, cf. Lk 9^{6}; 6^{30} etc., cf. Lk 9^{10} etc.; 9^{38-41}, cf. Lk $9^{49.50}$ etc.?

It is to be noted, also, that Mk preserves his distinctive character all through, and does not owe anything that is peculiar either to Mt or to Lk. Nor do the cases in which Mk is held to give the clearest evidence of dependence on the other Synoptists stand the test of a careful examination. Much is made, e.g., of Mk's tendency to adopt at points a copious narration and a twofold method of expression. This is explained by supposing him to have borrowed now from the one and now from the other. But it is found that these ways of writing are not confined to passages which might be regarded as extracts, but are generally characteristic of Mk. Not a few cases of agreement with Mt or with Lk, again, are thought to be best explained as the results of the carrying out of Mk's purpose to omit the longer discourses. But there are cases (e.g. 6^{56} 9^{40}) where Mk quotes Lk without the occasion created by a discourse; and there are paragraphs, such as those where the Sermon on the Mount (1^{21} etc.) and certain parables (4^{35} etc.) might come in, where the selection of verses cannot be explained by the mere wish to pass over these discourses. In short, the procedure which Mk must be supposed to have followed in these passages and in great parts of his narrative becomes incredible. He is made to leap from Mt to Lk and from Lk to Mt, taking a verse now from one and now from the other, and mixing up his borrowings in a way that can only discredit the hypothesis.

xi. PURPOSE.—The second Gospel gives no such declaration of its aim and intention as is found in the third and the fourth (Lk 1^{1-3}, Jn 20^{31}). But that its object was a simple, practical one, appears to be borne on its face. More subtle meanings, however, have been read into its story. That it was composed with a specifically dogmatic purpose, and that in the choice and presentation of its material it was ruled by that purpose throughout, was the contention of Baur and his school. The Tübingen critics dealt with it as a Tendency-writing constructed with the view of mediating between two antagonistic parties in the Church, and effecting their reconciliation. In harmony with their idea of the rise of the Catholic Church and the relation of the NT writings to that event, they explained the second Gospel as a neutral composition, prepared on the principle of taking over from Mt nothing that would offend Gentile or Pauline Christians, and from Lk nothing that would offend Jewish or Petrine Christians (so, too, Schwegler, Köstlin, etc.). Even the choice of the name given to the professed author was supposed to point to this, Mark being associated in the earliest literature both with Peter and with Paul. The same general idea was put by Hilgenfeld in the particular form of a purpose to mediate between the Jewish-Christian Matthew and the Pauline Luke.

Pfleiderer, again, takes this Gospel to be the product of Pauline influences adapted to mediating uses. He thinks the opening sentence which speaks of the 'Gospel,' the summary of the preaching of Jesus in terms of repentance and belief (1^{15}, cf. Gal 3^{26} 5^{6}), and other things in what follows, run in terms of Pauline ideas and expressions; that the recital of the wonderful works and the polemical discourses of Jesus is so put as vividly to contrast the free spirit of the Gospel with the narrow legalism of Judaism; and that the accounts given of the lack of spiritual discernment on the part of the disciples (Mk $9^{12.\ 32}$, cf. 2 Co 4^{4} $5^{16.\ 17}$, Gal 6^{12}), the lack of power on their side to expel evil spirits, while it was possessed by one who did not follow in their company (Mk $9^{18.\ 19.\ 38.\ 39}$, cf. 1 Co 12^{3} $15^{9.\ 10}$, 2 Co $12^{11.\ 12}$, Gal 2^{6} 3^{5}), and similar things which appear prominently in Mk's record, are the 'Pauline reply to the glorification of the Twelve in the Apocalypse at the cost of the Apostle to the Heathen' (Hibbert Lectures, pp. 170–177). Thus the second Gospel is made a Pauline writing, connected with the Roman Church, and the product of the movement in behalf of a reconciliation between Paulinism and Jewish Christianity in which that Church took an early and leading part.

In the hands of Baur himself and his original followers, the purpose ascribed to Mk was connected with the place given to Mk as dependent on Mt and Lk. With the disproof of the latter position the situation is materially altered, and important members of the Tübingen school have broken away from Baur's presentation of the case. Hilgenfeld and Holsten deny that Mk can be later than Lk. Volkmar admitted that it cannot be later than Mt any more than Lk. Hilgenfeld finds in it a mild Jewish Christianity; Holsten and Volkmar discover in it a sharp Paulinism. Pfleiderer, too, who attempts to put a new complexion on the mediating purpose, has respect for the ancient tradition, but reads Mk through Paul. Apart, however, from these differences, the Tübingen theory in all its forms involves an interpretation of many passages of the Gospel which is in a high degree fanciful and artificial. It allegorizes freely in dealing with the narrative. Even in the hands of Pfleiderer Mk's reports of Christ's announcements of His death and resurrection become a 'strong hyperbole,' and his account of the transfiguration is regarded as a 'hieroglyphic'; while Peter's words about the building of three tabernacles (Mk 9^{5} etc.) are an expression of the 'desire to see the transient and the permanent, the old and the new, the letter and the spirit associated for all time' (Hibbert Lect. p. 176). The theory reads into the narrative references to divisions in the Church, and allusions to the condition of things in the post-apostolic age, which the common eye cannot see there. It does violence to the simple, natural, descriptive, reporting character of the record, and puts a strained meaning on Christ's words regarding the Law, His Messiahship, His Mission, the Sabbath, and much else.

A didactic purpose of another kind has also been attributed to the Gospel. It is understood to have been written with a view to the effect which the delay of Christ's Second Coming might have on the primitive Church. The hope of that event was waning. It was necessary to reawaken it, and to secure Christians against the loss of faith and courage. With this object the second Gospel was composed, Christ's life on earth being so set forth as to show that in it, 'apart from His glorious Return, Jesus has sufficiently attested the Messianic character of His Mission' (so Weiss, Man. of Introd. to the NT, § 46, 7). But even this is to ascribe too much art and didactic design to Mk. To give witness to Christ as the Messiah, no doubt, was in the purpose of Mk as in that of the other Synoptists. But beyond this Mk has no other object than to tell a simple story of things as they happened, and for the most part as Peter reported them to have been seen and heard.

xii. DESTINATION.—So far as historical testimony bears on the destination of the Gospel, it points to Gentile readers. That is the inference from the terms in which Mk is spoken of by Irenæus (adv. Hær. iii.), Clement Alex. (Euseb. HE vi. 14), Jerome (de Vir. Ill. c. 8), etc. The way in which Rome is connected by some of the Fathers (e.g. Clement Alex. and Jerome) with the request that Mk should write a Gospel, implies that it was also understood to have been written for Roman Christians in particular. The internal evidence amply sustains the former position, but leaves the latter uncertain. The existence of a number of Latinisms in Mk is not enough to prove Roman readers to have been specially in view. For while Latinisms occur in larger measure in Mk than in the others, they are not absolutely peculiar to it. Far less can this definite destination be inferred from such alleged peculiarities of its narrative as the reduction of coins to the Roman quadrans (12^{42}), its reference to the Roman practice of divorce, or the fact that it takes it for granted that the readers knew Pilate.

The locality of those addressed is not definitely indicated. But that they were Gentile Christians appears from the fact that Aramaic terms, which would be strange to Gentiles, are interpreted, and that Jewish customs, localities, seasons, etc., with which Gentiles could not be presumed to be familiar, are explained. Instances of the former are seen in βοανηργές (3^{17}), ταλιθὰ κούμ (5^{41}), κορβάν (7^{11}), ἐφφαθά (7^{34}), ἀββά (14^{36}), ἐλωΐ, ἐλωΐ, λαμὰ σαβαχθανεί (15^{34}), as also in Βαρτιμαῖος (10^{46}). To the latter class belong the statements on the Jewish washings ($7^{3.\ 4}$) and on what was done on 'the first day of unleavened bread' (14^{2}); the interpretation of 'defiled' or 'common' as 'unwashen' (7^2); the explanation of the λεπτὰ δυό (12^{42}); and the descriptions of the Mount of Olives as κατέναντι τοῦ ἱεροῦ (13^3), of the παρασκευή or 'Preparation' as 'the day before the Sabbath' (προσάββατον, 15^{42}), etc.

Certain suggestive omissions and insertions may also form part of the same case, e.g. the omission of the genealogies, the passing over of the limitations put upon the mission of the apostles according to Mt 10^5, and the insertion (only in Mk) of the πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν in 11^{17}. The way in which the Jewish law passes into the background and the limited use of the OT have also their significance. Mk himself never quotes the OT, except once in the introductory paragraph ($1^{2.3}$; the passage in 15^{28} being of doubtful authority, as not found in ℵ, A, B, C, D, X, etc.). The entire number of references of all kinds to the OT is 67. Of these, only 7 are peculiar to Mk. The quotations amount to 23. They are generally in agreement with the LXX, with a few exceptions (those giving Is 29^{13} 40^3, Zec 13^7, Mal 3^1). With the one exception mentioned, all the references to OT in this Gospel and all the citations from it occur in reports of sayings of Christ or of those who spoke with Him.

xiii. PLACE AND DATE. — So far as historical testimony pronounces on the question of the place in which this Gospel was written, it is in favour of Rome. To this effect are the statements made by Clement Alex., Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, and others. These statements have been suspected. But there is nothing to show that they were made under the influence of the belief that Mark wrote under Peter's superintendence; and they have nothing against them in ancient tradition, except that Chrysostom named Alexandria as the place. But in this he stood alone, his statement having no support even on the part of Alexandrian writers. The only other place which has been suggested is Antioch (so Storr). But the suggestion is founded on an uncertain inference from Mk 15^{21} and Ac 11^{20}.

The idea has been mooted that there may have been a publication of the Gospel both in Rome and in Alexandria (R. Simon, Lardner, Eichhorn). There are, it is true, one or two passages in the Fathers which bring the composition of the Gospel and a mission of the evangelist to Egypt or to Alexandria in particular together. Eusebius, e.g., expresses himself thus: τοῦτον δὲ Μᾶρκον, πρῶτον φασὶν ἐπὶ τῆς Αἰγύπτου στειλάμενον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ὃ δὴ καὶ συνεγράψατο κηρύξαι, ἐκκλησίαις τε πρῶτον ἐπὶ αὐτῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας συστήσασθαι (HE ii. 16); and Jerome gives it even more explicitly, thus: 'assumto itaque evangelio quod ipse confecerat perrexit Ægyptum, et primus Alexandriæ Christum annuntians, constituit ecclesiam,' etc. (de Vir. Ill. c. 8; cf. also Epiph. Hær. ii. e. 1). But the passages do not imply that the Gospel was written or published at Alexandria. Rome, therefore, remains the only place with any claim on our attention so far as ancient tradition goes, and that Mk was in Rome with Paul appears from the NT itself (Col 4^{10}, Philem ^{24}). Whether it can be said that the NT represents Mk as in Rome also along with Peter, depends on the interpretation of ἐν Βαβυλῶνι in 1 P 5^{13}.

As the Gospel itself gives no certain indication of its date, opinions have differed greatly on the subject. They have been largely influenced by the views which scholars have taken of the purpose of the Gospel and of Mk's relation to the other Gospels. Those who have seen in it a Tendency-writing composed with a view to the harmonizing of two opposite parties in the Church, have naturally placed it very late. Baur himself put it far within the 2nd cent., our present Gospels having been assigned by him to somewhere between A.D. 130 and A.D. 170.

Those, too, who deny that Papias' statements refer to our Mk, and believe in the existence of an earlier and simpler Mk, naturally assign our Gospel to a comparatively late date. Dr. Samuel Davidson, e.g., thinks A.D. 120 is as near the true time as we can get. Those who hold it posterior to Mt and Lk (Griesbach, etc.), or posterior at least to Mt (Hilgenfeld, etc.), put it at various dates after the destruction of Jerusalem. Volkmar referred it to A.D. 73. Hilgenfeld himself ascribes it to Domitian's time; Keim brings it down to about A.D. 115-120; Köstlin, distinguishing between two Marks, refers the earlier one to A.D. 65-70, and our present Gospel to the first decade of the 2nd cent. On the other hand, some have attributed to it a very early date. Theophylact, e.g., and others place it some 10 years after Christ's death. The subscriptions of many manuscripts, both uncial and cursive, assign it to 10 or 12 years after the Ascension (cf. Harnack, Chronologie, pp. 70, 124). Schenkel refers it to A.D. 45-58; Hitzig, to A.D. 55-57.

The data available for the determination of the time of composition are limited and uncertain. The Paschal Chronicle places the Gospel at A.D. 40, and Eusebius in his Chronicon puts it in the third year of Claudius (A.D. 43). Irenæus and Clement Alex. both represent it as written after Peter's arrival in Rome, which might be early in A.D. 63. But they differ in that Clement speaks of it as composed while Peter was alive, whereas Irenæus describes it as published after the death of Peter and Paul.

Of the various historical testimonies, that of Irenæus appears to be both the most definite and the most credible. Doubt has been cast upon it. Some allow it to be nothing more than an inference from the statement made by the author of the Second Epistle of Peter (1^{15}) regarding his purpose to 'have these things in remembrance' after his decease (Fritzsche, Hug, Eichhorn). Others suspect it as if it were more doctrinal than historical (Weizsäcker). But these objections are not of serious weight, and the difference between Irenæus and Clement on the one point is neither sufficient to discredit the whole tradition, nor large enough to affect by more than a few years the indication of date which we get from tradition.

The internal evidence points on the whole to the same approximate period. There are things indeed in the Gospel which are thought to point to a later date than that suggested by Irenæus. The references to the coming of the Son of Man, and the final tribulation in 9^1 13^{24}, are said, when compared with their parallels in the first Gospel, to betray the disposition to put these events further forward than is the case in Mt. But it is precarious, to say the least, to build much upon the phrase 'till they see the kingdom of God coming with power,' as if it meant that the mighty effects of that kingdom must first be seen at large on earth. Nor can much be made of the change from 'immediately after the affliction of those days' in Mt 24^{29} to 'in those days after that affliction' in Mk 13^{24}. The use of the word εὐαγγέλιον in 1^1 is taken to be another sign of a late date, the term being supposed to mean there 'gospel history.' But it may mean simply the 'glad tidings' or announcement of the promised Messiah. Internal considerations of this kind are altogether uncertain and inadequate. Nor do they gain much when it is urged in addition that it is antecedently improbable that any Gospel in the form of a regular, finished, written record could have been produced before the destruction of Jerusalem.

Much turns upon the view taken of the eschatological passages. The parable of the fruit-bearing earth (4^{26-29}) has been placed alongside these, and has been strangely regarded (by Weizsäcker) as an indication that the Gospel was composed after the destruction of Jerusalem. But the impression produced by the words on the end in ch. 13 (especially vv.$^{13. 14. 24. 30. 33}$) is different. They naturally suggest that the end as yet was only in prospect, and there is no passage which clearly means or certainly suggests that the fall of Jerusalem and the temple was an accomplished event. It is reasonable to suppose that, if so great a catastrophe in Jewish history had taken place within a recent or a comparatively recent period, there would have been indications of it in less obscure forms in the earliest of the Gospels. There are also occasional expressions, such as the reference to the presentation of the shewbread as if it were an existing custom (2^{26}), which imply rather that the city and temple were still standing. And there are others which are difficult to harmonize with a late date. It is admitted, e.g., that 'the recollection implied in the notice that Simon was the father of Alexander and Rufus prevents the Gospel from being put too late into the 2nd cent.' (S. Davidson, Intr. to the NT, i. p. 508).

The period which seems to be made most probable, both by historical testimony and by internal considerations, is that between Irenæus' date and the year A.D. 70. Weiss proposes the close of the seventh decade, or about A.D. 67. A date only a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, perhaps early in A.D. 70, is as near as we can get. But where facts are so scanty and the indications given in the writing itself are of such uncertain interpretation, it remains a question only of greater or less probability.

MARKET-PLACE is in RV the fuller and better rendering for the Gr. ἀγορά, oftener represented in AV by the more general term 'market.' Its primary and comprehensive sense is that of a place of assembly, which may as such be associated with various uses. We find it mentioned accordingly in connexion with the holding of trials (at Philippi, Ac 16^{19}), with public resort and discussion (at Athens, Ac 17^{17}), with business dealings and traffic, such as the hiring of labourers (Mt 20^{3}) or the buying and selling of goods, which implies risk of pollution (Mk 7^{4}), with the sports of children in its open space (Mt 11^{16}, Lk 7^{32}), and with the passing exchange of formal greetings in its thoroughfare (Mt 23^{7}, Lk 11^{43}). It always conveys the suggestion of openness and publicity, and forms a contrast to what takes place in private or within doors. The like associations of a place of counsel, of traffic, and of idling gathered round the Latin word forum (see APPIUS, MARKET OF). The ἀγορά was probably at first simply an open space; but it subsequently in the more important towns became marked off by colonnades, embellished by statues, and surrounded by public buildings for judicial and other business.

MARMOTH (B Μαρμωθί, A Μαρμαθί), 1 Es 8^{62} (^{61} LXX) = MEREMOTH, Ezr 8^{33}.

MAROTH (מָרוֹת).—A town named only in Mic 1^{12}. There is a play upon the name of this town, which means 'bitternesses' (LXX tr. יֹשֶׁבֶת מָרוֹת by κατοικοῦσα ὀδύνας), but there is much that is obscure both in this and in the preceding verse (see Wellhausen, Nowack, and esp. Ryssel, 32 f.). The site is unknown; but as Maroth is noticed with Saphir and other places in Philistia, as attacked by the Hebrews, it is probably to be sought in the plain between Lachish and Joppa. C. R. CONDER.

Marriage (with Fr. mariage, Ital. maritaggio, and transitional forms maridatge, mariatge, from Low Lat. maritaticum) is used to describe—(1) the legal relationship of husband and wife; (2) the act, ceremony, or process by which this relationship is constituted. In the former case it is equivalent to wedlock or the estate of matrimony (Ehestand, cf. Old Eng. aéw or aé, custom, marriage); in the latter it corresponds to the marriage ceremony (Germ. Eheschliessung), or, by an easy transition, to the whole of the proceedings of which that ceremony is the essential part (wedding, Hochzeit). For the estate of matrimony the OT has no name: where 'marriage' appears in our versions the translation is a circumlocution (Gn 34^{9}, Ex 21^{10}, Ps 78^{63}), and the want was only supplied at a late date by the Talmudic אישות and זווג. The function by which a union was constituted is also indirectly referred to by some verb indicating that one takes, or gives, or becomes a wife (see Note on Nuptial Rites). The idea of the rite is apparently conveyed by the word 'espousals,' but in Jer 2^{2} כְּלוּלוֹת which is so translated really refers to the period of betrothal, while in Ca 3^{11} חֲתֻנָּה includes the whole marriage proceedings or wedding. The later word for the ceremony is נשואין or חופה. In NT 'marriage' translates γάμος, which, like the Eng. word, means both the estate of marriage (He 13^{4}) and the ceremony with its attendant proceedings (Jn $2^{1. 2}$), and also stands for the marriage feast (RV of Mt 22^{2}).

i. THE FORM AND DUTIES OF MARRIAGE AS DEVELOPED UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF REVELATION.—The history of marriage, in the extent which here concerns us, is the history of a Semitic institution which by natural development had reached a comparatively excellent form, and which, under the successive influences of Judaism and Christianity, was gradually improved and perfected. The fresher problem relates to the evolution of Hebrew marriage anterior to its contact with OT revelation; and the difficulty is to do justice, neither more nor less, to the theories which have been propounded as to the early history of marriage, and which at certain points claim biblical support.

1. OT VESTIGES OF PRIMITIVE MARRIAGE.—The scriptural account of the origin and history of marriage cannot satisfy the thorough evolutionist. According to the biblical representation, its perfect type was exhibited in the union of the first pair, upon this followed a declension to imperfect forms and sexual licence, and finally Christianity summoned mankind to realize the ideal by reverting to the divinely instituted original. But on evolutionary principles the ideal is to be found, not at the beginning but at the end —if anywhere; and the problem is to show from what base beginnings, under what impulses, and by what stages, marriage as we understand it came to be, and to be entrenched behind the laws. The theory which has served as the basis of the discussion (M'Lennan, Prim. Mar.) distinguishes four stages in the development—(1) a state in which the unions of the sexes were 'loose, transitory, and in some degree promiscuous'; (2) the system of polyandry, of which the lowest form is a kind of communal marriage, the highest the union of a woman with a band of brothers; (3) the reversal of polyandry in the system of polygyny; and (4) as the result of prolonged experience, and also of changed conditions, an exclusive monogamy. For a time this scheme was generally accepted as an assured result of anthropological science, but during the last decade it has been subjected to searching criticism, esp. by Starcke and Westermarck, and has been discredited in various important points. In particular, there is growing incredulity as to the alleged original promiscuity. Though the poverty of primitive languages in words expressive of relationships lends it some support, the counter-argument is stronger: human nature was sufficiently armed with jealousy, if not otherwise, to fight for and secure a better order from the first. As regards polyandry, it is not open to doubt that this form of union has played a part in human history of an importance which was till lately not even suspected. Still met with in widely remote parts of the globe, the custom of polyandrous marriage was yet more extensively prevalent in antiquity. The recollection of it is preserved in traditions and usages of the progressive nations of the old world, as well as in their notices of the manners of barbarians. It was doubtless at least one of the roots of the remarkable system of the Matriarchate, of which there are so many traces in ancient law, and which is still maintained by 'some score of peoples representative of all the great regions of the barbaric world.' But, important as this discovery is, there is a growing conviction that M'Lennan exaggerated. Even if it be admitted (and it is not admitted by all competent authorities) that the matriarchal system was exclusively the outgrowth of polyandrous marriage, the proof would still be far from complete that polyandry had been a universal and necessary phase in the evolution of the institution of marriage.

By the Matriarchate, maternal system or 'mother-right' is not to be understood a system in which women actually rule (gynækocracy), but only one in which they are regarded as constituting the family bond. They determine the recognized relationships, so that maternal relatives are treated as kin, while the paternal are ignored; and names and property are consequently transmitted through the offspring of the female members of the group. Such a system, M'Lennan contends, points to a time when paternity was usually, or in a great proportion of cases, uncertain. 'The connexion between these two things—uncertain paternity and kinship through females only—seems so necessary—that of cause and effect—that we may confidently infer the one where we find the other' (Prim. Mar.^{2} 126). This theory as to the origin of the maternal system is doubtless much more plausible than that of Bachofen, the pioneer in the field (Das Mutterrecht, 1861), who supposed that women, disgusted with the licentious primitive customs, rose in rebellion, procured the benefit of a marriage-law, and by their victory won an influence by which they reorganized the whole social life in their own favour. Starcke, however, denies that female descent necessarily points to uncertain paternity. 'The reckoning of kinship through the father only is a fact, yet no one has ever asserted that this is due to uncertainty with respect to the mother' (Prim. Fam. p. 18).

While Hebrew society in OT times represents an advanced stage in the evolutionary scheme, viz. that in which polygyny and paternal government are the dominant forms, the OT literature has nevertheless been largely drawn upon in the discussion, on the ground that it embodies survivals from the diverse customs of prehistoric times.

The evidence for a prehistoric stage of polyandrous marriage among the ancestors of the Hebrew stock is of no great weight. Most stress has been laid on the peculiar custom of the levirate marriage, which M'Lennan seeks to interpret as a right of succession derived from the special form of polyandry in which a family of brothers have a wife in common (Prim. Mar.^{2} 163), but this explanation is viewed with growing disfavour. Some use has also been made of the observation that the Hebrew words for brother, sister, and father occur with considerable latitude of meaning (cf. especially אָב with root-meaning 'nurturer,' thence 'progenitor' and even 'husband,' Jer 3^4; W. R. Smith, Kin. and Mar. p. 118)—the suggestion being that this points back to a time when paternal relationships were not distinguished because not ascertainable. It may, however, be safely said that these arguments would carry no conviction were it not for the assertion that an early stage of polyandry is proved to have been traversed by the kindred stock of the Arabs (ib.). And even the assertion that Tibetan polyandry prevailed among the early Arabs is only made in the modest form that it meets all the conditions of a legitimate hypothesis, and that the conditions under which this type of sexual relationship arises were actually present in Arabia (p. 124).

The evidence for the operation of the so-called matriarchate or 'mother-right' is of much greater weight, though some of the arguments are far-fetched and weak. (a) The custom of tracing descent through the female line may have survived in the distinction which long continued to be drawn between paternal and maternal relatives, with the consequence that marriage was allowed with a sister-german, a father's sister, a brother's daughter, etc. (see Bars of Marriage). From the same point of view Abimelech seeks assistance against his brothers from 'the family of the house of his mother's father,' and urges the plea, 'Remember that I am your bone and your flesh' (Jg 9^{1-5}). Agreeably to the same system, under which the uterine brothers have special duties of guardianship, we find that Laban is prominent in the negotiations about Rebekah's marriage (Gn 24^{29}), and that Simeon and Levi avenge the wrongs of Dinah (34^{25}). In the patriarchal history the family-tree of the two allied families in Syria and Palestine is worked out with reference to Milcah and Sarah (Fenton, Early Heb. Life, p. 7).* The force of much of this is indeed weakened by the obvious consideration that under a system of polygyny it is absolutely necessary for purposes of distinction to give prominence to the mother, and in case of domestic troubles to seek help of her kindred; but enough remains, especially in the matter of permitted degrees, to justify the belief that the Hebrew history contains fossil remains of the matriarchate. (b) The allegation that among these vestiges we are to reckon the so-called beena marriage, made simultaneously by M'Lennan and W. R. Smith, and since repeated with the utmost confidence, really rests on a most precarious foundation. 'In beena marriage,' to quote the former (Patr. Theory, p. 42), 'the young husband leaves the family of his birth and passes into the family of his wife, and to that he belongs as long as the marriage subsists. The children born to him belong not to him, but to the family of their mother. . . . His marriage involves usually a change of village; nearly always (where the tribal system is in force) a change of tribe.' Of this custom an example is furnished, it is said, in Jacob's marriage (Gn 29 ff.). He becomes a member of his wives' group, he buys his place by service, and Laban claims the wives and children as his own (31^{43}). What has been overlooked is that Jacob is represented as a fugitive from vengeance, who was not in a position to bring his wife into his own family, and that there is a design to exhibit Laban as a grasping and churlish person; and in the light of these facts Jacob's marriage appears to be merely an exceptional arrangement with a hard man, to which he was driven by stress of circumstances. A further proof is discovered by W. R. Smith in the phrase 'go into'—a relic, as he thinks, of the time when the husband literally left his home to join his wife, while the same practice had its visible monument in the long-continued custom of pitching a special tent for the consummation of marriage (Kin. and Mar. pp. 176, 291). More impressive is the M'Lennan-Smith suggestion, widely accepted by later writers, that it is beena marriage which is indicated in Gn 2^{24} in the words (of Adam [Del.]; of the narrator [Keil, Dillm.]): 'therefore shall (doth) a man leave his father and his mother, and shall (doth) cleave unto his wife; and they shall be (are) one flesh.' What is here contemplated, it is said, is that the man leaves the household, the family, of his birth and is adopted into his wife's kin. Now in interpreting the verse the first question which we have to ask is, What was the sense which the narrator intended to convey? And what seems quite certain is that it cannot have been the intention of a writer standing on the confines of the prophetical period to give his sanction, if not that of Adam, to a form of marriage which was obsolescent if not obsolete. If it be admitted that in the historical period 'the man is the head of the family, and of the wife, who is transferred from her family to that of the man' (Nowack, Arch. i. p. 153), it cannot be supposed that the purpose of J was to revive the abandoned and discredited type of family life. Much more likely is it that the command to leave father and mother and cleave to one's wife was directed against some loose form of marriage which does not involve the founding of a home, e.g. the so-called mota type, in which the husband's association with his wife is limited to occasional and clandestine visits (cf. Samson's marriage). There remains, indeed, the possibility that the saying 'therefore shall a man,' etc., while employed by the narrator as suitable to express his own idea, was an ancient form of words, and that as first coined it sanctioned and commended beena marriage. But it is rather unlikely that the characteristic formula of one system should have been cherished by the rival system which displaced it. In general it must be granted that in prehistoric times beena marriage may well have existed; but it must also be said that no direct conclusive evidence of such marriage can be drawn from OT sources.

2. FORM AND DUTIES OF MARRIAGE IN OT TIMES.—(1) The Form of Marriage.—The typical, though, of course, not the exclusive form of Hebrew marriage in historical times was polygyny. It emerges as an early and firmly established institution; and the interest centres in the attitude taken up towards it by the OT religion, which as Law regulated it, and as Prophecy began to undermine it.

The practice of polygyny is vouched for throughout the whole of the period in question. It appears as patriarchal usage: Abraham has a principal wife and two secondary wives (Gn 16^{3} 25^{1}), Jacob has two wives of each class (29^{23-30} 30^{4-9}). It was practised by at least some of the Judges (Jg 8^{30} 9^{2}), and in the cases of David and Solomon it comes in to account for their personal backslidings, and for the troubles and calamities of their reigns (2 S 5^{13}, 1 K 11^{1-3}). From these examples it is clear that it was customary for exalted persons to take several wives—whether from a desire for a numerous progeny, or with a view to strengthen themselves by influential connexions, or even to satisfy what were deemed the requirements of their position. But it might still be open to question whether the practice was at all general. Great importance accordingly attaches to the mention of Elkanah (1 S 1^{1}), who was doubtless representative of a large class. We are also justified in supposing that the peasant and the shepherd usually supplied themselves with two wives, or with a wife and a concubine. And this is confirmed by the implication of bigamy in Dt, which gives us a glimpse of the strained relations within the bigamous family ($21^{15ff.}$; cf. Nowack, Arch. i. p. 158 f.).

The wide prevalence of polygyny and bigamy becomes a certainty when we reflect upon the position of the female slaves in the Hebrew family. These were the property of the man, in the full sense of the word; and unless his establishment was on the scale permitting of the inter-marriage of slaves, they naturally became the concubines either of himself or of his sons. The recognized limitation of this right which is indicated, is that he could not appropriate a slave belonging to his wife except on the initiative of the latter or at least with her consent (Gn $16^{2.3}$). These slave-concubines were supplied from various sources—especially in sale by impoverished Israelitish parents, or as booty of war. The foreign origin of one name (פִּלֶגֶשׁ, cf. πάλλαξ) has been supposed to point to an extensive traffic, through the medium of the Phœnicians, in this class of slaves (Nowack, i. p. 159; cf. on the name and position of the concubine, art. FAMILY).

The measures taken for the legal regulation of polygyny pursued two main objects. In the first place, there is some evidence of a purpose to confine the practice within narrower limits. The Deut. code, voicing the sense of the calamities it brought upon royalty and the nation, forbids kings to 'multiply wives' (Dt 17^{17}). With this censure of royal licence is closely connected, as has been acutely pointed out (art. 'Marriage' in Smith's DB), the contumelious treatment of the eunuch-state, which is a presupposition of the system. But the purpose to which the law addresses itself with most earnestness and particularity is the protection of the interests of the several wives, and the amelioration of the condition of the slave-wives. The oldest code deals with the case of the Israelitish woman who has been purchased for a slave-wife, asserts her title to the three conjugal rights, and provides that if these are withheld she must be set free (Ex $21^{7ff.}$). Incidentally it refers to the wife of the Hebrew slave, and humanely enacts that the two must not be compulsorily separated: when the time of emancipation arrives, the wife in one instance follows the husband, in the other he may elect to remain with her in slavery ($21^{2ff.}$). The cause of the foreign slave captured in war is maintained by Dt. She is to be allowed a month of mourning, and her master, after living with her as his wife, is forbidden to sell her ($21^{10ff.}$). A fourth case would be that in which there were two wives of equal standing; and in this instance Dt interposes in the interest of the wife who may have lost her husband's affection, and insists that her son, if the first-born, shall receive his due portion * (vv.$^{15-17}$). The same spirit inspired, and to some extent the same end was accomplished by, certain provisions restricting the right of divorce (see below). To those enactments little was added by the later legislation, except that the ritualistic requirements may have militated against polygyny by enforcing a rule of continence within the pale of marriage (Lv 15^{16}).

* In the name of Eve, which he connects with ḥayy (a group based on female kinship), W. R. Smith finds a recognition of the fact that female descent had been the original system (Kin. and Mar. p. 177); while, according to Stade, the older tradition was that the twelve tribes were descended from twelve wives of Jacob (GVI).

A spirit of protest against the whole system, and the promise of more drastic reforms, is discoverable within the prophetic school. In opposition to existing practice, J sounds the significant note that in the beginning it was not so. According to the antique mode of thought, to say that the first man had one wife only, was as much as to say that monogamy was the ideal system; and it is no accident that according to the same narrative, which is deeply conscious of the disturbance and corruption introduced by the Fall, polygyny first makes its appearance in the lawless line of the Cainites (Gn 4^{23}). It is, further, not without significance that Noah, the second father of the human race, also represents monogamy (Gn 7^{7}). And it is noticeable that there is an apologetic strain in the references to patriarchal polygyny: the bigamy of Abraham is explained by Sarah's desire for children (Gn $16^{1ff.}$), of Jacob by the deceit of Laban (29^{23}). Of still greater importance than this class of incidents is the circumstance that monogamous marriage was extensively used in the prophetic teaching as the symbol of the union of God with Israel (Hos 2, Is 50^{1} etc., see below), while polygyny had its counterpart in idolatry. The imagery shows that monogamous marriage was felt to be the highest form, and on the other hand the detestation of idolatry naturally strengthened the dislike of the form of marriage by which it was so eloquently typified (Hamburger, art. 'Vielweiberei').

(2) The Wifely Status and Conjugal Duties.—In OT times various circumstances tended to depress the status of the wife—the logic of the patriarchal system, the custom of the 'dowry,' which suggested property, and the institution of polygyny, which divided her legitimate influence among several claimants. In theory she was the 'owned one' (בְּעוּלָה), while the husband was the 'owner' (בַּעַל, אָדוֹן, see FAMILY), and in the Decalogue she is numbered with his possessions (Ex 20^{17}). And in certain strata of the population the practice doubtless largely corresponded to the theory—the wife being little more than chattel and overdriven drudge. But among the wealthier classes the wife had no small liberty of action (1 S 25^{18}, 2 K 4^{22}). And where a woman possessed exceptional capacity, or knew how to increase her husband's affection, she asserted her title to a very different status. The wives of the patriarchs are not only consulted in matters of importance, but often impress us as accomplishing their purpose by their superior force of character (Gn 21^{10} $27^{13.46}$). In the period of the Judges the interest centres more than once in a strong woman ($4^{4.17}$); and in the history of the monarchy there are times when the queen or the queen-mother is the real power behind the throne. From the description of the virtuous woman in Pr 31 we learn how much influence could be acquired by a wise and energetic wife of the middle rank, and how much she might do to advance her husband's fortunes and to enhance his reputation.

Reference has already been made to the sympathetic attitude of the Law towards the wife, and we have to note in addition the bearing of the J narrative of Creation on the wifely status. It acknowledges that the subject and even servile position actually occupied by the wife is the appropriate one, but suggests that it is the punishment of her initiative in the original transgression (Gn 3^{16}), and thus contrasts it with the position of a 'helpmeet' which was designed by God in creation (2^{18}).

The duties of the husband were generally recognized to include all that is involved in the support of the home. Incidentally Ex 21^{10} enumerates as the minimum of obligation the provision of food and raiment, and cohabitation. As regards sexual morality the OT theory as well as frequent practice fell far short of the standard of equality of treatment. The chastity of the wife was jealously guarded by the heaviest penalties, but custom and law recognized no parallel obligation of conjugal fidelity as resting on the husband—provided always he respected the rights of other men. At the same time conjugal fidelity was naturally involved in the loving relations of the husband towards his wife, depicted in more than one touching instance (2 S $3^{14ff.}$). And there is evidence that the Hebrew intelligence, as tutored by experience, came to realize the folly, and through it the iniquity, of all sexual licence (Pr 2). Still more clear is it that the prophetic conscience was possessed by a deep sense of the abomination of whoredom; and finally a principle which claimed absolute marital fidelity was laid down by Malachi when he taught that neglect and inconstancy have God for their witness and avenger ($2^{14.15}$). The duties of the wife are not so specifically stated. The fundamental ones were chastity and submission (Gn 3^{16}), with devotion to the husband's family and interests. And by general consent the standard maintained by the Hebrew wives was high. Many daughters have done virtuously (Pr 31^{29}), and the invectives of Amos and Isaiah only illustrate the principle—'corruptio optimi pessima.'

3. THE LEAVENING BY CHRISTIANITY.—With Christianity begins a new epoch in the history of marriage. The changes which it introduced were due, partly to express enactment of Christ and His apostles, partly to the obvious implications of fundamental Christian principles.

(1) The Christian system involved the adoption of monogamy, and the prohibition of polygyny and bigamy. It is true that there is no direct condemnation of the latter. And the omission cannot be explained by saying it would have been superfluous, for, although in NT times monogamy was the rule, polygamy was certainly practised to some extent (Jos. Ant. XVII. i. 3).* As in the case of slavery, Christianity, without directly

---

* Favouritism was also discouraged by historical examples, which suggested that childlessness was ordinarily the judgment upon the preferred wife (Gn 30^{1}, 1 S 1^{2}).

* In opposition to the usual view (Selden, Ux. Heb. i. 9), it is contended by Abrahams that monogamy had become the settled Jewish custom in Roman times apart from imperial or Christian influence, and that the theory was only tardily brought into harmony with the established practice by Rabbi Gershom, c. 1000 A.D. (Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, ch. vii.).

attacking the custom, inevitably discredited and destroyed it. Our Lord's emphasis on the intimacy of the union between husband and wife (Mt $19^{4.5}$) at least suggested that no second woman could be admitted to the sphere. Above all, the golden rule was incompatible with polygyny, for under this system other men are robbed and wives are degraded.

(2) The duties of the married state were also revised in the spirit of Christianity. (a) The husband's duties, the minimum of which were promulgated as the demand of the law, were comprehended by St. Paul in the manner of His master under the requirement of love—a love which has self-love, and also Christ's love for His Church, for its standard (Eph 5^{28}, cf. 5^{25}, Col 3^{19}).* (b) The silence of the OT legislation in regard to licence outside the marriage bond was broken, and faithfulness was made strictly obligatory. The latter was evidently not taken for granted, from the first at least, among the Gentile Christians, and it was necessary for the Council of Jerusalem to educate their conscience by making it clear that fornication did not belong to the class of things indifferent (Ac 15^{29}). In various passages of the Pauline Epistles the imperative obligation of chastity is enforced with the menaces of excommunication (1 Co $5^{11ff.}$) and of eternal judgment (1 Th 4^{3}, Gal 5^{19}, cf. He 13^{4}), while the loose state of Corinthian opinion on the subject may be gathered from the careful argument by which the apostle demonstrates from the doctrine of the body as an integral and abiding element of personality, the incompatibility of sexual licence with an interest in Christ (1 Co 6^{13}). (c) Yet again the range of the husband's duty is extended to include constancy in love, which has its practical expression in the recognition of the perpetuity of the marriage tie (see below, Divorce).

The duties of the wife, in spite of the improvement of the status of woman which Christianity carried with it, continued to be developed from the presupposition of her subordination, and were summed up, not in love, but in obedience (Eph 5^{22}, Col 3^{18}, cf. 1 P 3^{1}). The new religion included various elements which tended to elevate and indeed revolutionize her position—especially the fact that in the spiritual sphere she was on the same platform as the man, redeemed by the same Saviour, saved by the same faith, destined to the same everlasting inheritance (cf. 1 P 3^{7}). In view of this stupendous fact, which St. Paul refers to in Gal 3^{28}, she could no longer be treated as an appanage to another, but was in herself an end. But the apostle did not hold it to be a consequence of this equality within the Kingdom that husband and wife were henceforth to be regarded as coequal partners in their union, or that women were to engage on equal terms with men in the varied work of the Church and of the world. The subjection of the wife to the husband, according to the apostle, was founded upon the original purpose and decree of God in creation, which could not be annulled (1 Co 11^{9}), and upon her constitution, which was modelled upon that of the man, and not, like his, an immediate reproduction of the image of God (v.^{5}). The question which arises at this point is whether the apostle has consistently argued from his Christian premises—whether the teaching of the OT on the relation of man and wife is the last word of Christianity. Expositors by whom his self-consistency is doubted might find in the teaching one of the Pauline antinomies—an old garment showing around the piece of new cloth; and it is certainly surprising that St. Paul, who elsewhere trusted to Christian love to fulfil all righteousness, should not have been satisfied with requiring of the wife true and constant conjugal love. His summarizing of wifely duty in obedience, however, had its firm supports, not only in his reverence for the religious tradition, but also in the monitions of his strong practical sense, which made it clear that in marriage, as in every other association of human beings, there must be at least in reserve a supreme court of appeal.

The incompleteness of the Pauline treatment of marriage is more conspicuous in relation to the ethical dignity of the institution, and the ends which it subserves. There were, it is to be remembered, two conflicting views in relation to which the Christian teaching had to be developed—the traditional Jewish view, according to which marriage was at once a duty and a privilege,* and the ascetic view maintained in Essene circles, according to which it was to be avoided as polluting and evil. The teaching of our Lord avoided both extremes: against the dominant opinion He affirmed the possibility of a duty arising under certain circumstances to abstain from marriage (Mt 19^{12}); against the ascetics He by word and countenance showed His estimate of marriage as a divine institution (Jn 3, Mt 19^{9}). The teaching of St. Paul inclines more to the ascetic side. He allows, as he could not but allow, the lawfulness of marriage (1 Th 4^{4}, cf. 1 Ti 4^{3}), but declares the celibate condition to be preferable. 'It is good for a man,' he says, 'not to touch a woman' (1 Co 7^{1}), and again he would have all men even as himself (v.^{7}). Where he allows it, it is from a point of view which discloses a relatively low view of the ends of marriage—as a preservative from immorality (1 Co $7^{9.35}$, 1 Th $4^{3.4}$); and to the same purpose he discusses the marriage of virgins (1 Co 7^{37}). In extenuation of these views it is usual to refer, and legitimately enough, to two facts—the first, that in an age of missionary hardship and impending persecution, celibacy was expedient (v.^{26}); and the second, that when the end of all things was believed to be at hand (v.^{31}), the importance of the family as an ethical sphere could not be taken at the same estimate as by those who look back upon and forward to a long development of Church and civilization. But St. Paul gives another reason in commendation of celibacy which is independent of temporary conditions and unfounded expectations, viz. that the married state brings with it cares and temptations which tend to weaken the heavenly affections and to cripple for Christian service (vv.$^{32-34}$). It may therefore be said with justice that his teaching on the subject is not quite on a level with the ethics of Protestantism. But, in taking up a more positive and sanguine attitude towards marriage, Protestantism has started from his own principle of 'all things are yours,' and in his spirit has conceived it to be a truer Christian achievement to bring the full circle of human experience into the obedience of Christ than to shun spiritual danger by the evasion of natural responsibilities. It may be added that the ideal view of marriage owes much to the apostle who compared it to the union between Christ and the Church.

ii. THE SPHERE OF LAWFUL MARRIAGE.—1. CONDITIONS AND BARS OF MARRIAGE.—In fixing the limits within which marriage is permissible, custom has varied widely, and it has not even been uniform among peoples occupying the same stage of civilization. In the phase in which the family is the most important social unit, it is common to prohibit a man from marrying within his own family group, or at least within that from which his mother sprang (Exogamy). Usually at an earlier but sometimes at a later period of the social history there is found the opposite custom, which forbids marriage outside the group (Endogamy). When the family comes to be superseded in important functions by the State, both obligations are naturally relaxed: a man may marry either within or without his ancestral stock, and only near relationships continue to be recognized as bars to union (Post, Stud. p. 79 ff.).

---

* While summing up the husband's duties in love, St. Paul's reverence for OT leads him also to re-emphasize the particular heads of marital duty which it had specified, e.g. in 1 Co 7^{3-6} where he asserts the law of conjugal rights sensu angustiori, and in 1 Ti 5^{8} where stress is laid on the husband's fundamental duty of providing for his household.

* According to Weber, Jüd. Theol.^{2} p. 234, a youth was expected to marry between 14 and 20. But the zealots of the Law did not deem themselves to be so bound. Rabbi Asai took no wife. 'My soul,' he said, 'cleaves to the Law: let others see to the upbuilding of the world' (p. 30).

(a) Racial Bars to Marriage.—When the Hebrews emerge into the light of history, exogamy (if it ever prevailed among them) has disappeared, and endogamous marriage is strongly favoured. That a lively prejudice of this kind existed in early times is shown in the patriarchal histories, in which great anxiety is shown to procure wives from the original stock—marriages with cousins being most favoured, while loud protests are heard against marriage with aliens. In the period subsequent to the settlement in Canaan, racial intermixture was inevitable, and the old sentiment was in danger of being crushed out. Not only did the kings contract foreign alliances (David 2 S 3^{3}, Solomon 1 K 3^{1} 11^{1}, Ahab 1 K 16^{31}), but there is reason to believe that national distinctions were lightly regarded by the common people (Ru 1^{4}, 2 Ch 24^{26}). Israelitish women also married aliens (1 K 7^{14}), but usually, as it would seem, under the condition that their husbands settled in Israel (2 S 11^{3}, 1 Ch 2^{17}). In this matter, however, religious interests were at stake, a halt was called, and the reaction gradually carried the people back to the primitive position. In Dt marriage was expressly forbidden with the original inhabitants of Canaan (7^{3}, cf. Ex 34^{16}) as the race most likely to debase the religion and morals of the people; but an exception seems to be intended in the case of Edomites and Egyptians (23^{7}). During the Exile and for some time subsequent to it the law had again fallen into abeyance, only to be revived in greater stringency under Ezra (9^{2} 10^{3}) and Nehemiah (13^{23}). The exclusive spirit was fostered by historical examples of the low type of character that sprang from such mixed marriages (Lv 24^{10}).

(b) Forbidden Degrees of Kinship.—The older custom, which confined marriage within the limits of the family group, had its natural counterpart in lax views as to the bars arising from consanguinity and affinity. Unions tolerated among other nations were indeed regarded as incestuous, viz. with a daughter, or with a uterine sister, but, at least as regards relatives on the paternal side, the utmost latitude was allowed. Thus, Abraham is represented as marrying a half-sister, the daughter of his father (Gn 20^{12}), and the words of Tamar imply that this was recognized as lawful down to the time of the Monarchy (2 S 13^{13}). As late as the age of Ezekiel, marriage with a stepmother must still have been common (22^{10}). Moses himself seems to have been the offspring of a marriage between a nephew and his paternal aunt (Nu 26^{59}, cf. v.^{57}). Of these cases the more obnoxious were prohibited in Dt, viz. marriage with a stepmother (27^{20}), a half-sister (v.^{22}), and a mother-in-law (v.^{23}).

The list of forbidden degrees is extended in Lv (18$^{7-17}$, cf. 20$^{11ff.}$), and largely on the basis of the general principle that paternal relationships rank equally with maternal for purposes of marriage. The following table gives a conspectus of the code—the names of the prohibited relatives being printed in italics, while those about whose identification or otherwise some doubt exists are marked with a ? (cf. Selden, Ux. Heb. p. 5).

Various problems arise out of the table of prohibited degrees.

(1) The prohibitions of marriage with sisters are somewhat obscure. The obvious sense of v.^{9} is that it forbids marriage with a half-sister, whether on the father's or the mother's side, and v.^{11}, which prohibits 'the father's wife's daughter, begotten of thy father,' simply repeats the prohibition of a half-sister on the father's side. While the prevalence of the custom (sanctioned as it was by Abraham's example) and the gravity of the evil might justify the repetition, the interposition of different matter in v.^{10} makes it probable that a fresh case is contemplated. The most plausible interpretation of v.^{11} is that, in addition to the half-sister of v.^{9}, it prohibits the daughter of a man's stepmother by a previous husband. This result has been got in two ways—either by regarding the phrase 'begotten of thy father' as an interpolation, or by (illegitimately) treating the participle מולדת as active, with the meaning 'who hath borne children to thy father' (Bohl, Contra Matr. Comprivignorum; cf. Michaelis, ii. 107). Another view is that v.^{11} is to be taken as withholding the half-sister, and that v.^{9} (where read not 'or' but 'and' the daughter of thy mother) would point to the full sister. Keil (Comm. in loc.) finds in the text as it stands a distinction—that in v.^{11} the prohibition refers to a son by a first marriage, whereas v.^{9} treats of the son by a second marriage. This, however, involves no difference of relationship, though possibly some difference of status on the part of the half-brother. It is unfortunate that the most satisfactory explanation which connects v.^{11} with the stepmother's daughter by another husband requires alteration of the text.

(2) A second difficulty arises from a group of three ambiguous prohibitions which might be regarded as referring either to polygamous or monogamous marriages. Marriage is prohibited (a) with a stepdaughter (v.^{17}), (b) with the daughter of a stepson or stepdaughter (ib.), and (c) with a wife's sister (v.^{18}); but is the decease presupposed in (a) of the wife who is the girl's mother, in (b) of the wife who is the girl's grandmother, in (c) of the wife whose sister is mentioned? In case (b) it is possible that the original wife is dead, and the same may fairly be held in case (a); but in case (c) it is certain that the wife is alive, and that what is forbidden is a special type of bigamy. The discussion of this brings us to the more famous problem.

(3) Marriage with a deceased wife's sister is certainly not directly forbidden. The actual words are, 'thou shalt not take a woman to her sister, to be a rival to her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her lifetime' (v.^{18}). The AVm suggests translating 'one wife to (i.e. in addition to) another' instead of 'to her sister'—in which case we should have a direct prohibition of bigamy; but modern scholarship has not been able to sustain this. The Mosaic law was not anciently understood to preclude marriage with the sister of a deceased wife. It was declared lawful by the Talmudists, and it was even encouraged by removing or mitigating in this special case the conditions governing the remarriage of a widower. The opposition to it began among the Jewish sect of the Karaites, whose origin is traced to the 8th cent. of our era, and whose leading principle was the Protestant one of going behind the accumulated traditions and decisions of the Rabbis to the written word, with the accompanying proviso that Scripture was to be interpreted by Scripture. In the case before us the plain sense of Scripture is that no objection is raised to marriage with a wife's sister if the former is deceased, and the argument against it is consequently constructive. The argument may be summarized as follows: (1) Marriage is interdicted with those that are near of kin (Lv 18^{6}); (2) 'near of kin' are shown in the legislation to include, along with mother, daughter, etc., sisters and half-sisters; (3) the wife's 'near of kin' are to be regarded as standing in the same relationship to the husband, and that because (a) it was declared in the primordial decree that the twain shall be one flesh (Gn 2^{24}), and (b) the principle is conceded and exemplified in other instances—e.g. in the prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's granddaughter (v.^{17}) (Selden, Ux. Heb. i. 3 ff., where are set forth the various arguments of the different Karaite teachers, who, however, agreed in the conclusion, 'Uxoris soror, tam ea demortua quam superstite, in vetitis habenda'). But the argument is unsound. If the question be to determine whether the Mosaic law sanctions marriage with a deceased wife's sister, we must adhere as closely as possible to the statute, and, as we have seen, the object of the relevant clause is something quite different—the regulation of bigamy. If we fall back on the principle underlying the prohibitions we do not settle the matter, for it is not clear that the principle is theoretically adopted of treating the wife's near of kin as if they were the husband's; rather it would seem that this guidance is followed only in so far as it was necessary on grounds of expediency—e.g. in the case of the stepdaughter or granddaughter who would be living (unlike the sister) in the man's family, and who would thus, as a possible wife, be in an obnoxious position. Various other extensions of the forbidden degrees specified in Lv have been made—notably in barring marriage of an uncle with a niece, and of the nephew with the widow of his maternal uncle; and, as in these instances, the problem of the deceased's wife's sister falls to be settled in accordance with the circumstances of a given age and the teaching of experience.

(4) The rationale of the forbidden degrees has been variously interpreted. The following is a summary of the older explanations (cf. J. D. Michaelis, Mos. Recht (Eng. tr.) ii. p. 53 ff.). The cases in which marriage is disallowed in the Mosaic law have been supposed to be proscribed as those (a) which are repugnant to the natural sentiments of mankind (horror naturalis), or (b) which lead to the physical degeneration of a stock, or (c) which tend to the aggrandizement of particular families by the concentration of wealth and power, or (d) which are subversive of natural rights—e.g. degrading an aunt from her due rank, and elevating a stepdaughter above her proper position. Without denying a certain influence from these considerations, Michaelis himself argues with great force that the real reason of the prohibition of marriages among near of kin is, that, 'considering the free intercourse that such persons have with one another, some of whom, besides, live from their infancy in the same house, it would be impossible to prevent the presence of whoredom in families, or to guard against the effects of very early corruption among young persons if they could entertain the least hope of throwing a veil over past impurity by subsequent marriage' (ii. p. 68). In recent times the whole subject has been re-examined from the evolutionary point of view, with the result of showing that every system of forbidden degrees has been a growth to which something has been contributed by successive forms of social organization, and which has been dominated at different periods by different ideas. Of the Levitical system we may say that it has as its nucleus a list of prohibitions inherited from the maternal type of family organization, and that it has extended these in general (though not doctrinaire) accordance with the demands of the patriarchal system, and with a keen instinct for the interests of domestic and social purity.

The penalties for violation of the forbidden degrees were proportioned to the gravity of the case. In Dt those forming the three types of incestuous union there specified (27$^{20.\ 22.\ 23}$) have a curse laid upon them. In Lv 20 capital punishment is decreed against the partners in three cases of incestuous intercourse or marriage, viz. with a stepmother (v.^{11}), a daughter-in-law (v.^{12}), and with a woman whose daughter has already been taken by the man as his wife (v.^{14}). The same may be assumed in the possible cases of still deeper guilt. The mode of death was probably stoning, and in the case of the last group of offenders it is provided that their corpses shall be burned. The penalty for marriage with a half-sister was excommunication (v.^{17}). In another group of cases, viz. intercourse or marriage with an aunt (v.^{19}), an uncle's wife (v.^{20}), and a sister-in-law (v.^{21}), the culprits are left to the vengeance of Heaven, with the added menace in the last two cases that 'they shall be childless.'

(c) Official Restrictions.—In OT certain restrictions are imposed upon the sacerdotal class. A priest was forbidden to marry a harlot, or a fallen woman, or a divorced person (Lv 21^{7}); the high priest was not even allowed to marry a widow (v.^{14}). It was not, however, held by the Talmudists that the latter enactment required a high priest, on his elevation, to divorce a widow whom he might have previously married or betrothed (Selden, Ux. Heb. p. 46).

To this closer fencing of married life in the case of the OT priesthood there is a certain analogy in the NT provision that the bishop shall be the husband of one wife (1 Ti 3^{2}), and likewise the deacons (v.^{12}). The interpretations of this much disputed enactment are as follows: (1) It provides that the bishops and deacons shall be monogamists. But, even if it be assumed that polygyny was still practised among the Jews, it is unlikely that it was represented among the Jewish Christians; and 1 Ti 5^{9} is decisive, as, similarly interpreted, it would mean that no woman living in polyandry was to be enrolled among the widows. (2) It disqualifies for office a man who has been more than once married, and prohibits him after his appointment from contracting a second marriage. This view derives strong support from the fact that it was embodied in the current opinion of the patristic Church, and was reinforced by the decision of Councils (Plummer, Cath. Epp. in 'Expos. Bible'), and it would doubtless have been more generally adopted but for the prejudice created by existing practice. At the same time it is right to observe that the admission of this interpretation does not involve the permanent condemnation of second marriage on the part of the clergy, as the reason for the apostolic prohibition might be peculiar to the apostolic age. (3) The regulation disqualifies for office those who had availed themselves of the rights of divorce which Christ sought to curtail, or (according to some authorities) who had in another way (concubinage, licentiousness) sinned against the marriage law. The suggestion that it was designed to support our Lord's condemnation of capricious divorce has lately grown in favour, and must be regarded as at least a possible interpretation.

(d) Natal Disability.—On the score of a taint of birth, a class of person known as מַמְזֵר was debarred from marriage with Israelites. 'A bastard shall not enter into the assembly of the Lord, even unto the tenth generation' (Dt 23^{2}). By 'bastard' is to be understood, not a person born out of wedlock,—illegitimacy did not entail any serious penalties under Jewish law,—but one born of an unlawful marriage (Driver, in loc.). Such at least is the plausible interpretation given in the Mishna in a passage which determines the status of children (Kiddushin iii. 12). In a lawful marriage, it is held, the child follows the father; in an unlawful marriage, e.g. of a high priest with a widow, or of an Israelitish woman with one of the Nethinim, the child follows the party by whom the marriage is vitiated. The offspring of such illegal marriage, it is added, is מַמְזֵר.

(e) Additional marriage-bars that fall to be noted are (1) the physical disqualification of certain mutilated or injured persons (Dt 23^{1}); (2) the hereditary disqualification of the heiress who was not allowed to marry into another tribe (Nu 36$^{5-9}$); (3) the retributive disqualification, which disallowed remarriage under certain circumstances with a wife who had previously been divorced (see below, Divorce).

2. The Levirate Marriage of the OT (levir, brother-in-law, יָבָם husband's brother; יִבֵּם to perform the marriage obligation of a husband's brother; Talm. יִבּוּם the type of marriage; Gr. ἐπιγαμβρεύω, Mt 22^{24}), formerly treated as a curious anomaly, has been shown by modern research to be widely prevalent at certain stages of civilization.* 'The fundamental character of this type of marriage,' says Post (Studien, p. 248), 'is that a widow is inherited in accordance with the system of kinship dominant among a people, and is married by the heir—whence there then arises the obligation to provide for her and her children.' In the narrower sense it is defined (as by Starcke, Prim. Fam. p. 141) as 'the custom which enjoins a man to marry the widow of his brother, if he die childless, in order to raise up children to the dead man, to whom the children produced by such a marriage were supposed to belong.' Obviously, the custom is one which is capable of large modification in detail, and it would seem that even within the limits of OT times there was some shifting of view as to the object of the levirate marriage, and the range of the obligation.

What is virtually an enactment of the levirate law, and that the oldest, is given in narrative form in the story of Tamar and Judah (Gn 38). Here the object of the marriage is 'to raise up seed' to the deceased (v.^{8}); the person upon whom the obligation rests is the younger brother, failing whom the next in age (v.^{26}); the issue of the marriage becomes the head of the family (v.^{29}; cf. Mt 1^{3}); and the sanction of the law, the binding character of which is generally admitted, is in the last resort a special retributive judgment (v.^{10}).

In the formal enactment of the Deut. code (25^{5-10}) the ancient custom is similarly motived and as earnestly supported, if with some relaxation in detail. The obligation rested on a brother only if he had 'dwelt together' (i.e. 'on the same family estate,' Driver) with the deceased (v.^{5}), and only the eldest son of the new marriage was to be reckoned as the son of the deceased (v.^{6}). On the other hand, the obligation was not superseded if the deceased left daughters (v.^{5} 'no son,' as against the Sadducean interpretation in Mt 22^{24}, Mk 12^{19}, Lk 20^{28}). The duty was not legally enforced, but was supported by the resources of public opinion. A brother evading it publicly forfeited his right—symbolized by drawing off his sandal—and was to be openly insulted by the widow, and condemned to perpetual obloquy (v.^{9}).

The Book of Ruth, while certainly referring to the custom, is by no means faithful to the Deut. model. As judged by Dt, Boaz was under no obligation to wed Ruth unless it should be argued that as Elimelech's brother (4^{3}) he was bound to marry Naomi, and that as the latter was past child-bearing he married instead her widowed daughter-in-law. As a fact, the view taken is that the next of kin, who may be quite remote, is in duty bound to redeem a dead man's estate and marry his childless widow. Further, as Ruth's son by Boaz ranks as the son of the latter (v.^{21}), not of Ruth's former husband, it would seem that the earlier intention of the law is abandoned (Nowack, Arch. i. p. 347, who even argues that in the writer's view the sole object is the welfare of the widow). It is also noticeable that the repudiation, with the ceremony of the drawing off of the shoe, no longer has the ancient stigma attached to it (v.^{7}). On the whole, it must be said that the book reveals a state of things when the strict law had been found impracticable, but when its principle continued to be in a wider way operative, and was favoured as fostering humane dealing and averting the pathetic event of the extinction of a line.

The attitude of the later legislation towards the custom is matter of dispute. Certainly Lv (18^{16} 20^{21}) forbids marriage with a deceased brother's wife without any qualification; and it is therefore held by many modern critics that P designed to abolish this type of marriage as incestuous in the minor degree (Nowack, Arch. i. 346; Benzinger, art. 'Ehe,' Real-Encycl.^{3}). In confirmation of this it is pointed out that in this code the estate, failing a son, descends to the daughters (Nu $27^{1\text{ff.}}$). By others the traditional view is still maintained that P lays down the general rule against marriage with a deceased brother's wife, while Dt specifies the exceptional case (Driver, Deut. in loc.). It has also been held that the collision of the codes is only apparent, as Lev prohibits illicit intercourse with a brother's wife, and is not legislating in the passage in question about marriage (Bertholet, Com. on Deut., but erroneously). Whether P intended to repeal the special law is a question likely to be determined by subjective considerations. The famous disputation with the Sadducees clearly implies that the levirate law was regarded as binding in the time of our Lord, while it was perhaps even acted on (ἦσαν δὲ παρ' ἡμῖν ἑπτὰ ἀδελφοί, Mt $22^{25\text{ff.}}$).

In the later period, however, its observance was exceptional: in the language of the Mishna, the dispensation (חליצה) was preferred to the observance (Bechoroth 13*a*). Theoretical opposition accompanied, and the opinions of the Rabbis of the first four Christian centuries were divided as to its lawfulness—Rabbi Jose declaring it unpermissible even when desired by both parties concerned. The same division of opinion ran through the Middle Ages, though the preponderance of opinion favoured the dispensation (Mishna, treatise Yebamoth; Surenhusius, ii.; Hamburger, Real-Encyk. art. 'Schwagerehe').

Of the origin and primitive purpose of the levirate marriage various explanations have been propounded. (1) The first group of theories accepts the biblical statement that the object was the procreation of a son or sons who were regarded as the children of the deceased. But on this assumption the further question arises, What was the object of the fiction by which the line was continued? To this the principal answers which have been given are (a) that it was regarded as a calamity (where personal immortality was not realized, a calamity tantamount to annihilation) that one's line should become extinct (Dt 25^{6}); (b) that the custom was connected with a system of ancestor-worship, under which failure of offspring entailed deprivation of cherished rites and service.* Popular, however, as the latter theory is, it assumes the influence of a form of religion, for the existence of which in Israel the evidence is of the scantiest. (2) A second theory, propounded by M'Lennan and supported by W. R. Smith, pushes the question further back and discovers in it a survival from polyandry. 'It could more easily be feigned,' says the former, 'that the children belonged to the deceased brother if already, at a prior stage, the children of the brotherhood had been accounted the children of the eldest brother' (Prim. Mar. p. 164). And in regard to this view it must be admitted that polyandry may well have left behind such a custom as its legacy. As Starcke observes (Prim. Fam. p. 150), 'the Levir-child was ascribed to the dead man in virtue of the same ideas according to which, in Tibet, the eldest brother and ruler of the house was held to be the father of all the children of the household.' This proves that a system of polyandry may sometimes have had as an offshoot the levirate marriage, but does not preclude the possibility of its development in other quarters from other primitive practices and modes of thought—e.g. the exercise of paternal authority in setting aside in certain cases the direct fatherhood (Starcke, p. 151). (3) Yet again it has been suggested that in conditions where marriage was associated with purchase, and the wife was treated as a chattel, it was natural that she should be claimed by the next of kin as part of the inheritance (Spencer, Principles of Sociology). Well, however, as this practice is vouched for, the inheritance of a wife by a surviving brother is widely removed from the biblical theory, for the essence of the latter is the concession that the younger brother, instead of himself heiring, raises up heirs to the deceased. (4) Yet again the object of the custom has been found in an agrarian motive, the law being designed to keep together under the levirate husband the property which would otherwise have been divided among all the brothers (Meilziner, quoted by Starcke, p. 150). But, though at a late date (Ru 4^{5}) the custom was utilized in connexion with the conservation of lands, the evidence points to its having reached back into the nomadic stage of civilization.

* The parallel in the Laws of Manu (ch. ix. 59-64) has been often cited. Instances of the custom among other races have been collected by Post, Einleitung in das Stud. d. ethnolog. Jurisprud. 1866, and Westermarck, Hist. of Hum. Marriage.

* An expression of this idea is quoted from the Mahâbhârata (Muir's tr.) by Max Müller, Anthrop. Rel. p. 31—

'That stage completed, seek a wife
And gain the fruit of wedded life,
A race of sons, by rites to seal,
When thou art gone, thy spirit's weal.'

On the whole, the question of origin is, and probably will remain, matter of controversy. Widespread as the custom is, it may well have sprung from various roots—according as in one region an ancestor-cult prevailed, in another a system of polyandry had developed, etc. Where it meets us in Hebrew history it clearly connects itself with the natural desire for survival in posterity, later with the endeavour to perpetuate family property; and if in spite of the benediction of early tradition and law it gradually fell into abeyance, the cause is to be sought in the growth of the self-consciousness and of the claims of the individual with the progress of society.

iii. MARRIAGE PROCEDURE.—1. The System of Betrothal.—The betrothal, as the first stage in the formation of a marriage union, had a prominent position among the Hebrews, as among other peoples at the same stage of social development.

The act of betrothing is described by three Heb. verbs:—אֵרַשׂ (Pi. of [אָרַשׂ] 'pay the price,' Dt 20^{7}, Hos 2$^{19.20}$), יָעַד ('designate') Ex 21$^{8.9}$, [חָרַף] ('acquire') Lv 19^{20}; and by one Greek verb —μνηστεύειν (Mt 1^{18}, Lk 1^{27} 2^{5}). In AV the Hebrew verbs are usually rendered by 'betroth,' occasionally by 'espouse' (2 S 3^{14}): the Greek verb is translated by 'espouse.' In RV 'betroth' is exclusively used where the reference is to the initial stage (2 S 3^{14}, Mt 1^{18} etc.), while 'espouse' is restricted to the passages which imply completed marriage (Ex 21$^{8.9}$). The ceremony of betrothal has no name in OT. The Talmudists refer to it under the names of קדושין (consecration), אירושין (betrothal), and שרוכין (compact) or תנאים (conditions).

The custom of allowing the individuals concerned to arrange a marriage according to inclination is a late and exceptional concession. In societies in which the family organization is strong and stable the betrothal is treated as a concern of the family group or of the tribe. The powers are vested in the head of the tribe, or they may be devolved upon particular members of a family group—under the patriarchal system upon the father or nearest paternal relative, under the matriarchal upon the maternal uncle or the eldest uterine brother (Post, Studien, pp. 163, 164). From this standpoint the betrothal is viewed in OT. In the exercise of his patriarchal function Abraham through a servant negotiates with Bethuel for the hand of Rebekah, and Laban as her brother is taken into council (Gn 24); Hamor endeavours in treaty with Jacob and his sons to arrange a marriage on behalf of his son Shechem (Gn 34$^{6ff.}$); even the lawless Samson requests his father to procure for him to wife a woman in Timnah (Jg 14^{2}). The advances, further, were made by the house of the bridegroom, except in cases where the superior rank of the bride's family justified them in taking the first step (Ex 2^{21}, Jos 15^{17}, 1 S 18^{27}). Resentment was expressed when a man repudiated the rights of the natural guardians and took the matter into his own hands (Gn 26^{34})—a feeling strongly shared by the Arabs, who held it sufficient ground for withholding a bride (Wellhausen, Die Ehe bei den Arabern, p. 432); and the protests were not unreasonable in view of the interest of the family in the alliance that might be formed, and of the women in the bride with whom in a patriarchal society they were to be so closely associated (Gn 27^{46}). Yet, while the system required that the machinery of the family should be employed, it might easily happen, as the cases of Shechem and Samson show, that it might be set in motion by a lover, and the more so that in ancient Israel the association of the sexes was comparatively unrestrained, and naturally led to personal attachments which sought satisfaction in marriage (Gn 24^{15} 29^{10}; cf. 1 S 18^{20}). Among the Hebrews, in any case, the tyranny of family rule does not appear to have dispensed with the consent of the parties (Gn 24^{8}), which under this regime is often treated as matter of indifference, at least as respects the bride (Post, Studien, p. 166 ff.).

The first important stage in the betrothal procedure was the settlement of the amount of the so-called dowry, and the payment or part payment of the same.

The dowry of the OT (מֹהַר Gn 34^{12}, Ex 22^{17}, 1 S 18^{25}; cf. Ex 22^{16}, where RV has 'pay a dowry') was not a portion brought by the bride into the husband's family, but a price or ransom paid to the father or brothers of the bride. That this was its original significance is not open to doubt. In primitive conditions it was naturally claimed as compensation for the loss to a family of a valuable member. Recent research has shown that it was so regarded in ancient times in Arabia (Kinship and Marriage, 68, 78 ff.; Die Ehe bei den Arabern, 433 ff.); and among the same stock it retains this character. 'An Arab father,' says Tristram, 'regards his daughters much as he would his sheep or cattle, selling them for a greater or less price, according to his rank and fortune and their beauty' (Eastern Customs, p. 92). And so it appears in OT: Hamor offers to pay for Dinah 'never so much dowry' (Gn 34^{12}); in Ex 22^{17} it is referred to as a settled custom. Dt 22^{29} assesses the damages for seduction, which are payable to the father, and thus fixes the amount in one particular case. For the common people the sum to be paid was doubtless settled by custom, while in the case of important alliances it was matter of negotiation (Gn 34^{12}). The 'dowry' was not necessarily paid in money or kind, but might take the form of service, as in the case of Jacob (Gn 29) and David (1 S 18^{25}; cf. 17^{25}).

With the advance of families in dignity and wealth the 'dowry' easily passed into a new stage. It was natural that a portion, if not the whole, should be appropriated to ensure the comfort and security of the bride. A hint of the custom of so diverting a part is given in the complaint made by the daughters of Laban, when they declare that he 'hath sold us, and hath quite devoured our money' (Gn 31^{15}). In later times the appropriation of the 'dowry' to the wife became customary; it was conserved as capital; and in the event of the death of the husband, or an arbitrary divorce, it furnished a useful provision. A parallel development took place to some extent among the Arabs, as the Koran assumes that the 'dowry' falls to the wife (Wellhausen, Die Ehe bei den Arabern, p. 435).

The dowry in the modern sense was not customary, but was occasionally met with. The daughters of wealthy houses at least received handsome gifts: Rebekah brings female slaves with her to her new home (Gn 24^{61}), Laban makes a similar present to Leah (29^{24}). As a special instance of liberality, doubtless also with some reference to proprietary rights, mention is made of Caleb's gift to his daughter of a field of springs (Jg 1^{15}). The alliances of the kings with foreign princes furnish examples of the dowry—in one case a princess brings with her a city as her portion (1 K 9^{16}).*

In addition to the mohar, there is mention of other gifts which, naturally prompted by the occasion of a betrothal, might be distributed more or less lavishly as a means of conciliation or a token of goodwill (מַתָּן, Gn 34^{12}). The gift to the bride, which came under this category, was significant of the wealth of the wooer (24^{53}). The latter had its counterpart in the sadâk of the Arabs; and as the bestowal of the sadâk came to be treated as part of the marriage ceremony, it is possible that among the Hebrews also it was incorporated in the formal procedure either of the betrothal or of the marriage.

While the settlement and payment (in whole or in part) of the 'dowry' was the decisive act in the betrothal, there was probably also an additional ceremony of a more or less formal kind. Of the procedure various elements appear to be preserved in the narrative of Rebekah's betrothal (Gn 24). The terms in which she is asked, and gives her consent, in all likelihood preserve an ancient and familiar formula ('Wilt thou go with this man?' 'I will go,' v.^{58}); and the same applies to the blessing which is pronounced upon her when she is handed over or 'sent away' (v.^{60}). The conjecture that a ring was given to the bride has no support in the passages referred to (Ex 35^{22}, Is 3^{21}), yet the use of the ring, which plays an important part in the Talmudic formalities, may well have been of considerable antiquity.

In the procedure sanctioned by the Talmudic authorities the bridegroom handed to the bride an article of value, such as a ring, or a written document, adding: 'By this ring, etc., may she be consecrated (or betrothed) to me.' The presence of two male witnesses was required, so that the appropriate benedictions might be pronounced on the union. According to the Mishna (treatise Kiddushin), there were three modes of betrothal—by the payment of money, by the conveyance of a contract, and by coition; but the third was prohibited by the later Rabbis under penalties (Hamburger, arts. 'Trauung,' 'Verlöbniss').

After the betrothal the bride was under the same restrictions as a wife. If unfaithful she ranked and was punished as an adulteress (Dt 22$^{23.\ 24}$); and on the other hand the bridegroom, if he wished to break the contract, had the same privileges, and had also to observe the same formalities as in the case of divorce. The situation is illustrated in the history of Joseph and Mary, who were on the footing of betrothal (Mt 1^{19}).

2. Nuptial Rites and Customs.—Upon the betrothal followed, after a longer or shorter period, the marriage proper or wedding, the features of which may be collected partly from incidental allusions in Scripture, partly from survivals of ancient custom in Talmudic literature and in the life of the East.

The Heb. terms translated 'marry' are לָקַח 'to take' (Gn 19^{14} etc.), in late Heb. נָשָׂא (2 Ch 13^{21} al.)—both with a probable reference to ancient marriage by capture, הָיְתָה לְאִישׁ 'to be married' (Hos 3^{3} al.), and הָיְתָה לפ׳ לְאִשָּׁה 'to become a wife' (Nu 36$^{3.\ 6.\ 11}$), בָּעַל to 'become master of,' expressive of the husband's authority (Dt 22^{22} etc.); later הוֹשִׁיב, lit. 'make to dwell,' 'give a dwelling to' (cf. Ps 113^{9}), Ezr 10$^{2.\ 10.\ 14.\ 17.\ 18}$, Neh 13$^{23.\ 27}$ [al.]. 'To form marriage alliance with' (lit. 'to make oneself daughter's husband') is הִתְחַתֵּן (Gn 34^{9} etc.). AV 'given to marriage' in Ps 78^{63} is merely a paraphrase; Heb. is lit. 'were not praised.' In NT γαμεῖν is used of either sex (Mt 5^{32} 19$^{9.\ 10}$ etc.); also γίνεσθαί τινι (Ro 7^{3}), used of a woman, means to be married to a man (RV to be 'joined to a man'), γαμίσκεσθαι, to be given in marriage (Mk 12^{25}), γαμίζειν, to give in marriage (1 Co 7^{38}). The word translated 'espousals' (Ca 3^{11}) comes nearest to describing the subject here discussed.

It is probable that in the early period the principal if not the only ceremonies were connected with the betrothal, and that when these were completed the consummation of the marriage might follow at the option of the parties concerned (Nowack, Arch. i. p. 162). In the case of Isaac and Rebekah the formalities were over with the betrothal, and on the bride's arrival at her new home she was simply conducted to her tent (Gn 24$^{63-67}$). Similarly, whenever David has fulfilled the conditions imposed by Saul, he receives Michal to wife (1 S 18^{27}). That this was, however, not universal appears from Gn 29^{27}. The later practice was to draw a clear distinction between betrothal and marriage (Dt 20^{7} 28^{30}), to magnify the final function, and to invest this increasingly with characters of publicity and pomp. And in the celebration of Hebrew marriage the most noteworthy point is the retreat of the distinctively Hebrew element. We seem to be in the atmosphere of Hellas rather than of the Holy Land. There is no evidence that, in the older period, the proceedings were regulated from the theocratic point of view, or even that they included a religious ceremony: rather is there a temporary abandonment to the cult of mere happiness, with its unconsecrated ritual of feasting and song.

In the biblical references to the marriage celebrations two functions stand out prominently—the wedding procession and the wedding feast or marriage supper. As regards the nature and place of the ceremony by which the woman was transferred to the husband (the counterpart of our marriage service), the biblical notices leave us uninformed.

The wedding procession naturally fell into two parts. First the bridegroom and his friends may be supposed to have marched to the home of the bride, then in a return procession the festal company, reinforced by the bride's friends, conducted the pair to their future home. Of the movement and colour of this picturesque drama graphic touches are preserved in Scripture. We catch a glimpse of the garlanded bridegroom in his splendid attire (Is 61^{10}), and of his veiled bride surrounded by the friends of her youth (Ps 45$^{14.\ 15}$); the attendant throng gives vent to its jubilant feelings in dancing and shouting, and songs are struck up (some perhaps preserved in the Song called Solomon's) which sound the praise of wedded love and of the newly-wedded pair.

The relation of the wedding procession to the situation presupposed in the parable of the Ten Virgins requires elucidation. 'More rarely it happened,' says Nowack (i. p. 163), 'that a procession conducted the bride to meet the bridegroom as he approached with his friends (1 Mac 9$^{37\text{ff.}}$); in the evening such a procession sometimes took place by lamp and torchlight.' The explanation here suggested is that the marriage took place late at night, and that the bride's company was preparing to sally forth to meet the bridegroom on his first appearance. It is, however, plausibly argued by Mackie (Bibl. Manners and Customs) that the parable presupposes that this stage is past. The bride, he infers from existing custom, has already been conducted to her future home, the bridegroom has subsequently withdrawn to the house of a relative, where he is to stay with his companions till a late hour; meanwhile the bride and her companions grow weary, and sleep falls upon them; until at last a clamour in the street heralds the approach of the torch-illumined party, and within all are roused to life and excitement. ‘Before he arrives the maidens in waiting come forth with lamps and candles a short distance to light up the entrance and do honour to the bridegroom and the group of relatives and intimate friends around him. These pass in to the final rejoicing and the marriage supper; the others, who have discharged their duty in accompanying him to the door, immediately disperse and the door is shut’ (p. 126).

* Among the Greeks the dowry had a similar origin and a parallel development. In the Homeric age it was customary for the father to receive a purchase-price from his future son-in-law (Il. xi. 244)—hence the expression παρθένος ἀλφεσίβοια, the oxen-bringing virgin; and if it was rare for a father to give his daughter gratuitously (ἀνάεδνον), it was reckoned an act of the most signal generosity to offer presents (ἐπιμείλια), as was done by Agamemnon (ix. 146) along with the daughter. The ancient custom gradually disappeared, and was referred to by Aristotle as barbarous (Pol. ii. 5. 11), but Euripides voices a complaint of the women of a later day that it had become the custom that women had to purchase their husbands at a great price (Med. 232; Derenberg, Dict. des Antiq. Grecq. et Rom., Paris, 1892, art. 'Dot'). In Rome from an early period the wife who did not bring with her a dowry was regarded as a concubine rather than as a wife (Plaut. Trinum. iii. 2, v. 73, 5), and it was a duty of clients to make up a dowry for the daughter of a poor patron (ib.).

The marriage supper, which took place in the house of the husband, was the great social event in the life of a family, and, where the standing and means allowed it, might be planned on the most lavish scale. In the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son we have an example of boundless hospitality, and also an indication of the resentment felt when the invitation was slighted (Mt 22$^{1-14}$). A difficulty in the parable has been met by the conjecture that persons of high rank further showed their magnificence by furnishing the invited guests with festal robes (ἔνδυμα γάμου). The wedding at Cana of Galilee gives us a glimpse of the way in which the spirit of hospitality was exhibited in humbler homes (Jn 2$^{1\text{ff.}}$). But, while the same spirit prevailed throughout Hebrew society, it is to be remembered that among the poorer classes the marriage feast must have been very different from the picture which at the name naturally rises before the imagination.*

The scene at the marriage supper is depicted with some fulness of detail. Now (probably not in the procession) the high-born bride appeared in the full splendour of her bridal array, in a robe embroidered with gold (Ps 45$^{13.14}$, Jer 2^{32}), which was gathered up by a peculiar girdle adorned with jewels (Is 49^{18}), and on her head a crown. Prominent in honour, as they had been in service, were the male friends of the bridegroom (υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος, Mt 9^{15}), one of whom was charged with the duties of a master of ceremonies (Jn 2^{8}, cf. Jn 3^{29}). From descriptions of later times we can fill out other spaces with panegyric and blessing uttered by the company in song and speech. At the close the bride was conducted by her parents to the nuptial chamber (cf. Jg 15^{1}). Throughout the whole proceedings it may be noted, as explaining the deception practised upon Jacob, the bride had remained veiled (Gn 29^{23}). The duty of preserving evidence of the bride's antenuptial chastity, which was enforced in Dt 22$^{13\text{ff.}}$, was attended to as a safeguard against the slanders of a malicious or inconstant husband.

A marriage ceremony, to which proceedings like those described are mere adjuncts, is naturally assumed by us, but the idea is not to be summarily imported into early Hebrew marriage. We are doubtless nearer the mark in regarding the marriage supper as being in early times itself the marriage ceremony. Among primitive peoples the public meal has a quasi-sacramental character; and it was quite in harmony with this mode of thought to look on the feast of which bridegroom and bride partook in company with their friends as the rite by which they were definitely placed upon the conjugal footing. The view is supported by the fact that at a late period the feast was still treated as so essential a part of the proceedings that γάμος stands equally for the marriage and the supper (Mt 22^{4}). Its original significance would thus have been similar to that of the confarreatio—a mode of contracting marriage through a sacrificial use of bread anciently practised in Rome. It was, however, inevitable that in course of time a more definite rite should be instituted. The most natural occasion might seem to be the point at which the bridegroom came to fetch the bride from her parents, but the evidence goes to show that the matter was still in suspense so long as her parents, who accompanied her to the feast, were at her side. The act upon which attention would readily fasten as the decisive and uniting act was the leading of the bride to her ‘chamber,’ which in the old period was a tent specially erected for the wedded pair. The central importance of this act is further attested by the circumstance that the chamber (חֻפָּה) supplied a name for marriage—marriage being described, as it were, as ‘the tenting’ (Wellhausen, op. cit. p. 444). Out of this other acts would as naturally develop to form a kind of ritual. From a hint in Mal 2 it is supposed that the pair entered into a solemn covenant, and it is also probable that the good wishes of the company came to be crystallized into definite benedictions craving prosperity and posterity. After the Exile the ‘covenant’ was embodied in a written contract (To 7^{13} συγγραφή, כְּתוּבָּה).

This somewhat conjectural account of the ancient marriage ceremony would have an important addition could we follow Mackie in interpreting Ps 19^{6} in the light of modern custom. ‘At a Jewish wedding,’ he says, ‘the most interesting feature is the canopy under which the bridegroom and bride sit or stand during the ceremony. It is erected in the court or large room of the house where the guests are assembled, and it is made of palm branches and embroidered cloth. It is suggestive of the dome sometimes seen above pulpits, and gives to the wedding the appearance of a coronation. . . . The sight of the robed bridegroom issuing from the canopy (tabernacle) and receiving the congratulations of his friends suggested the simile of the sunrise in Ps 19^{5}’ (p. 123). But in early times the ḥuppah would seem to have been an actual tent (cf. Jl 2^{16}), and the canopy described by Mackie (a picture of which is given in Bodenschatz, Kirch. Verfas. iv. p. 126) is doubtless a late ornamental erection evolved from the old bridal tent.

The wedding festivities which followed were long drawn out. In ancient times, as still among the fellaheen of Syria, the usual period for the rejoicings was a week (Jg 7). Feasting, music, and dancing, such as celebrated the return of the Prodigal Son, were the staple of the festivities of the season, and we hear of the exercise of the wits by riddles and wagers (ib.). The expense must have pressed somewhat heavily on the humbler folk—the more so that a marriage seems to have been treated as a festival for the community, and more than one thrifty saw in Pr may well have been suggested by an extravagance that injured the guest with the host. It is probable that then as now some contribution towards the cost was made in the case of peasant marriages by the guests themselves (Tristram, p. 93).

One of the most important contributions to this subject is the description of the marriage rejoicings of the Palestinian fellaheen in an article on the Syrian threshing-sledge by Dr. J. G. Wetzstein (Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Bd. v. 1873, p. 287 ff.). The following are the principal points. During the seven days following the wedding the young couple are treated by the villagers as king and queen; the threshing-floor, where they are married, is their court; and the threshing-sledge is their throne. March is the favourite month. The most prominent incidents of the wedding-day are the sword-dance of the bride, and the great feast. On the following day they hold a reception, being greeted first by the best-man (wezîr), then by the friends of the bridegroom (sebâb el-'aris). Then the sledge is transported on stalwart shoulders, with singing of martial or erotic songs, to the threshing-floor. Here a stage or scaffolding some two ells high is erected, and on this the sledge is placed and covered over with a gaily-coloured carpet on which two embroidered cushions are planted. On this with all pomp the husband and wife are enthroned. A tribunal is then set up, whose business is to ascertain that the marriage has been consummated (Dt 22^{13-21}). The tribunal being satisfied, there follow dancing and singing, the staple of the song being praise of the graces of the newly wedded pair (cf. Ca 4–7). Games follow, which begin on the first day in the morning, on the succeeding days shortly before noon, and last late into the night. During the whole week their majesties wear their festal clothes, do not work, and merely look on at the games—except that now and again the queen joins in a dance. The expenses are borne by the friends of the bridegroom eked out by fines. The proceedings end with a supper, and the degradation of the king to his proper rank. 'The festal regulations are annulled, the jokes become rougher, and scarcely is the meal over when a pair of hands smear the king's face from a dung-heap' (p. 293).

* The following realistic description by a modern traveller is of use in this connexion: ‘He found that the villagers of Schwat-el-Blat were engaged in the wedding festivities of one of the young men of the family. After the reception, etc., a huge platter, 6 feet in diameter, made of tinned copper, was brought in, on which was piled a mountain of boiled crushed wheat mingled with morsels of boiled meat. When this had been set in place, a dish of melted, clarified butter was poured over the wheat until it was quite saturated. Loaves of bread in the form of cakes were placed by the side of the platter, and the guests, rolling up their sleeves, proceeded to help themselves with their fingers, and consumed the provisions, as is usual, in silence. Water and soap were then passed around to the guests, who washed off the remains of their greasy meal, after which coffee and pipes were served’ (Pal. Expl. Fund Quart. St. 1888, p. 204).

iv. THE MORAL SUBVERSION OF MARRIAGE.—Adultery falls to be considered here as the practice subversive of the institution of marriage (Old Eng. aéw-bryce, Germ. Ehebruch).

נִאֻפִים 'adultery' (Jer 13^{27}, Ezk 23^{43}), verb נָאַף Qal and Pi. (Ex 20^{14}, Dt 5^{18} etc.); μοιχεία (Jn 8^3), and of the same group μοιχός (Lk 18^{11}), μοιχεύειν (Mt 5^{27}), μοιχᾶσθαι (Mt 5^{32}), μοιχαλίς (2 P 2^{14}).

The biblical conception of adultery is often expressed by saying that, as in Roman law, a woman could violate only her own marriage, a man only that of another. In other words, an unchaste bride was guilty of adultery, an unchaste husband was guilty of it only if he sinned along with the bride of another. If in certain cases the law took cognizance of a husband's licentiousness, it was because it involved infringement of property rights, and gave rise to a claim for damages (Ex 22^{16}, Dt 22^{29}).

At a certain stage of social evolution, adultery is commonly regarded as an injury which a husband is entitled to avenge by slaying the culprits; and when important powers of the family come to be taken over by the nation, it often happens that the death-penalty continues to be attached, at least in theory, to the capital sexual crime (Post, Studien, p. 353 ff.). To this generalization of the sociologist the history of adultery among the Hebrews closely corresponds. According to the tradition the unfaithful wife was in old times put to death (by burning, Gn 38^{24}), and, alike from the character of the people and the duties anciently assigned to the Goel, it may be assumed that the wrong was one which was held to invite and justify the extreme of vengeance. The legislation confirmed the estimate of its enormity—the Decalogue condemns both the overt act and the lawless desire in which it originates (Ex $20^{14.\,17}$), and the prohibition is solemnly repeated in the later legislation, and supported by the sanction of capital punishment. The mode of execution varied with the standing of the woman: a guilty wife was to be put to death, i.e. strangled, along with her paramour (Dt 22^{22}; cf. Lv 20^{10}), while a betrothed woman who should be seduced was to be stoned (v.^{24}). If, however, the betrothed woman was seduced in circumstances suggesting that she had been violated, the man only was to be executed: she received the benefit of the doubt (v.$^{25\text{ff.}}$); if she was a bondmaid, the culprit escaped with a guilt-offering (Lv $19^{20\text{ff.}}$)). In the case of a priest's daughter, the punishment of sexual immorality was death by burning (Lv 21^9). The same high ground is taken by Ezekiel, who threatens the adulterer with death (18^{11}).

It must be added that there is no evidence that the capital penalty was actually inflicted in historical times. In late Jewish practice the penalties were merely divorce, with the wife's forfeiture of her dowry (Bodenschatz, Kirch. Verfass. iv. p. 164); and a long tract of earlier practice is disposed of by Lightfoot, who remarks: 'I do not remember that I have anywhere, in the Jewish Pandect, met with an example of a wife punished for adultery with death' (Hor. Heb. ad Mat. 19^8). The NT evidence is to the same effect. In His references to the subject (Mt 5^{32} etc.) Jesus implies that it simply entailed divorce. The reason given for Joseph's purpose to put away his betrothed wife privily is that he was a just man—a reason which could hardly have been given if he had been frustrating the recognized operation of the law, and saving Mary from the usual death by stoning (Mt 1^{19}). The weightiest evidence on the other side is derived from the narrative of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8^{3-11}). From the reference to stoning it might be inferred that her status was that of a betrothed woman, and the implication of the narrative seems to be that there was but a step between her and death. It is, however, to be remembered that Jesus was surrounded by enemies who laboured to entangle Him in His talk—esp. to bring Him into collision with Moses; and the plot in this instance doubtless was to 'put Him in the dilemma of either declaring for the revival of a practice which had already become obsolete, or of giving His sanction to the apparent infraction of the law which the substitution of divorce involved' (art. 'Adultery,' Kitto, Bib. Cycl.). At all events, the reply of Jesus supported the abrogation of the law: until judges were found, themselves innocent as tried by His own heart-searching test, the title was wanting to execute the law of Moses (v.^{7}). Nor do the historical records of the pre-Christian period supply any evidence of the operation of the law in the exaction of the death-penalty. On the contrary, the prophetical writings imply that there was widespread guilt and widespread immunity. If the story of Hosea be accepted, as by most moderns, as a real history, and as implying the post-nuptial fall of the prophet's wife, it would follow that in the 8th cent. the law not only did not inflict capital punishment, but did not even (as later) insist on divorce. In spite of the legal enactments, then, it may be assumed that death was not actually inflicted, and that it was deemed that the husband was sufficiently protected by his right of divorce, the woman sufficiently punished by loss of status and property, while the adulterer might be mulcted in damages.

In OT it is sought to intensify the moral sentiment on the subject by picturing the miserable disguises and subterfuges of the adulterer, and by dwelling on the risks to which he was exposed—as degradation (Pr 2^{18}), poverty (6^{26}), and the strokes of unbridled vengeance (5^{8-10}). In NT (1 Co 6^9) the sin is declared to be utterly inconsistent with a Christian standing, and to entail exclusion from the eternal kingdom (1 Co 6^9).

A charge of adultery was ordinarily substantiated at a formal trial. The reason for this, when the death-penalty was no longer inflicted, was at least partly connected with money. A husband could divorce his wife on suspicion, but if he did not prove his case she retained the 'dowry.' It lay, however, in the character of the crime that it was often impossible to prove guilt according to the ordinary canons of evidence, and to meet this difficulty P provides that a suspected woman shall submit to trial by ordeal (Nu 5^{11-31}).

The particulars of the remarkable enactment of the ordeal of the waters of bitterness are as follows:—

(1) The trial takes place when a husband forms a suspicion, founded or unfounded, of his wife's chastity (vv.$^{12-14}$).

(2) The procedure is that he brings his wife to the priest, along with a sacrificial gift of barley-meal (v.^{15}); the priest sets her 'before the Lord' (v.^{16}), loosens her hair (v.^{18}), places in her hand the meal-offering (v.^{18}), and stands before her holding an earthen vessel which contains a potion of holy water sprinkled with dust from the floor of the tabernacle (v.^{17}). He then sets apart the potion to its judicial use—declaring that if she be innocent it will not injure her, if guilty it will cause her belly to swell and her thigh to shrink (v.^{22}). The woman having acquiesced with an 'Amen,' the priest writes down the curses, washes them off, adds the rinsings as a new ingredient to the potion (v.^{23}), and after some ritualistic observances gives her the water to drink (v.^{26}).

(3) The issue is a judgment of condemnation or acquittal. If guilty, she is smitten with the threatened diseases (usually supposed to include dropsy, Jos. Ant. III. xi. 6), and is shunned as accursed (v.^{27}); if innocent, she has the compensation of again becoming a mother (v.^{28}).

In the ordeal of the bitter waters (so called as the instrument of a curse) we have doubtless an ancient custom surviving in a modified form, and amended in the interests of good sense and humanity. Similar practices have been discovered among other peoples, e.g. in Sierra Leone and Upper Guinea, and, according to various authorities, in the African practice it is common to employ a deadly poison, when the accused may hope to escape only by the accident of vomiting, or by the surreptitious use of an antidote. In the OT legislation, on the other hand, the case was not prejudged against the accused; the ingredients of the potion were innocuous, and reliance was placed on exposure through divine intervention. That the ordeal was at least occasionally efficacious in revealing guilt through the workings of fear and an accusing conscience, need not be doubted.

From the long persistence in Christendom of the judicium Dei in various forms (judicium ignis, aquæ, panis adjurati, etc.), the last trace of which only disappeared in the 18th century, it may be surmised that the ordeal appeals strongly to human nature. But among the Jews as among the Christians, experience bred doubts as to its trustworthiness. Sometimes the curse failed to operate, and that although the guilt was morally certain, or was established by later discoveries. Of such miscarriages of justice two explanations were offered. God, it might be said, stayed His hand because adultery had become so common among the accusing husbands that they had lost all claim to justice as against their wives.* Another reason was discovered in the doctrine of 'merits,' and it was suggested that, on the ground of other good deeds, the woman might, if not altogether escape, at least have the punishment deferred. But at all events it was no longer relied upon, and so naturally fell into disuse.

v. THE LEGAL DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE.—Divorce (Old Eng. hiw-gedales, forlaeton, Germ. Ehescheidung) is expressed in Heb. and Gr. by a number of words embodying the idea of dismissal or separation. The usual Heb. verb is שִׁלַּח 'to send away,' LXX ἐξαποστέλλειν (Dt 22^{19}, Jer 3^{1}), and for the practice of divorce שַׁלַּח is once used (Mal 2^{16}); in the later books יָצָא occurs in Hiph. ('make to go forth,' Ezr 10$^{3.19}$). A divorced woman is אִשָּׁה גְרוּשָׁה (Lv 21^{7}, Ezk 44^{22}). The bill of divorce (Old Eng. hiw-gedales bôk, later 'book of forsaking') is סֵפֶר כְּרִיתֻת (Dt 24^{1}). In classical Greek the legal terms are ἀποπέμπεσθαι, ἀποπομπή (of the man), ἀπόλειψις (usually of the woman). In the Greek of NT their place is taken by three verbs: (1) ἀπολύειν, used throughout the Synopt. (Mt 1^{19} 5$^{31.32}$, Mk 10$^{2.4}$, Lk 16^{18}); (2) ἀφιέναι, which with St. Paul describes the action either of husband or wife in promoting divorce (1 Co 7$^{11.12.13}$, cf. Rev 2^{4}), but in Synopt. has the meaning of 'leaving' a wife at death to another (Mt 22^{25}); (3) χωρίζειν, χωρίζεσθαι, 'to separate, depart,' then (cf. scheiden) to terminate a marriage union (1 Co 7$^{10.11.15}$). In the translation of those terms, both AV and RV are timid about using 'divorce,' and prefer the vaguer phrases of 'putting away' (ἀπολύειν) and 'depart' (χωρίζειν), the explanation of which is to be sought in a desire partly to mark the fact that ancient and modern divorce are on a different legal footing, partly to avoid prejudicing the much disputed question as to the dissolubility of marriage.

The Jewish law of divorce has a long history, beginning with the early period in which the right of 'putting away' a wife appears as the traditional prerogative of the husband, then passing into the stage in which the exercise of the right was at least impeded by prophetic protest and legislative enactment, and ending with the effective protection of the wife's position, alike by the Talmudic jurisprudence and the ethics of the Gospel.

That the power of divorce should have been anciently regarded as a traditional right was in harmony with the general ideas and practice of the time in regard to woman's status. When compensation was given to the wife's relatives it was natural to regard her under the point of view of property, and the notion of property involves liberty to alienate it. In heathen Arabia the continuance of a marriage depended on the husband's pleasure, and Mohammed was content to leave matters on the old footing (Wellhausen, Gött. Nach. 1893, p. 452 ff.). The old Hebrew practice, perhaps also the very procedure, is exemplified in Abraham's dismissal of Hagar (Gn 21^{14}). From the action of Saul (1 S 25^{44}) it might be supposed that the wife's father had also power to dissolve a marriage, but the transference of Michal to another husband by paternal authority evidently has the aspect of an outrage.

The Deut. code acknowledged the husband's right of divorce, but guarded against its abuse. To prevent so important a step being taken in the heat of passion, it required him deliberately to write her 'a bill of divorcement' (24^{1}). Another check was imposed upon impulsive action by the provision that, under certain conditions, the separation should be final—if, that is, the divorced woman should marry a second time, and should later on be again free to marry (vv.$^{3.4}$). That this was an innovation may be inferred from the story of Hosea (Nowack, Arch. i. p. 347). The purely arbitrary exercise of the prerogative was discouraged by assuming that there was some solid ground of resentment—'that she finds no favour in his eyes because he hath found some unseemly thing in her' (v.^{1}, see below). In certain cases, again, the right of divorce was forfeited by misconduct. The husband who falsely charged his wife with antenuptial fornication (22$^{13-19}$), and the ravisher of a betrothed virgin (22$^{28.29}$), were bound in perpetuity by the marriage tie. In the school of the prophets the higher conception of woman's claims, which has some expression in Dt, found more definite utterance. The germ of the Deut. reforms, and of greater than these, was contained in J (Gn 2$^{18-25}$), which in the narrative of the Creation had described the husband as knit to the wife in the most intimate union. It is, however, in Mal that the prophetic spirit definitely breaks with established custom, and declares without qualification that God hateth divorce (2^{16}). God's disregard of the sacrifices is due, he teaches, to His wrath at men's treacherous dealing with the wife of their youth (v.^{14}). In the period following the Exile it would seem that divorce had become very common; doubtless the divorce of strange women required by Ezra (9. 10) had reacted upon the general practice, and had retarded and even set back the movement carried forward by the prophets.

In the succeeding period interest centred in the question of the precise nature of the Deut. condition justifying divorce, and the vagueness of the language in which the wife's offence was described gave rise to one of the most famous of rabbinical controversies: What was the 'unseemly thing' (עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, lit. 'nakedness of a thing,' LXX ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα)? The account of the dispute is given as follows in the Mishna (Giṭṭin ix. 10):—

'The school of Shammai says, "No one shall divorce his wife

[*] 'After that adulterers multiplied, the bitter waters ceased, and R. Jochanan Saccai abolished their use according to Hos 4^{14} I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, for they themselves go apart,' etc.—Mishna, Sota, cap. 9, Surenhusius. iii. p. 291.

unless there shall have been found in her some unchastity (דבר ערוה 'a thing or matter of nakedness'), since it is written, Because he hath found the nakedness of a thing (ערות דבר) in her"; the school of Hillel says, "Even if she shall have burned his food in cooking, since it is written, Because he hath found in her the nakedness of a thing" (i.e. anything); R. Akiba says, "Even if he find another fairer than she, as it is written, If she find no favour in his eyes."' As indicated in this passage, the latitudinarian view was adopted on the ground that the governing principle is laid down in the opening clause 'if she find no favour in his eyes,' and it was also supported by reference to v.^{3}, where it is implied that a second husband will also divorce the woman if he hate her. The emphasis was also laid on 'matter' rather than on 'unseemly,' thereby suggesting that the unseemliness might appear in various matters. The school of Shammai treated the second clause as the significant one, and emphasized 'unseemly,' which they interpreted as meaning immoral or at least indecent conduct. The opinion of Hillel was generally adopted as the true representation of the state of the law ('decisio juxta scholam Hillelis,' Maimon. in loc.), although it is to be remembered that many who endorsed the position as jurists condemned it as moralists. 'Over him who divorces the wife of his youth,' said R. Eleazar, 'even the altar of God sheds tears' (Amram, Jewish Law of Divorce, p. 37). That 'the unseemly thing' was not a euphemism for unchastity may be confidently assumed in view of the fact that Dt prescribes the capital punishment for adultery. But recent scholarship at least agrees with Shammai in confining it to the region of immodest or indecent behaviour (Driver, in loc.).

Upon this vexed question of the schools the judgment of Jesus was eagerly sought (Mt 19^{3-9}, Mk 10^{1-12}), and in view of the great practical importance of the subject it was even spontaneously given (Mt $5^{31.32}$, Lk 16^{18}). Our Lord decreed in favour of the rigorous view, and indeed disallowed any ground of divorce, with the probable exception of adultery. He does not, it is true, base this on His interpretation of 'the unseemly thing'; on the contrary, He grants that the Mosaic law gave some latitude in the matter of divorce, and goes on to reform the law so as to bring it into conformity with the older ideal (Gn 2^{24}), or the original purpose of God. But did Jesus allow even adultery to be a valid ground of divorce? A negative answer is given from opposite quarters. The Rom. Cath. Church, as is well known, is committed to the position that adultery does not justify the total dissolution of a marriage (quoad vinculum) between two Christians, but only separation from 'bed and board,'[*] and some modern German critics have supported this contention as at least corresponding to the teaching and intention of Christ. This view, it must be admitted, is not without foundation, while yet regard for the accepted canons of NT criticism precludes the claim that it has been established.

A presumption that Jesus intended to prohibit divorce in all cases is created by the following considerations:—(1) In two passages of the Gospels it is stated without reservation that 'he who putteth away his wife and marrieth another committeth adultery' (Lk 16^{18}, cf. Mk 10^{11}), and the Pauline report of our Lord's teaching on the subject (1 Co $7^{10.11}$) is similarly unqualified; (2) it is in harmony with the spirit of Christ's general teaching to suppose that He inculcated towards the erring one utter constancy in love and forgiveness unto seventy times seven. The Book of Hosea, it may be added, shows the possibility of a love which feels that the bond which binds a husband to even a faithless wife is indissoluble. But the force of this seems to be dissipated by the fact that Jesus actually admitted the exception in the proviso, 'saving for the cause of fornication'[†] (Mt 5^{32} 19^{9}). The objection is met in two ways. (1) The Rom. Cath. theologians deny that the punishment contemplated was more than a separation, and urge in proof that the woman who is put away commits adultery if she marries another. If the union was really dissolved, it is argued, there could be no allegation of adultery. But these statements rest on erroneous exegesis. The verb ἀπολύειν was a recognized Hellenistic term for divorce, and could not convey to the early Christians the modified conception of a separation. Further, it is not certain that according to this passage Christ taught that a man committed adultery by marrying a divorced guilty wife, and consequently it may be held that in her case at least the marriage was regarded as annulled by divorce.[*] (2) Instead of explaining away the exception, Bleek, Keim, and others have denied the genuineness of the clause specifying it, and this on the ground that the original unqualified statement of Jesus was felt to be a stumbling-block, and that the exception ('saving for the cause of fornication') crept into the traditional report as a concession to the realities of social life. In support of the genuineness it is pointed out that the MSS indicate no uncertainty as to the reliability of the text in Mt; while the absence of the exception from the parallel passages in Mk and Lk is explained either by saying that it was taken for granted (Meyer), or by recalling that the law already provided for the punishment of adultery (Schegg). Yet another suggestion is that the teaching of Jesus, which was originally comparatively lenient, eventually withdrew the single concession which had been made (Hug, quoted in Weiss-Meyer, in loc.). The question at issue must eventually be settled in the light of a general theory as to the trustworthiness of the Synoptic report of our Lord's sayings, and the explanation of the Synoptic divergencies; and it must be added that this particular instance does not materially strengthen the evidence that the oral tradition seriously modified the sayings of our Lord (on this subject cf. Bruce, Kingdom of God, Crit. Introd.).

Among Protestant writers the more urgent question has been whether, consistently with the teaching of Christ and His apostles, divorce may be sought on other grounds than adultery; and the laxer modern practice has usually been justified as an extended application of the principle embodied in the words ascribed to Jesus.

The prima facie sense of the relative passages in the Gospels (Mt 5^{32} 19^{9}) certainly is that Jesus permitted divorce on one ground only, though the precise bearing of His references to remarriage presents considerable difficulties.[†] Are we then to describe a system of law which has multiplied grounds of divorce as openly defiant of the mind of Christ? To this it is replied in the first place that the apostolic teaching sanctioned further extension. The reference is to what Roman Catholics call 'the Pauline privilege' (1 Co $7^{15.16}$), according to which if a Christian husband or wife is deserted by his or her consort—being an unbeliever, the former is declared to be no longer under bondage, i.e. free to marry again. In the second place, it is contended that in this case Jesus, as in so many other cases, states a principle under the form of a particular instance, and that other instances are to be allowed which can be shown to embody the same principle.[‡] And certainly it must be granted in general that the Christian morality does not consist of a cast-iron system of laws, but rather of germinal principles which entail the labour and responsibility of thinking out their inmost significance and judging as to their proper application. In the evangelical precept the spirit counts for more than the letter. If, therefore, we assume that Jesus allowed divorce at all, which is the most doubtful point in the argument, it is quite legitimate to extend the exception to cases involving a real moral subversion of marriage under the proviso that the verification of such be taken out of private hands and vested in a public tribunal. Nor can it be said that, at least in Great Britain, the occasions of legal dissolution allowed by law amount to less than a moral subversion.

[*] 'If any one saith that the Church has erred in that she hath taught and doth teach, in accordance with the evangelical and apostolical doctrine, that the bond of matrimony cannot be dissolved on account of the adultery of one of the married parties; and that both, or even the innocent one who gave not occasion to the adultery, can not contract another marriage during the lifetime of the other'; and that he is guilty of adultery who, having put away the adulteress, shall take another wife, as also she who, having put away the adulterer, shall take another husband, let him be anathema' (Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, De Sacr. Matri., Can. VII.).

[†] It has been held by some critics that as the word used is πορνεία, the justification of divorce here admitted was antenuptial fornication; but cf. Weiss-Meyer, in loc.

[*] The weakness of the exegetical argument is obviously felt by a recent Rom. Cath. writer, who, after admitting the reality of the difficulty, and pleading that the passage be interpreted in the light of the clearer Scriptures, remarks that the matter affords a good instance of the impossibility of arriving at any assured interpretation of Scripture except in the light of the traditional teaching of the Catholic Church (Hunter, Dogm. Theology, § 815).

[†] As regards remarriage, the main exegetical difficulty is to know whether the phrase, 'whosoever marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery' (Mt 5^{32}), prohibits the remarriage of every divorced woman, or only that of a woman who has been unlawfully divorced. The latter view, supported by Weiss-Meyer and Alford (who translates 'her when put away'), is the natural one, though it has the curious consequence that an innocent wife is, but a guilty wife is not, prohibited from forming a second marriage. The husband of a guilty wife, as is clearly implied in Mt 19^{9}, may marry again; and by parity of reasoning, in a case which could not lawfully occur in the Jewish Church, a woman who has divorced her husband on the ground of his immorality should be free to take another husband. On the other hand, it does not follow that a legal dissolution of marriage justifies remarriage. The legal decision gives rise, for the Christian conscience, to the further question whether the marriage has been broken in the sense intended by Christ.

[‡] This argument is suggestively stated by Newman Smyth (Christian Ethics, p. 410 ff.): 'There is no other legitimate principle for divorce than that presented by the nature of the sin of adultery. If, however, we can say with a good conscience that some other sin (some sin which possibly in Christ's day had not reached its full measure of iniquity—a sin, for instance, like drunkenness, which may utterly destroy the spiritual unity of a home and threaten even the physical security of one of the persons bound by the vows of marriage) is the moral equivalent of the cause which our Lord had immediately before Him for pronouncing divorce, we shall be justified in admitting it to be likewise a proper Christian ground for divorce?' Martensen argues to a similar purpose (Christian Ethics, Social, p. 41 ff.).

While Christianity broke down the husband's right of divorce along one line, on another the Talmudic law was developed with the purpose of impeding its exercise.

The most important provisions making in this direction may be thus distinguished: (1) Inculcation of the doctrine that the right was not absolute by the statement of grounds justifying it—viz. suspicion of adultery, violation of decency and of Jewish customs, obstruction of religious service, refusal of conjugal rights; (2) enforcement of penalty in the restoration of the 'dowry'; (3) complication of procedure in carrying out the divorce; (4) deprivation of the right in cases where the husband had come under some incapacity, e.g. as insane, or as a deaf-mute, or where the wife—as insane, or a captive, or a minor—was specially entitled to protection (cf. Amram, Jewish Law of Div. c. 4, 'Laws of the Mishna restricting the husband's right to divorce'). On the other hand, circumstances were specified in which the husband was compelled to divorce his wife, viz. cases of adultery, clandestine intercourse, leprosy, childlessness, etc. (Hamburger, art. 'Scheiden'). The abolition of the man's theoretical right to divorce was decreed in 11th cent. by Rabbi Gershom, who enacted that 'as the man does not put away his wife except of his own free will, so shall the woman not be put away except by her own consent' (Amram, op. cit. p. 52). The decree, however, was not universally accepted as law by the Jews, and is ignored by Maimonides (ib.).

The right of the wife to divorce her husband, which was conceded at least under later Greek and Roman law, was an idea repugnant to Hebrew custom and enactment. The only trace of such an idea is the legal provision that if a bondwoman become a wife, and if she be denied conjugal rights, she shall go out free without money (Ex 21^{7-11}). This, however, was not a concession to the woman of power to divorce; in any such case the theory was that the husband was called upon, in the exercise of his exclusive prerogative, to put away his wife (Amram, op. cit. p. 60). Under the influence of alien customs, and with the support of Roman law, the practice came into vogue in NT times, whereby the wife directly repudiated the husband by sending him a 'bill of divorce.' The innovation was opposed by Jos. (Ant. XV. vii. 11, XVIII. v. 5), and was expressly condemned by our Lord in the words, 'if a woman shall put away her husband and marry another, she committeth adultery' (Mk 10^{12}). The Talmudists upheld the old theory, allowing the wife to demand divorce in certain cases—e.g. leprosy, apostasy, cruelty, impotence (Amram, op. cit. c. 5).

The writing or bill of divorcement (סֵפֶר כְּרִיתֻת, Talm. גֵּט, Gr. βιβλίον ἀποστασίου), which figures so largely in this subject, was of great antiquity (Dt 24^{1}, Is 50^{1}, Jer 3^{8}). In earlier times no great ceremony was used (Gn 21^{14}), and the form of words would doubtless be similar to those in use among the Arabs.[*] While necessary to make a divorce legal, it would appear that in the time of our Lord the 'bill' could be granted without bringing the matter under the cognizance of the authorities (Mt 1^{19}). From the Mishna, a treatise of which takes its name from the 'bill' (Giṭṭin), it appears that most elaborate regulations were enforced in regard to the judiciary, clerk, witnesses, time and place, and also the medium and mode of the delivery of the document. The following is given by Maimonides as an ancient and model form of the geṭ or bill: 'On the —— day of the week and —— day of the month of —— in the year —— since the creation of the world (or of the era of the Seleucidæ), the era according to which we are accustomed to reckon in this place, to wit, the town of —— do I —— the son of —— of the town of —— (and by whatever other name or surname I or my father may be known, and my town and his town), thus determine, being of sound mind and under no constraint; and I do release and send away and put aside thee —— daughter of —— of the town of —— (and by whatever other name or surname thou and thy father are known and thy town and his town), who hast been my wife from time past hitherto, and hereby I do release thee and send thee away and put thee aside that thou mayest have permission and control over thyself to go to be married to any man whom thou desirest, and no man shall hinder thee (in my name) from this day forever. And thou art permitted (to be married) to any man. And these presents shall be unto thee from me a bill of dismissal, a document of release and a letter of freedom, according to the law of Moses and Israel.

—— the son of —— a witness.
—— the son of —— a witness.'

(Amram, pp. 157-158, with which cf. original text and Latin rendering in Surenhusius, Mishnah, iii. p. 323, and commentary, ib. p. 325).

vi. MARRIAGE AS A SYMBOL OF SPIRITUAL TRUTHS.—Although modern exegesis has given up the idea that in Canticles divine love is set forth under the image of human love, it is a familiar biblical thought that the marriage relationship is typical of the union and communion of God with His people. After Hosea, whose domestic life is reasonably supposed to have impressed him with the suitableness of the imagery, it became a commonplace of prophecy that God was to Israel as a husband, and Israel to God as a bride (Hos 2^{19}, Jer 3^{14} 31^{32}, Is 54^{5}).[*] The conception passed over into NT, but with modifications agreeable to the nature of Christianity—the bridegroom being now God in Christ (Mt 9^{15}, Jn 3^{29}), the bride the spiritual Israel elect out of every nation (2 Co 11^{2}, Rev 19^{7}).

Now, this conception of God as the husband, though it has been little utilized in theology, cannot be said to be less apt or important than the two other conceptions of God which have been made the basis of systems. These are the idea of God as King, which lays the main stress on the divine sovereignty, and the idea of God as Father, which lays the main stress on the divine love. And as the weakness of the system built upon the principle of the divine sovereignty has been widely felt to be that it does less than justice to the ethical being of God; and as, on the other hand, the theology based on the divine fatherhood has been in danger of obscuring the divine might and majesty, there is certainly something to be said for putting in the forefront the thought of Hosea, which, representing God as husband, equally emphasizes to our minds His sovereignty and His goodness.

How large a portion of the body of Christian doctrine may be set forth, and with the sanction of Scripture, under the category of the marriage relation, may be briefly indicated.

(1) Under the doctrine of God this representation, besides embodying as its fundamental principles the divine sovereignty and love, lays special stress on the attributes of clemency and long-suffering, while it safeguards the holiness of God by showing Him grieved and provoked to anger by contumacy and unfaithfulness (Hos passim). As husband God also provides for His people (2^{8}).

(2) The doctrine of sin is, from this point of view, characterized as adultery (Hos 2^{2}, Jer 3^{9} 13^{27};

[*] Two formulæ are given by W. R. Smith (Kinship, pp. 94, 163: 'Begone, for I will no longer drive thy flocks to the pasture.' 'Thou art to me as the back of my mother'; cf. the Latin formula: 'Tuas res tibi habeto, tuas res tibi agito.'

[*] The germ of the conception, according to W. R. Smith, was found in Semitic heathenism; and the service of Hosea was to purify the gross physical conception of the god as the husband of the motherland, and to apply it to describe moral relations of Jehovah with His people (Prophets of Israel, new ed. p. 170 ff.).

on אַחֲרֵי זוֹנָה see Driver on Dt 31^{16})—a designation which, as regards (a) the nature of sin, indicates that its essence consists in indifference or even hatred toward God, and the giving of the affections to other objects (Hos 2^5, Jer 2^{20}, Ezk 20^{30}); (b) the heinousness of sin, draws attention to its aggravation as unfaithfulness to solemn obligation and ingratitude for high favours (Jer 5^7); and (c) the punishment of sin, teaches that persistence in it entails a casting-off, of which human divorce is a pale emblem (Hos $2^{12ff.}$, Jer $2^{35ff.}$).

(3) In the Christological doctrine the points which are chiefly emphasized by the conception are the love of Christ, His kingly office as exercised in His headship over the Church, and His intimate union with it through the indwelling Spirit (2 Co 11^2, Eph 5^{23-32}).

(4) In close relation to the last the doctrine of the Church is elucidated and enriched by the assertion of its mystical union with and dependence upon Christ (Eph. loc. cit.), and of its essential note of sanctity—the latter, which includes all the graces included in sanctification, being beautifully portrayed as the bridal adornment (Rev 19^8).

(5) Finally, as regards eschatology, the figure concentrates attention on the momentous event of the Second Coming, which is sudden as the coming of the bridegroom (Mt 25^{1-13}), and places in a clear light the bliss, the security, and unutterable glory of the everlasting kingdom (Rev 19^7 $21^{2.9}$).

LITERATURE.—Next to the Scriptures the chief source is the division of the Mishna סדר נשים (Liber de re uxoria), containing, with two others, the treatises יבמוֹת (de levirorum in fratrias officio), כתובות (de dote literisque matrimonialibus), סוטה (de uxore adulterii suspecta), גטין (de divortiis), and קדושין (de sponsalibus)—pt. 3 in the ed. of Surenhusius, Amsterdam, 1700. The best of the above material is collected in Selden, Uxor Hebraica, London, 1546, and Hamburger, Real-Encyclopædie für Bibel und Talmud, Breslau, 1870. Of the older articles, that in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopædia is distinguished by Talmudic erudition. The recent German manuals which cover the ground are Benzinger, Heb. Arch., Freiburg, 1894, cf. his 'Familie u. Ehe' in Hauck=Herzog³; Nowack, Lehrb. der Heb. Arch., Bd. i., Freiburg, 1894, with which may be mentioned Stade, GVI, Berlin, 1887, i. pp. 371–395. On primitive marriage the chief works from the general standpoint are M'Lennan, Primitive Marriage, reprinted in Studies in Ancient History, London, 1876; Starcke, The Primitive Family, London, 1889; Westermarck, History of Human Marriage, London, 1891; Post, Studien zur Entwickelungsgeschichte des Familienrechts, Leipzig, 1889; while the theories are tested in the Semitic field with special knowledge by W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, Cambridge, 1895, and Wellhausen, 'Die Ehe bei den Arabern' in the Göttinger Nachrichten, 1893, p. 431 ff., following Wilken, Das Matriarchat bei den alten Arabern, 1884. For the interpretation of the laws there is much to be learned from Michaelis, Mosaisches Recht, Eng. tr. 'Commentaries on the Laws of Moses,' London, 1814. Amram, Jewish Law of Divorce according to Bible and Talmud, London, 1897, is an important discussion by a legal expert. See also Fenton, Early Hebrew Life, London, 1880; Jacobs, *Studies in Bibl. MARSENA (מַרְסְנָא; Μαλησεάρ AB, Μαλισεάρ, Μαρσανά; Marsana).—One of the seven princes of Media and Persia, who 'sat first in the kingdom,' and had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1^{14}, cf. ADMATHA). The name is doubtless Persian, but the derivation is uncertain.

MARSHAL.—The word does not occur in AV, but in RV it represents two Heb. words. (1) סֹפֵר ṣōphēr (Jg 5^{14}) in the difficult phrase מֹשְׁכִים בְּשֵׁבֶט סֹפֵר '[out of Zebulun] they that handle the marshal's staff' (RV). The usual meaning of סֹפֵר is 'scribe' or 'writer,' and so AV, agreeing with Syr.* ܕܟܬܒܝܢ ܒܩܢܝܐ ܕܣܦܪܐ and Targ. כתבין בקולמוס דספר, gives 'They that handle the pen of the writer.' None of the Greek versions, however, give 'pen,' in A בשבט = ἐν σκήπτρῳ, in B and Theod. ἐν ῥάβδῳ, in Symm. μετὰ ῥάβδου. Therefore we may take Greek authority to be on the side of 'marshal' as against 'scribe,' 'writer,' though an abstract noun, acc. to A ἡγήσεως, acc. to B (and Theod.) διηγήσεως (error for ἡγήσεως?), seems to be the original Septuagint rendering. B offers γραμματέως as a second rendering, and Symm. has γραμματέως only, the meaning of which is 'marshal' as appears from 1 Mac 5^{42}, ἔστησεν (sc. Judas) τοὺς γραμματεῖς τοῦ λαοῦ ἐπὶ τοῦ χειμάρρου. The office of a marshal was to help the general to maintain discipline. His wand of office (σκῆπτρον or ῥάβδος) could be used, if necessary, for inflicting chastisement.

(2) טִפְסָר ṭiphṣār (Jer 51^{27}) or טַפְסְר ṭaphṣēr (Nah 3^{17}). The meaning of this word—a loan-word in Heb.—is not certainly known, but Lenormant (followed by most scholars) compares the Bab.-Assyr. dupsarru [dupšarru, Delitzsch], 'tablet-writer'; so RVm to Nah 3^{17} 'thy scribes.' The title 'scribe' might very well be given to a provost-marshal; cf. γραμματεύς in 1 Mac 5^{42} (cited above). The VSS give no help, and the meaning of the word was evidently lost in early times. LXX has βελοστάσεις ('batteries of warlike engines') in Jer, but leaves the word untranslated in Nah. Symm. has ἐκλεκτούς in Jer (so Field). Syr.* has ܚܒܠܐ 'destruction' in Jer, but in Nah ܟܠ ܥܝܪ̈ܝܟܝ 'thy aroused ones' or (possibly) 'thy warriors.' Targ. gives עבדי קרבא 'warriors' in Jer, but leaves the word untranslated in Nah. All these renderings of the VSS are founded on guesses from the context, rather than on real knowledge.

MAR'S HILL.—See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA (Μάρθα, an Aramaic form [מָרְתָא, fem. of מָרָא 'lord'], not found in Heb., meaning 'mistress' or 'lady.' Compare Κυρίᾳ in 2 Jn ^{1}, which some interpret as a proper name, and some identify with the Martha of the Gospels).—The name does not occur in OT. Only one person called Martha appears in NT, mentioned in Lk $10^{38.42}$, Jn $11^{1.5.19-39}$ 12^2. It is not possible to doubt the identity of the Martha of the Fourth Gospel with the Martha of the Third. In both cases there is a sister Mary, and similar traits in the characters of the two women appear in each of the narratives. But the course of events in Lk would suggest that the village where the sisters lived was situated in Galilee; according to Jn it was Bethany. The harmonistic suggestion, that they may have changed their place of abode previous to the events with which they are connected in the Fourth Gospel, is evidently a device invented to meet a difficulty; it has no probability. St. John is so exact in his topography that it is not reasonable to suppose he was mistaken in this instance. Bethany is one of the centres round which the history in the Fourth Gospel moves. It would seem, therefore, that the order of the narrative is dislocated in Lk, so that a Judæan incident is inserted in the course of events that transpired in the north. Martha here appears actively engaged in serving Jesus and His disciples at a hospitable feast. In this case, and in the Johannine incidents, she takes the lead in a way that implies that she is the elder sister. According to the Synoptic account, it was in the house of Simon the leper that a woman, pouring precious ointment over Jesus, was rebuked by the disciples for her wastefulness (Mt 26^7, Mk 14^3); according to Jn, this occurred at the house of Martha and Mary, the latter being the woman who testified her devotion to Jesus by the costly gift (Jn 12^{1-8}). Therefore it has been suggested that Martha may have been Simon's wife or widow. In St. Luke's narrative Martha is gently corrected for her excessive anxiety and the impatience with which she complains of her sister. Thus she is seen to be one who, while truly devoted to Christ, and commendably energetic in the service of hospitality, does not possess her soul in quietness; sets too high a value on the material sumptuousness of the feast for which she is responsible; fails to understand how best to entertain her divine Guest by best pleasing Him; and hastily blames the gentler Mary. According to the oldest MSS and some VSS and Fathers,[*] Jesus said to her, 'There is need of but a few things or one'—the 'few' pointing to simplicity in the provisions at table (compare Lk 10^{42}), the 'one' perhaps carrying her thought to what alone He supremely cared for, the kingdom of God (see Mt 6^{33}), to show profound interest in which was to receive Jesus in the way most acceptable to Him. In the narrative of the death and raising of Lazarus, Martha and Mary are true sisters, echoing one another's thoughts, both trusting in Jesus as their one friend who could help them in the greatest need. In Jn 12^{2}, as in the Lk narrative, Martha is found 'serving.' See, further, under MARY, No. iv.

* We have verified the Syr. from MSS, viz. the Ambrosian, the Buchanan Bible (Jacobite of cent. xii.), and Camb. Univ. Add. 1964 (Nestorian of cent. xiii.) for Jg 5^{14}, and from the first two of these MSS together with Camb. Univ. Add. 1965 (Nestorian of cent. xv.) for Jer 51^{27} and Nah 3^{17}.

A tradition, which cannot be traced earlier than the Middle Ages, is cherished all over the south of France, to the effect that during a persecution of the Christians by the Jews, Lazarus and his two sisters, having been sent to sea in a boat without rudder, oars, or provisions, drifted to land near Marseilles, founded many churches in Provence, in particular those at Marseilles, Aix, and Avignon, and finally lived in retreat at Tarascon (see Guettée, Histoire de l'Église de France, i. 402, n. 5; Guérin, Les Petits Bollandistes, etc. x. 91–105, where many childish but picturesque legends of Martha are recorded; cf. also Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, i. 325 ff.).

W. F. ADENEY.

MARTYR.—The Gr. word μάρτυς (from a root signifying to 'remember,' connected with 'memory' and μέριμνα, 'care,' therefore primarily 'one who testifies to what he remembers'), which in AV is frequently translated 'witness,' is rendered 'martyr' in Ac 22^{20}, Rev 2^{13} 17^{6}. The Vulg. has martyr in the last passage only, in the other two the usual testis, and Wyc. and Rhem. follow. Tind., Cov., Cran. have 'witness' in all; Gen. and Bish. 'witness' in Ac, but 'martyr' in Rev. The Versions, even the earliest, seem to have used 'martyr' in its modern sense, one who seals his testimony with his blood, not merely a witness, but a witness who suffers. But the Gr. word does not appear to have acquired that meaning within the NT, though it is common in early Christian writings. In Ac 22^{20} the tr. 'martyr' loses the reference to the preceding 'witness' (μαρτυρία, 22^{18}). RV gives 'witness' in Ac 22^{20} and Rev 2^{13}, but retains 'martyr' in Rev 17^{6}, m. 'witness.'

J. HASTINGS.

MARVELLOUS is an adverb in Wis 19^{8}, 'seeing thy marvellous strange wonders' (θαυμαστὰ τέρατα, RV 'strange marvels'). Cf. Ps 31^{23}, Pr. Bk. 'Thanks be to the Lord: for he hath showed me marvellous great kindness in a strong city'; and Ps 145^{3} 'Great is the Lord, and marvellous worthy to be praised' (but mod. edd. wrongly print 'Great is the Lord, and marvellous, worthy to be praised'). Cf. also Jer 30^{6} Cov. 'Yee all their faces are marvellous pale.' Tindale uses 'marvellously,' as Mt 2^{10} 'When they sawe the starre, they were marvelously glad.' So also often in Shakespeare.

J. HASTINGS.

MARY (Heb. מִרְיָם Miriam; LXX and NT Μαριάμ or Μαρία; Josephus Μαριάμμη or Μαριάμη or Μαριάμνη).[*]—The name, as Stanley says, probably owes its frequent recurrence in the narratives, alike of the Evangelists and of Josephus, not to the memory of Miriam the sister of Moses, but to the sympathy felt for the beautiful Hasmonæan princess, the high-souled and ill-fated wife of Herod (Jewish Church, iii. 429). We find it used as follows in the NT—

i. Mary the mother of James.
ii. The other Mary.
iii. Mary of Clopas.
iv. Mary the sister of Martha.
v. Mary Magdalene.
vi. Mary the mother of Mark.
vii. Mary saluted by St. Paul.
viii. Mary the mother of the Lord.

i. ii. iii. Of the above, the first three are generally identified. The first is mentioned in the three Synoptic Gospels as one of those who were present at the crucifixion. In Mt $27^{55.56}$ we read, 'many women were there beholding from afar, which had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother[†] of James and Joses, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee.' In v.^{61} we are told that the same evening, after Joseph of Arimathæa had buried the body in his own new tomb hewn out of the rock, 'Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary (evidently the before-mentioned mother of James), were sitting over against the sepulchre.' Next day, 'as the sabbath began to dawn towards the first day of the week,' the other Mary again appears with Mary Magdalene (28^{1}). It is to them that the angel at the sepulchre speaks words of comfort after rolling away the stone, 'Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which hath been crucified. He is not here; for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. And go quickly, and tell his disciples.' In fear and joy they ran to carry the message; and as they went, 'Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and took hold of his feet, and worshipped him. Then said Jesus unto them, Fear not: go tell my brethren that they depart into Galilee, and there shall they see me.'

Mark (15^{40}) gives some further details. Mary is called the mother of James the Little and Joses, and Salome is mentioned as one of her companions along with Mary Magdalene. In v.^{47} she (now called M. ἡ Ἰωσῆτος) is watching where He was laid. In 16^{1} 'Mary of James' is joined with Salome and the Magdalene, as buying spices and bringing them to the tomb at sunrise on the first day. As they go they wonder how they shall get the stone rolled away; but this is already done when they arrive, and they find in the tomb a young man in white raiment, who bids them not be amazed, but carry word to the disciples to meet the Lord in Galilee. 'But they said nothing to any one; for they were afraid' (v.^{8}).

[*] It has been asserted that the form Μαριάμ is used exclusively for the Virgin, and Μαρία for the others; but, though the Hebraic form is in general used of the former (in the nominative), perhaps as being the more dignified, it is by no means confined to her, nor is the Hellenic form confined to the latter. Thus, where the Virgin is spoken of, WH read Μαρία with Codd. BD in Lk 2^{19}, and though they follow B in calling her Μαριάμ elsewhere, yet it is only in Lk 1^{27} that this form has the support of all the MSS. In Mt 13^{55} Μαρία is read by C, in Lk $1^{36.39.56}$ and 2^{5} by D, in Lk $1^{34.38.46}$ by both. On the other hand, the best text has Μαριάμ of the Magdalene in Mt 27^{61}, Mk 15^{40}, Jn $20^{16.18}$, and this reading has the support of C and L in several other passages. Μαριάμ is not used of the mother of James in the best MSS, though C has it in Mt 27^{56} and Lk 28^{1}. Μαριάμ is used of the sister of Martha in the best text of Lk $10^{39.42}$, Jn $11^{2.20.32}$ 12^{3}.

In the other cases the Hebraic and Hellenic forms are used indiscriminately. Thus the best text has the acc. Μαρίαν of the Virgin in Mt 1^{20} and of St. Paul's friend in Ro 16^{6}, but Μαριάμ of the Virgin in Lk $2^{16.34}$, of Martha's sister in Jn $11^{19.28.31.45}$. The gen. Μαρίας is the only form used as well of the Virgin as of Martha's sister and the mother of Mark. The dat. Μαριάμ is used of the Virgin in Lk 2^{5}, Ac 1^{14}, but Μαρίᾳ of the Magdalene in 'Mk' 16^{9}.

[†] Here and in Mk 15^{40} Syr. Sin. has 'daughter' instead of 'mother.'

In Lk 23^{49-56} we are told generally that the women which came from Galilee stood afar off at the crucifixion and followed Joseph to the tomb to see how the body was laid, and prepared spices and ointments, which they brought at early dawn on the first day. Entering into the tomb they saw two men in dazzling apparel, who asked them why they sought the living among the dead. 'Remember the words he spake unto you in Galilee, saying that the Son of Man must be crucified, and the third day rise from the dead. And they remembered his words, and told all these things to the eleven and to all the rest.' From 24^{10} we learn that Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary of James were among the number of these women.

John (19^{25}) tells us that there were standing by the cross, His mother and His mother's sister (identified with Salome, see article on BRETHREN OF THE LORD), Mary of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene. Comparing this with Mk 15^{40}, we naturally conclude that Mary of Clopas must be the same as Mary of James. All we know of Clopas is derived from Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 11), who tells us that he was brother of the reputed father of our Lord, and that Symeon the second bishop of Jerusalem was his son. Whether ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ means wife or (as Jerome suggests) daughter of Clopas is uncertain. Lightfoot (cited in the above-named article) holds that there is no ground for identifying the name Clopas with Alphæus, and that the Peshitta version and Jerome may be right in regarding it as another form of Cleopas. If Mary was daughter of Clopas, she may have been wife of Alphæus, and her son James may be the apostle known as the son of Alphæus. Jerome, however, maintains that Mary of Cleophas, the aunt of the Lord, is a different person from the mother of James (see Ep. ad Hedibiam cited by Lightfoot, Gal. p. 260). John of Thessalonica and other Fathers (quoted by Faillon, i. p. 150) strangely identify the mother of James with the mother of the Lord, thinking that her presence at the crucifixion could not have been passed over without mention by the Synoptists.

iv. MARY, SISTER OF MARTHA.—It is only in the last two Gospels that her name occurs. Luke (10^{38-42}), after narrating the return of the Seventy, says vaguely that, 'as they went on their way, Jesus entered into a certain village: and a certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house. And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word.' When Martha complained that she was left to serve alone, Jesus answered that, whereas she was anxious and troubled about many things, her sister had chosen the good part, which should not be taken from her. In Jn 11 we find the two sisters living with their brother Lazarus in a village named Bethany; and all three are said to have been beloved by the Lord. Jesus, on His last journey to Jerusalem, receives tidings of the sickness of Lazarus, and, when He reaches Bethany, finds that he had been dead four days. The behaviour of the sisters is such as we might expect from Luke's narrative. Martha goes out to meet Him; but Mary sits still in the house, till she receives a message that the Master called for her. Then rising quickly, she came where He was, and fell down at His feet. Both meet Him, however, with the same words of sorrowful reproach: 'If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.' It would seem that, though Martha was apparently the elder sister, Mary was for some reason held in greater consideration. In v.^{19} we are told that many of the Jews had come to comfort Martha and Mary; but, while nothing is said of their accompanying Martha, we read in v.^{31} that the Jews, who were in the house with Mary, when they saw that she rose up quickly and went out, followed her, thinking that she was going to the grave to weep there; and in v.^{45} it is said that many of the Jews that came to Mary believed on Jesus.

In the chapter which follows we have the story of the anointing of the feet of Jesus. Each evangelist tells us of an anointing of the Lord by a woman, whilst He was reclining as a guest at a hospitable entertainment; and there has been much discussion as to how often He was anointed, and (supposing Him to have been anointed more than once) whether the anointing was by one and the same woman. Speaking generally, it will be seen from the conspectus given on next page that Matthew and Mark are in agreement, and that Luke's account differs widely from theirs, whilst John's is independent of either, yet presenting points of contact, now with the one, now with the other. We will consider these differences in order.

(1) As to time and place: if we may judge from the context, the anointing described by Luke took place in Galilee while the Baptist was in prison; that described by the other evangelists took place in Bethany shortly before the crucifixion. (2) As to the host: Luke names Simon the Pharisee, the other Synoptists Simon the leper, while John is indefinite, merely stating that after the raising of Lazarus 'they made him a feast, at which Lazarus sat at meat, and Martha served.' (3) As to the action: whilst the first two Gospels speak of the head being anointed with precious ointment, Luke says that the feet of Christ were first wet with the tears of the woman standing behind Him, and then wiped with her hair and anointed; John says nothing of her tears, but agrees in the statement that it was the feet which she anointed and wiped with her hair. (4) As to who or what the woman was, the first two Gospels tell us nothing beyond the fact of her pouring the ointment on the head of Jesus; Luke says that she was a sinner in the city, and that Jesus said of her, 'her sins which are many are forgiven, for she loved much'; John tells us that she was the beloved and honoured sister of Martha and Lazarus. (5) As to the criticism passed upon the action: Mark speaks vaguely of some who were indignant at the waste of money, saying to themselves, 'this ointment might have been sold for more than 300 denarii and given to the poor'; Matthew puts this censure in the mouth of the disciples; John ascribes it to Judas, who bore the bag; while Luke reports quite a different criticism made by a different person, Simon the Pharisee, who becomes suspicious of Christ's pretensions as a prophet, on the ground that He had failed to read the character of the woman who touched Him. (6) As to our Lord's justification of the woman: this, of course, is different in the two cases, since it has to meet two distinct charges. The Pharisee is answered by the parable of the Two Debtors; and a contrast is drawn between his neglect of the ordinary forms of hospitality and the humble devotion of the penitent woman, who is bidden to go in peace. In the other Gospels the disciples are reminded that the poor would be always with them, while their Master would shortly leave them; that the woman had done a good work in anointing His body for the impending burial; nay, that this action of hers would be reported in her praise throughout the world, wherever the gospel was preached.

Such being the diversity of the narratives, it is evident that there are many difficulties in the way of any one who would regard them as all speaking of one person and recording one scene.* And yet it is almost as difficult to suppose that such an action could have been repeated. Is it likely that our Lord would have uttered such a high encomium upon Mary's act if she were only following the example already set by the sinful woman of Galilee; or (taking the other view) if she herself were only repeating under more favourable circumstances the act of loving devotion for which she had already received His commendation? Is it likely, again, that St. John would have distinguished Mary as 'her who anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair' if he had known that in this she was only doing what had been done by another before her? Taking a more general view, is it likely that so rare an act, the beauty of which lay in its instinctive spontaneity and freedom from self-consciousness, could have been imitated or reproduced without losing all its savour?

Conspectus of the Anointings.

[The thick type is used in the Synoptic Gospels to mark their mutual differences: in Jn for the opposite purpose of marking his resemblances to one or other of the Synoptists].

Perhaps it may be answered that the act was not really unusual, since the context in Luke implies that not to anoint the head of a guest is to be wanting in ordinary courtesy.† It is true we have no other reference to the anointing of the feet in the Bible, but that this was not unprecedented may be seen from Arist. (Vesp. 605, ὃ δέ γ᾽ ἥδιστον τούτων ἐστὶν πάντων . . . ὅταν οἴκαδ᾽ ἴω τὸν μισθὸν ἔχων . . . καὶ πρῶτα μὲν ἡ θυγάτηρ με ἀπονίζῃ καὶ τὼ πόδ᾽ ἀλείφῃ καὶ προσκύψασα φιλήσῃ), where the daughter is represented as washing, anointing, and kissing the feet of her father, when he comes home from his day's work. Still this does not furnish a precedent for the hair being used to wipe the feet; and it must be remembered, on the other side, that in proportion as we diminish the rarity of the act, we find it more difficult to account for the value set upon it by our Lord, and the importance ascribed to it by St. John.

We turn now to consider how it has been attempted to harmonize the different narratives by those who believe that only one event is recorded. The most elaborate attempt is that made by Hengstenberg,* who replies to (1) the first difficulty above stated, that Luke's context is determined here, not by the order of events, but by the connexion of thought; since the contrast between the Pharisees and the publicans, in vv.$^{29.\ 30}$, and the description of Christ as the Friend of publicans and sinners, in v.^{34}, naturally lead on to the story of the sinful woman at the house of the Pharisee. This, we think, must be conceded. As to (2), if we are to identify Simon the Pharisee with Simon 'the leper,' we must understand the latter title to refer not to his present condition; for in that case he could not himself have entertained guests, as he does in Luke. Some have thought that he may have been previously healed of his leprosy by Jesus. But this is not at all suggested by the words addressed to him in Luke, nor does it seem consistent with his ungracious behaviour. There is less force in the argument that the injurious title 'leper' would not have been retained in the case of one who had been cured of his leprosy.

* This view is taken by Ephraem Syrus, Paulinus, Victor of Capua in his Diatessaron (see quotations in Faillon, i. 37, 146), Grotius, Strauss, and the rationalistic interpreters generally, and also by Hengstenberg.

† See art. on ANOINTING, where reference is made to Egyptian monuments, as bearing witness to the practice of anointing the head of the guest at a feast, cf. also Ps 23^5 45^7.

* Comm. on St. John, Eng. tr. pp. 1–33, 78–89.

Lastly, is it likely that so pronounced a Pharisee as the Simon of Luke would have entertained Jesus at so late a period in His career, when the Pharisees had already resolved upon His death? or, on the other hand, that one who was so much impressed with the raising of Lazarus as to preside at a banquet given in honour of the occasion, should have shown so little respect for the prophet whom he professed to be honouring?

The other incidents of the supper may be treated together. It is said that the discrepancies in the two accounts are due merely to the different points of view taken by the narrators. The anointing gave rise to both conversations—that with Simon and that with the disciples. Luke seizes the point of her repentance, the other evangelists that of her lavish expenditure. But surely this is psychologically impossible.

Let us examine a little more closely the story in Luke. A notorious sinner, learning that Jesus is sitting at meat in the house of a certain Pharisee, makes up her mind to follow Him there. She enters the house, and immediately takes up her stand behind the Lord.* It is evident that something must have happened to make her loathe the life she had been living, and feel that her only hope of escaping from it was to take refuge with Him whose words, spoken to the scornful Pharisees, may have been brought to her ears: 'I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' As she stands behind Him she wipes away with her hair the penitential tears which fall fast upon His feet. Then, as the agony of shame is gradually conquered by the sense of the Saviour's forgiving love, she kneels and kisses His feet and anoints them with the ointment she had brought with her. She has no thought, no eye, for anything but Him. For a while no notice is taken, but at last words of comfort come, addressed first to another, 'Her sins, her many sins are forgiven, for she loved much'; and then directly to herself, 'Thy faith hath saved thee. Go in peace.' How would it be possible for her after this to have stayed on and listened to the reproaches of Judas and the others, or how could they have ventured to find fault where their Lord had already given His blessing? Turn now to the other side of the story, if we are to piece it out from what we read of Mary. Is it possible that she who had long ago made the good choice, who was now living quietly with her brother and sister, all three noted as especially dear to Christ; she whose house had been chosen by Him for His temporary home before the end came, and who had lately been brought into such intimate contact with Him when He raised her brother from the dead,—is it possible that she should be spoken of as a notorious sinner, who was forcing herself into His company? No! If we want to make one consistent story out of the four narratives, our only course is to suppose with Strauss that the underlying fact has been much falsified by tradition, especially in the case of Luke, who has, he thinks, mixed up with it the story of the woman taken in adultery.

Before examining other explanations, we will just mention the attempts which have been made to get over two minor difficulties: (1) the discrepancy as to the anointing of feet or head; (2) the nature of the locality where the sinful woman lived. As to (1), some have compared Ps 133^2, where the precious ointment is said to have run from Aaron's head down to the skirts of his clothing; but (even if the correct tr^n is 'collar' instead of 'skirts'), this could only happen in the case of one who was standing and not reclining at table. Others have assumed two anointings, first of the head and then of the feet, the former of which they think may have been omitted by John as being generally known. This does not seem probable. The writer's own view of the matter is given below. As to (2), the ἁμαρτωλὸς is said to have been 'in the city' (πόλει, Lk 7^{37}), but Bethany is described as a κώμη (Lk 10^{38}, Jn 11^1). To this it is replied that there is no reason why Bethany should not be regarded as a suburb of Jerusalem.

We will now examine the view which has been most generally held in the Latin Church, viz. that Luke describes a different scene from that in the other Gospels, but that the woman is the same. This gets rid of some difficulties, but is open to the objections stated above, as to multiplying what appears to be a unique occurrence. According to it, we are to suppose that the sister of Martha had at one time lived a vicious life, but had been conscience-stricken by some word of the Saviour, and, hearing that He was in Simon's house, had felt herself constrained to seek Him there, and received from His lips the word of forgiveness and blessing. If we allow an interval of two years, it is, of course, not such a flagrant impossibility for the sinner to have changed into the saint; and the quiet weeping of the one is not unlike the quiet sitting of the other at the feet of Jesus. Some have thought, too, that the remarkable reticence as regards the family at Bethany, which characterizes the Synoptic Gospels, might be explained by the wish not to call attention to a history which would bring discredit on the early life of a leading member of the Church. But if this danger of scandal still existed when the Gospels were written, how much more strongly must it have been felt some 30 years before, when the memory of the past was still fresh, and the Jews were on the watch for anything which might raise a prejudice against the prophet whom they sought to kill. Is it possible that they could have crowded to Bethany to express their sympathy and esteem for one who had so lately done such dishonour to the name of Israel? The difficulty as to the recurrence of the name Simon is perhaps fairly met by calling to mind its frequency at the time: we find no fewer than 9 different Simons in the NT. This led to its often having some distinctive appellation attached, e.g. Simon 'Zelotes,' Simon 'Peter,' and here Simon 'the Leper.'

The third view is that most generally entertained among Protestant divines, viz. that there were two anointings—one of the feet by the penitent sinner of Galilee, the other of the head and feet by a totally different person, the saintly Mary of Bethany. It has been objected to this that the way in which the latter is described in Jn 11^2 'Mary was she who anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair,' must refer to some previous occurrence; but the object of the evangelist is simply to introduce Mary to his readers by referring to an action which was in itself famous, though it had not been connected with her name in the earlier Gospels. Just in the same way Judas Iscariot is distinguished, in the earliest list of the apostles, by the addition 'which also betrayed him.' There remains the serious objection already stated: Could John have used these words to describe Mary, if he knew that they were equally true of another woman? Could our Lord have promised world-wide fame to her action, if the same thing had been already done by another in much more trying circumstances?

* The reading of the best MSS, ἀφ' ἧς εἰσῆλθον, in Lk 7^{45}, seems to contradict the words ἐπιγνοῦσα ὅτι κατάκειται in v.^{37}, which imply that it was the knowledge of His being seated at table which led her to seek the house herself. This is an argument in favour of the reading εἰσῆλθεν, which is witnessed to by several of the most ancient versions. The reading εἰσῆλθον is perhaps a repetition from v.^{44}.

It appears to the present writer that the easiest way in which we can escape these difficulties is by supposing that the story told by St. Luke cannot, in its original form, have contained any reference to anointing. In that case the final words of v.^{38} καὶ ἤλειφεν τῷ μύρῳ and the whole of v.^{46} must be regarded as later developments. It is easy to understand their being added under the idea that the words recorded by Matthew and Mark, 'wheresoever this gospel is preached in the whole world, there shall also this that she hath done be told for a memorial of her,' required that the act of anointing should appear in each separate Gospel. If we do not feel ourselves at liberty to make such a supposition, we must find some other means of accounting for the high commendation bestowed on Mary. It cannot have been simply for anointing, but for anointing with the precious spikenard in the prospect of the Lord's death. In any case it seems probable that the anointing with the common ointment, of which Luke speaks, was something of an afterthought. It is hardly likely that one in such extreme agitation of mind would have planned such an action beforehand. How could she know that she might not be forestalled by Simon? It will be noticed, too, that the anointing follows, not, as in John, precedes the wiping of the feet with her hair. If the details are correctly given, we may conjecture that she happened to be carrying a flask of myrrh, and, finding that the Lord's feet had been unwashed and left unanointed, had been seized by a sudden impulse to anoint them.

Prof. W. M. Ramsay * favours this third view, but considers that 'the attempts to harmonize John with Mark and Matthew fail completely. John, who says that "they made him a supper there, and Martha served," obviously places the meal in Martha's house: it seems quite absurd to suppose that she would be serving in the house of Simon.' He thinks Mark fell into error from putting together two separate incidents, one of which was connected with the name Bethany, the other with the name Simon; whom he identifies with a 'Simon who lived at Bethany and was or had been a leper.' It does not, however, seem likely that Mark, whose mother was at this time living in Jerusalem, and whose house was a centre of the early disciples, could have been ignorant of the facts connected with the anointing at Bethany. We must therefore accept the fact that it took place in the house of Simon, just as we accept the fact that Martha had the chief ordering of the feast. The two facts are not necessarily opposed. It may be, as Nicephorus says (HE i. 27), that Simon was the father of Martha, though living apart from his family. But we need not even suppose any such connexion. John's description, from its vagueness, 'they made him a feast,' rather implies a public entertainment given in His honour by the inhabitants of Bethany, probably in the largest or most convenient house in the village, which might be the property of a leper named Simon.†

The fourth view is that there were three distinct anointings by either two or three distinct persons. This view was first propounded by Origen in order to meet the discrepancies between the account given in John and in the first two Gospels. The latter appear to fix the date of the supper two days (Mt 26^{2}, Mk 14^{1}), the former six days (Jn 12^{1}), before the Passover. The latter represent the ointment as poured upon the head, the former speaks of the feet as anointed and then wiped by Mary with her hair. The latter state that the supper was held in the house of Simon the Leper, the former appears to imply that it was in the house of Martha (this difficulty has been already discussed). Hence it has been supposed that there were two different anointings in the same week; that on each occasion the same objection was made by the bystanders, and the same answer returned by Jesus. Such a repetition, we may at once say, is impossible; but what are we to make of the discrepancies? Shall we say that they are of no importance, and only such as must be expected in different reports made several years after the occurrence? We may be quite prepared to allow this; but it appears to be possible to get a little nearer to explaining them, when we observe that the dates given in the different Gospels do not refer directly to the supper. John's 'six days before the passover' is the date on which Jesus came to Bethany, where, as we learn from the other Gospels, He was lodging during the week before the crucifixion.* On the other hand, the two days of Matthew and Mark refer to the close of His discourses in Jerusalem: 'when he had finished all these words he said to his disciples, Ye know that after two days is the passover.'† Thus both dates may be literally exact, and yet neither may be the precise date of the supper. As to the other discrepancies, it is possible that the narrative in John, which seems to have been edited by the elders of Ephesus (see 21^{24}), has been to some extent affected by that in Luke. It is remarkable that the feet are thrice referred to (in 11^{2} 12^{3}) as if the writer wished to lay stress on this by way of correcting a current misapprehension. Such a correction seems strange to us in the present day, to whom the written Gospels are the ultimate authority; but in the first century the appeal was still to oral tradition, as we may see from the Preface to Luke, and it seems not improbable that the predominant tradition may have laid hold on the anointing of the feet as testifying to a higher degree of humility and reverence than that of the head. If, then, the original narrative of John spoke only in general terms of the anointing of Jesus, we may conceive that the elders might have taken the opportunity to correct what they deemed to be an erroneous report in Mark. Our present feeling would probably be that, where honour is intended by anointing, the head rather than the feet should be anointed. On the other hand, it was natural that the penitent, standing behind the Lord, should wipe away with her hair the tears that fell upon His feet, but less natural that it should be used to wipe away the ointment, which would simply have the effect of anointing her own hair.

It may be interesting to add a brief sketch of the history of opinion on this question. The treatment of Scripture by early Christian writers is, as a rule, uncritical. Difficulties are not felt. They are much more anxious to extract a useful moral from their text by means of some forced allegory, than to ascertain the precise meaning of the words as they were understood by the speaker and hearers, or to get a clear conception of the actual facts referred to. Hence they are often careless of distinctions, and, like children, apt to mistake resemblance for identity. It is only when there is some special call for the attention of the writer, as when he is engaged on a commentary or a harmony of the Gospels, that we can attach much weight to any critical judgment. This is seen in the references to the present question. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the woman who was still a sinner bringing the alabaster box of ointment, which she thought the best of her possessions, to anoint the feet of the Lord, and then wiping away with her hair the superfluous ointment, whilst she poured on His feet the libation of her tears. These things, he says, symbolize both the preaching of the gospel and the passion of the Lord (Pæd. ii. 61, p. 205). Tertullian more distinctly identifies the two anointings in the words, 'Peccatrici feminæ etiam corporis sui contactum permittit, lavanti lacrimis pedes ejus et crinibus detergenti et unguento sepulturam ipsius inauguranti' (Pudic. xi.). On the other hand, Tatian, towards the end of the 2nd cent., in his Diatessaron,* which was for many years the only form of the Gospel known in Mesopotamia, separates the story in Lk from that in the other evangelists, and shows that he distinguishes the sinner from Mary by placing the visit to Martha and Mary before the anointing. Victor of Capua, who published a Latin revised version of the Diatessaron some 300 years later, mixed up Luke's anointing with that which took place at Bethany, to suit the view which had then become popular in the Western Church.† Origen is the first distinctly to grapple with the difficulties of the question. In his commentary on Mt (§ 77), after stating the points of agreement in the four accounts, he proceeds to argue against the prevailing view that the actor was in every case the same, on the ground (1) that according to Matthew and Mark it was the head of Jesus which was anointed with precious ointment, while, according to the other evangelists,‡ His feet were anointed with myrrh(!); (2) that it is incredible that Mary the sister of Martha, who chose the better part and was beloved by Jesus, could be spoken of as a sinner; (3) that the sinner in Luke does not venture to approach the head of Jesus, but waters His feet with penitential tears, whereas there are no tears and no sinner in John. He then goes on to say that some will perhaps argue that the actor in each Gospel is different; but he thinks it enough to distinguish three different actors; and he adds further reasons for holding that the nameless woman in the first two Gospels is not the same as the sister of Martha, the supper being at a different time and a different place. He meets the objection that the disciples could not have repeated their complaint of the waste of so much valuable ointment, by making a distinction between the honest indignation of the others and the veiled covetousness of Judas; and concludes with an allegorical interpretation of the three anointings. Elsewhere he seems to accept the view that there were only two anointings (cf. Hom. in Ca 1^{12} 'scio Lucam de peccatrice, Matthæum vero et Johannem et Marcum non de peccatrice illa dixisse . . . cujus nomen quoque Johannes inseruit,' also on Ca 1^{3} 'si quid peccatrix habuit, ad pedes referendum est; si quid ea quæ non erat peccatrix, ad caput'). Chrysostom also makes only two anointings, but, strangely enough, he holds that one of these is narrated only by John, the other by the three Synoptists. Accordingly, he considers that the indignation of the disciples and the comforting words of the Lord have reference to the πόρνη γυνή of Luke, who is encouraged to come to Jesus by the thought that he did not disdain to eat in the house of a leper (Comm. in Matt. 80). In his 62nd homily on John he says that the sister of Martha is not ἡ πόρνη ἡ ἐν τῷ Ματθαίῳ οὐδὲ ἡ ἐν τῷ Λουκᾷ . . . ἐκεῖναι μὲν γὰρ πόρναι . . . πολλῶν γέμουσαι κακῶν· αὕτη δὲ καὶ σεμνὴ καὶ σπουδαία. Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. 6) is inclined to think that one woman only was concerned in the anointing, but in the end leaves it an open question: 'potest non eadem esse, ne sibi contrarium evangelistæ dixisse videantur: potest etiam quæstio meriti temporis diversitate dissolvi, ut adhuc illa peccatrix sit, jam ista perfectior.' So Augustine, speaking of the anointing in Matthew (de Cons. Evang. 2. 154), says, 'Lucas quamvis simile factum commemoret, nomenque conveniat ejus apud quem convivabatur dominus . . . tamen potius credibile est alium fuisse illum Simonem, non leprosum in cujus domo hoc in Bethania gerebatur. Nam nec Lucas in Bethania rem gestam dicit. . . . Nihil itaque aliud intellegendum arbitror nisi non quidem aliam fuisse mulierem quæ peccatrix tunc accessit ad pedes Jesu et osculata est et lavit lacrimis . . . sed eandem Mariam bis hoc fecisse' (so too Tract. in Joh. 49). Jerome, on the other hand, distinguishes between the two women (Comm. in Matt. 26^{2}), 'Nemo putet eandem esse quæ super caput effudit unguentum et quæ super pedes. Illa enim et lacrimis lavat et crinibus tergit et manifesto meretrix appellatur. De hac autem nihil tale scriptum est.' Gregory the Great finally decided the question for the Latin Church by identifying the peccatrix first with the sister of Martha, and then with the Magdalene § (Hom. 33 in Evang.), 'hanc, quam Lucas peccatricem, Johannes Mariam nominat, illam esse Mariam credimus de qua Marcus septem dæmonia ejecta fuisse testatur. Et quid per septem dæmonia nisi universa vitia designantur?' Hom. 8, 'venit Maria Magdalene post multas maculas culpæ ad pedes Redemptoris nostri,' ib. 25. This was the generally accepted opinion in the West from the beginning of the 7th to the 16th cent. as testified to by the office in the Breviary for July 22.

* In the work entitled, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 91.

† Dr. E. A. Abbott suggests that the appellation Λάζαρος may represent laẓẓārûaʿ (לַצָּרוּעַ), 'belonging to the leper.'

* Mt 21^{17}, Mk 11$^{1.11}$, Lk 21^{37}.

† There is no reason to suppose that the date given in Mk 14^{1} extends to the following verses. The phrase καὶ ὄντος αὐτοῦ of the third verse is well explained by Dr. Abbott as meaning, 'And here let me state something which happened while Jesus was still in Bethany, which should be mentioned here to prepare the reader for the betrayal which follows.' So in Mk 14^{66} καὶ ὄντος means, 'And here let me say that Peter had been some time ago in the court exposed to temptation, and this must be mentioned here, because now comes his fall.'

Discussion recommenced with the rise of the Reformation in the treatise of Faber Stapulensis de Maria Magdalena, which was somewhat feebly answered by Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and condemned by the Sorbonne in 1521, on the ground that Faber departed 'ab universali Ecclesiæ ritu unicam Magdalenam in suo officio asserentis,' and that he deprived the Church of her chief type of the penitent sinner; also that there would be no certain truth, if each, at his own caprice, might reject accepted tradition. Later Roman Catholics, however, have not been unanimous: Estius, Tillemont, and others denying the identity, while Maldonatus,* Lamy,† and the Bollandists ‡ have argued with reason and moderation in its favour. Indeed, the reaction against the old view prevailed more in France than in England, going so far that, in a whole series of dioceses with Paris at their head, new editions of the Breviary were issued in the 17th cent. without those portions of the office of St. Mary Magdalene which referred to Lk 7 and to the sister of Lazarus.§ Dupin, Mabillon, Bossuet, and Fleury are mentioned as favouring the newer view.

Meanwhile the Menology of the Greek Church assigns three distinct days for celebrating the memory of the sister of Martha, the Magdalene, and the ἁμαρτωλός. And Theophylact, writing in the 11th cent., says in his comment on Mt 26 that some hold that there were three, others that there were two only, who anointed the Lord; that Simon the leper was father of Lazarus, and that he is the man who showed the disciples a room ready furnished for the last supper. In his commentary on Mk 14 and Lk 7 he declares himself in favour of the view that there were three anointings—one by the πόρνη of Lk, one by the sister of Lazarus six days before the passover, one in the house of Simon the leper two days before the passover.

It has been already stated that the view most commonly entertained in the Reformed Churches has been that the sinner of Lk is distinct from the sister of Lazarus, and both distinct from the Magdalene. The two former are, however, confused by Grotius and by many of the recent German theologians, as Schleiermacher, Ewald, Bleek, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Weisse, Keim, as well as by the orthodox Hengstenberg. In the Anglican Church the mediæval view was followed by Bishop Andrews, who speaks of 'Mary Magdalene anointing Christ three several times one after the other,' and being permitted to see two angels, one at the head the other at the feet where the body of Jesus had lain, because she had herself anointed His head and anointed His feet; by Donne, who identifies the sister of Lazarus with the Magdalene (Sermons, 25 and 80); by Jer. Taylor (iii. 248, Heb.), 'Mary Magdalene having been reproved by Judas for spending ointment upon Jesus' feet, it being so unaccustomed and large profusion, thought now to speak her love once more and trouble nobody, and therefore she poured ointment on His sacred head'; and in late years by Dr. Pusey.‖

Having thus examined the general question of the anointings of Jesus, it remains for us to consider more particularly the motive ascribed by our Lord Himself for the anointing by the sister of Lazarus. This is given with slight variations: in Mt 26^{12} 'In that she poured this ointment on my body, she did it to prepare me for burial' (πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με), Mk 14^{8} 'She hath done what she could: she hath anointed my body aforehand for the burying' (προέλαβεν μυρίσαι τὸ σῶμά μου εἰς τὸν ἐνταφιασμόν); Jn 12^{7} 'Suffer her to keep it against the day of my burying,' or (marg.) 'Let her alone: it was that she might keep it' (ἄφες αὐτὴν ¶ ἵνα εἰς τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ ἐνταφιασμοῦ μου τηρήσῃ αὐτό; several MSS, including A, read τετήρηκεν, omitting ἵνα). The meaning of the word ἐνταφιασμός is explained in Jn $19^{39.40}$, where we are told that Nicodemus brought 'a mixture of myrrh and aloes about 100 pound weight, and wound the body in linen cloths with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury' (ἐνταφιάζειν). The general sense seems to be given most simply in Mark's words. 'She hath done what she could' is an answer to the assertion that she ought to have spent her money otherwise, viz. in distributing to the poor. We are to understand, apparently, that this was not the work for which she was fitted: she probably did not possess the practical business habits which would enable her to decide as to the best way of helping the poor. But wisdom is justified of all her children. What she had, what the grace of ¶ Dr. E. A. Abbott suggests that ἢ may have been lost after αὐτῇ, and that the words are a reproach to Judas, 'or is it your wish that she should keep it for my embalming?' i.e. 'do you grudge it the living, that she may bestow it on the dead?'

God working in her enabled her to do, was to call forth generous emotion in others by being herself an example of the highest and noblest of all emotions, the impassioned devotion of a pure and loving heart to Him who is absolute Purity and Love. The genuine simplicity of a beautiful soul, however liable to misconception for the moment, yet in the end appeals more strongly to what is best in man, and is at the same time a more acceptable offering to God than any outward manifestation of human activity, however useful or charitable.

Then how are we to understand what follows: 'she hath anointed my body aforetime for the burying'? From the phrase in Jn, 'suffer her to keep it,' we gather that the spikenard had not been bought on purpose, but was applied to this use after being some time in her possession. Some have supposed that she had bought it for her personal adornment, but such a supposition is unworthy of Mary; and as our Lord associates it with the thought of death, it seems more probable that it had been purchased for the burial of her brother, and perhaps left unused from some faint hope that the coming of Christ might still render such a use superfluous. Compare Martha's words, 'Even now I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give it thee.' Destined for the tomb, the precious ointment now becomes a thankoffering to Him who called Lazarus from the tomb; but it is only in anticipation—was this Mary's own foreboding, or did she learn it first from the Lord?—of a mightier death to come. The words in Jn must, we think, be taken to mean, 'Allow her to have kept it for my burial,' i.e. 'do not find fault with her for doing so.'

History tells us nothing more of Mary. Her name is not mentioned among the women who were present at the crucifixion, or who brought spices to lay in the grave. This strange silence was, no doubt, one of the reasons for identifying her with the Magdalene. It seemed so natural that she who had been specially honoured and beloved by the Lord, who had been conspicuous beyond all others in doing honour to Him during His life, should have been also the last to watch by His cross and the first to whom He would appear on His resurrection. A late legend reports that Lazarus with his two sisters and Maximin, one of the Seventy, fled from Palestine in the persecution described in Ac 8 and took refuge in Massilia, and that Mary (confounded with the Magdalene) retired to a cave near Arles and died there.

v. MARY MAGDALENE (ἡ Μαγδαληνή) is probably named from the town of Magdala or Magadan (wh. see), now Medjdel, which is said to mean 'a tower.' It was situated at a short distance from Tiberias, and is mentioned (Mt 15^{39}) in connexion with the miracle of the seven loaves. An ancient watchtower still marks the site. According to Jewish authorities it was famous for its wealth, and for the moral corruption of its inhabitants (Edersheim, vol. i. p. 571). Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mt 27^{56}), following some of the rabbinical writers, gives a different derivation, according to which the name would mean a plaiter of hair, a phrase sometimes used of a woman of light character.

The first notice we have of the Magdalene is in Lk 8^2, where we read that certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities accompanied Jesus and the Twelve in their missionary journeys, and ministered to them of their substance. Among these are mentioned 'Mary that was called Magdalene, from whom seven demons had gone out (cf. 'Mk' 16^9), and Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna.'

The question has been raised whether this possession implies moral as well as physical disease or infirmity. Those who affirm this have found in it a ground for upholding the identity of the Magdalene with the 'sinner' of Luke. Others hold that the phrase implies nothing more than that 'the wretchedness of despair, the divided consciousness, the preternatural frenzy, the long-continued fits of silence,' which we read of in other demoniacs, were exhibited here in their most aggravated form; that such a state is 'all but absolutely incompatible with the life implied in ἁμαρτωλός,' and that to speak of 'seven demons' as equivalent to 'many sins' is 'to identify two things which are separated in the whole tenor of the NT by the clearest line of demarcation.'* But surely this is going too far. We are told of some who were 'vexed with unclean spirits,' and the parable speaks of an 'unclean spirit' taking with him 'seven other spirits more wicked than himself' and dwelling within a man. It would seem, therefore, that wickedness may be a sign or effect of possession. But this possibility goes a very little way towards proving what is wanted. If St. Luke knew that the Magdalene of ch. 8 was the same as the sinner of ch. 7, would he not have given some hint to this effect? Should we not have been told before, that the sinner had been under a Satanic influence, and had been delivered from this by the Saviour previously to her entrance into Simon's house? Then is it likely that she who had been known as the 'sinner' would have been allowed to accompany the Lord and His disciples in their journeys? Would this have been in accordance with the oft-repeated principle that we have to 'provide things honest,' not only in the sight of God, but also 'of men'? Would it not have been putting an additional stumbling-block in the way of the weak, if one of notorious character were known to be habitually in the company of the new Prophet? There would seem to be at least as much ground for the identification of the Magdalene with the daughter of the Syro-phœnician woman, proposed by Nicephorus (HE i. 33).

No further mention of the Magdalene is made till the crucifixion, where she appears with the other women who had accompanied Jesus from Galilee. See above under 'Mary the mother of James.' We confine ourselves here to her experience, apart from the others, which is recorded by John alone, excepting for the brief note in 'Mark' 16^9 'He appeared first to Mary Magdalene.' If we are to reconcile this account with what we read in the other Gospels, it would seem from a comparison of all the accounts that, after setting out for the tomb with the other women, she must have hurried on, found the stone rolled away, and hastened at once to tell Peter and John. She returns with them, and waits outside after they have gone (Jn 20^{11}). While weeping there, she stoops and looks into the tomb, and sees two angels sitting, one at the head and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. To their question, 'Why weepest thou?' she repeats what she had said to Peter and John, 'They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' Turning round, she sees behind her one whom she supposes to be the gardener, who also asks, 'Why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?' In answer, she begs him, if it is he who has borne Him hence, to tell her where He was laid, that she might take Him away. 'The one thought that fills her mind is still that . . . she has been robbed of that task of reverential love on which she had set her heart. . . . The utter stupor of grief is shown in her want of power to recognize at first either the voice or the form of the Lord. . . . At last her own name uttered by that voice, as she had heard it uttered, it may be, in the hour of her deepest misery, recalls her to consciousness; and then follows the cry of recognition, and the rush forward to cling to His feet.'[*] The title Rabboni, however, by which she addresses the risen Saviour, falls very far short of the address of Thomas, and shows that she had not yet realized the change which had come over her relation to Him, whom she had known as her earthly master and teacher. And therefore the first lesson which she receives is a warning against supposing that the familiarities of earth are any longer possible. A higher and closer communion will be open to her when He has ascended to the Father, but it will be that of spirit with spirit. She must cease to clasp His feet, must rise and carry to the disciples His message, 'I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God.'

* E. H. Plumptre in Smith's DB.

This is all that the Bible tells us of the Magdalene. Before going on to inquire what has been built up on this foundation by the later legends, it may be well to consider whether the facts as given above lend any probability to the mediæval belief that she was the same as the sinful woman or the sister of Lazarus. It may be granted that something of the same type of character is visible in them all. All show an impassioned devotion, a generosity of feeling, which lifts them far out of the common groove. But may it not be said that this is partly a national trait, Jewish history abounding in high deeds of female heroism, and is partly due to the overpowering spiritual influences of the time? Anyhow, the similarity was sufficient to suggest to the interested hearer or reader of the three stories, whose imagination was already at work to fill in the picture from the slight outline given in each case, that this result might be most easily obtained by combining them into one. She who had been possessed by seven demons and came from Magdala must have been a sinner: she brought spices to the tomb, she clasped the Lord's feet, she was the most faithful and loving of all the women that followed Him from Galilee: must it not have been she who anointed His feet during His life, and whose faith and love had been specially commended by Him? And the same would apply to Mary of Bethany. She, too, ministered to Jesus of her substance, she fell at His feet, she anointed Him beforehand for His burial, she, too, was loving and beloved—she cannot have deserted her Lord in His last struggle, she cannot have left it to others to pay Him the last token of respect. It is she, and not another, who performed these pious offices under the name of Mary Magdalene. Yet the improbability is even greater on the other side. We have seen this already in the case of the sinful woman, and it is equally impossible that John should either have been ignorant of the identity of Mary of Bethany and the Magdalene, or knowing it should have given no hint of it to the reader. Nor can it be said that the characters are quite the same. The Magdalene could not be selected as a type of contemplation like the sister of Martha; and we can hardly believe that the latter, who had so lately witnessed the triumph over death in the raising of her brother, could have been so slow to believe in the rising again of Him whom she knew to be the Resurrection and the Life.

It may seem strange that while the general tendency was to combine the three of whom we have spoken into one, others were led to make two different Magdalenes, owing to the difficulty of reconciling the narratives of the crucifixion. Thus Eusebius (ad Marinum, ii. 7) says there may have been two Marys, each belonging to Magdala, one of whom is the subject of Matthew's narrative, the other of John's. The first goes to the tomb with the other Mary; they see the angel sitting on the stone; they receive his message for the disciples, and depart quickly in fear and great joy. As they are on their way Jesus meets them, and they come and hold Him by the feet, and worship Him. The second goes alone to the sepulchre, stands weeping outside, is forbidden to touch the feet of Jesus when He appears to her. Some identified the former, the rejoicing Magdalene, with the sister of Martha; the latter, the weeping Magdalene, with the sinner.

Nothing is really known to us of the subsequent history of the Magdalene. The Greek Church believed that she died at Ephesus, whither she had followed St. John,[*] and that her relics were removed from thence to Constantinople by the Emperor Leo VI. The story, however, which took root in the West was very different. It was said that she belonged to a wealthy family possessed of great estates at Magdala and Bethany; that she abused all her admirable gifts to tempt others to sin; that after the Ascension she remained at Bethany till the disciples were scattered by the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen. The two sisters and others were placed in a boat by their persecutors, and were providentially carried without oars or sails to Massilia, where, by their preaching and miracles, they converted the heathen, and Lazarus was made bishop, while Mary retired to the wilderness and lived a life of extreme asceticism for thirty years. Finally, she was carried up to heaven in the arms of ascending angels.

Apparently the earliest document which gives the legend is the Life by Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, who flourished at the beginning of the 9th cent. This was greatly amplified by Vincent of Beauvais in the 13th cent. The story was not known to Gregory the Great, or to Gregory of Tours in the 6th cent., as he mentions the death of the Magdalene at Ephesus (Mirac. i. 30), nor, if we may believe Launoi,[†] is there any allusion to it in the writings of Bernard or Peter of Cluny or Peter Damianus, all of whom took the Magdalene as the subject of panegyric. It is treated as unworthy of examination by the Bollandists, and is probably due to misapprehension arising from the great place occupied in the traditions of Provence by Marius, who defeated the Ambrons and Teutons in the battle of Aix, B.C. 102. Marius was accompanied, as we learn from Plutarch, by a Syrian prophetess of the name of Martha, and it is suggested by Baring-Gould, after Gilles, that the connexion of these two names may have been the starting-point of the whole legend. At Les Baux, where Marius was encamped, there are some ancient sculptures on a limestone block, one, known as the Trémaié, containing three standing figures, which tradition holds to be the three Marys, but Gilles is of opinion that they represent Marius with his wife Julia and the prophetess Martha. The Trois Maries here are said to be Martha with her attendant Marcella and the Magdalene. It is curious that at another Trois Maries in the Camargue, the landing-place, according to the legend, of the whole party from Palestine, the three Marys are said to be the mother of James, Salome, and the attendant Sara. As there is really only one or, at most, two Marys in either case, we naturally ask how the number three came in, and it may not be irrelevant to remember that the famous Fossæ Marianæ from Arles to Massilia were constructed by Marius in his third consulship, while he was preparing for his campaign against the Ambrons, and would no doubt be commemorated by inscriptions which might run something as follows: C. Marius C. F. cos III. fossas faciendas curavit; and these, as they got defaced with age, might easily be supposed to bear witness to Trois Maries. The tradition had pretty well established itself by the 11th cent., though it was a matter of hot dispute whether Aix or Vezelay possessed the true relics of the Magdalene. Fortunately, in 1279 Charles the nephew of Louis IX. (who had himself made a pilgrimage to her cell at St. Baume) discovered her body in St. Maximin's Church at Aix, and since then the cult of the Magdalene has had hardly less vogue than that of the Virgin. The romantic character of her story and the feeling of a common frailty endeared her to all classes, and even reformers were loth to disturb a belief which on the whole worked for good. For an account of her place in art the reader is referred to Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. ii. p. 343 ff.

vi. MARY THE MOTHER OF MARK.—The only place in which she appears in the NT is Ac 12^{12}, where we read that many were gathered together and praying in her house when Peter knocked at the door after his escape from prison. As Mark is called cousin (ἀνεψιός) of Barnabas (Col 4^{10}), she would be aunt of the latter. Later writers believed that her house was situated on Mt. Zion, and that it was the place of meeting for the disciples from the Ascension to the day of Pentecost. It was said to have escaped the destruction of the city by Titus, and to have been used as a church at a later period (Epiphanius, de Pond. et Mens. c. 14; Cyril Jerus. Catech. 16).

vii. MARY SALUTED BY ST. PAUL.—Nothing is known of her except that her name appears after Priscilla, Aquila, and Epænetus in the list of 24 persons to whom St. Paul sends greetings in the 16th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. She, like the other women (Tryphæna, Tryphosa, and Persis) mentioned in v.^{12}, is said to have 'laboured much' for the Church, and may possibly have held the position of deaconess or 'widow' at Rome.

viii. See next article. J. B. MAYOR.

MARY (THE VIRGIN).—This subject may be considered under four heads: (A) the story of her life as it is given (1) in the NT, (2) in the Apocryphal Gospels and elsewhere; (B) the history of opinion respecting her; (C) her place in Liturgiology; (D) her place in Art.

A. 1. What we are told in the Bible about Mary falls naturally into two portions—that which precedes, and that which follows the baptism of our Lord. (a) All that we know of the former is included in the earlier chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke. These agree in the main facts, that Jesus was 'conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,' that His mother was espoused to Joseph, that the birth took place at Bethlehem towards the end of the reign of Herod the Great, that Nazareth was the subsequent home of the Holy Family, that previous intimation of the supernatural birth had been given through the instrumentality of angels, that Jesus was descended from David, as shown in the appended genealogies. To these facts St. Matthew adds that the marriage of Joseph and Mary was carried out after the doubts of the former had been set at rest by an angelic vision; that wise men from the East, under the guidance of a star, came to offer their gifts at the cradle of the infant Saviour; that the children at Bethlehem were massacred owing to Herod's jealousy, Jesus and His parents having previously taken refuge in Egypt, from whence they returned on the death of Herod, and settled at Nazareth in consequence of a divine warning. St. Luke adds the story of the birth of John, the Forerunner; the statement that Mary was already living at Nazareth when the angel Gabriel announced to her that she should be the mother of the Messiah; the visit of Mary to her cousin Elisabeth, and her reception by the latter as the destined mother of the Lord; Mary's song of praise; the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem to be enrolled there as belonging to the family of David; the birth in the stable; the announcement to the shepherds; the circumcision; the purification in the temple; the blessing of Simeon and Anna; the return to Nazareth; the visit to the temple when Jesus was twelve years old; His questioning of the doctors; His answer to Mary's complaint ('Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing'), in the words, 'How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' and lastly, the general statement as to the Son's humility and the thoughtful pondering of the mother.*

It is a significant fact that the story of the Infancy is confined to these two Gospels. We may explain its omission in the Fourth Gospel by the consideration that this, being evidently supplementary to the others, often omits details which were assumed to be already familiar to the reader. But in the case of St. Mark we are forced to the conclusion, either that he was unacquainted with the details of our Lord's life previous to the preaching of John, or that, knowing them, he did not regard them as an essential part of the Gospel message. The general impression left by all the Gospels certainly is that during our Lord's life the secret of His miraculous birth had been communicated to very few. Thus we read in Mt 13^{55} 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4^{22} 'Is not this Joseph's son?' Jn 6^{42} 'Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' And so in Jn 1^{45} Philip says to Nathanael, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph'; and both the genealogies of our Lord are traced to David through Joseph 'the son of David.'† Nor have we any evidence that the mysterious truth was generally known during the apostolic age. No allusion is made to it in the Acts or the Epistles,‡ and the 'woman clothed with the sun' in Rev 12, though interpreted by some of the Virgin, is plainly intended to symbolize the Church. St. Paul, St.

* Resch thinks (Kindheitsevangelium, Leipzig, 1895) that both evangelists borrowed from the same source, the Βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ mentioned by St. Matthew (1^{1}), which we may suppose to have been published after the Virgin's death, about A.D. 60. He accounts for the differences between them by supposing that St. Luke purposely omitted those incidents which had been already selected by St. Matthew as showing the fulfilment of Hebrew prophecy, while he preferred himself to dwell on that part of the story which possessed the widest human interest. Prof. W. M. Ramsay, on the other hand, thinks that Luke's account is directly due to Mary herself (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? pp. 73–88).

† Mt 1^{20}.

‡ It is true that Gal 4^{4} 'When the fulness of time was come God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law,' has been cited as such an allusion; but the phrase there used γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικός may be merely an equivalent of γεννητοὶ γυναικῶν found in Job 14^{1} 15^{14} 25^{4}, Mt 11^{11}, Lk 7^{28}, or at most it may refer to the promise of Gn 3^{15}.

Peter, and St. John are alike emphatic in insisting on the fact of the Incarnation as the central truth of the Christian religion, and alike silent as to the way in which it was brought about.

The ancient Syriac Gospel discovered at Mt. Sinai, and published in 1894, of which a translation was published by Mrs. Lewis in 1896, has some remarkable variants in Mt $1^{16\text{ff.}}$. It runs thus: 'Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus who is called Christ'; again in v.^{21} the reading is 'she shall bear to thee a son'; and in v.^{25} 'she bore to him a son.' The publication gave rise to much discussion in the Academy[*] and elsewhere: among other theories it was suggested that this might be an Ebionite revision of our Gospel; but this seemed inconsistent with the word 'Virgin' which appears in v.^{16}, as well as with vv.$^{18-20}$. Others supposed that the Syriac version represents an earlier form of the genealogy, which may have been taken from a Jewish register and incorporated in the Gospel. This view received a certain amount of support from some of the old Latin versions, which have Joseph cui desponsata virgo Maria genuit Jesum, where the use of genuit instead of peperit has been thought to betoken an earlier form, in which desponsata was followed by erat.[†] See, further, art. JESUS CHRIST in vol. ii. p. 644.

However this may be, there can be no doubt that the miraculous conception was denied by several of the early heretics, who either maintained (with Cerinthus) the naturalistic birth of the Lord, followed by the bestowal of supernatural powers through the descent of the Spirit at His baptism, or held (with Marcion) that He was without earthly parentage, but descended from heaven in the 15th year of Tiberius and showed Himself in the synagogue of Capernaum.

On the other hand, stress is laid on the supernatural birth of the Lord by Ignatius, who in opposing the phantom theory of the Docetæ uses such phrases as καὶ ἐκ Μαρίας καὶ ἐκ θεοῦ, Eph. 7; ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ἐκυοφορήθη ὑπὸ Μαρίας κατ' οἰκονομίαν ἐκ σπέρματος μὲν Δαυεὶδ πνεύματος δὲ ἁγίου, ib. 18; ἔλαθεν τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἡ παρθενία Μαρίας καὶ ὁ τοκετὸς αὐτῆς, ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ θάνατος τοῦ Κυρίου, ib. 19: these, he says, are τρία μυστήρια κραυγῆς, three mysteries wrought in the silence of God, though destined to be proclaimed aloud.[‡]

(b) Proceeding now to the second part of Mary's life, we find her, after the death of her husband (who is introduced for the last time in the visit to the temple), residing, as it would seem, with the Lord and His brethren [see BRETHREN OF THE LORD], partly at Nazareth (Mk $6^{1\text{ff.}}$, Lk 4^{16}, Jn 1^{45} 19^{19}) and partly at Capernaum (Mt 4^{13} 9^{1}, Mk 2^{1}, Jn 2^{12}). We are not told that she accompanied our Lord in His missionary journeys, like Mary Magdalene and Susanna (Mk 15^{40}, Lk 8^{3}). The first mention of her in this period is at the marriage at Cana in Galilee (Jn 2), where her direction to the servants, 'Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it,' seems to show that her relation to the bridegroom was such as to justify the exercise of authority on her part. Her previous appeal to her Son to provide for the deficiency of wine had drawn forth from Him the same sort of correction as her complaint at His disappearance on the occasion of the visit to the temple, τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί, γύναι; 'Woman, what hast thou to do with me?' Though there was nothing of harshness in the appellation γύναι, as we may see from its use in the last tender commendation of His mother to the beloved disciple (Jn 19^{26}), yet the choice of a word applying alike to all women is not without its significance, and the clause which follows undoubtedly contains a warning that it was not for her or for any human being to determine His course of action.[*] The next mention of Mary is in Mk 3^{20-37}, where we are told that the people pressed upon Jesus to such an extent that He had not even time to eat; and that His friends hearing this, 'went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself.' Accordingly in the 31st verse we read that 'his mother and brethren came where he was, and, standing without, sent unto him, calling him. . . . And they say unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee. And he answereth them, and saith, Who is my mother and my brethren? And looking round on them which sat round about him (in Mt 12^{49} 'stretching forth his hand towards his disciples'), he saith, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.' Here, too, the same lesson is taught, viz. that the knowledge of Christ after the flesh conveys no special privilege, no right of interference or control, not even any exclusive or peculiar blessedness, for in Lk 11^{27} the exclamation, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou didst suck,' calls forth the correction that His mother's true blessedness consisted, not in the fact of a physical connexion, but in those moral and spiritual qualifications which were open to all, 'Yea, rather (μενοῦν),[†] blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.' The next occasion on which we meet with Mary is at the foot of the Cross. She had come up with other women from Galilee to be present at the passover. As she stood watching the dying agony of her Son, she received His latest charge, entrusting her to the guardianship of the beloved disciple, who from that hour took her to his own home (Jn 19^{26}). The only remaining notice of her in the NT is contained in Ac 1^{14}, where she is mentioned as continuing in prayer and supplication with the apostles and the other women and the brethren of the Lord.

2. The brief but exquisite sketch of our Lord's early years contained in the NT provided a natural stimulant to imagination and curiosity, and the craving for further particulars was supplied by the writers of the Apocryphal Gospels, sometimes with the ulterior aim of magnifying asceticism or inculcating some special doctrine of their own. Hence in the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 16) these works are spoken of as 'poisonous apocryphal books in which the wicked heretics reproach the creation, marriage, the providential government of the world,' etc. Their popularity, however, was so great, that Catholic writers found it necessary either to imitate or to revise them. We will give here a general sketch of the further story of the Infancy, derived from a comparison of these apocryphal sources, disregarding minor discrepancies.

Grenfell and Hunt in the 1st part of the Oxyrhynchus Papiri. It appears there in its ordinary form, Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός.

[*] Blass (l.c. p. 238) quotes Nonnus' paraphrase τί ἐμοί, γύναι, ἢ σοὶ αὐτῇ, as implying that ἤ must have been read instead of καί in a contemporary MS of the Fourth Gospel, and argues that we should replace ἤ in the text. Prof. Ramsay thinks that we may understand the existing text in the same general sense, 'how does that concern us' (l.c. p. 84). The objection to this is (1) the constant use of the phrase in the other sense; (2) the consensus of the ancient commentators; (3) the almost certainty that the other meaning would have been expressed by τί πρὸς ἡμᾶς as in Mt 27^{4}, Jn 21^{22}; (4) the inappropriateness of the supposed language in the mouth of Jesus under the actual circumstances. Surely it is every man's 'concern' to save his friend from inconvenience or discredit. And what, on this supposition, is the force of the words which follow 'mine hour has not yet come'?—words which give a natural reason for the τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί;

The first development is concerned with the period preceding the betrothal of Mary. Her parents are said to have been Joachim of Nazareth and Anna of Bethlehem, both of the family of David. When they had been married twenty years without children, Joachim, going up to make his offering at the temple, was repelled as coming under the curse pronounced in Scripture against those who had not raised up seed to Israel. Being ashamed to return home, he retired to the wilderness and fasted there forty days, and received an assurance that a child should be born to him. Meanwhile his wife was bewailing her barrenness and her husband's desertion, envying even the sparrows which had their nest in her garden. An angel comforted her by the news that Joachim was returning, and that she should bear him a child, whom she at once vowed to dedicate to the service of the temple. At the age of three, the child of promise was accordingly taken by her parents to the temple, where she charmed all the beholders by dancing on the steps of the altar. She remained in the temple, ministered to by angels, till she had completed her twelfth year, when the high priest was directed to summon all the widowers of Israel to bring each his rod to present before the altar, in order that it might be made known by a miraculous sign to whose care the Virgin was to be committed. When Joseph's rod was returned to him, a dove issued from it and hovered over his head: to him therefore Mary was entrusted in spite of his protests. Seven virgins were appointed to be her companions, and to work with her at a new veil for the temple, while Joseph left his home to follow his calling as a shipwright. One day Mary, going out to draw water, heard a voice saying, 'Hail! thou that art highly favoured.' Being alarmed at seeing no one, she left her vessel and returned to work at the veil, when an angel appeared and addressed her in the words, 'Fear not, Mary, thou hast found favour with God by thy vow of chastity, and shalt conceive by His word. . . . A virgin thou shalt conceive, a virgin bring forth, a virgin rear thy Son.' Shortly afterwards Mary appeared before the high priest with the veil, and received his blessing. Then come the visit to Elisabeth, the return home, the meeting with Joseph, the quieting of his suspicions by a vision, a summons from the priests, directing both Mary and Joseph to attend at the temple and reply to the charge brought against them; the proof of their innocence by the ordeal of the water of bitterness (Nu 5^{18}).

In the apocryphal account of the visit to Bethlehem the following points are noticeable. Mary rides on an ass, and is accompanied by Joseph and two of his sons; as they approach Bethlehem they stop before a cave,[*] into which Joseph carried her. As soon as she entered it the darkness was lit up by a glory brighter than the sun, which continued as long as she remained there. Meanwhile Joseph had gone to seek for a midwife. As he went, he looked up and saw all movement brought to a sudden pause, both in heaven and earth. When the pause was over, he beheld a woman coming down from the mountain, who told him she was a midwife, and went with him to the cave, on which a bright cloud was resting. Going in they found Mary with her Child at her breast, but no other sign of her delivery. Salome, who had followed them, would not believe in the miraculous birth without further examination,[†] and was punished for her impiety by the withering of her hand, which was, however, restored on her repentance. On the third day after the birth, Mary moved from the cave to a stable, and placed the Child in a manger, where the ox and the ass worshipped Him, thus fulfilling the word of the prophet, 'the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib.'

The adoration of the Magi and the subsequent massacre of the Innocents are taken with little alteration from the Bible. But many fanciful additions are made in narrating the journey to Egypt. Wild beasts play around the infant Saviour; trees bend down their branches to offer their fruit to Mary; springs burst forth at her need; the idols fall from their bases to the earth; the journey is miraculously shortened; lepers and demoniacs and sick people of all sorts are healed by being sprinkled with the water in which Mary had washed her Child, or by handkerchiefs which He had touched. One of the most remarkable stories is that of the healing of a young man who had been turned by enchantment into a mule. His sisters having besought the Virgin's help, she placed her Son on the mule, and at her prayer He restored the youth to his original shape. Another story relates to the two robbers who were afterwards crucified with Jesus. The one, called Titus,[*] had with difficulty prevented his fellow from giving the alarm as the Holy Family passed by. Mary thanked him, and prayed that he might receive forgiveness of his sins; whereupon Jesus answered, 'After thirty years he shall be crucified on my right hand, and shall precede Me to Paradise.' At the end of the third year they returned from Egypt to Nazareth. It is unnecessary to relate the miracles, trivial or even malicious, said to have been wrought there by the child Jesus. Joseph died when Jesus was eighteen years of age.

No further particulars of interest are added to the life of Mary, as recorded in the Bible, till after the resurrection, when Jesus is said to have appeared to her, first of all, accompanied by the patriarchs and prophets whom He had released from Hades.[†] Two years later (other versions give 22 or 24 years) she was warned by an angel that her death was approaching, and the apostles were all miraculously conveyed from various parts of the earth to be present at her bedside. Jesus Himself received her soul, and after three days her body was carried up by angels to heaven. St. Thomas, who had come too late for her death, was privileged to behold her ascension, and to receive her girdle as a sign of blessing.[‡]

In his note on Jn 19^{27} Westcott says, 'Nothing is known with reasonable certainty of the later life of the mother of the Lord. Epiphanius was evidently unacquainted with any accepted tradition on the subject (Hær. 78). He leaves it in doubt whether she accompanied St. John to Asia Minor or not. But in the course of time surmises were converted into facts; and Nicephorus Callisti (†c. 1350), Hist. Eccl. ii. 3, relates that she lived with St. John at Jerusalem for eleven years after the death of the Lord, and died there in her 59th year. The site of the Tomb of the Virgin, just to the north of the Garden of Gethsemane, is not mentioned by any traveller of the first six centuries, and the later tradition that the church there was built by Helena is certainly false. See Quaresmius, ii. 240 ff.; Williams, Holy City, ii. 434 ff. From a passage in a synodical letter of the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431, Conc. iii. 573, Labbe) it appears that, according to another tradition, the mother of the Lord accompanied St. John to Ephesus, and was buried there.' See, further, art. 'Le lieu de la dormition de la Très Sainte Vierge,' by Père Séjourné in Revue Biblique, Jan. 1899, p. 141 ff. The traditional site of the Dormitio Mariæ in Jerusalem was made over to the Emperor of Germany in 1898.

[‡] For the story of the death and Assumption, see the apocryphal treatises de Transitu Mariæ, ascribed to St. John and to Melito. The earliest hint of such a belief among orthodox writers is to be found in Epiphanius (d. 403), who, while strongly censuring the heretical sect of the Collyridians for their worship of Mary (Panar. p. 1061), believes that some extraordinary mystery about her death is implied in the words of Rev (12^{14}), 'there were given to her eagle's wings.' Melito's de Transitu was condemned as heretical in the decree de Libris Canonicis, attributed to Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494. The most recent statement of the Roman Catholic belief on this point will be found in Wilhelm and Scannel, vol. ii. p. 220: 'Mary's corporeal assumption into heaven is so thoroughly implied in the notion of her personality as given by Bible and dogma, that the Church can dispense with strict historical evidence of the fact.' Cf. also Livius, Blessed Virgin, pp. 338-378.

For Jewish and Mohammedan traditions with regard to Mary, see Canon Meyrick's article 'Mary the Virgin,' in Smith's DB. The only point which need be mentioned here is the Jewish slander reported by Celsus,[*] to the effect that Jesus was the illegitimate son of Mary and a soldier Pandera.

B. As early as the 2nd cent. we find Eve made a type of Mary, as Adam was of our Lord. As Eve had brought about the curse by listening to the Serpent, so Mary the blessing by listening to the Angel.[†] Still she shared man's fallen nature, and was guilty of actual sin. So Irenæus (iii. 16. 7), 'Dominus repellens ejus intempestivam festinationem dixit: Quid mihi et tibi est, mulier?' So Origen (Hom. in Luc. 17) interprets the prophecy of Simeon, 'A sword shall pierce through thine own soul also,' of the doubts felt by Mary, in common with the apostles, at the crucifixion: 'Si omnes peccaverunt et egent gloria Dei, justificati gratia ejus et redempti, utique et Maria illo tempore scandalizata est';[‡] and still more strongly Tertullian (de Carne Christi, 7), and Chrysostom, commenting on Mt $12^{47ff.}$ (Hom. in Matt. 44), where he says Mary called down her Son's rebuke by her presumption (ἀπόνοια).[§]

Augustine[‖] was among the earliest of the Fathers who thought it possible that she might be an exception to the rule that all have committed actual sins; though he allows that she shared the common corruption of humanity,[¶] and quotes Lk 11^{27} as showing that even the mother of Jesus was blessed, not because in her the Word was made flesh, but because she kept the word of God.

It does not appear that we have any direct evidence of prayer being made, or worship offered, to Mary during the first four centuries,[] except by the obscure sect of the Collyridians already mentioned, against whom Epiphanius lays down the rule, ἐν τιμῇ ἔστω Μαρία, ὁ δὲ Πατὴρ καὶ Υἱὸς καὶ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα προσκυνείσθω· τὴν Μαρίαν μηδεὶς προσκυνείτω. But the cultus and invocation of the martyrs, and belief in their miraculous power, had been growing up as early as the 3rd cent.,[*] and the gradual paganizing of the Church, which followed the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the empire, led, in many places, to the substitution of Christian saints for the old local divinities.[†] Indeed the continued use of the old temples and ceremonies and images under new names might seem to be countenanced by St. Paul's words in reference to the Athenian altar 'whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.' Then the worship of the Lares, the apotheosis of the dead, the almost blasphemous homage paid to the living emperor in the East, prepared the way for the worship of saints. The votaries of Demeter and Persephone and of other female deities found it easier to transfer their allegiance to the Christian Church, when they were permitted to make their vows there to Mary as the Mother of God and the Queen of Heaven;[‡] while at the same time these titles were demanded by the more fanatical Christians, who claimed divine honours for the ideal and prototype of virginity, which they held to be the highest of all virtues. The movement in this direction was especially favoured by the reaction against the Nestorian heresy, condemned at the Council of Ephesus in A.D. 431—a reaction shown in the multiplication of pictures of the Virgin, and in a readiness to accept, as authentic, any supposed tradition or revelation which tended to her glory. On the other hand, the Divinity of Christ tended to obscure his Humanity. The loving sympathy of one who could be touched with the feeling of our infirmities was transferred to Mary, whose mediation with her Son, the stern and terrible Judge, was every day felt to be more necessary to weak and erring mortals. Add to this the chivalrous sentiments and the respect for woman among the northern nations of Europe, and we shall not be surprised at the subsequent developments of Mariolatry. The language of the Bible, especially in the Vulgate, was strained to support this: the name 'Mariam' itself received various interpretations, of which the most popular was Stella Maris: the promise to the seed of the woman in Gn 3^{16} was transferred to the woman herself in accordance with the Vulgate mistranslation, 'ipsa conteret caput tuum': the greeting in Lk 1^{28} χαῖρε κεχαριτωμένη (Vulg. 'ave gratia plena') was a proof that Mary was herself a fountain of grace: her reply to the angel (οὐ γινώσκω ἄνδρα) is taken to be a vow: the words by which she was entrusted to the care of the beloved disciple, ἰδοὺ ὁ υἱός σου, describe her relation to all true members of the Church. She is the Bride of the Canticles, the Woman persecuted by the dragon in the Apocalypse, the Wisdom of whom Solomon speaks, whom the Lord possessed in the beginning as His daily delight, rejoicing always before Him. Christian orators, beginning with Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople in the middle of the 5th cent. (who spoke of the Mother of God, ἡ θεοτόκος,[§] as 'the only bridge between man and God'), vied with one another in devising new phrases in her honour; and the glowing hyperboles of an earlier generation were fixed in the dogma or ritual of a later generation, which again quickly gathered to itself a new halo of sentiment, to be followed by a yet further advance both in theory and practice. We may consider this development under three heads: (1) the personal holiness of the Virgin; (2) her power and dignity; (3) the nature of the worship due to her.

(1) We have seen that Augustine thought Mary might be exempt from actual sin, though sharing the general corruption of man's nature. Pelagius and his disciple Julian denied this hereditary sinfulness.[*] Paschasius Radbertus (c. 830), in his controversy with Ratramnus, maintained that Mary was sanctified in the womb; and this was the doctrine of Bernard (b. 1091), who, however, protested strongly against the institution of the feast of the Conception by the Canons of Lyons, Dec. 8, 1140, as sanctioning the belief in the Immaculate Conception, which he regarded as superstitious and opposed to the tradition of the Church. Bernard was followed by the greatest schoolmen, including Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274); but about the year 1300 Duns Scotus maintained that, since it was as much in the power of God to blot out sin in the moment of conception as at a later period, it was more congruous to attribute to the Virgin the higher perfection. This view was adopted by the Franciscans and supported by the visions of St. Brigitta, while the older view was maintained by the Dominicans and supported by the visions of St. Catharine of Sienna. Pope Sixtus IV. (1476) declared it an open question, but gave his sanction to the festival. Finally, the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was proclaimed by Pius IX., Dec. 1854.[†]

(2) By the end of the 7th cent. the belief in wonder-working pictures, icons, and the honouring of these with osculation, lights, and incense, together with the invocation of the Virgin and other saints, had become so common in the Eastern Church, that Christians were regarded as idolaters by the Mohammedans. Leo the Isaurian, who became emperor in 716, tried to avert this charge by forbidding the use of images altogether; and his prohibition was confirmed by the Synod of Constantinople in 754. The chief opponents of the Iconoclasts were Germanus of Constantinople and John of Damascus, who, in their writings, assign to Mary the highest place in heaven next to the Blessed Trinity, though they guard themselves against the imputation of deifying her, as the pagans did their Mater Deorum (see Damasc. Hom I. in Dorm. Mariæ, §§ 11, 15). John addresses her as 'the rest of the weary, comfort of the sorrowful, healing to the sick, pardon to the sinful, a ready help to all.' In the 11th cent. Damiani speaks of her as 'non solum rogans sed imperans, domina non ancilla.' In the 12th cent. Bernard, in the 13th Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura, carry their adoration to a still higher pitch. Thomas is cited as saying that 'in Mary is all our hope of salvation,' and that she has obtained half the kingdom of God, 'ut ipsa sit Regina misericordiæ, ut Christus est Rex justitiæ'; Bonaventura speaks of her as the 'porta cæli, quia nullus potest jam cælum intrare nisi per Mariam transeat tanquam per portam,' and to him are ascribed the contemporary adaptation of the Psalter and Te Deum to the worship of the Virgin, as a specimen of which may be quoted the versicles of the latter—'All the earth doth worship Thee, Spouse of the Eternal Father'; 'Vouchsafe, O sweet Mary, to keep us now and ever without sin.' What is perhaps even more remarkable is that, in an early sermon of Wyclif's[*] (d. 1384), we read: 'It seems to me impossible that we should obtain the reward without the help of Mary. There is no sex or age, no rank or position, of any one in the whole human race, which has no need to call for the help of the Holy Virgin.'[†]

It must not be supposed, however, that there was no protest against the constantly advancing tide of Mariolatry. Beside the Nestorians and the Eastern Iconoclasts, who were to a certain extent supported by the Frankish Church under Charlemagne, there were various sects, Paulicians,[‡] Cathari, and later the Waldenses and Moravians, which condemned the Invocation of Saints; and at least two eminent Churchmen in the 9th cent. wrote against it, viz. Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, and Claudius, bishop of Turin.[§] Wyclif gradually came to the same conclusion, and some of his followers, e.g. Lord Cobham, were condemned to death for contradicting the teaching of the Church as to the worship of saints. The desire for reform in the practice and teaching of the Church was strongly reinforced by the reaction from the mediæval system, which came in with the Renaissance: and by the end of the 15th cent. there were many signs that the old ideas as to the Virgin were becoming untenable. This may be seen from the reference made to her in Dean Colet's Preceptes of Livinge, 'Byleve and trust in chryst Jesu. Worship hym and his moder Mary,' especially when viewed in the light of his favourite principle, 'Keep to the Bible and the Apostles' Creed, and let divines dispute about the rest'; as well as from the charge brought against him (1512), that he denied the worship of images.[‖] The opinion of Erasmus is known from the Encomium Mariæ and Peregrinatio, in which he ridicules pilgrimages to the shrine of St. Mary of Walsingham, the prayers offered to her, and generally the speculations of the schoolmen as to her virginity and sinlessness. Even Sir Thomas More condemns image-worship in his Utopia, and in a letter to Erasmus expresses his disgust at the Mariolatry which he witnessed at Coventry, where a Franciscan was preaching that 'whoever made daily use of the Psalter of the Blessed Virgin could never be damned,' while the parish priest, seeing that men became emboldened to crime through trust in their devotions to the Virgin, made a vain protest, which only drew on him the charge of impiety. In another letter to a monk in defence of Erasmus, More mentions that he had himself known of a band of assassins, who used to kneel before the Virgin, and then proceed 'piously to perpetrate their crime.' He adds that he does not say this 'to condemn those who occasionally salute the Holy Virgin, than which nothing is more beneficial.' While all the Reformed Churches condemned the doctrine of Rome on this point, the Lutherans were less prominent in opposing it than the Swiss and the French, who often drew upon themselves persecution by their violence in destroying images. Berquin, the first Protestant martyr in France, was charged with asserting that it was wrong to invoke the Virgin Mary in place of the Holy Spirit, and to call her the source of all grace, or assign to her such titles as 'Our hope' and 'Our life,' which belong only to Christ. The doctrine of the Church of England is given in the 15th Art., Of Christ alone without sin, and in the 22nd, where it is said, 'The Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping, and Adoration, as well of Images as of Reliques, and also Invocation of Saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God.' Both articles are unaltered from the form in which they were originally put forth in 1553, except that the phrase 'Romish doctrine' was substituted in 1562 for 'doctrine of the school-authors' in the earlier form.

Even the Council of Trent (1545–1563) gives evidence of this change of feeling in the guarded language used in Sess. xxv.: De invocatione, veneratione, et reliquiis Sanctorum et sacris imaginibus, where it is enjoined that 'the people be taught that the Saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers for men to God, and that it is good and useful to invoke them as suppliants, and to have recourse to their prayers for the sake of obtaining benefit from God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, who is our only Redeemer and Saviour.' This is followed by a warning against superstition in such worship, and the caution that no innovation should be made except with the approbation of the bishop. The Roman Catechism speaks more particularly of the Virgin: 'Rightly are we taught to pray to the most blessed Mother of God, ut nobis peccatoribus sua intercessione conciliaret Deum, bonaque tum ad hanc tum ad æternam vitam necessaria impetraret.'

The check on superstition was, however, only temporary. Mainly owing to the efforts of the Jesuits, Mariolatry is probably now more prevalent in the Church of Rome than at any former time, if we may judge from the Decree of 8th Dec. 1854, the enormous crowds of pilgrims who flock to Lourdes, and the popularity of such books as the Glories of Mary, brought out in 1784 by St. Alphonsus de Liguori, of which the English translation is 'heartily commended to the faithful' by the late Cardinals Wiseman and Manning. Even Cardinal Newman does not shrink from using the phrase 'deification' in reference to the Romish doctrine of the Virgin and the Saints (Essay on Development, ch. 8).*

(3) As early as the 5th cent. Augustine gives a warning against the worship of saints in the words, 'Honorandi sunt propter imitationem, non adorandi propter religionem' (de Vera Religione, 55); 'Colimus martyres eo cultu dilectionis et societatis quo in hac vita coluntur sancti homines Dei . . . illo cultu qui Græce "Latria" dicitur, cum sit quædam proprie divinitati debita servitus, nec colimus, nec colendum docemus nisi unum Deum' (c. Faustum, xx. 21). In the 2nd Council of Nicæa (786) it was decreed that the Cross of Christ, the Virgin, Angels, and Saints were entitled to religious reverence, τιμητικὴ προσκύνησις, but not to divine worship, λατρεία. Peter Lombard (Sent. III. Dist. 9. 1) uses the word 'dulia' for the former, but he says that there is a special dulia due to the humanity of Christ, 'est quædam dulia soli humanitati Christi exhibenda, non alii creaturæ.' Thomas Aquinas gives this higher dulia the name of hyper-dulia, but transfers it to the worship of Mary, not to that of the humanity of Christ, which he identifies with latria (Summa, Pars. 3, Qu. 25). He cites Augustine for the distinguishing feature of latria: 'aliquid est quod soli Deo exhibetur, scilicet sacrificium'; and later writers have maintained that, as the Mass is never offered to the Virgin, her worship never oversteps the limit of dulia. If, however, we understand sacrificium, as Augustine does (Civ. Dei, x. c. 1, §§ 2, 3; c. 3, 4, 5, 6), in a spiritual sense of fervent love and devotion, it is difficult to see how the worship inculcated in such a book as the Glories of Mary differs from this; and Pusey quotes passages from Corn. a Lapide, Faber, and others, in which it is actually maintained that Mary is present and received in the Eucharist, and feeds the worshippers there with her own flesh.*

C. By far the commonest form of devotion to the Virgin is the Ave Maria, consisting of two parts: the salutation—'Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb'; and the prayer—'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now, and at the hour of death.' The former part was first ordered to be used as a church formula by Odo, bishop of Paris, in 1196; the latter part first appears in the 15th cent., and was directed to be used daily at the seven canonical hours by Pius V. in 1568. The 'Angelus' (said to have been introduced in 1287) consists of three recitations of the Ave Maria at the sound of the Angelus bell, at morning, midday, and night, the first recitation on each occasion being introduced by the words, 'The Angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Ghost.' The 'Rosary' is the string of beads introduced by St. Dominic in 1210 to facilitate the repetition of 150 Ave Marias and 15 Pater Nosters. The name is also used for this particular kind of devotion.†

The oldest festival connected with the name of Mary is the Purification,‡ observed on 2nd Feb., thus consecrating, as Bede observes, the old lustral month of the Romans to a higher purpose. It was probably instituted by Justinian in 542. Its name of 'Candlemas' was derived from the custom of consecrating candles and marching in procession with them on that day, in remembrance of the 'light to lighten the Gentiles.' The Annunciation ‡ (Lady Day), of which St. Bernard spoke as the 'radix omnium festorum,' was instituted about the end of the 6th cent. The pagan feast of the Hilaria Matris Deum was held on the same day (25th March). The Assumption (15th Aug.), instituted by the emperor Maurice about the beginning of the 7th cent., was introduced into the West by Charlemagne. The Nativity § (8th Sept.) was probably instituted in Italy in the 10th cent. The Presentation (21st Nov.) commemorates the dedication of Mary by her parents in her 3rd year. This festival was known in the East in 1150, but not till 1375 in the West. We have already spoken of the Conception § (Dec. 8). The Visitation § (2nd July) was instituted in 1389 to commemorate the visit of Mary to Elisabeth. It may be worth while to mention two other festivals: that of Mount Carmel, instituted in 1587 to commemorate the appearance of the Virgin to the general of the Carmelites in the year 1251, when she is said to have presented him with a scapular of the order, telling him that whoever died wearing this would escape the flames of hell. The other is the Translation of the House of Loretto, instituted in 1669 to commemorate the miraculous removal to Italy in 1294 of the house at Nazareth in which the angel appeared to Mary.

Saturday was appropriated to the worship of the Virgin in 1096, so far as the clergy were concerned, and this rule was extended to the laity in 1229. The month of May is also dedicated to her honour.

Manning it is maintained that the Intercession of Mary is an ordinary and necessary means of salvation; and the dictum of certain theologians, that 'God grants no grace except on the intercession of Mary,' is defended (Wilhelm and Scannel, ii. pp. 223, 224).

‡ The festivals thus denoted are marked with red letters in the Church of England calendar.

§ The festivals thus denoted, as well as that of St. Anne, the mother of the Virgin (July 26), are marked as black-letter feasts in the Church of England calendar.

D. Development in opinion is illustrated by development in art. During the first five centuries there is nothing to show that the Virgin was in any way raised above other saints. She appears simply in scenes taken from Scripture, e.g. the Annunciation, the Adoration of the Magi, the Mother and Child (of frequent occurrence after the Nestorian controversy), or possibly as a single figure in the attitude of prayer. In an Adoration dated A.D. 435, Christ is seated alone on a throne with angels above Him, while His mother occupies a subordinate position on one side near two of the Magi. The nimbus is given to Christ, the angels, and king Herod, not to Mary.* It is not till the 6th cent. that we find evidence of pre-eminent dignity ascribed to her in the painting of an Ascension, contained in a Syriac MS dated 586, where she stands in the centre of the apostles beneath the ascending figure of Christ. In this picture she, as well as our Lord and the angels, has the nimbus, but the apostles are without it. With one remarkable exception, it is not till the 9th cent. that we find her enthroned as Queen of Heaven in the centre of the apse†—a position formerly reserved for Christ. The exception referred to is 'the mosaic of the apse of the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria, the work of Bishop Euphrasius, A.D. 535–543. She is throned and nimbed and supported by angels, holding her Son in her lap.'‡ The climax is reached in the 12th cent., when we find the Virgin enthroned with Christ, as His equal, in a mosaic of the Church of St. Maria in Trastevère.

Mrs. Jameson, in her Legends of the Madonna, distinguishes between representations of real or supposed historical scenes, and purely ideal or devotional paintings. Among the latter may be noted those which exhibit the Virgin as Virgo Sapientiæ, Sponsa Dei, the Pietà (Madonna with dead Christ), Mater Dolorosa, Regina Cœli, Mater Misericordiæ, in which character she is sometimes represented as endeavouring to shield mankind from the wrath of her Son.

The most famous of the ancient portraits of the Virgin was that attributed to St. Luke, which was sent to Pulcheria from Jerusalem in 438. This was subsequently regarded as a kind of palladium, and accompanied the emperor to the battlefield, till the capture of Constantinople in 1453.

From what has been said, it appears that no kind of justification for the worship of Mary is to be found in the Bible, or in the theory or practice of the Early Church. Indeed the silences no less than the utterances of Scripture might seem providentially ordered so as to forbid any such development in after-ages. It may be argued, however, that there is an a posteriori justification in history. The idolatry of the Canaanites, against which the Mosaic law was primarily directed, was the deification of cruelty and vice, a true worship of devils. The idolatry of Greece at its best was the deification of beauty and intellect, sometimes favourable to virtue, as we may see in Herodotus, but more frequently to vice, if we may trust the witness of Plato. The worship of the Virgin is the deification of beauty and goodness. Regarding this from the historical point of view, who can dispute the immense gain to humanity of the substitution of such worship for any pre-existing idolatry? Contrasting it even with some other forms of Christianity, say with the more rigid Calvinistic school, we can see reasons why the continued existence and prevalence of Mariolatry should have been permitted 'for the hardness of men's hearts' by Divine Providence. Tenderness, gentleness, reverence, sympathy; enthusiastic devotion to high objects; a deepened sense of the gracious dignity of motherhood; joy in all beauty, whether of art or nature, as the outward manifestation of the Supreme Beauty; a kindly natural piety breathing trust and hope; some faint reflexion of the modest meekness, the resigned submission, the pure unruffled calm of the maiden of Nazareth,—such we might anticipate would be some of the effects of the contemplation of so noble an ideal. And such, no doubt, have been its effects in thousands of simple believers to whom Mary has been the authorized representation of the Divine goodness. But even so, there are certain qualities of mind and character, such as veracity, justice, fairness, honesty, an open eye, robust common-sense, large-minded considerateness, which are liable to fall into the background, when the feminine ideal, often coloured by mediæval modes of thought, bulks so large in the foreground. And if the only acceptable worship is that in spirit and in truth, must we not expect that a worship, founded in mere human invention and the capricious movements of an unchastened piety, would give proof of its unsoundness by its fruits? We shall not therefore be surprised to find that, where the sovereignty of Mary has tended to eclipse the sovereignty of God, the idea of goodness has been exchanged for that of mere weak indulgence, while the thought of the All-Holy and All-Just has been first shrunk from and then forgotten. If Christ has entrusted to His mother the whole treasury of grace, what need is there to look beyond her? The repetition of a few prayers, the offering of a few candles, even the presence of a picture of the Virgin, acts as a sort of charm to win her favour, even for the vicious and criminal.* The sense of personal responsibility, of the inexorable claims of duty, of the heinousness of sin, has been perilously weakened by the fatal error which led to the separation of the spheres of mercy and justice, assigning the former to the Madonna, the latter to her Son. The God of love, the meek and lowly Saviour, are robbed of their highest prerogatives, while the Virgin and the Saints, whose perfection on earth consisted in conforming their wills to the Divine will, are too often represented in popular Catholicism as seeking to resist and control that will.

That the above view of the dangers of Mariolatry is no mere delusion of the Protestant mind, but is shared more or less by many Anglicans who claim to adopt the Catholic position, as well as by some of highest authority among Roman Catholics themselves, is shown by Pusey's Eirenicon and Letter to Newman, and by Newman's reply to the former, in which he says (p. 108), 'Now at length coming to the statements . . . which offend you in works written in her (Mary's) honour, I will frankly say that I read some of them with grief and almost anger. . . . And if I hate those perverse sayings so much, how much more must she in proportion to her love of him?' Again he says (p. 119), 'They (these statements) seem to me like a bad dream. I could not have conceived them to be said. I know not to what authority to go for them, to Scripture, or to the Fathers, or to the decrees of Councils, or to the consent of schools, or to the tradition of the faithful, or to the Holy See, or to reason.' And he refers to Gerson, and Petavius, and others, who condemn the 'prurience of innovation,' and the frivolous and sophistical reasonings 'in which so many indulge in order to assign any sort of grace they please, however unusual, to the Blessed Virgin.' The motive of this is, according to Petavius, a 'kind of idolatry, lurking, as Augustine says, nay, implanted in human hearts, which is greatly abhorrent from theology, that is, from the gravity of heavenly wisdom.'

MASCHIL.—See PSALMS.

MASH (מַשׁ).—A son of Aram, Gn 10[23]. The parallel passage 1 Ch 1[17] substitutes Meshech; the LXX in both has Μόσοχ. A name corresponding with Mash is found in Assyrian inscriptions, especially the cylinder R^{m} of Assurbanipal, who, in describing his Arabian campaign, says he marched through the desert of Mash, 'a place of thirst and fainting, whither comes no bird of the heaven, neither do asses nor gazelles feed there' (S. A. Smith's edition, i. pp. 67, 68). Frd. Delitzsch (Paradies, 242, 243) interprets this to mean the Syrian desert; Glaser (Skizze, ii. 419), as 'the interior of Western Arabia'; and the word, according to Delitzsch, is foreign, and means 'wilderness.'

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

MASHAL (מָשָׁל, Μαασά).—1 Ch 6[74] [Heb. [59]]. See MISHAL.

MASIAS (A Μασίας, B Μεισαίας), 1 Es 5[34].—One of Solomon's servants (RVm Misaias). The name is absent from the parallel list in Ezra.

MASON.—In Syria masons both hew and build. In hewing they use the different kinds of hammers mentioned under art. HAMMER. In Ezr 3[7], 1 Ch 22[2], hewers (חֹצְבִים) are mentioned; the word in Arab. VS is naḥātîn, those who smoothed the stones. Masons use several instruments in building—the plumb line, a line wound on a reel for laying the courses of stone, a long rod of wood about 6 ft. in length, and a very curious kind of trowel. The trowel is of iron, about a foot long, fully an inch broad in the widest part, and tapers to a point; it is about half an inch thick. It is used as a lever for putting the stone exactly into its place, as well as for spreading the mortar.

The masons of Lebanon seem still to be the skilled builders of Palestine and Syria, as they were in ancient times (as we read in 2 S 5[11] that Hiram, king of Tyre, sent masons [חָרָשֵׁי אֶבֶן] to David to build him a house), for they travel all over Syria, Palestine, and the Ḥauran, building houses for the people, and forts for the government.

W. CARSLAW.

MASREKAH (מַשְׂרֵקָה, Μασέκκα).—Mentioned in connexion with the list of 'the kings that reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' Gn 36[31]. When one of these kings, named Hadad, died, Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead (v.[36]=1 Ch 1[47]). The locality has not been identified. The Onomasticon defines it thus: Μαρσικὰ πόλις βασιλείας Ἐδὼμ περὶ τὴν Γεβαληνήν. The name מַשְׂרֵקָה may signify 'place of Soreḳ (שֹׂרֵק) vines' (Del. on Gn 36[36]).

J. A. SELBIE.

MASSA (מַשָּׂא).—Name of a son of Ishmael (Gn 25[14] [A Μασσή]=1 Ch 1[30] [B Μαναςσή, A Μασσή]).—The correct translation of Pr 31[1], where Lemuel is described as 'king of Massa,' is due to Hitzig (Zeller's Theol. Jahrb. 1844, 269-305), and it is probable that the sense of the words following the name 'Agur' in Pr 30[1] is similar, though they cannot be rendered with certainty. Delitzsch (Paradies, 301) called attention to the occurrence of the name Ma-as-'a-ai immediately before Taymæans and Sabæans in a list of States which brought presents to Tiglath-pileser II. (WAI iii. 10. 1, 38), and justly identified these people with the Ishmaelite tribe. He also (ib. 302) thought there might be a reference to them in a tablet published in WAI iv. 56. 1, and further edited by G. Smith (History of Assurbanipal, 296-298), and most recently by S. A. Smith (Keilschrifttexte Asurbanipals, ii. 36-38). In that tablet a certain Nebo-sum-esir, who has been told to send the king anything that he may hear about the Arabs, states that Ākamaru, son of Ammē'tā of Mash (Mash-'a-ai), made a raid on the people of Nebaioth, and killed all the troops except one man, who is despatched to the king to give him personal information. It is more probable that a tribe of moderate size is referred to than a vast region like MASH; and the difference in spelling between this tablet and the former may be due to the popular pronunciation which is represented in the letters (S. A. Smith, p. 38). The scene described in the tablet resembles that of Job 1[17] (as Delitzsch observes), and it is probable that we have in these chapters a specimen of the famous wisdom of the 'children of the East.' From none of these passages can any data be got for the localization of Massa, and the conjectures of Hitzig (repeated by him in his comm. on Pr 30) scarcely deserve mention. See, further, art. SIMEON (TRIBE). Such portions of chs. 30 and 31 as really come from Massa are probably translated; but the first verse of ch. 30, which is unintelligible, may be partly in the original dialect. Of the proper names, Lemuel or Lemoel might be Hebrew or Arabic (compare Lishemesh, Lidzbarsky, Handbuch der nordsem. Epig. 304), Yaḳeh seems to be old Hebrew, while Agur is uncertain. On the other hand, the names given in Nebo-sum-esir's letter are very clearly old Arabic, and he certainly implies that the 'Mash-'a-ai' are Arabs.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

MASSAH (מַסָּה, i.e. 'proving,' 'trial'; (ὁ) πειρασμός, in Dt 33[8] πεῖρα).—The name given to the place, near Rephidim, at which, according to Ex 17[1-7], the Israelites 'tempted' J″ (i.e. in the old sense of the word, tried Him, put Him to the proof), doubting (v.[2]) His power to save them in their thirst, and saying (v.[7]) 'Is J″ among us, or not?' This incident at Massah is alluded to in Dt 6[16] 'Ye shall not "tempt" J″ (put J″ to the proof), as ye "tempted" Him (put Him to the proof) at Massah' (cf. Driver), 9[22], and Ps 95[8] 'Harden not your heart as at Meribah, as in the day of Massah in the wilderness, when your fathers tempted (i.e. tried) me, tested me, but also saw my work (sc. of judgment).' In Dt 33[8] the name is either played upon differently, or there is an allusion to a different version of the incident at Massah: 'Thy Thummim and thy Urim be for the man, thy godly one, whom thou didst prove at Massah, with whom (or, according to others, for whom) thou contendedst at the waters of Meribah.' The words have reference to the tribe of Levi; and the idea expressed by them may be that at Massah J″ either 'proved' the tribe in Moses' person, or (Dillm.) 'proved' Moses himself, by observing how he would behave under the provocation of the people's complaints. However, this explanation is not perfectly satisfactory; and it becomes less so when the attempt is made to adjust the Meribah clause to it: so that the opinion cannot be excluded that the allusion is to some different account of what happened at 'Massah,' according to which the fidelity of the tribe was tested directly by J″. The Arabs point to a rock called Ḥesy el-Ḥaṭṭâtîn, in the arid N.W. part of the Wady Feiran, as the one struck by Moses at 'Massah' (Palmer, Desert of Exodus, 159). See, further, REPHIDIM. S. R. DRIVER.

MASSIAS (A Μασσιας, B Ἀσσειας), 1 Es 9^{22}=MAASEIAH, Ezr 10^{22}.

MASSORAH, MASSORETES.—See TEXT OF OLD TESTAMENT.

MASTER.—See LORD. Like the Lat. magister from which it comes, 'master' was formerly used for 'teacher,' as Mal 2^{12} 'The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, the master and the scholar.' Cf. He 5^{12} Rhem. 'For whereas you ought to be maisters for your time, you neede to be taught againe your selves what be the elements of the beginning of the wordes of God.' Especially was it used for the head of a school (as it is still in use in the rural parts of Scotland), as Goldsmith, Des. Village, 196—

> 'There in his noisy mansion skilled to rule,
> The village master taught his little school.'

The Gr. διδάσκαλος, teacher, is in AV rendered 'master' in 2 Mac 1^{10}, Ja 3^{1}, and in all its occurrences in the Gospels, except Lk 2^{46} 'doctor' (RVm 'teacher') and Jn 3^{2} 'teacher.' But elsewhere it is tr^{d} 'teacher' in both AV and RV (Ac 13^{1}, Ro 2^{20}, 1 Co 12^{28}, Eph 4^{11}, 1 Ti 2^{7}, 2 Ti 1^{11} 4^{3}, He 5^{12}). So also ῥαββεί, though it is transliterated 'Rabbi' in Mt $23^{7.\,8}$, Jn $1^{38.\,49}$ $3^{2.\,26}$ 6^{25}, and is tr^{d} 'Lord' in Mk 10^{51} (after TR, but edd. mostly ῥαββουνεί, whence RV 'Rabboni'), is elsewhere rendered 'master' (Mt $26^{25.\,49}$, Mk 9^{5} 11^{21} 14^{45}, Jn 4^{31} 9^{2} 11^{8}); RV has Rabbi throughout. See RABBI.

Mastery is four times used for mod. 'victory': Ex 32^{18} 'It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery'; Dn 6^{24} 'the lions had the mastery of them'; 1 Co 9^{25} 'Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things' (ὁ ἀγωνιζόμενος, RV 'that striveth in the games'); 2 Ti 2^{5} 'If a man also strive for masteries' (ἀθλῇ; RV 'contend in the games'). Cf. Milton, PL ii. 899—

> 'For hot, cold, moist, and dry, four champions fierce > Strive here for mast'ry.'

The verb to 'master' in the sense of 'control' occurs in Wis 12^{18} 'But thou, mastering thy power, judgest with equity' (δεσπόζων ἰσχύος, RV 'being sovereign over thy strength'). RV has the word in the mod. sense of 'overcome' in Ac 19^{16} 'the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and mastered both of them.' J. HASTINGS.

MASTICK (σχῖνος,* lentiscus).—A diœcious tree, Pistacia Lentiscus, L., of the order Anacardiaceæ, of a spreading growth, 10 to 12 ft. high and broad. The leaves are persistent, with 3 to 5 pairs of oblong lanceolate to obovate, leathery, mucronulate leaflets, 1 to 1½ in. long, on a winged rachis. The fruits are dry, globular-obovate, somewhat flattened drupes, ⅙th of an in. in diameter, borne on short stiff panicles. It grows in thickets, in rocky places, along the coast and on hills to a height of 2500 feet, all around the Mediterranean. The gum is obtained from incisions in the bark, made in August. The juice exudes in the form of tears, which harden into spherical, flattened or irregular, pale-yellow masses, covered with a bloom, caused by their mutual attrition. They have a mild terebinthine odour and taste. Mastick is known in Arab. by the name mistaki. It is in universal use by women and girls as a chewing-gum, partly because of its pleasant taste and the agreeable odour it gives to the breath, and its reputed virtues as a preservative to the teeth and gums, and partly for the amusement of chewing it. It is also used as a temporary stopping for cavities in the teeth. It is an astringent, used to check discharges from the mucous membranes. A sweetmeat is made of it in Chio, and forms a considerable article of export. The tree is mentioned once only, in Apocrypha (Sus^{54}).

G. E. POST.

MATHELAS (A Μαθήλας, B Μαεήλας, AV Matthelas), 1 Es 9^{19}=MAASEIAH, Ezr 10^{18}. The LXX forms are due to confusion of c with θ or ϵ.

MATRED (מַטְרֵד, Ball compares the Arab. miṭrad, 'a short spear').—The mother-in-law (?) of Hadar (Gn) or Hadad (Ch), one of the kings of Edom, Gn 36^{39} (A Ματραίθ)=1 Ch 1^{50} (A Ματράδ). In Gn the LXX and Pesh. make Matred the son not the daughter of Me-zahab, which is accepted by Ball, who reads בן instead of MT בת. Kittel is not indisposed to accept the same reading in Ch, thus making Matred a masculine name.

J. A. SELBIE.

MATRITES (הַמַּטְרִי=the Matrite; B Ματταρεί, A Ματταρεί and Ματταρείτ).—A family of the tribe of Benjamin to which Saul belonged (1 S 10^{21}). The readings of the LXX point rather to a form מַטָּרִי (Mattarite). Klostermann would substitute 'of the family of M.' for 'the son of a Benjamite' in 1 S 9^{1}. J. F. STENNING.

MATTAN (מַתָּן 'a gift'; more usually, with explicit addition of the divine name, in the form Mattaniah).—1. (Ματθάν Luc., Μαγθάν B, Μαχάν A; in Ch Ματθάν without variation). Priest of the temple of Baal in Jerusalem during the reign of Athaliah. He lost his life with the queen, when she was deposed (2 K 11^{18}, 2 Ch 23^{17}). Ahab, presumably at the instigation of his Phœnician wife Jezebel, built a temple for the worship of Baal in Samaria (1 K 16^{32}). Their daughter Athaliah was probably founder of this temple in Jerusalem. Possibly, therefore, Mattan was not a Judæan. The name is known as Phœnician (Gesenius, HWB ^{12}).

2. (Ναθάν B, Μαθθάν Q^{mg}). Named only as the father of Shephatiah, a contemporary of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 38^{1}). W. B. STEVENSON.

MATTANAH (מַתָּנָה; LXX Μανθαναείν B, -νίν A, -νέν F*; Eus. Μαθθανέμ).—A station mentioned only Nu $21^{18.\,19}$. It was on the route from the Arnon to the plains of Moab, and would therefore be to the E. of the Dead Sea and N. of the Arnon. No satisfactory identification has been made; but if the position assigned to it by Eusebius (Onom. p. 169 and p. 274, ed. Lagarde), 12 Roman miles to the E. of Medeba, be correct, the course taken by the Israelites must have been farther to the E. than is generally supposed.*

MATTANIAH (מַתַּנְיָה).—1. The original name of king Zedekiah, 2 K 24^{17} (B Μαθθάν, A Μεθθανίας). 2. An Asaphite, 1 Ch 9^{15} (B Μανθανίας, A Ματθανίας), leader of the temple choir, Neh 11^{17} (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθανίας) 12^{8} (B Μαχανιά, A Μαθανιά), door-keeper $12^{25.\,35}$ (B Ναθανιά, A Μαθθανιά). 3. Mattaniah, a descendant of Asaph, was, according to 2 Ch 20^{14} (B Μανθανίας, A Ματθανίας), contemporary with Jehoshaphat, but this name should probably be identified with the preceding. 4. 5. 6. 7. Four of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{26} (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθανιά, called in 1 Es 9^{27} Matthanias), v.^{27} (B Ἀλαθανιά, A Μαθθανιά, called in 1 Es 9^{28} Othonias), v.^{30} (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθανιά, called in 1 Es 9^{31} Matthanias), v.^{37} (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθανιά, combined in 1 Es 9^{34} with the following Mattenai into Mamnitanemus). 8. A Levite who had charge of the offerings, Neh 13^{13} (B Ναθανιά, A Μαθθανίας). 9. (מַתַּנְיָהוּ) A Hemanite, 1 Ch $25^{4.\,16}$ (B Μανθανίας, A Ματθανίας). 10. (מַתַּנְיָהוּ) An Asaphite, 2 Ch 29^{13} (B Μαθθανίας, A Ματθανίας).

MATTATHA (Ματταθά).—Son of Nathan and grandson of David, according to the genealogy of Lk 3^{31}.

MATTATHIAS (Ματταθίας), the equivalent of the Heb. Mattithiah (מַתִּתְיָהוּ מַתִּתְיָה). 1. AV Matthias, a Jew, who had married a foreign wife in the days of Ezra (1 Es 9^{33}). In Ezr 10^{33} the name is given as Mattattah, AV Mattathah (מַתַּתָּה). See GENEALOGY. 2. One of the men who stood at the right hand of Ezra during the reading of the law (1 Es 9^{43}); in Neh 8^{4} Mattithiah. See GENEALOGY. 3. The father of the five Maccabæan brothers (1 Mac $2^{1.\,14.\,16\text{f}.\,19.\,24.\,27.\,39.\,45.\,49}$ 14^{29}). See MACCABEES. 4. The son of Absalom, a captain in the army of Jonathan the Maccabæan, who, together with Judas the son of Chalpi, stood by his commander during the flight of the Jews at the battle of Hazor, and helped to turn the fortunes of the day (1 Mac 11^{70}). 5. A son of Simon the high priest, who was murdered, together with his father and brother Judas, at a banquet at Dok, by Ptolemy the son of Abubus (1 Mac 16^{14-16}). 6. One of three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas Maccabæus when he invaded Palestine in B.C. 161 (2 Mac 14^{19}). Negotiations on the part of Nicanor are mentioned also in 1 Mac 7^{27-31}, but it is there stated that they were immediately broken off by Judas, who discovered that they were only a treacherous device for getting possession of his person. 7. The son of Amos in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk 3^{25}). 8. The son of Semein (AV Semei) in the same genealogy (Lk 3^{26}). H. A. WHITE.

MATTATTAH (מַתַּתָּה).—One of the sons of Hashum, who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{33} (B Ἀθά, A Μαθθαθά), called in 1 Es 9^{33} Mattathias.

MATTENAI (מַתְּנַי).—1. 2. Two of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{33} (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθθαναί, called in 1 Es 9^{33} Maltanneus), v.^{37} (B Μαθανάν, A Μαθθαναί, combined in 1 Es 9^{34} with the preceding Mattaniah into Mamnitanemus). 3. Representative of the priestly house of Joiarib in the days of Joiakim, Neh 12^{19} (B ℵ* A om., ℵ$^{\text{c.a mg inf}}$ Μαθθαναί).

MATTER.—In Sir 28^{10} 'matter' is used where we should now use 'material' instead, 'As the matter of the fire is, so it burneth' (κατὰ τὴν ὕλην τοῦ πυρός, RV 'As is the fuel of the fire'). Cf. Chaucer, Persones Tale, § 8, 'But for your sinne ye been woxen thral and foul, and members of the feend, hate of aungels, sclaundre of holy chirche, and fode of the false serpent, perpetuel matere of the fyr of helle'; and Bacon's Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 57), 'The surest way to prevent Seditions, (if the Times doe beare it,) is to take away the Matter of them. For if there be Fuell prepared, it is hard to tell, whence the Spark shall come, that shall set it on fire.' In Ja 3^{5} the same Gr. word (ὕλη) is tr$^{\text{d}}$ 'matter,' 'Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth,' but it is clear from previous versions that the Eng. word means here 'affair.' Coverdale's tr. is 'Beholde how gret a thinge a lyttell fyre kyndleth'; the Gen. Bible has the same with 'matter' in the marg., and the Bishops place 'matter' in the text. RV renders 'Behold, how much wood is kindled by how small a fire!' marg. 'how great a forest is kindled'; this is very near Wyclif's 'Lo! hou miche fijr kyndlith hou greete a wode,' after Vulg. Ecce quantus ignis quam magnam sylvam incendit.

For the phrase 'Make matter' see under MAKE; and add this illustration from Tindale (Works, i. 169), 'Let this little flock be bold therefore: for if God be on our side, what matter maketh it who be against us?' J. HASTINGS.

MATTHAN (Μαθθάν).—Grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary, Mt 1^{15}, perhaps to be identified with Matthat, who occupies the same place in St. Luke's genealogy of our Lord (Lk 3^{24}).

MATTHANIAS.—1. (A Ματθανίας, B Ματάν), 1 Es 9^{27}=MATTANIAH, Ezr 10^{26}. 2. (A Ματθανίας, B Βεσκασπασμύς, AV Mathanias), 1 Es 9^{31}=MATTANIAH, Ezr 10^{30}.

MATTHAT (Μαθθάτ).—1. Grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary, Lk 3^{24}, perhaps to be identified with Matthan, who occupies the same place in St. Matthew's genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1^{15}). 2. Another ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{29}.

MATTHEW, APOSTLE (Μαθθαῖος, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. WH; Ματθαῖος TR).—Matthew's place in the Apostolic list is not quite constant, varying between seventh and eighth, and so affecting the station assigned to Thomas (in the Synoptics; in Ac 1^{13} Bartholomew). His position in Mk, Mt, and Lk, viz. seventh, must give his standing in the original apostolic circle, as reflected in St. Peter's mind. He is called in Mt 10^{3} 'the customs-officer' (ὁ τελώνης), and is thus identified with the Matthew of 9^{9} (cf. Mk 2^{14}, Lk 5^{27}), called while sitting 'at the toll-office' near Capernaum, on the Great West Road from Damascus to the Mediterranean. St. Mark styles this servant of the tetrarch Herod, 'Levi the son of Alphæus'; but that does not bar the identification. For there is analogy for even two Hebraic names, both outside (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, Ἰωσὴφ ὁ καὶ Καϊάφας) and within the apostolic circle. And it is likely that, as with Simon Cephas, Matthew was the later name, given after his call. This fits its probable meaning, 'Jehovah's gift.' Matthew, then, was the name by which this apostle became known in Christian circles; and by it even St. Mark indicates him in his official list, while giving his call with strict historic fidelity. So Thomas is 'Judas Thomas' in Acta Thomæ; and Bartholomew was perhaps Nathanael's usual Christian name. On the forms and meaning of the name Matthew see, further, Dalman, p. 142.

Several things seem implied in this call of Matthew. He must already have been familiar with Jesus and His gospel as preached in Caper-

---

(March 1895, p. 136 ff.) Budde argues that Mattanah is not a proper name at all, but that the song should end—

> 'With the sceptre, with their staves,
> Out of the desert a gift';

and then v.^{19} resume 'and from Beer (LXX ἀπὸ φρέατος) to Nahaliel.' See also Expos. Times, vi. (1895) p. 481 f.

naum (for there is no sign that he, like the first six apostles, had been an adherent of the Baptist); and the feast which he gave in honour of Jesus (Mk $2^{14\text{ff.}}$) probably marked the new relationship. Finally, while we cannot date his call with precision, Pharisaic suspicion was already awake; so that his call and consequent experience of his Master's ministry can hardly go back to the very earliest days (this bears on the next art.).

The only other facts related of Matthew on good authority concern him as evangelist. Eusebius (HE iii. 24) says that he, like John, wrote only under the stress of necessity. 'For Matthew, after preaching to Hebrews, when about to go also to others, committed to writing in his native tongue the Gospel that bears his name; and so by his writing supplied, to those whom he was leaving, the loss of his presence.' The value of this tradition can be decided only after considering the Gospel itself. No historical use can be made of the artificial story in Sanhedr. 43ª, that Matthew was condemned to death by a Jewish court (see Laible, Christ in the Talmud, ed. Streane, 71 ff.); especially in face of Heracleon's explicit denial of martyrdom in his case (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9). References to him in apocryphal sources are specially doubtful on account of the easy confusion between Matthew and Matthias, to whom gnostic Paradoseis were attributed (e.g. Clem. Pæd. ii. 16).   (e) Artificial grouping in chs. 8–9.
  (f) Modifications in the narrative of the Passion and the Resurrection.
  (g) Eschatological standpoint and date.
  (h) The Genealogy.
iii. Conclusions:
  (1) Mt used the Petrine memoirs written by Mk.
  (2) Mt and Lk probably did not use in common a Logia document.
  (3) The Logia as found in our Mt are largely coloured by the life of the Palestinian Church.
  (4) Their nucleus is the common Apostolic didactic tradition, but with the special impress of Matthew.
  (5) Matthew is only indirectly the author of our Mt.
  (6) Mt was written to establish a true Messianic ideal.
  (7) It was probably written in S. Syria, and certainly by a Jew: its standpoint.

Literature.

i. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE OF AUTHORSHIP, ETC.—Referring the reader to the article GOSPELS for the outlines of the Synoptic problem, we have here to investigate the specific features and origin of the Gospel which bears the name of Matthew. Even were the title in our oldest authorities, 'According to Matthew' (κατὰ Μαθθαῖον), to be held original, it need not imply more than that this written Gospel contains the substance of the oral Gospel as taught by Matthew. Nor is the matter carried much further by the words of Papias (Eus. HE iii. 39), that 'Matthew, then, in Hebrew speech compiled the Logia; while they were interpreted by each man according to his ability.' For (1) it may be taken as proved that our Mt is not a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic; (2) it is improbable that the Logia or 'Oracles' of the Lord, giving all due latitude to the term logion, included anything like as much narrative as does our Mt; (3) tradition is apt to transform indirect into direct authorship. Matthew's connexion, then, even with the first collection of Christ's sayings (Logia) may have been simply that of their guarantor in the region in which they were reduced to writing, just as Mark's Gospel might have been called 'according to Peter,' or 'Peter's memoirs' (ἀπομνημονεύματα)—to use the actual words of Justin. If it was a disciple of Matthew, corresponding to John Mark, who actually redacted the oral instruction in question, it would best fit what we know of the literary habits of the first generation; and the difference would be little more than formal.

The external evidence as to a written Gospel by Matthew resolves itself into the witness of Papias (c. 110–125);* for upon him later writers depend for all save traditions too vague to be trusted in such a case. Various views, however, are taken of Papias' meaning. The only safe mode of approach is through a careful study of his motive in referring to Matthew at all. Eusebius, to whom we owe our quotations, begins by saying that Papias compiled five books of 'Exposition of Sayings of the Lord' (λογίων Κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεως). He then challenges Irenæus' statement that Papias had been a hearer of John the apostle; and to prove his point quotes Papias' preface to his work. From this we gather that, in order to vouch for the truth of his expositions of the above Sayings (διαβεβαιούμενος ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν ἀλήθειαν), he subjoined to his own interpretations (ταῖς ἑρμηνείαις) a number of primitive traditions, carefully gathered from 'the Elders,' and of which he had taken special note (ὅσα ποτὲ παρὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων [i.e. men of the former, here the first, generation] καλῶς ἔμαθον κ. καλῶς ἐμνημόνευσα). He was anxious, that is, to show that his views of the Gospel, unlike those of many who were glib in giving their opinions on the subject, were formed under the influence of first-hand traditions, running back, as he believed, to the Lord Himself. These, moreover, were supplemented by the best sort of second-hand inquiry, made of companions of the first witnesses, i.e. certain apostles now dead, but also of two apostolic men, Aristion and John the Elder, personal disciples of the Lord still alive in his youth. From these sources he had got his best understanding of the Lord's deep sayings, namely, from oral tradition continued in living men, and not from books (i.e. probably written gospels, rather than exegetical writings of any kind).

His whole interest, then, is in the true interpretation of certain sayings of the Lord, embodying the genuine Gospel. But he wishes also to make clear to his readers the source whence came the Logia or Sayings themselves on which he commented.† He has found, he seems to say, Matthew's collection of these Logia preferable to any other. For as an ordered body (σύνταξις) of the Lord's Sayings,—with which alone his comments had to do,—Mark's Gospel was not its equal. But, after all, Matthew had compiled these Sayings in Aramaic before Papias' own day; and at that time each man had had to interpret them as best he could, i.e. for the most part without the rare advantages to which Papias could appeal in his own case.‡ In a word, his call to write his 'Expositions' lay in the absence of any written body of authorized interpretations of the Logia in detail (αὐτά). So had it been at first, so was it still; while the need, in an age of wild speculation, was greater than ever.

* A later date for Papias' work is too readily assumed. Eusebius (HE iii. 37) reckons him in 'the first line of succession (διαδοχήν) from the apostles,' through whose writings the tradition of apostolic teaching lived on. He then names Ignatius and Clement as cases, and proceeds at once to Papias. The next book opens with Trajan's latter years, later than which Eus. does not seem to place Papias' work; while Polycarp he names after Justin.

† Euseb. does not necessarily give us the extracts in the order in which they came in Papias' preface. The statement, 'M., then, in Hebrew speech compiled the Logia: but as for their interpretation, each did as best he could,' may well have led up to the reference to his own 'interpretations.'

‡ Comp. Irenæus, Præf., of men in his own day, ῥᾳδιουργοῦντες τὰ λόγια Κυρίου, ἐξηγηταὶ κακοὶ τῶν καλῶς εἰρημένων γινόμενοι.

Zahn and others find Papias' emphasis to lie on the Semitic form of Matthew's work. But then we should expect this to be brought out by a contrast, 'in Greek,' in the antithetical clause. In its absence the quotation seems motived by Papias' main idea of right 'interpretation' (ἡρμήνευσε follows immediately on συνεγράψατο). Further, for Papias' use of 'interpret,' his reference to his own 'interpretations' (ἑρμηνεῖαι) outweighs his use of ἑρμηνευτής in another context, where he is citing another's words. Finally, according to Zahn's view, Papias should go on to say how a Greek edition of the Aramaic Mt finally arose. But, to judge by Eus.'s silence, he did nothing of the kind. He knew a Greek Mt; he knew of Aramaic Logia current in Matthew's name; and he assumed the Greek Gospel to be a version of an original Aramaic writing by the apostle.

Thus, according to Papias' own personal belief, Matthew had indeed written down the Logia. But he had left no written interpretation of their meaning. The result was a divergence of views as to the Lord's teachings which Papias deplores, and which he seeks to rectify by aid of traditions which had reached him from Matthew and other disciples of the Lord.

So far, then, external evidence to the connexion of Matthew with our Greek Gospel is slender. Papias implies, no doubt, that the apostle wrote, and that in Aramaic. But what he is asserting is neither the one nor the other, but rather the fact that the Matthæan Logia were at first left to chance interpretation. As to Papias' implication that Matthew actually wrote out in Aramaic the Sayings of the Lord, its worth is doubtful. Against it stands the weighty witness of St. Luke ($1^{1ff.}$), who seems to know of no narrative of the matters on which Christian faith had assured hold drawn up by an eye-witness. The force of this can hardly be turned by saying that his word διήγησις suggests narrative, rather than a collection of Sayings.[*] To say the least, St. Luke would surely have constructed his careful paragraph otherwise had he known of—much more intended to use—a writing by an apostle embodying Christ's own sayings.

The strange divergence of the Logian elements in Mt and Lk respectively seems inconsistent with a common written basis. Thus, if one still suspects positive tradition to lie behind Papias' reference to Matthew as having written the Logia, it must be conceded that Lk at least had not access to it. And even as to our Mt, it seems easier to suppose that it incorporates the composite catechesis of a locality, than that it blends so much pure local tradition with the written Logia of Matthew (see iii. (2) etc. below). The meagreness of the historic setting of the Logia common to Mt and Lk may be gauged from Mt 11^{2-25} = Lk 7^{18-35} $10^{12-16.\ 21}$.

Before leaving St. Luke, however, one may remark that he also uses much matter which, as found also in Mt, may well go back to the Apostle Matthew in some form; only, he seems to have found it for the most part already in its present historical setting (e.g. in Lk 9^{51}–18^{14}). This setting differs widely from that in which the like sayings occur in Mt. But no early work, such as Luke's 'special source,' would have departed far from a setting provided in an apostle's work. Hence the Apostle Matthew did not give the Logia such a setting: and it has to be seen whether even the Logia themselves as used by our first evangelist owed their exact form to an apostle at all, rather than to oral tradition starting from Matthew's teaching. For that Matthew had some hand in shaping the Logia in question seems certain from the mere fact that to him, quite an obscure apostle, tradition uniformly and in all circles assigns our first Gospel. On the other hand, the variety of Gospels which in the 2nd cent. claimed to represent the Apostle Matthew—our Mt and the two forms of the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews'[*]—along with the lack of any trace of a common Matthæan document in Aramaic or Greek, suggests that all that really belonged to the apostle was a type of oral teaching. In that case our Mt would be related to the apostle much as Mk is related to St. Peter; and the difference in their titles may simply mean that Mark was a well-known apostolic disciple, whereas the name of the author of the Matthæan Gospel was early forgotten. Then posterity, fixing instead on the ultimate source of its tradition, would call the work 'κατὰ Μαθθαῖον.'

(a) OT Quotations.—In this inquiry welcome aid would seem to offer itself in the phenomena of biblical quotation. This has two aspects—a formal and a material. The formal relates to the text used, whether Hebrew or Greek (or even that of the vernacular paraphrase or Targum accompanying the reading of the Hebrew OT in the synagogue); and, if Greek, to the local variety of LXX text implied. The material aspect concerns the mode of thought reflected in the formula of citation, and the degree to which the evangelist's purpose shines through his use of the words or even modifies what he remembers and writes.[†]

Formally, then, the quotations in passages peculiar to Mt diverge from the LXX far more than those in parts common to it with Mk or Lk or both. This is specially the case with quotations introduced by the evangelist himself in comments signalizing 'fulfilment' (πληρωθῆναι) of prophecy. These are ten in number (1^{23} $2^{15.\ 18.\ 23}$ $4^{15f.}$ 8^{17} 12^{18-21} 13^{35} 21^{5} $27^{9f.}$); and of the words composing the citations nearly half do not occur in the LXX equivalents. The significance of this is indubitable, when we observe that in nineteen quotations common to Mt with at least one Synoptic, less than a sixth of the words diverge from the LXX. In other words, the homogeneity of our Mt, and so any claim to be a simple version of an Aramaic Mt, is at once disproved.

(b) Chapters 1–2.—Zahn maintains that the first verse of Mt is a title for the whole book, arguing that βίβλος γενέσεως cannot linguistically and by LXX usage mean 'genealogy' or even 'nativity,' but only 'history' or 'career.' But as Irenæus evidently thought otherwise (adv. Hær. III. xi. 11, cf. frag. 27, ap. Harvey, ii. 493, Dial. Tim. et Aq. [see below, p. 303], where γενέσεις=γενεαλογίας, fol. 93 r° et v°), one has only to prove the fitness of an introductory section, to which v.^{1} may serve as opening. Thus it might refer to the nativity (cf. Lk 1^{14}) and its attendant circumstances, including the antecedents of the seed royal, arranged so as to indicate three great moments in Israel's fortunes—climax in David, anti-climax in the Exile, and the moment of restored Davidic glory in Messiah. This would be paralleled, not only in the three prefatory chapters of Hosea, especially in the LXX (1^{2} ἀρχὴ λόγου Κυρίου ἐν Ὡσῆε . . . 4^{1} ἀκούσατε λόγον Κυρίου, υἱοὶ Ἰσραήλ), but also in Mk 1^{1}, taken as the first verse of a prefatory account of the Forerunner's ministry

[*] In Sir 6^{35} διήγησις θεία is parallel to παροιμίαι συνέσεως; and in 9^{15} we get πᾶσα διήγ. σου ἐν νόμῳ Ὑψίστου. Cf. Eus. HE iii. 39. 12–14.

[*] The idea that this in either form was an enlarged edition of the 'Ur-Matthäus' rests only on the assumption that the Apostle Matthew was a Judaizer—an assumption improbable in the case of any of the primitive apostles, who saw the Gospel in its continuity with the prophets.

[†] In this section, as in some others, the 'Statistics and Observations' collected with scholarly care by Rev. Sir J. C. Hawkins in his Horæ Synopticæ (1899), have been of great service.

(cf. Hosea, above). Further, since 1^{18}, 'Now the birth (γένεσις) of the Christ[*] was on this wise,' seems to follow closely on the last clause of 1^{17}, 'until the Christ, fourteen generations,' and 1^{17} sums up the gist of 1^{2-16}, the whole of ch. 1 might easily be subsumed under 1^{1}. But it is better to take βίβλος γενέσεως as 'birth-roll,' and see in 1^{18} a fresh section; so also with ch. 2, which sets forth certain prophesied corollaries of the birth of Messiah (on the genealogy itself see below (h), p. 302).

(c) The Sources. — (1) The Logia. — Here two things must be borne in mind. In early days the tradition of Jesus' Sayings 'did not remain merely personal reminiscence and communication, but served the Church as law and doctrine, and was accordingly put into the form of didactic pieces.' 'Again, this was done in a spirit and amid associations that prevented the rise of a binding letter': and hence we must be ready to recognize among the Logia, along with the voice of the Church's Lord, echoes awakened in the Church's experience. These conditions have been stated, and applied to the forms in which the Logia meet us in Mt and Lk respectively, by Weizsäcker in particular, in his Apostolic Age (Eng. tr. ii. 32 ff.); and his views are largely utilized in what follows. The difference in style and standpoint between the Logia groups in Mt and Lk is due to the differing history of the Logian tradition in the apostolic Church. The preoccupation amid which our Mt's type of Logia took proximate shape was 'the secession of the Church from Judaism and its authorities. Thus did Jesus Himself oppose the Pharisaism and the scribes of His time.' So, too, the main lines of our first Gospel reflect the practical wants of the early days—'the doctrines of righteousness, the disciples' vocation, the kingdom of God, the duties of the society, the false system of the Jews and Pharisees, the future of the kingdom of God.' These answer to chs. 5–7. 10. 13. 18. 23–25, sections in which the unity of the parts is didactic rather than historical, kindred matter having gravitated to each considerable nucleus by the exigencies of memoriter instruction. That our evangelist was already familiar with these sections as more or less connected wholes, is probable from the formula which he appends to each of them: καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους (7^{28} 19^{1} 26^{1}), or τὰς παραβολὰς ταύτας (13^{53}), or διατάσσων τοῖς δώδεκα μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ (11^{1}). We take, then, these didactic sections of our Mt in order.

(α) The Sermon on the Mount, Mt 5–7.—Weizsäcker subjects this sermon, 'a kind of catechism' set in the forefront of this Gospel, to an analysis which reveals its true nature as 'a kind of code, such as originated in and was designed for the Church.' This transformation of Christ's teaching into forms adapted to the religious use of disciples was inevitable so long as the evangelic tradition was a matter of catechesis, with a view to edification. Indeed this fact witnesses to its vital hold on Christians at a time when the Spirit was everything and the letter little thought of, and so when fresh applications of a principle laid down by the Master could not in oral teaching be kept apart from the germinal saying which had given them birth in the Church's mind. The question, then, is here not so much one of the Lord's ipsissima verba, lying behind the Logia used in our Gospel, as touching the nucleus of a sermon formed out of such Logia which Mt expands.

Weizsäcker makes it consist of three sections originally independent, as is seen from Lk: viz. the new Christian law in contrast to the existent legal usage of the scribes (5^{21-48}); Christ's estimate of the pious usages then in honour (alms, prayers, fastings); and His reformation of them (6^{1-18}) and His exposition of the higher life in contrast to division of heart and care for the worldly life (6^{19-34}). Secondary to these, even as combined, he regards not only ch. 7—an appendix of seven short sections supplementing and partly repeating the foregoing (7^{15}, with its 'false prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing,' being clearly a late touch)—but also the twofold introduction in $5^{3-12.\ 13-16}$. Now, that 5^{13-16} is out of place one may justly infer from Lk $14^{34f.}$ 8^{16} 11^{33}. But Lk also makes the Sermon open with beatitudes, though less than half Mt's number (which seems filled out with OT phrases), and otherwise contradicts Weizsäcker's analysis. For this among other reasons, the reconstruction of the Logian Sermon favoured by Weiss and Wendt (with some divergences) is to be preferred. Yet even so, one must not assume that the Sermon was known to Mt and Lk in the same recension. Thus, while it is probable that Lk's four beatitudes (apart from the parallel woes, a secondary feature) best represent the original apostolic Logian tradition (not necessarily as Matthew taught it), it is clear that Luke knew the Lord's Prayer in another form from Mt's, and that not as part of the Sermon at all.

Allowing, then, for the different history of the Logian tradition before it reached our Mt or Luke, we may regard the following as 'Matthæan' in substance:—Four beatitudes parallel to Lk ($5^{3.\ 4.\ 6.\ 11f.}$); four revised readings of Mosaic morality as understood by the scribes—about murder, adultery, retaliation, hatred of enemies ($5^{21.\ 22.\ (24).\ 27f.\ 38-40.\ 43-48}$); three corrections of the Jewish ideal of piety—alms, prayer, fasting (6^{1-18});[*] four dangers of the higher life—earthly-mindedness, insincerity, a divided heart, carefulness for things bodily—the remedy being absorption in the Father's kingdom (6^{19-34});[†] some more miscellaneous counsels (7^{1-27}). These last, most of all, owe their combination to our evangelist, as they repeat a good deal; and in one case (7^{12}), the Golden Rule of duty towards one's neighbour, a verse comes more naturally in Lk (6^{31}), earlier in the Sermon. Yet the words on criticism and self-criticism (7^{1-5}, Lk $6^{37f.\ 41f.}$), on fruit as the test of goodness (7^{16-21}, Lk 6^{43-46}), and the similitude which clinches the whole Sermon (7^{24-27}, Lk 6^{47-49}), come in fitly.[‡] Probably even this reconstruction leaves too much in the Sermon for it really to have been spoken at one time: it expects far more of men's hearing capacity than Jesus ever demanded. But it may stand as representing the Matthæan didactic catechism for the citizen of the Father's kingdom, and as suggesting the processes of further accretion in later use, and of final compilation, which lie between it and Mt 5–7.

(β) The Disciple Discourse, ch. 10.—The action of local Church usage upon the tradition is also implied in the specific disciple-discourse. This in practical use must early have lost much of its original restrictions, as intended for the guidance of the Twelve in their first preaching by the side of their Master's own ministry (cf. Mk 3^{13-15}). Thus in Lk it refers to the conduct of a large circle of disciples who assisted Jesus in a similar way; and in either form it doubtless embodies rules taught in the churches for the guidance of all who acted as missionaries ('apostles' in the larger sense, for which 'evangelists' became a synonym). The words in Mt 10^{23} cannot have been used of the original temporary mission: 'When they persecute you in the one city, flee to the other: for verily I say to you, ye shall not finish the cities of Israel before the Son of Man come.' This must rather represent an early stage of the Church's echoed counsels to the Messianic missionaries in general, on the lines laid down by Jesus for His first disciples. Weizsäcker sees in Mt $10^{5-15\,(16)}$ the original tradition as to the apostolic mission, once current as an independent piece (cf. Mk 6^{7-13}, Lk 9^{1-6} 10^{2-11}), and here given in a form retaining the restricted scope of Christ's own earthly ministry—the form in which the Matthæan Logia were current in our evangelist's region. A secondary formation follows in the section on persecution, which reflects the experience of the Apostolic age at least as late as St. Paul's trials before Roman courts at Cæsarea. Its originally detached character is shown by its appearing in the eschatological discourse in Mk $13^{9\text{ff.}}$, Lk $21^{12\text{ff.}}$, where Mt faintly echoes Mk. Here, however, Mt seems independent of Mk's form, having points in common with Lk's 'doublet' ($12^{11\text{f.}}$), and being the more original in its basis (apart from the evangelist's own colouring). These two sections Weizsäcker calls 'the fundamental law for the missionary activity of the Church.' He adds that they were naturally extended by analogous sayings, like Mt10^{24-42} (many of which are clearly misplaced, see Lk $12^{3-9.\ 51-53}$ 14^{25-27}), either by Mt or in the traditional form under which he was wont to teach the Matthæan Logia.

[*] The diverse orders, 'Jesus Christ' (ℵCEKL al. Pap. Oxyr. (sæc. iii.) ægypt. syr. $^{\text{utr.}}$ arm. æth. Or.) and 'Christ Jesus' (B), point to the originality of 'the Christ' (D 71, it. vg. syr. $^{\text{sin. cur.}}$ Iren); cf. 1^{17b}.

[*] Each of these sections admits of further analysis: note particularly the change from 'ye' to 'thou' (? of catechesis) in each case. We cannot, of course, by such rough tests distinguish the teaching as original and derivative. But certainly the Lord's Prayer did not come originally in the Sermon (see Lk $11^{1ff.}$). The backbone of Mt's form of this section consists of $6^{1.\ 5.\ 16}$.

[†] Here, too, there may be later or editorial elements, v.^{34} in particular. But Lk's divergent arrangement by no means proves that these subjects were no part of the Matthæan Logia.

[‡] On the other hand, $7^{6.\ (7-11).\ 22f.}$ are out of place.

(γ) The Parables of ch. 13.—As to these parables, where Mt's love of the number seven (cf. the double sevens of the genealogy) attracts our attention, it appears that all three evangelists possessed collections of parables, beginning with 'the fundamental parable,' the Sower. To this main parable there were two types of sequel: one as in Mk and Lk, where it is combined with the simile of the Lamp, whereby Jesus explained to the disciples (in the actual course of events) the function of parable as a test of hearers' receptivity; the other, as in Mt, where it is followed didactically by other parables more or less related in thought. These appear to come from different sources. The pendent parable (to the Sower) of the Wheat and Tares has a peculiar opening, ὡμοιώθη ἡ βασ., which recurs in parables in 18^{23} 22^{2}, and may point to the three having been once a didactic whole, representing a late stage of Logian teaching. On the other hand, the remaining five begin with ὁμοία ἐστὶν ἡ βασ., probably the usual opening in parabolic collections.[*]

Weizsäcker's 'reflexions' deserve attention. Viewing the Wheat and Tares as a later supplement to the Sower, he says: 'From the very nature of this form of instruction, the discussion of one parable leads naturally to the invention of others: interpretations develop into fresh parabolic material.' Thus this parable reflects 'an experience from the life of the Church,' which may be the case also with the Drag-net and some others. But 'in any case the collection gives us an insight, not only into the way in which the tradition operated, but also into the method of editing passages for definite didactic purposes.' Its object is to set forth not so much distinct commands, as 'the fruits of the teaching received, the perfection and divine nature of the cause.' It is, in any case, characteristic of Mt's standpoint that his first special parables—the Tares and the Leaven—'carry us involuntarily into the primitive Church. They found their most direct use in the relations of that Church to the nation.'

(δ) The Discourse in ch. 18.—In the discourse on the 'little ones' and fraternal treatment of all brethren, even the least, Weizsäcker thinks $18^{6\text{ff.}}$ is an organic unity. 'The whole refers to the conduct of the disciples to each other: the sayings teach the nature of their communion,' even if some took shape rather later than others. It seems a proof of the general justice of these remarks that the parable of the Lost Sheep, which Lk gives as an apology for Jesus' own attitude to outcasts, came to Mt as a lesson for believers, in relation apparently to converts from among such 'little ones' of society. It had lost its original application and gained another in the Church's life. Moreover, already in 18^{3-6} Mt has made humility the note of the kingdom, in place of the spirit which thinks of 'greater' and 'lesser' among brethren. Each must be ready to sink all 'superiority,' to receive even a young child on the ground of Christ's name, and to avoid wounding the feelings of the humblest believer—one of no more account than a child (cf. Mk $9^{41\text{f.}}$). Hence, however much our Mt may be influenced in the wording of $18^{1-5.\ 6.\ 8\text{f.}}$ by Mk $9^{33-37.\ 42-47}$, yet his mind is already filled with a Logian piece of didactic which asserts itself both in idea and in phrasing, as well as in $18^{3\text{f.}}$ as a whole: 'The intention of its original form' shines through; and 'the apostles are thought of as patterns for the Church.'

(ε) The later Parables.—Similarly the three parables of 21^{28}–22^{14}, centring in that of the Vineyard common to the Synoptics, define the Church's relations to Judaism. In the first two of these parables we get the phrase ἡ βασ. τοῦ θεοῦ, so rare in Mt, and perhaps a mark of the later stratum in its Logia.

In $12^{28\text{b}}$ the phrase may be due to parallelism with ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ in 28^{a}; and in 19^{24} it seems to come from Mk 10^{24}. In $21^{31.\ 43}$, however, we can only suppose that this Hellenistic or un-Hebraic expression (so Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, 155) marks the secondary, rather than Matthæan, element in the tradition reflected in Mt, to whose own usage ἡ βασ. τῶν οὐρανῶν can by no means be exclusively traced.

The parable of the Marriage Feast is partly paralleled by Lk 14^{15-24}, and is an old Logian element which has undergone change in two lines of tradition. Mt seems to have it in a late form; for it has gained an appendix, on the Wedding-garment and the fewness of those who respond and are elect. And even the part parallel to Lk adds the feature of insult and death visited on the king's messengers, resulting in vengeance on the murderers and their city—surely an echo of the experiences and expectations of the later apostolic age, though not necessarily after, rather than just before A.D. 70 (cf. Mk $12^{9.\ 10}$, Lk 20^{16-18}, Mt 21^{41-44} for the like as already foretold in prophecy). We shall return to the subject in discussing Mt's date. Meantime this impression of the absolute rejection of the national religious system is confirmed by the great anti-Pharisaic discourse in ch. 23—an excellent case of didactic compilation, the bulk at least of which our Mt found ready to his hand, though the seven distinct Woes may betray his schematism. We must now turn aside, for the moment, to consider the other chief factor of Mt, the narrative sections parallel to Mk.

(2) Mt's relation to Mk.—To begin with a simple case, namely one which involves no other connected source like the Logia, Christ's walking on the sea may be taken (Mt $14^{22\text{ff.}}$, Mk $6^{45\text{ff.}}$). Here we observe slight omissions—αὐτοῦ (followed by addition of αὐτόν), τὸ πέραν πρὸς Βηθσαιδάν, αὐτός; insertions—κατ' ἰδίαν, μαθηταί (to compensate for αὐτούς in a clause omitted), ἀπὸ τοῦ φόβου ἔκραξαν in place of ἀνέκραξαν, [ὁ Ἰησοῦς]; use of favourite forms of a word—τοὺς ὄχλους for τὸν ὄχλον, ἀνέβη for ἀπῆλθεν; changes in construction—i.e. ἕως οὗ ἀπολύσῃ for ἕως . . . ἀπολύει, ὑπὸ τ. κυμάτων for ἐν τῷ ἐλαύνειν, τετάρτῃ φυλακῇ for περὶ τετ. φυλακήν, ἦλθεν for ἔρχεται, περιπατῶν ἐπὶ τήν (cf. ^{29}, only Mt) for ἐπὶ τῆς, λέγων for κ. λέγει—sometimes involving transposition of a word, like ἐταράχθησαν (λέγοντες, κ.τ.λ.) in ^{26}; paraphrase—ἤδη σταδίους πολλοὺς ἀπὸ γῆς ἀπεῖχεν for ἐν μέσῳ τ. θαλάσσης; omission of a clause—κ. ἤθελεν παρελθεῖν αὐτούς, Mk $6^{48\text{b}}$, πάντες γὰρ αὐτὸν εἶδον, $^{50\text{a}}$.

In the general result Mt's Greek is smoother and better than Mk's, though less vivid; also the changes appear for the most part involuntary, due to memoriter rewriting of section by section after perusal, rather than to line for line copying.* This less mechanical conception of the process by which Mk passes into Mt is not only most likely, but helps to explain much elsewhere. In fact it secures the advantages claimed for the purely oral theory, without sacrificing what gives to the documentary theory its strength. The section affords other lessons. Peter's walking on the water ($^{28-31}$) is an insertion from tradition,† and points to a factor which must be reckoned with throughout, e.g. in 27^{62-66} 28^{11-15}, as also in relation to the parables peculiar to Mt. And, finally, the description of the effect upon the disciples' minds is put in a different form from Mk—one reflecting less upon their slowness of heart and pointing more directly the moral of this Gospel (v.^{33}, cf. 16^{16} 27^{54}). The phrase full of adoration, 'Truly thou art Son of God,' is here anachronistic in view of $16^{15f.}$, Mk 8^{29}. These various points might be illustrated from the next few sections. But space forbids: and so we turn to apply our principles to the parts where Logia and Mk may be thought to blend.

[*] Weizsäcker thinks ἄλλην παραβολήν ($13^{24.\ 31.\ 33}$) and πάλιν ($^{45.\ 47}$) original parts of special collections. But they rather show Mt's compiling hand. He also thinks that the reflexions in $13^{34\text{f.}}$, coming in the middle of things, must be due to a source used. But against this must be set Mt's favourite formula in v.$^{35\text{a}}$. He inserts them from Mk and practically where Mk has them. Then he returns to explain the Wheat and Tares, and adds other parables.

(d) Setting of the Sermon on the Mount.—Mt 4^{23}–5^{1} is crucial for the evangelist's methods. Is his relation to Mk here determined by other narrative material, oral or written, or simply by his own plan for the use of his didactic or Logian matter?

Historically arbitrary as the latter hypothesis would argue Mt's eclectic use of Mk to be, it is yet probably correct. For in fact all close study of Mt shows its historic interest to be quite subordinate to the interpretative, the setting forth in orderly fashion of the salient features of Messiah's activity and teaching. Here, then, Mt's prime care is to find a fit point of contact with the traditional narrative—of which Mk is the form before him—for the general Sermon on the kingdom. As it stood in the forefront of the Logian tradition, so should it stand in a full written Gospel as Mt conceived it. Starting from Mk 1^{22} (Mt $7^{28f.}$), he readapted Mk 3^{13}, where Jesus 'ascends the mountain' in order to associate with Himself an inner circle of disciples; assuming that such a call would imply a prior formal exposition of the nature of the new kingdom. And so far he may have followed tradition—a tradition, too, which knew of a discourse on a mountain. But, this identification once adopted, Mt carried out his use of Mk with great freedom.

The whole of Mk 3^{13} influences Mt 5^{1}. Not only does Jesus ascend 'the mountain,' though no special locality is in question; but the reference to disciples as coming to Him creates some obscurity touching the persons addressed in the Sermon. Mt has just referred to 'the crowds'; and at the end we hear of its effect, not on disciples, but on these same crowds. Hence, apart from the form in which the Sermon is cast (perhaps mainly that of current Logian catechesis; contrast Lk 6^{20}, where the disciples are first addressed, and then hearers in general, ^{27}), we have the blending of Mk's context with that which Mt has just created for himself. For with the hint supplied by Mt 5^{1} in relation to Mk 3^{13}, we can hardly fail to see in Mt 4^{23-25} a mosaic of Marcan situations and expressions, generalized in order to set forth the earlier activity of Jesus in word and deed—the presupposition of 'the crowds' present at the Sermon. Similarly, the call of disciples had been hinted at by the typical cases borrowed from Mk in $^{18-22}$. The artificial nature of $^{24f.}$ is clear from the fact that no little lapse of time is implied in the going forth of Jesus' fame 'into the whole of Syria' and the gathering of crowds from Decapolis and Judæa and beyond Jordan—features natural in Mk's later context (3^{7}, Lk 6^{17}), but not in Mt, if it were meant to be chronological. Similarly 4^{23} is based on Mk 1^{39} 6^{6a}, with 1^{23} for starting-point (just as 1^{22} is used at the end of the Sermon in 7^{28}); and 9^{35} repeats the borrowing when Mt gets really parallel to Mk 6^{6}.

The fact that both in 4^{23} and ^{24} there are echoes of more than one passage in Mk, suggests that our Mt was so familiar with the latter as to combine his phrases in memory without a full sense of their actual position in Mk's narrative. And this is confirmed by the fact that these verses appear quite in Mt's style. But in any case Mt's generalizing use of Mk seems clear (so 8^{16} $15^{30.31}$), and is illustrated by our next paragraph.

(e) Artificial grouping in 8–9.—In 5–7 Mt has been drawing on his prime Logian source. In 7^{28b} he returns to Mk (1^{22}) with ἐξεπλήσσοντο (οἱ ὄχλοι) ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ αὐτοῦ· ἦν γὰρ διδάσκων αὐτοὺς ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων καὶ οὐχ ὡς οἱ γραμματεῖς (αὐτῶν). He thus draws attention to the authority of Jesus' manner of teaching, and then proceeds to show how this Messianic mien extended to His action and attitude towards men. In fact the series of works and words of power which follow, fulfils the second part of the forecast in 4^{23}. Once more we get the broad, vague background of ὄχλοι πολλοί (cf. 4^{25}); and then the cleansing of the leper (Mk $1^{40ff.}$) is introduced with an abrupt καὶ ἰδού.

Thus he passes over the deliverance of the man with an unclean spirit (Mk 1^{23-28}), since he has already used the impression produced by it, ἡ ἀκοή (φήμη is Mt's own word 9^{26}), in his general description in 4^{24a}. This omission was the easier that the story has much in common with the fuller Gadarene incident which he is about to use shortly ($8^{28ff.}$ = Mk $5^{1ff.}$). But why does he take Mk $1^{40ff.}$ before $^{29ff.}$? Partly perhaps because it contains words of respect for Moses in keeping with 5^{17}, and partly because in Mk the healing of the leper comes between a reference to a general ministry in Galilee (1^{39}), in which Mt sees the continuation of his own 4^{25}, and an entry into Capernaum.

Mt is not concerned with temporal sequence, but tries to preserve local conditions. Hence he goes on with something which had come to him connected with Capernaum (8^{5}, cf. Lk 7^{1}). In the healing of the centurion's servant (παῖς, Lk δοῦλος) the interest centres in the dialogue: and the story may have come in the Logia just after the Sermon (as in Lk [or his special source, cf. $9^{51ff.}$], who has already used Mk's material right up to the withdrawal with disciples to the mountain).

To Mt it had special value here as introducing the idea of authority (ἐξουσία), which the centurion implicitly recognizes as on the side of Jesus (8^{9}). Vv.$^{11.12}$ are attached by logical affinity (?already so in Logia tradition in Mt's region, against Lk $13^{28ff.}$), and serve to justify Gentile faith in Mt's day. Then, at last, he returns to the thread of Mk 1^{29-34} ($^{35-38}$ illustrates nothing that is to his purpose). The healing of Peter's mother-in-law becomes a mere typical case, one of a class, like the many referred to in v.^{16}. This verse summarizes Mk 1^{32-34} with some characteristic changes (e.g. demoniacal possession is put first as marking authority), and is followed by the citation of prophecy with Mt's usual formula of 'fulfilment.'

The next step is more obscure; but the link seems to be a similarity of occasion (to which time is subordinated). As the last event was ὀψίας γενομένης (^{16} = Mk 1^{32}), so he subjoins another evening scene (Mk 4^{35} ὀψίας γεν., Jesus saith Διέλθωμεν εἰς τὸ πέραν· κ. ἀφέντες τὸν ὄχλον . . .). The motive of departure, too, comes from Mk's context,* ἰδὼν δὲ ὁ Ἰ. ὄχλον περὶ αὐτὸν ἐκέλευσεν ἀπελθεῖν εἰς τὸ πέραν. The episode of the two aspirants to discipleship, which intervenes, needs some special reason for its position; it comes in very abruptly. It is otherwise placed in Lk ($9^{57ff.}$), at a later part of the ministry, and rightly. But this does not hinder its having stood in local catechesis after the Sermon, as logically akin, viz. as affording a typical case of response to the Master's call to discipleship: and that Mt forces it in here suggests that it so stood. It illustrates the authority, even in isolation, that marked the Son of Man (esp. ^{22}). From v.^{23} to the end of ch. 8 Mt follows Mk $5^{1ff.}$, the only points calling for note being the softening down of the disciples' alarm and surprise in the storm (ὀλιγόπιστοι and οἱ δὲ ἄνθρωποι), the substitution of the more familiar Gadarene region for the obscure Gerasene (i.e. of Kersa, a village on the lake's edge), and the fresh reading of the demoniac incident by which Mt follows the plurals in the dialogue (e.g. Mk's παρεκάλεσαν αὐτὸν λέγοντες) to the ignoring of the sing. of Mk's narrative. It is possible that this reading had already in oral tradition generated the δύο δαιμονιζόμενοι, and that Mt uses Mk in the light of the story as known to him orally. Yet Mt's general tendency to duality (cf. 20^{30}) is to be noted; particularly the clear case in 21^{2-7}, where his narrative is warped by words of prophecy which he himself introduces with his own formula. The divergences from Mk seem to be quite in Mt's own style.* The words with which he returns to Mk $2^{1ff.}$ are still coloured by Mk 5, καὶ ἐμβὰς εἰς πλοῖον (Mk 5^{18}) διεπέρασεν † (ib. ^{21}, the verse after which Mt resumes this section of Mk in 9^{18}). Capernaum is called τὴν ἰδίαν πόλιν in terms of 4^{13}. Once more, in the healing of the paralytic, the note of authority is struck in both Gospels. In 9^{9} Mt seems to show that his aim is to present a series of typical scenes in their logical rather than strict historical connexion; for adopting Mk's παράγων, appropriate to progress along the lake's margin, he uses it as a mere verb of motion by inserting ἐκεῖθεν, ignoring the teaching on the shore which comes in between. In the incident itself it is interesting that he substitutes 'Matthew' (with λεγόμενον, a favourite phrase), Levi's disciple-name, for that by which he was known at the time of his call: i.e. his standpoint is less purely historical than Mk's. If in $9^{14ff.}$ Mt were not following Mk, he would hardly have inserted the defence against criticism at this point, but rather reserved it for the later section devoted to the topic ($12^{1ff.}$). For the very next paragraph shows that he is still dominated by the idea of the mighty deeds of Jesus. He goes back, that is, to Mk $5^{21ff.}$: but having already used the link of circumstance in v.^{21}, he uses one belonging to a later stage of the incident (v.^{35} ἔτι αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος) and compresses the whole.

* That renewed reference was sometimes made, seems proved by Mt's reversion to Mk's περιπατεῖν ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης, in 26^{a}, after writing automatically περ. ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν, his own construction (cf. ἐπὶ τὰ ὕδατα in $^{28f.}$). For a parallel, compare the freer parts of Codex Bezæ.

† As such it gives a good specimen of Mt's style when free to follow its own literary form. Note ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν [Mk 5 times, generally ἀποκ. λέγει; common in Lk, and in Mt 14–28 (34 times), where rewriting Mk, but rare in 3–13 (7 or 8 times), where using Logia: hence not a Logian phrase: Jn ἀπεκρίθη], ἀπὸ τοῦ πλοίου (cf. 3^{16}, Mk prefers ἐκ), καταποντίζεσθαι (Mt 18^{6}) ὀλιγόπιστος (8^{26} 16^{8}), διστάζειν (28^{17}), and κύριε in later religious sense (cf. Lk). It shows also the easy way in which an insertion may blend with the Marcan context, i.e. ἀναβάντων αὐτῶν for ἀνέβη (πρὸς αὐτούς). Note κελεύειν (14^{28}, cf. 9. 19), never in Mk, once only in Lk (18^{40}).

* This is a crucial case of Mt's use of Mk. For whereas the sing. ὄχλος is Mk's regular form (33 to 1), Mt prefers ὄχλοι (25 times, ὄχλοι πολλοί 5, ὄχλος 19, generally parallel to Mk): and the foregoing context would suggest ὄχλοι (cf. v.^{1}) or at any rate τὸν ὄχλον.

That Mt is here using Mk rather than a shorter source is shown by (1) the mention of the duration of the woman's malady, (2) the coincidence in ὄπισθεν, (3) the rather otiose καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ in v.^{19} (seeing that they play no part in what follows in Mt) due to Mk (vv.$^{37.40}$), (4) the fact that neither Mt nor Lk really adds any fresh matter, so that their deviations in form are to be put down to their style and aim.‡ Mt's ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν is a result of compression; and the other turns of phrase and additions are in Mt's special manner.

The last two incidents of the section are compilations of Mt completing the cycle of typical healings. They have distinct echoes of Mk, as also marks of Mt's own style; but possibly they have also a traditional basis, particularly in the case of the dumb demoniac, $9^{32f.}$. For though Lk $11^{14f.}$ has the same in substance, yet the form differs, especially if we omit v.^{34} as a later gloss, as do O.L., Syr-Sin., Tat. (see 12^{24}).

Another view is possible, namely, that Lk $11^{14f.}$ shows the story of the possessed mute in its right place, so introducing the dialogue with Pharisees as to exorcism originally in the Logia. In that case Mt may use the incident twice: first, among the works of power in 9, where the people's comment comes from Mk 2^{12}; and next in $12^{22ff.}$, where the two incidents in 9^{27-33} appear fused into one case as occasion of the people's wonder, which elicits the Pharisees' retort.

The cycle of typical Messianic deeds is now complete: and Mt wishes to present Jesus in the further aspect of authority shown in commissioning others to aid in gathering in the harvest of the Kingdom. In so doing he omits for the present (but see $13^{53ff.}$) a few verses in Mk, and takes the first words of his introduction to the Mission of the Twelve from Mk 6^{6b}, i.e. καὶ περιῆγεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὰς πόλεις πάσας κ. τὰς κώμας, διδάσκων, repeating also the bulk of 4^{23}, his earlier programme of Messianic ministry. Then he takes part of Mk 6^{34} (where Mt omits half the verse) and generalizes the statement of Christ's compassionate perception of the people's shepherdless condition. In $9^{37f.}$ he probably employs the opening words of the Logia at this point (cf. Lk 10^{2}), and then follows Mk once more in 10^{1}, repeating words used already in 4^{23b} 9^{35b} (θεραπεύειν πᾶσαν νόσον κ. πᾶσαν μαλακίαν). The names of the Twelve are next given, without any interest in the circumstances of their original call (Mk $3^{13ff.}$). Indeed it is assumed that they are already known.*

(f) Modifications in the Passion and Resurrection narratives.—Most will agree with Dr. Salmon that Mt 27 'copied the narrative as we find it in St. Mark, interpolating in it different passages founded on knowledge derived from some other source.' A word or two on such a source, or rather sources. In the Institution of the Supper it is likely that the slight differences in Mt are due mainly to local Eucharistic use, the cause of Lk's inversion of the Bread and Cup (so the Didaché). In the Crucifixion, on the other hand, the slight divergences are due to the subtle reaction of certain details of OT prophecy—now seen to be Messianic, since suffering was included in Messiah's lot. The influence of Ps 22 (whence came Jesus' great cry) is especially marked (as also in He $2^{11f.}$; cf. $^{6-9}$). Thus—

Mk ἐδίδουν αὐτῷ ἐσμυρνισμένον οἶνον.

Mt 27^{34} ἔδωκαν αὐτῷ πιεῖν οἶνον μετὰ χολῆς μεμιγμένον.

Ps 69 (68)^{21} ἔδωκαν . . . χολήν, κ. εἰς τὴν δίψαν μου ἐπότισάν με ὄξος.

Then, after the casting of the lots, Mt adds—

καὶ καθήμενοι ἐτήρουν αὐτὸν ἐκεῖ.

Cf. Ps 22 (21)^{18} αὐτοὶ δὲ κατενόησαν καὶ ἐπεῖδόν με.†

And once more—

Mt 27^{43} (only) πέποιθεν ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, ῥυσάσθω νῦν εἰ θέλει αὐτόν.

Ps 22^{9} ἤλπισεν ἐπὶ Κύριον, ῥυσάσθω αὐτὸν . . . ὅτι θέλει αὐτόν.

Such apologetic use of prophecy is yet more obvious in 8^{17} $12^{17ff.}$, and it may have helped the evangelist to his own faith in Jesus' Messiahship; while the elaborative influence of the OT is seen in Mt's Beatitudes as compared with Lk's.

Probably the modifications of the Passion story were already part of Mt's way of telling it, before he sat down to write, and spontaneously reasserted themselves, sometimes more, sometimes less decisively, as he freely reproduced Mk. And this may afford us a fresh analogy for the way in which the general tradition of the Lord's ministry, already living in memory, modified the impressions left by his perusal of Mk.

---

* Mt's ἰσχύειν seems due to Mk's ἴσχυεν, his ἦλθες to Mk 1^{24}; even μακρὰν ἀπ' αὐτῶν may gloss πρὸς τῷ ὄρει. As the case is a crucial one for the use of narratives assumed to exist in written Logia, one may refer also to the case of the demoniac boy ($17^{14ff.}$, Mk $9^{14ff.}$, Lk $9^{37ff.}$). What there seems to exclude such Logia as causing Mt's abbreviation of Mk, is the sudden emergence of τὸ δαιμόνιον (v.^{18}), easily explained by his knowledge of Mk, but not a natural sequel of the description of the lad's symptoms in v.^{15}. If this be so, then that section affords cases of pure transposition by Mt (^{15b}, cf. Mk ^{22}); recurrent comment (^{18c}); a favourite idea (διὰ τὴν ὀλιγοπιστίαν, ^{20a}); and a favourite word, θεραπεύειν ($^{16.18}$).

† The other case of this rare word, 14^{34}, is also in Mk's wake.

‡ The προσ(ελθοῦσα) . . . τοῦ κρασπέδου common to Mt and Lk might seem to need a literary link. But both regularly prefer προσελθεῖν for 'approach' (see Mt 8^{25}=Lk 8^{24}, cf. Lk 7^{14}); while the addition of τοῦ κρ. is a quite natural (cf. Mt 14^{36}) explanatory touch, which may even come from oral tradition.

* Similar analysis of 12–16^{20} may be seen in the second of W. C. Allen's 'Critical Studies in Mt's Gospel' (Expos. Times, March 1900).

† Following on reference to the sufferer's deadly thirst, and the fact that many 'dogs' or wicked ones encompass him and pierce his hands and feet; while the next words are διεμερίσαντο τὰ ἱμάτιά μου ἑαυτοῖς. Here Mk's language may already have been coloured by this Ps, as also in the use of κινοῦντες τὰς κεφαλάς; cf. Ps 22^{7} πάντες οἱ θεωροῦντές με ἐξεμυκτήρισάν με, ἐλάλησαν ἐν χείλεσιν, ἐκίνησαν κεφαλήν.

A good instance of this is the Resurrection, where Mt's narrative is modified by the story of the Guard in the tradition known to him. Hence the women come, not to anoint the body, but only 'to behold the tomb'; and the influence of Mk, if present at all, is very slight. There is no consciousness that the women entered the sepulchre, as in Mk; the fulfilment of Jesus' word in his resurrection is emphasized (καθὼς εἶπεν, cf. 27^{63}); and so the element of fear is overshadowed by joy. The great fear, which is the note of Mk, has been toned down in tradition by later feelings on the subject. The rather indistinct account of the promised Christophany to 'the eleven disciples' is part of the generalizing style of oral tradition, where the original facts are set in the light of their abiding bearing on the Church's life. The 'authority' which was largely veiled in Messiah's earthly ministry is now His chief note, shown in the extension of the Kingdom to the Gentiles, and in His abiding presence with His own during the days between the Resurrection and the Parousia (note silence as to Israel and the Law, in contrast to Mt $10^{5f.}$).

(g) Eschatological Standpoint and Date.—Here the concluding Woes on the scribes and Pharisees lead up to the Last Things.

23^{34-36}. The blood of the Prophets will come on them. This is fuller than Lk of colour from Palestinian experiences, and of presage of the reckoning imminent. The addition of 'son of Barachiah' (not in Lk) quite possibly shows that Mt took certain words in v.^{35} as referring to events early in A.D. 68 (found in Jos. BJ IV. v. 4).

23^{37-39}. Their house is deserted by the Divine presence till they repent. This implicit reference to the Parousia is here arbitrarily connected (against Lk $11^{49ff.}$ $13^{34f.}$) with the judgment on Jerusalem (see Charles, Eschatology, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian, p. 328).

$24^{1.\ 2}$. Destruction of the temple (cf. Mk $13^{1f.}$, Ac 6^{14}).

24^{3}. Tokens of this and the Parousia.

The specification of the 'Parousia' (only in this chapter in the Gospels) and the phrase συντέλεια τ. αἰῶνος, found only in Mt (cf. $13^{39.\ 40.\ 49}$ 28^{20}), point to this being a special form in which this discourse was quoted in Mt's circle (see note below).

24^{4-8}. The preliminary troubles * (ἀρχὴ ὠδίνων).

Clearly Lk is not entirely dependent on Mk. Nor does Mt seem to be so in all parts of this discourse.

24^{9-13}. Trial (θλῖψις) for Christians—

Vv.$^{10-12}$ are peculiar in form (see below on $^{23.\ 24}$ for affinity with Did. $16^{3.\ 4}$); and in their light v.^{9} may also be recognized as not altogether dependent on Mk, ^{9a} referring to Jewish hatred, ^{9b} to Gentile. What Mk has here, is partly in different order, and partly occurs in the Commission to the Twelve in Mt (10^{17-22}); cf. Lk $12^{11.\ 12}$. Vv.$^{9-12}$ seem very significant for Mt's date in virtue of their special phrasing (cf. the Christian section of Ascensio Isaiæ, c. 65–68, or else 80–90 A.D.).

24^{14}. The witness to the Gentiles.

In Mt's form, preaching 'in all the inhabited world' is, in contrast to Mk's 'unto all the Gentiles,' as 'witness to the Gentiles.' Here we probably get the idea of the Gospel in relation to the Gentiles current among Jews in S. Syria. In 10^{23} we had the corresponding idea touching Israel: the two are combined in 10^{18}. 'And then shall come the end' (in contrast to v.^{6}), i.e. the συντέλεια or final climax—a unique clause in Mt and one going far to date the first Gospel at a period just before the final catastrophe of 'the holy city,' the crisis of whose fortunes is seen to be approaching, as appears from the nota bene in v.^{15}; cf. 10^{23}.

24^{15-25}. The final Crisis of Distress (θλῖψις).

The forecast in ^{15} is still on the vague lines of consummate evil in Daniel (a reference made explicit by Mt), of which Caligula's purpose of setting up his image in the temple must have seemed the foreshadowing (cf. Mt's ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ, again making more explicit what is implied in Mk, ὅπου οὐ δεῖ). Lk's deviation, in terms of the actual events of 70, is instructive as showing that these were not yet in view in Mt and Mk; cf. also Lk 21^{22}. (See further the article ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION). Vv.$^{16-25}$ are in the main in terms of current Apocalyptic notions, including Dn 12^{1}; Lk 21^{23b-24} again presents a somewhat more developed form of the tradition. The specifically Christian touches, e.g. $^{23.\ 24}$, parallel features found in two documents of c. 64–68 A.D., viz. Didaché 16, and the Christian section of the Ascensio Isaiæ. The former, which echoes its own local tradition rather than the words of any of our Gospels, has, ἐν γὰρ ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις πληθυνθήσονται οἱ ψευδοπροφῆται καὶ οἱ φθορεῖς, κ. στραφήσονται τὰ πρόβατα εἰς λύκους, κ. ἡ ἀγάπη στραφήσεται εἰς μῖσος. αὐξανομένης γὰρ τῆς ἀνομίας (cf. Mt ^{12}) μισήσουσιν ἀλλήλους κ. διώξουσι κ. παραδώσουσι (Mt ^{11}), καὶ τότε φανήσεται ὁ κοσμοπλάνος ὡς υἱὸς θεοῦ κ. ποιήσει σημεῖα κ. τέρατα. Here the false wonders are attributed summarily to a supreme Antichrist: yet his action may include that of many subordinate agents, as in Asc. Isaiæ (4), where Nero is expected to develop into or reappear as the incarnation of Berial, and along with Berial's hosts of evil spirits to parody Beloved's (Messiah's) works of power.

$24^{27.\ 28}$. The Son of Man comes like the lightning.

Mt (Lk elsewhere, $17^{23f.}$) repeats the warning against being led away by rumours of Messiah's having been seen in various retired places (cf. Apoc. Bar 48^{34})—so showing the topic of the hour when he wrote. The comparison of Messiah's Coming to lightning is found in Apoc. Bar $53^{8f.}$, cf. $72^{1ff.}$ (Apoc. A^{3}, not long before 70), being suggested apparently by the imagery of Dn 7^{13}.

24^{29-31}. The Coming of the Son of Man.

Here εὐθέως points to an early date for Mt, i.e. before A.D. 70. The signs of v.^{29} are the conventional ones derived from prophecies like Is 13^{10}, 34^{4}, and appear in varying forms in the three Synoptics. V.^{30a} καὶ τότε φανήσεται τὸ σημεῖον τ. υἱοῦ τ. ἀνθρ. ἐν οὐρανῷ, κ. τότε κόψονται πᾶσαι αἱ φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς is peculiar to Mt. The former half is akin to Did. 16^{6} καὶ τότε φανήσεται τὰ σημεῖα τῆς ἀληθείας· πρῶτον σημεῖον ἐκπετάσεως ἐν οὐρανῷ: the latter comes from Zec $12^{10ff.}$ (cf. Rev 1^{7}). In v.^{30b}, where it is parallel to Mk and Lk, Mt has τοῦ οὐρανοῦ after τῶν νεφελῶν, as in Dn 7^{13}, whence all derive their language. In ^{31} Mt, as distinct from Mk, speaks of the angels sent forth, as Messiah's (αὐτοῦ); of their agency in gathering the elect (ἐπισυνάξουσιν); and of the 'great trumpet' which summons these. This last Jewish trait appears not only in 1 Th 4^{16}, 1 Co 15^{52}, Rev 8^{6}–9^{14} 10^{7} 11^{15}, but also in Did. 16^{6} in the same position, πρῶτον σημεῖον ἐκπετάσεως ἐν οὐρανῷ (Mt ^{30}), εἶτα σημεῖον φωνῆς σάλπιγγος (Mt ^{31}), καὶ τὸ τρίτον ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν (see Mt 25^{32}); cf. its Prayers for the Gathering of the Church ἀπὸ τῶν περάτων τῆς γῆς or ἀπὸ τῶν τεσσάρων ἀνέμων (see Zec 2^{6}, Dt 30^{4}) into God's Kingdom (9^{4} 10^{5}).

$24^{32.\ 33}$. The parable of the Fig-tree.

24^{34-42}. The exact time of the Coming unknown.

Mt, like Lk, goes its own way after v.^{36}, citing the Noachic Deluge for the way in which the Parousia will surprise men (cf. Lk $17^{26f.\ 30}$), and intimating how it will separate neighbours (cf. Lk $17^{34f.}$). Here the independence of Mt's tradition is specially evident. At v.^{42} the three are once more parallel in thought. But each ends the solemn call to vigilance in its own way, Mt being fullest. Its form seems to reflect the dangers of its day, viz. bad stewardship of the sacred charge of fellow-servants, and fellowship with the worldlings (v.^{48}), men being thrown off guard by their Lord's long delay. This is just the state of things in the Christian section of Asc. Isaiæ 3, where the faithless shepherds are spoken of. Such shall share the lot of the 'hypocrites,' the term by which Pharisaic Jews were spoken of in the circle whose tradition Mt inherited ($6^{2.\ 5.\ 16}$ 7^{5} 15^{7} 22^{18} $23^{13ff.}$)—another link with the Didaché ($8^{1.\ 2}$ 'Let not your fasts be μετὰ τῶν ὑποκριτῶν').

(h) The Genealogy.—This is of importance for our Evangelist's scope and method. As Zahn says (The Apostles' Creed, 126 ff., cf. Einleitung in das NT, ii. 271 ff.), this Gospel is 'a carefully arranged account of events of which a superficial knowledge is for the most part assumed.' We find 'not the simple confession that Jesus is the promised Messiah. The point kept strictly in view from the first page to the last is much more apologetic, and, so far as it is unavoidable, polemic.' In spite of all so bitterly urged against Jesus' claim to be the Messiah, that claim is absolutely true. Thus, though the Jews scoff at His obscure origin, He fulfils the prophecy of the Messiah. It is from this point of view that we must read ch. 1 and, as Zahn well shows, much in ch. 2 likewise. Mt lays before his readers a genealogy artificially constructed in terms of the throne-succession in the Davidic line, and not that of the actual progenitors of Joseph (as in Lk). But why, we ask, should he go out of his way to make certain additions, needless to a bare genealogy, including four women's names? Above all, why choose 'women whose characters are highly offensive to Jewish, and in three cases out of four to every human, feeling'? Zahn alleges 'the same apologetic purpose which governs his account of the Conception and Birth of Jesus'; and even argues that the well-known Jewish slander that Jesus was a son of shame (cf. Laible, Jesus Christ in the Talmud, p. 7 ff.), is itself presupposed by Mt's genealogy, just as 28^{11-15} presupposes the Jewish story that the disciples stole the body of Jesus. This is going too far, even were the direction followed the right one. But this is doubtful. There was another Jewish objection to be met. Granting Joseph's paternity,—which the Jews always assume in the Gospels,—was Joseph of Davidic descent? And further, was God likely to send Messiah as the son of a carpenter, even though of Davidic stock? To this twofold query Mt's genealogy is a reply; and to the latter phase of it the additions already alluded to are an implicit rebuke.* The God who chose from various brethren the younger son's line, and who overruled unlikely unions to continue the chosen seed, —this God of Israel ever worketh according to His own good pleasure, and His ways of sovereign elective freedom are often marvellous in men's eyes. Thus it is in the home of the humble, yet Davidic, carpenter Joseph, that Messiah Jesus has really been born. How, it is Mt's next step to show in $1^{18ff.}$.

* These reproduce in general conception the 12 divisions or elements in the Last Times as given in an Apocalypse embedded in Apoc. Bar (27–30^{1}), and dating c. 50–65 A.D., i.e. before the Jewish War. They are in this order—(1) The beginning of commotions; (2) slayings of the great ones; (3) the fall of many by death; (4) the sending of desolation (or 'the sword'); (5) famine; (6) earthquakes; [(7) terrors]; (8) portents and incursion of the Shedim or demons; (9) the fall of fire; (10) rapine and much oppression; (11) wickedness and unchastity; (12) confusion from the mingling together of all these. There follows a reference to 'the consummation of the times.' In our Gospels we find these elements of popular Jewish Messianic expectation, blended with features drawn from the experiences of the Palestinian Church in particular, viz. the appearance of pseudo-Messiahs, and persecutions. Mt's order keeps close to the above list, including (11) alluded to in v.^{12} (ἀνομία); while Lk's puts (6) before (5), as in another kindred place in Apoc. Bar (70^{8}), and also alludes to (7)–(9). Charles (op. cit. 325 ff.) thinks that an independent apocalypse (cf. Eus. HE III. v. 3) underlies Mt $24^{6-8.\ 15-22.\ 29-31.\ 34f.}$).

Since the discovery of the Sinaitic codex of the Old Syriac version of the Gospels, it has been argued that our text of Mt 1^{16} is not original, but secondary. Not only is this refuted by study of the various forms in which divergence from our oldest Gr. MSS occurs in certain groups of authorities (see, e.g., Zahn's Einleitung, ii. 291-293); but even the view that Mt used a source in which Joseph's full paternity was assumed, is itself unlikely. For the way in which Mt calls attention to the numerical symmetry of the three divisions in the pedigree, each fourteen ending with a great crisis in Israel's fortunes, suggests that he has himself so constructed it.† Further, the four women cannot have stood in an earlier source, and yet here they seem integral. The pedigree is through and through didactic: and the fact that it was from the first compiled by the aid of 1 Ch 1-3, shows that it was never other than in Greek, the language of our evangelist (cf. W. C. Allen, Expos. Times, Dec. 1899). Hence it seems best to conclude that Mt did not use a pre-existing genealogy (see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST for another view: yet cf. also ii. 645^b).

A fresh witness for 1^{16} has just come to light in the ancient basis of the Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila (itself of the 5th cent. at least). This basis is carried back by its editor, F. C. Conybeare, to the Dial. Jasonis et Papisci, c. 135. The Christian cites Mt's genealogy, and gives 1^{16} first in the form, Ἰακὼβ δὲ τὸν Ἰωσήφ, ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα Μαρία, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγ. X.; and next as Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τ. Ἰωσὴφ τὸν μνηστευσάμενον Μαριάμ, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη ὁ X. ὁ υἱὸς τ. θεοῦ. These passages seem to cast light on the real origin of the readings unsupported by our oldest Gr. MSS (for the evidence in full see art. JESUS CHRIST, vol. ii. p. 644). They are in fact explanatory glosses, such as the Dialogue presents us with in reply to the hostile gloss of the Jew, Ἰακὼβ ἐγέννησεν τ. Ἰωσήφ, τον ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγ. X., καὶ Ἰωσὴφ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγ. X., περὶ οὗ νῦν ὁ λόγος, φησίν, ἐγέννησεν ἐκ τῆς M. The Jews glossed τον ἄνδρα M. one way, in the teeth of the narrative; the Christians glossed it another, in harmony with the narrative. And this crept into some MSS.

SUPPLEMENTAL NOTES.—This Dialogue quotes the parable of the Husbandmen in extenso; and in so doing shows the way in which materials derived from similar sources tended to blend in the memory of an early Christian. The case is the more instructive that the writer has just quoted Isaiah's parable-germ of Jehovah's vineyard ($5^{1ff.}$), to which the Gospel parable was probably meant to point back: and we see how Isaiah's language affects the form at the beginning of Christ's parable. It runs ᾠκοδόμησεν αὐτῷ τεῖχος καὶ πύργον κ. ἐποίησεν ἐν αὐτῷ ληνὸν κ. ὑπολήνιον, omitting φραγμὸν περιέθηκεν and changing the position of ληνὸν (Mt) or ὑπολήνιον (Mk), as well as uniting the two—which were in fact both integral—to a wine-press. Here the writer quotes freely, but is quite possessed by his sources, of which Mt counts for most. Thus he reproduces almost every syllable and letter of the triple tradition, while the result is a wonderfully eclectic composition, produced not mechanically, but by the subtle tricks of memory. We may be prepared, then, for the recurrence of similar phenomena in Mt.

The Fayyûm papyrus fragment parallel to Mt $26^{31. 33f.}$, Mk $14^{27. 29f.}$, is too scanty and mutilated to justify much inference. But it omits a verse common to Mt and Mk; while it combines features of both (ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτί with Mt, τὰ πρόβ. διασκορπ., καὶ εἰ πάντες ο[ὐκ ἐγὼ], δὶς κοκ[κύξει], with Mk). It may, then, represent oral tradition; but more likely a free memoriter use of Mt and Mk in some manual of catechesis or edification like the Oxyrhynchus Logia.

[και εν τω απαλ]

Here ὡσαύτως is to be noted as pointing to a series of detached sayings rather than a gospel.

iii. CONCLUSIONS.—On the whole, then, the following results emerge as the most probable. (1) The order of narration common to the latter parts of Mt and Mk in particular, the closeness of which is made the more striking by the deviation of their earlier parts, points to the use by Mt of the Petrine memoirs written by Mk. (2) Conversely, the notable deviation of Mt and Lk in the order of the Discourses and Sayings (Logia element) common to them, combined with their textual variations, goes strongly against common use of a Logia document, as distinct from an oral Greek tradition which reached them in detached portions and in somewhat different forms.* (3) The Logia familiar to Mt, who had long taught them catechetically,—so that their vocabulary and his own were virtually one and the same,—reflected in epitome the whole experience of church life in certain Palestinian apostolic circles. They were rooted in the memories of the germinal Christian society, the apostles who had companied with their Master. But they contained also echoes of the first missionary commission as repeated for the guidance of others in the early days of Palestinian evangelization; of the persecution that had been their lot all along; of the forms in which the Master's principles of fellowship among brethren took actual shape as the life became more organized; and not least of the terms in which the polemic against their religious environment of Pharisaic Judaism was conducted in ever-growing volume and detail. That is, these Logia, far more than the Lucan, are memorials of the life of the Palestinian Church as well as of its Messiah. (4) The Matthæan Logia have as their nucleus the common apostolic didactic tradition, which took shape in the early Jerusalem days under the lead of Peter—a tradition which passed into Mk in its later Petrine form. At some stage which we cannot now trace they took on the special impress of the Apostle Matthew,[*] probably in a ministry of which Galilee, rather than Judæa, was the scene. In this form they passed, as Jewish unrest became more acute, to the neighbouring parts of Syria, in the person of our evangelist among others, still receiving fresh elements in the course of oral teaching.[†] And it was at this stage that they took written shape, as the main constituent in the mixed gospel composed with the aid of the Marcan memoirs of Peter. The freedom with which the writer has accommodated Mk's narrative to massed Logian discourses, suggests that these discourses already existed orally much in this massed form, and were not then first thrown into it by Mt. That Mk should early reach S. Syria is the more probable that St. Peter was evidently held in high honour there, witness the special references to Peter in 14^{28} 15^{15} 16^{18} 17^{24} 18^{21}; cf. 10^{2}, 'First, Simon who is called Peter.' Indeed it seems likely that Peter had left a strong oral tradition behind him in those parts, so that Mt knew the substance of Mk before it came into his hands. This may help to explain certain phenomena in his use of it. (5) The fact that the Matthæan cycle of Logia was taken up into our Mt, gave it its distinctive status and acceptance; and the actual facts of its origin were soon forgotten—probably never known outside a narrow circle. Thus the indirect sense in which Matthew was its author and guarantor dropped out of tradition, and Papias could simply take for granted that the Gospel κατὰ Μαθθαῖον was from the apostle's pen. (6) The actual conditions giving its author the stimulus to compose his artistic and reflective Gospel, must be gauged from the perspective in which he places the central Figure. He is set forth as the full blossoming of Israel's prophetic ideal of the King ruling in righteousness, and in wondrous gentleness too. The picture is the implicit corrective of the false Messianic ideal which had made the nation as a whole reject Jesus, and had already led it yet further astray in the path of earthly force. Thus, as we have seen, the urgency of the warnings against going after false Messiahs on the felt approach of the great national crisis (conceived on the lines of Daniel's prophecy of Jerusalem's last trial and in terms of current apocalyptic based thereon), points to the actual crisis of 68–70 as to the specific occasion which gave it birth. It is an appeal to waverers of all sorts to trust the true King, whose reign is of heaven, and depends on the action of God, not of men; and not to become involved in the current of the false national ideal. It is meant to do the same work as the Epistle to the Hebrews, only in another fashion and at a rather later date. And, like it, it is at once apologetic and polemical: it is a dissuasive in the form of a positive presentation. Jesus is God's Messiah in spite of all superficial appearances, and that by realizing the essence of Moses and the Prophets. It is hard to see which of the alternative dates, shortly before or after A.D. 70, makes the Gospel the more pertinent as a book for the times—and so satisfies the law of all early Christian writings. On the whole, Mt 24 adheres so closely to Mk's standpoint, in contrast to Luke's modifications and omissions, after 70—notably in counsels practical before 70, but not after (e.g. $^{15b.\ 16a.\ 20}$, esp. μηδὲ σαββάτῳ, ^{23})—that c. 68–69 seems the best date.

* Similarly the enigmatic, 'He shall be called a Nazarene,' seems an implicit reply to criticism. The flinging at Jesus of the epithet 'Nazarene'—a term of contempt on lofty lips—really fulfils the substance of 'the prophets' as a whole, touching Messiah's humble and even despised lot (e.g. as the faithful 'Servant of Jehovah,' Is $53^{1ff.}$).

† This will be the more convincing if even some of the other numerical arrangements which Sir J. Hawkins suggests as intended by Mt, hold good (Horæ Synopt. 131 ff.). We cannot, however, see that the number of the 'formula' verses, 7^{28} 11^1 13^{53} 19^1 26^1, is intentional. They are far apart, and no attention is drawn to their number any more than in the case of the recurring formulæ in Jg 2^6-16^{31}.

* Lk probably had in his 'special source' a mixed gospel embodying the bulk of his Logian element as it now stands in our Lk.

In 24^{15b} ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ follows Dn's forecast of Temple-desecration and not the facts of 70. Some, however, doubt whether Mt 28^{19} can have been written before 70, since it implies use of the triune baptismal name. But, if a similar clause be an original part of Didaché 7, its evidence may be cited. For the work as a whole, and not the 'Two Ways' only, seems to be implied by the Christian interpolation in Ascensio Isaiæ, which perhaps falls before Nero's death (i.e. c. 65–68). Hence there is nothing decisive against c. 68–69 A.D.; while the statement in 27^{8}, 'that field is called the Field of Blood until this day,' and casual references to 'the holy city' and the temple-worship, are more natural at that date than after the utter ruin and change of 70. So with the reference to 'going over the cities of Israel,' 10^{23}. Perhaps, then, $22^{6b.\ 7b}$ are additions after 70: contrast Lk 14^{21}.

(7) The evangelist writes, however, with a sort of detachment hard to imagine in one living in Palestine about 70. Thus it is best, and most in keeping with the Greek form and with internal evidence, to locate him in S. Syria, say Phœnicia (4^{24a} $15^{21ff.}$ alongside Mk 1^{28} $7^{24ff.}$, cf. Ac 11^{19} 15^{3}). That the author was a Jew, is clear from the text and manner of his special OT quotations, which so colour his work. But his was a spiritual Israel, new while old, inclusive not exclusive, conceived on prophetic lines after the manner of Peter and the Apocalypse of John—with the latter of which its affinities are most marked. Jesus of Nazareth is really the Christ, since in His person, teaching, work, and even His tragic end, all has been as prophecy had intimated. While as to the scope of Messiah's Ecclesia, the elect Israel, it was but a little thing that God should through Him raise up Jacob: the nations, too, were to be His inheritance, by the incorporation into the Kingdom of all who were of faith [cf. Kübel (as below), Introductory Remarks, trans. in Bibl. World, i. 194 ff., 263 ff.].

(8) All theories of Mt must be both problematic and complex. Zahn's theory of an 'apologetic' Aramaic[*] Gospel by the Apostle Matthew, c. 62 A.D., turned into Greek, c. 85, is too simple for the phenomena. The prevalent 'two document' hypothesis, with the use of special oral traditions, comes far nearer the truth. But it may be doubted whether the second or Logian document is needed to account for Mt's divergences from Mk; and whether the differences as well as similarities of the Logian element in Mt and Lk are not best explained by a common Gr. Logian type of catechesis[†] behind both. In favour of such a 'one document' hypothesis may be alleged the Logian quotations in the Didaché, perhaps also in the first Ep. of Clement and the Oxyrhynchan fragment, as seeming to reflect local catechesis rather than either Mt or Lk. It would be some time before a written gospel superseded traditional local usage as the prime factor in forming the Logian equipment of Christians. It is in Ignatius, then, that we seem first to have good evidence of Mt as an influence at work (e.g. ad Eph. 19^{2}). But not even then did oral tradition cease to operate. To its reaction on the written text we owe in large part early secondary readings, such as those misnamed 'Western': and from it, especially in its later stages, come those Logia known as Agrapha.

LITERATURE.—The following aims at indicating only the more representative works of earlier times, with a rather fuller citation of those since 1880.

TEXT.—In checking the witness of the MSS and VSS, we have, besides the fragments of Tatian's Diatessaron (in Hamlyn Hill, The Earliest Life of Christ, pp. 333–377), which are common to the four Gospels, a special aid in the 3rd cent. papyrus of Mt 1^{1-20} (Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, i. pp. 4–7). This supports not only the usual reading in 1^{16} but also the 'Neutral' type of text resting on ℵB.

[*] Similarly, the Epistle of James echoes in its own way not a few of the precepts of the great Sermon, esp. those on Swearing (otherwise peculiar to Mt) and on Censoriousness towards brethren (=towards 'Law,' 4^{11}, perhaps that of Mt 7^{1}, Lk 6^{37}).

[†] This kind of expansive and explanatory activity of the Christian 'scribe instructed in the kingdom of heaven' seems taken for granted in 13^{52}; cf. 23^{34} for the catechist.

[*] We can merely note the weighty witness of Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1898) against the directly Aramaic antecedents of our Gospel-material. The Hebraisms of our Gospels he traces chiefly to LXX influence on their writers.

[†] The absence of all historical trace of such a revered writing as an Ur-Matthäus would have been, is rendered doubly inexplicable if it be granted that it was ever current in Greek. Here is the one strong point of Zahn's theory over against the 'two document' theory of Weiss and others.

ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—There is a special treatise by Gla, Die Originalsprache des Mt, Paderborn, 1887. But the most authoritative discussion in relation to the whole subject of the Semitic basis of the Synoptics is that in Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, Bd. i., Leipzig, 1898. There, as also in Zahn's Einleitung in d. NT, Bd. ii., will be found the earlier history of the subject.

RELATION TO THE GOSPEL OF THE HEBREWS.—Hilgenfeld, NT extra Canon. receptum^{2}, 1884; Nicholson, Gospel according to the Hebrews (1879); Handmann, Hebräerevangelium (1888), in TU v. 3 (with good Geschichte der Kritik); Resch, Agrapha (1889), in TU v. 4, p. 322 ff.; Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, ii. 642 ff.; Harnack, Chronologie, Bd. i. 625 ff. Hilgenfeld's thesis, that in the original Nazarene Heb. Ev. [=the Heb. Matt., i.e. Papias' Logia] is to be sought the Archimedean point of the whole Gospel problem, has met with little support (yet see McGiffert's note on Eusebius, iii. 27). It is largely another case of ignotum per ignotius. Thus Nicholson falls back on the rather effete view that Mt wrote both in Greek and Hebrew (=the Heb. Ev.). Handmann and Resch agree in denying the identity of the Heb. Ev. with the supposed Hebrew Matt. The former makes it a second source of our Synoptics, alongside 'Ur-Markus,' and perhaps even what Papias meant by the Logia; the latter emphasizes its apocryphal features (even in its original form), and makes it dependent on our Matthew. Harnack, here in principle agreeing with Zahn, takes a middle position, making it originally a sort of cousin of our Matt., each being an enlarged edition of the Matthæan Logia. Only Harnack differs from Zahn in making both recensions of about the same date (not long after 70). Finally, J. Armitage Robinson, in Expos. 5th Ser. v. (1897) 194–200, discusses three of the fragments of the Heb. Ev. in such a way as to traverse the main conclusion of these two scholars.

COMMENTARIES.—Patristic and Mediæval: Origen (in Greek for 13^{36}–22^{33}, in Latin to 27), Chrysostom (91 Homilies, ed. Field, 3 vols. 1839), Hilary of Poitiers (ed. Oberthür, tom. vii.), Jerome, Augustine (on parts), Bede, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus (ed. C. F. Matthæi, 1792, a valuable work), Thomas Aquinas. To these may be added Cramer's Catenæ græc. patrum in NT, tom. i. 1844.

Reformation and Post-Reformation.—Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Beza; the Roman Catholics Maldonatus (1596; Eng. tr. Hodges, 1894), Jansen and Cornelius a Lapide; Grotius, Calovius, Hammond, le Clerc, Olearius (1713), J. C. Wolf (Curæ Philolog. et Crit. 1733), Bengel, J. J. Wetstein (NT græc. 1751), H. E. G. Paulus (1800), Campbell (1807^3), Kuinoel, Fritzsche (1826), Bland (Cambridge, 1828), Olshausen, Baumgarten-Crusius, de Wette, Ewald, Meyer, Alford, Patritius (R.C.), Bleek, Morison, M'Clellan, Keil, Lange, Schaff and Riddle, Schanz (R.C., 1879), Nicholson, Knabenbauer (R.C.), Nösgen (1886, 1897^2), Broadus (Philad. 1887), Holtzmann (Handkom. 1889, 1892^2), Kübel (Exeg.-Hom. Handb. 1889), Meyer-Weiss (1890^8, 1898^9), Maclaren (1892), A. B. Bruce (Expos. Greek Test. vol. i.).

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Hebrew and Talmudic parallels are collected chiefly in the Horæ Heb. et Talm. of Lightfoot and Schöttgen, and in Gerh. Meuschen, NT ex Talmude et antiquit. Ebræorum illustr. 1736; Weber's Jüd. Theologie and Dalman's Worte Jesu also contribute thereto. In the enormous accumulation of Greek parallels to word or phrase, the following have done good service: Price, Comm. in Varios NT Libros (1660); Raphel, Annot. Philolog. in NT ex Xenophonte, Polybio, Arriano et Herodoto (1709–31); Elsner, Observ. sacræ in NT libros (1720); J. Alberti, Observ. Philolog. in Sacros NT Libros (1725), Palairet (French pastor in London, 1752); Kypke (1755); Krebs (esp. from Josephus, 1755), and Loesner (esp. from Philo, 1777); Campbell, Dissertations, 1788; Grinfield, Scholia Hellenistica in NT (1848); and Field, Otium Norvicense, Pars iii.^{2} (1899).

DISCUSSIONS ON SPECIAL SECTIONS.—Lutteroth, Essai d'interprétation de quelques parties de l'Évangile selon S. Matt., 1864–76. Nativity: Resch, Kindheitsevangelium, TU x. 5 (where further references will be found). Sermon on the Mount: Trench (1844), Tholuck (translation, 1869^2), H. J. V. BARTLET.

MATTHIAS (Ματθίας [Tisch. Treg. WH Μαθθίας], abbreviated from Ματταθίας, the Gr. form of מַתִּתְיָה 'gift of J″'; cf. the name Theodorus).—The disciple selected along with Barsabbas, after the Ascension, from those followers of Christ who were deemed qualified for appointment to the apostleship vacant through the death of Judas (Ac $1^{15\text{-}26}$). The procedure was adopted on the initiative of St. Peter, who applied Ps 109^8 to the circumstances; and the selection appears to have been made by the assembled Christian brotherhood.* The general qualification required was to have 'companied with us (the apostles) all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us.' Barsabbas and Matthias had also, presumably, special graces of character and gifts of teaching and administration. After prayer, addressed probably to Christ,† and a solemn appeal to the lot,‡ Matthias was elected.

This is the sole instance of the lot being employed in the history of the Apostolic Church, and it occurs significantly between the Ascension and Pentecost, when the disciples were 'orphans' (Jn 14^{18}). Stier (Words of the Apostles, in loc.) regards this election as premature and unwarranted, the outcome of St. Peter's officious impetuosity. 'The lot fell: not the Lord chose.' He holds that St. Paul was the true successor of Judas, chosen, like the other apostles, by the Lord Himself. It may be granted that the appointment of Matthias stands on a somewhat lower level than that of the original Twelve and of St. Paul; but, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, the procedure was a legitimate exercise of human wisdom in dependence upon divine guidance; and St. Luke, the 'beloved' friend of St. Paul, appears to endorse the election (representing, doubtless, the general opinion of the Apostolic Church); for after speaking of the eleven apostles (Ac 1^{26}) he refers (Ac 6^2) to the 'Twelve.'§

The historical character of Matthias' election has been impugned by Zeller (Acts of Apost., Eng. tr. i. 168) on account of (1) the assumption that the apostles remained in Jerusalem; (2) the close connexion of the narrative with Pentecost. But the departure of the apostles to Galilee after the Resurrection did not preclude their early return to Jerusalem; and the second objection can have weight only with those who reject entirely the supernatural in primitive Church history.

According to Eus. (HE i. 12, ii. 1) and Epiphan. (Hær. i. 22), Matthias was one of the 'Seventy' (Lk 10^1).‖ Hilgenfeld identifies him with Nathanael, owing to the two names having nearly the same meaning.* A tradition preserved by Niceph. Call. (HE ii. 40) represents Matthias as labouring in Ethiopia; and in the apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias † (assigned to the 2nd cent.), Matthias evangelizes the Ethiopian man-eaters, from whom he is delivered by St. Andrew. See ANDREW. Another ancient tradition assigns to Matthias Jerusalem as scene of ministry and place of burial (Pseudo-Hipp. in Combesis, Auct. Nov.).

---

* So Beng., Stier, Mey., Alf., Baumg., etc. on the ground that the subj. in v.^{23} must be the same as in vv.$^{24.\,26}$. Some (Mosh. Ham. Jacobson, etc.), assign the selection to the apostles, taking the subj. from v.^{17}.

† So Beng., Ols., Baumg., Alf., Words., Hows., and most commentators, on the ground that the choice of apostles is always referred to Christ (Lk 6^{13}, Jn 6^{70} 15^{16}, Ac 1^2), the same Greek word being used. Meyer, Holtz., Zöck. refer 1^{24} to God (Ac 4^{29} 15^8).

‡ The lot, presumably, would be taken in the usual way, the names of the two men being written on tablets, and shaken in a vessel, and he whose tablet first leapt out being regarded as divinely designated (Lv 16^8, Nu 26^{55}, Pr 16^{33}). So late as 1731 the Moravians decided by lot the question whether they should retain their own organization, or be incorporated with the Lutherans (Gloag, in loc.). Wesley also had a predilection for sortilege (Southey, Life of Wesley, i. 136, 187). Mosh. (Comm. Sæc. i. 14) and others (Gagneius [doubtfully] Salmeron) maintain, chiefly on the ground of ἔδωκαν instead of ἔβαλον in v.^{26}, that the election was by ballot. But this view harmonizes neither with Jewish usage nor with the context ('show of these two the one whom Thou hast chosen'); and while αὐτοῖς in v.^{26} is the correct reading, the rendering 'for them' is legitimate.

§ The objection of Stier, that St. Luke here avoids the expression 'Twelve Apostles,' is hypercritical.

‖ It is noteworthy that the ancient Syriac translation of Eus. substitutes Tolmai and the ancient Armenian version Bartolmai (Bartholomew) for Matthias (when referring to him as one of the Seventy), embodying probably a very early local tradition that Matthias bore this additional name. See Nestle in Expos. Times, ix. 568 (Sept. 1898). This Tolmai or Bartholomew may have been a brother or other relative of Bartholomew the Apostle, to avoid confusion with whom the other name Matthias would commonly be used. Or perhaps this Syriac

The Gnosticism of Basilides, or of his followers, was professedly based on the παραδόσεις of Matthias, which the Basilidians held to embody instruction secretly received by Matthias from our Lord (Philosophoumena, vii. 20). This work is probably identical with a Gospel of Matthias referred to by Origen (Hom. in Luc. i.) and by Eus. (HE iii. 25), who includes it among spurious works cited by heretics under names of the apostles.‡

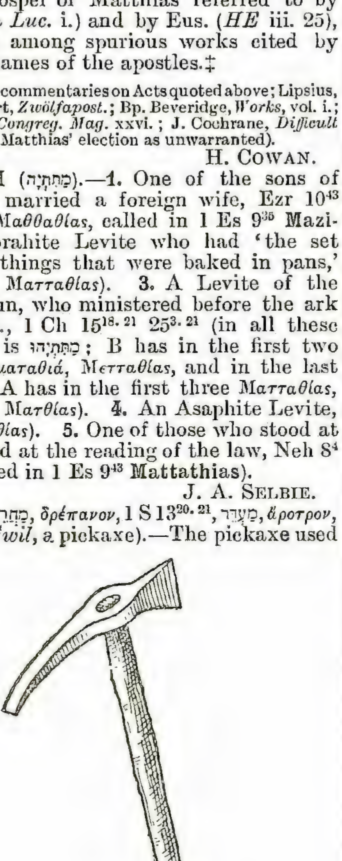
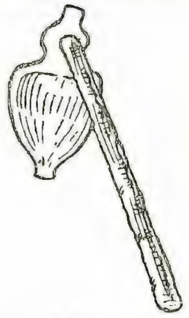
MATTOCK (מַחֲרֵשָׁה, δρέπανον, 1 S 13^{20. 21}, מַעְדֵּר, ἄροτρον, Is 7²⁵; Arab. ma'wil, a pickaxe).—The pickaxe used in Syria is of different shapes, but the most common has a long arm for breaking up the ground, and a short broad one, like a small axe, for cutting roots. In ploughing, the plough is always followed by one or two men with pickaxes, breaking the large clods of earth turned up by the ploughshare, or digging up the ground which cannot be reached by the plough. The hoe (Arab. mijrăfăt) is also used both for digging and for filling baskets with earth for removal. The shovel (rufsh or mirfăshĕt) is sometimes used. The RVm of 1 S 13²¹ is the same as the Arab. Version.



MA'WIL OR PICKAXE.



MIJRĂFĂT OR HOE.

W. CARSLAW.

MAUL.—In Pr 25¹⁸ the Arab. Version gives miḳma'at for maul (מֵפִיץ). It is a stick for striking a person on the head as a mark of disgrace, but it may also mean a club. Clubs are always carried by the shepherds of Lebanon, slung from the wrist by a thong or cord. The head of the club is round and heavy, and is sometimes studded with iron spikes. The common name for it in Lebanon is dabûs; in Egypt, nabût. In Jer 51²⁰ the Heb. מַפֵּץ is tr. in RV 'battle-axe,' and in the marg. 'maul.' In the Arab. VS it is fa's, an axe, not very unlike מַפֵּץ in sound. W. CARSLAW.

MAUZZIM.—The text of the AV of Dn 11³⁸ contains the title 'the God of forces': the marg. has 'Heb. Mauzzim, or Gods protectors.' The same Heb. word מָעֻזִּים occurs in the beginning of the next verse. Our marg. note may be traced to Theodotion's rendering, θεὸν μαωζείν, which, however, he does not repeat in v.³⁹. The Vulg. is more consistent: 'Deum autem Maozim . . . et faciet ut muniat Maozim.' The LXX has no trace of this inclination to find a proper name here: in v.³⁸ the present reading is ἔθνη ἰσχυρά, and in v.³⁹ ὀχύρωμα ἰσχυρόν; but Jerome, in his Commentary on Daniel, states that its rendering in v.³⁸ was deum fortissimum [Is ἔθνη, a corruption of θεόν?]. Aquila has θεὸν ἰσχύων. The Rhemish Version follows the Vulg.: 'But he shall worship the god Maozim. . . . And he shall do this to fortify Maozim,' etc. Luther's Bible is under the same influence, 'seinen Gott Mäuzim . . . stärken Mäuzim,' as is also the Authorized Dutch Version, but not quite to the same extent, 'den god Maüzzim . . . vastigheden der sterkten.' The Pesh. has 'strong god . . . strong fortress.'

It is now universally agreed that Mauzzim is not a proper name. Hitzig proposed to divide the word into two, reading מָעוֹז יָם (which at Is 23⁴ is the designation of Tyre), and taking אֱלֹהַּ מָעוֹז יָם to be Melḳart, the god of Tyre. But this seems unnecessary. 'The god of fortresses,' v.³⁸, and 'the strongest fortresses,' v.³⁹, of our RV are an adequate rendering. The only remaining dispute is as to who was meant by 'the god of fortresses.' Livy (xli. 20) states that Antiochus Epiphanes—whose deeds Daniel here depicts—began to build a splendid temple at Antioch in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus. Hence it has been inferred that this tradition originated in a confusion occasioned by a possible early anticipation of the double later identification (1) of Bartholomew with Nathanael, and (2) of Nathanael with Matthias—a confusion which might lead to Matthias being identified with a Bartholomew.

* John Lightfoot had previously (Com. on Ac, in loc.) regarded this identification as tenable, but preferred on the whole to identify Nathanael with the Apostle Bartholomew.

† So the oldest MS, which Tisch. follows; some later MSS substitute Matthew for Matthias. Lipsius, however (Apocr. Apos. iii. 258), regards these Ethiopian traditions as really referring to Matthew.

‡ Some fragments of the παραδόσεις are preserved by Clem. Alex., and indicate a high moral tone: 'When the neighbour of an elect person falls into sin, the elect one sins himself' (Strom. vii. 13). 'We must contend with the flesh, and in our treatment of it yield nothing in the way of wantonness to its craving' (ib. iii. 4). The reference in the Philos., however, indicates that the work countenanced Gnostic speculations.

is 'the god of fortresses.' Again, 2 Mac 6^{2} informs us that he re-dedicated the temple at Jerusalem to Jupiter Olympius. And this has given rise to the conjecture that the Olympian Jupiter is the one referred to. With equal reason might the same verse induce us to fix on Jupiter Hospitalis. A yet more doubtful conjecture is that Mars was intended. And, on all grounds, Layard's suggestion must be put aside. He was inclined towards the Assyrian Venus, who is represented as 'standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower or mural coronet.' Perhaps the choice, if a choice must be made, lies between Jupiter Capitolinus and Ζεὺς Πολιεύς, 'the guardian of the city,' the family god of the Seleucids, to whom there was an altar on the Acropolis at Athens, whose claims are strenuously maintained by G. Hoffmann and Behrmann. In point of fact the evidence is not sufficient to justify a decision.

As curiosities of exegesis may be mentioned the view of Sir Isaac Newton and others, that the Mauzzim of Dn 11^{38} are protectors or guardians, the verse being a prediction that the doctrine of guardian angels should be introduced by the Roman Antichrist, and Pfeiffer's view that 'the idol of the Mass' is intended. J. TAYLOR.

MAW (Anglo-Sax. maga, the stomach).—This old name for the stomach is used in Dt 18^{3} as the tr. of קֵבָה in its only occurrence. RV uses the same word in Jer 51^{34} for AV 'belly' as tr. of כְּרֵשׂ in its only occurrence also. The tr. in Dt 18^{3} is from Tindale, who uses the word also in his exposition of Mt 7^{15} 'Your prayer is but pattering without all affection; your singing is but roaring to stretch out your maws (as do your other gestures and rising at midnight), to make the meat sink to the bottom of the stomach, that he may have perfect digestion, and be ready to devour afresh against the next refection'; and Coverdale uses it in translating 1 K 22^{34}, 'A certayne man bended his bowe harde, and shott the kynge of Israel betwene the mawe and the longes.' J. HASTINGS.

MAZITIAS (A Μαζιτίας, B Ζειτίας), 1 Es 9^{35}= MATTITHIAH, Ezr 10^{43}.

MAZZAROTH (מַזָּרוֹת).—This word occurs only in Job 38^{32}, and seems early to have been regarded by commentators as being connected with the מַזָּלוֹת (mazzālôth) of 2 K 23^{5}, as is indicated also by the LXX, which has Μαζουρώθ in both passages. In the AVm Mazzārôth is rendered by 'the twelve signs,' and in the RV by 'the signs of the Zodiac,' both of which may be regarded as the true significations of the word. Ges., who proposes the latter rendering, and suggests its identity with mazzālôth ('lodgings'), compares the Chaldee mazzālayā. Mazzālôth would therefore be the plural of the Hebrew equivalent of this Chaldee form, given in late Jewish works as מַזָּל (mazzāl), which was used to denote not only the single signs and the planets, but also their influence on the fate of men (Selden, de Dîs Syr., Synt. i. c. 1). If the etymology of Mazzārôth (=mazzālôth) be, as Ges. suggests, the same as that of the Arab. manzil, 'lodging-place,' the root would be nāzal, one of the meanings of which is 'to descend,' i.e. 'to alight at a place in order to sojourn there.' Another etymology, however, has been revived by Jensen, who compares Mazzārôth (=mazzālôth) with the Assyr. manzalti.* This comparison, however, is not without its difficulties, as the Assyr. word is for manzazti, from nazāzu, 'to stand,' whence also manzazu, 'station,' 'resting-place.' This, of course, would disconnect mazzārôth and mazzālôth from the late singular form mazzal.* Other renderings of mazzārôth that may be noted are the Syriac (Peshiṭta) agalta, 'the wain,' or 'the great bear'; 'Lucifer, the morning star' (Procopius of Gaza); 'stars' generally, and 'a northern constellation' (Aben Ezra and R. Levi ben Gershon), etc.

The Babylonian names of the twelve signs of the Zodiac are given in vol. i. p. 192 (footnote), and the inhabitants of that country were accustomed to observe them and to note the dates when the moon and the planets entered them, for the purpose of forecasting events, drawing up horoscopes, etc. These people were therefore wont to see Mazzaroth 'led forth in their season,' and the passage in Job where this word occurs would seem to point to the author of the book being as well acquainted as they with the wonders of the starry heavens. MAZZOTH.—See PASSOVER.

MEADOW.—This purely English word (Anglo-Saxon, Mædu, Mædewe) occurs in the AV only in Gn $41^{2.\ 18}$ and Jg 20^{33}.

1. In Gn $41^{2.\ 18}$ אָחוּ (LXX ἄχει), the word tr^{d} 'meadow' is of Egyptian (demotic αχυ) origin (cf. Jerome on Is 19^{7}; Wiedemann, Sammlung altägyptischer Wörter, p. 16; Ebers, Ægypten und die Bücher Mose's, p. 338), and believed to mean the reed-grass (so RV) which in Lower Egypt borders the Nile and its branches, together with the marsh-lands, during floods.† As suggested, also, in the art. MEADOW in Smith's DB, the word may denote the pasturage afforded by the growing crops during high Nile. But the pasturage of cattle was carried on extensively in Lower Egypt under the Old Empire. In modern Egypt cattle are fed in cultivated clover fields, for there are but few natural meadows of wild grass; but in ancient Egypt it was otherwise. As we know from numerous Egyptian tablets, cattle were fed on the stretches of marshy land in the Delta, whether beds of old rivers or water-courses, or such extensive shallows as that of Lake Menzaleh, now covered by brackish water, but once forming to a large extent one of the most productive tracts in Egypt.‡ The dream of Pharaoh, therefore, in which the fat cattle were seen to feed in the reed-grass by the river side was the natural suggestion to the mind during sleep of a custom which he may often have witnessed.

* The original text of the Assyr. inscr. here referred to is as follows:—

'(If) the planet Jupiter approach,' etc. etc. etc., ilāni ina šamê ina manzalti-šunu izzazzūni parakke-šunu daḫdu inammaru,
'the gods in the heavens in their station remain, their shrines will see plenty.' (WAI iii. 59, 35–36).

* It is worthy of note that the Assyr. intermediate form mazzarti has not yet been found, and that, if found, it would be singular, like manzalti. On the other hand, the plural, if regular, would be manzazāti (l or r changing back to z before a vowel), and ought to have been borrowed by the Hebrews, not as mazzārôth or mazzālôth, but as mazzāzôth. Both Heb. forms, therefore, if borrowed from Assyr., must have come from the Assyr. singular without regard to the original root of the word.

† אָחוּ occurs also in Job 8^{11} (LXX πάπυρος; AV, RV 'rush,' RVm 'papyrus'), and should be restored in Hos 13^{15} (אָחִים for אַחִים [Oxf. Heb. Lex.], or read כְּבֵין מַיִם אָחוּ [Wellh. and Nowack]).

'Meadows' is introduced by RV also in Is 19^{7} (AV 'paper reeds'). The Heb. is עָרוֹת, a ἅπ. λεγ.; LXX (so also Syr.) has ἄχι. It is just possible that they may have read or misread אחות for עָרוֹת. The LXX reads ἄχει also in Sir 40^{16} (AV 'weed,' RV 'sedge'). The recently recovered Heb. text has קרדמות, which is prob. a corruption (see König in Expos. Times, Aug. 1899, p. 513 f.).

‡ Adolf Erman, Ægypten, translated as Life in Ancient Egypt by H. M. Tirard, pp. 438–444 (1894).

'meadows of Gibeah,' RVm 'meadow of Geba,' RV Maareh-geba). Much uncertainty attaches to the correct tr$^{\text{n}}$ of this passage. By alteration of the vowel-points adopted in MT, the word signifies 'a cave' (מְעָרָה). So Studer, following the Peshiṭta. This is a probable enough translation, as the position of Gibeah (which is the correct reading, not Geba), high up amongst the hills of Central Palestine, puts the idea of meadows in connexion therewith out of the question. On the other hand, caves amongst the limestone rocks are not infrequent in Palestine. Of Gibeah (Tuleil el-Fûl) Tristram says: 'Dreary and desolate, scarce any ruins, save a confused mass of stones, which form a sort of cairn on the top [of the hill]. As we recall also the hideous deed of the men of Gibeah, the blighting doom seems to have settled over the spot' (Land of Israel ^{2}, p. 171).

Another probable emendation, in the line of LXX (A) and Vulg., is מִמַּעֲרָב לג׳ 'to the west of Gibeah.' See MAAREH-GEBA. E. HULL.

MEAH.—See HAMMEAH.

MEAL.—1. A repast, the portion of food eaten at one time. The word is used only in the compound 'Mealtime' (Ru 2^{14}), where it is the tr. of עֵת הָאֹכֶל, literally 'the time of eating.' See FOOD in vol. ii. p. 41 f.

2. The substance of grain ground but not sifted. Our English word is from the Anglo-Saxon melu, which is connected with the Gothic malan, 'to grind.' The word is used as the tr. of קֶמַח ḳemaḥ, which signifies meal in general, sometimes used with the genitive of the kind of grain from which it is made, as of the $\frac{1}{10}$th ephah presented by the husband for his wife in the Jealousy Offering, Nu 5^{15}. In this case, the homely nature of the material is supposed to typify the humiliation of the woman accused. When used to represent fine flour it is combined with סֹלֶת as in Gn 18^{6}. Three ṣeahs of this fine meal (probably about 4 pecks) were used by Sarah to make cakes for the angelic visitors at Mamre. The mention of the same quantity, ἀλεύρου σάτα τρία, in the parable of the leaven, Mt 13^{33}, Lk 13^{21}, seems to show that this was the ordinary quantity to prepare at one time. Ḳemaḥ and ṣôleth are sometimes contrasted, as in the account of Solomon's daily provision, which consisted of 60 kors (=622$\frac{1}{2}$ bushels) of meal and 30 kors of ṣôleth (1 K 4^{22}). Meal was the breadstuff used by the poor. The widow of Zarephath had only a handful of ḳemaḥ in her meal-tub, 1 K 17^{12}. It was with ḳemaḥ that Elisha healed the poisonous pottage, 2 K 4^{41}. Meal was brought as part of the tribute to David on his becoming king in Hebron, 1 Ch 12^{40}.

In the prophetic writings 'meal' is used in several figures. The humbling of the Daughter of Babylon was to be shown by her being reduced to the work of grinding meal as a sign of servitude, Is 47^{2}. Hosea represents the unprofitableness of the evil works of Israel as sowing the wind, reaping the whirlwind whose bud (צֶמַח) makes no meal (Hos 8^{7}). There is a peculiar force here in the assonance 'ên lō ẓémaḥ bĕlî ya'ăseh ḳémaḥ. For other particulars see BREAD and FOOD.

In the RV the word occurs very much more frequently in connexion with the minḥāh or meal offering, Lv $2^{1\text{ff.}}$ and many other passages. This is called 'meat offering' in the AV. See OFFERING and SACRIFICE.

The Israelites seem to have employed mills from a very early period, but it is remarkable that they were apparently unknown in Egypt until a comparatively late time. There is no word which unequivocally signifies 'mill' in the language of the Old or Middle Empire, as far as we know. Their grain seems to have been pounded or brayed. The word ḳemḥ occurs in a list of offerings at Denderah as a kind of flour. In Ethiopic k'amiḥi is used for 'pulse.' The word ke-me is used for meal in several cuneiform texts (see Strassmaier, Inschr. v. Nabonidus, Leipzig, 1889).

A. MACALISTER.

MEAL-OFFERING is the rendering substituted by the OT revision for AV 'meat-offering' (מִנְחָה). The American Revisers further record their preference for 'meal-offering' in Jer 14^{12} 17^{26} 33^{18} 41^{5}. In these passages our RV reads 'oblation' with 'meal-offering' in the margin. For details see general article SACRIFICE.

MEAN.—The verb to 'mean' (from Anglo-Sax. maenan to intend, tell, and connected with 'mind,' the root being man to think) signifies sometimes to intend, purpose: Gn 50^{20} 'But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good'; Is 3^{15} 'What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor?'; 10^{7} 'Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so'; Ac 21^{13} 'What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart?'; Ac 27^{2} 'We launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia'; 2 Co 8^{13} 'For I mean not that other men be eased and ye burdened.' Cf. Shaks. Merry Wives, V. ii. 15, 'No man means evil but the devil, and we shall know him by his horns.'

The subst. meaning, which in Dn 8^{15}, 1 Co 14^{11} signifies 'understanding,' 'sense,' as in its modern use, expresses 'purpose,' 'intention,' in 1 Mac 15^{4} 'My meaning also being to go through the country' (βούλομαι δὲ ἐκβῆναι κατὰ τὴν χώραν; RV 'I am minded to land in the country'). Cf. Jer 44^{25} Cov. 'Purposly have ye set up youre owne good meanynges, and hastely have ye fulfilled youre owne intente'; Hall, Works ii. 103, 'Good meanings have oft-times proved injurious.'

The subst. 'mean' (from Old Fr. meien, moien; Lat. medius) signified originally something that was in the middle. Thus Tymme's Calvin's Genesis (1578), p. 678 '[Moses] was a meane betweene the Patriarches and the Apostles'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 334, 'He that punissheth whyle he is angry, shall never kepe that meane which is betwene to moche and to lyttell'; Barlowe, Dialoge, 103, 'God loved the people so entyerly, that of theym he chose bysshoppes, preistes, and deacons, to offer speciall sacrifices for the clensynge of theyr synnes, and to be as meanes betwene hym and them'; and Knox, Works, iii. 98, 'Is he who discendit from heaven and vouchsaffit to be conversant with synneris, commanding all soir vexit and seik to cum unto him (who, hanging upon the Cross, prayit first for his enemyis), becum now so untractable, that he will not heir us without a person to be a meane?' From this arose easily the sense of instrument, which is often sing., 'a mean,' in the Eng. of that day, though in AV itself it is always plu., 'means.' Thus Lever, Sermons, 79, 'Of God surely thou hast received it, by what messenger or meane so ever thou came unto it,' and Knox, Works, iii. 299, 'The instrumente and meane wherwith Christe Jesus used to remove and put awaye the horrible feare and anguysshe of his Disciples, is his only worde'; and in AV, Wis 8^{13} 'By the means of her I shall obtain immortality' (RV 'because of her'); 2 Co 1^{11} 'the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons' (RV 'by means of many'); Rev 13^{14} 'by the means of those miracles' (RV 'by reason of the signs'). This word is sometimes also an adj., of which we have such examples in AV as in the mean while, 1 K 18^{45}, Jn 4^{31}, Ro 2^{15}; in the mean time, 1 Mac 11^{41}, Lk 12^{1}; and in the mean season, 1 Mac 11^{14} 15^{15}. Cf. Pr. Bk. 'The Communion,' 'My duty is to exhort you in the mean season'; Jer 32^{25} Cov. 'In the meane season the cite is delyvered in to the power of the Caldees.'

There is another adj. 'mean,' which is traced to the Anglo-Sax. gemaene, 'common,' 'general,' and is possibly connected with Lat. communis, though Skeat counts that very doubtful. This word was early confused with the distinct Anglo-Sax. word maene, 'false,' 'wicked,' with the result, that from signifying merely peasant-born, of common origin, it came to express 'low-minded,' 'base' (the word 'base' has a parallel history, see BASE), and again 'niggardly,' 'penurious.' In AV the word is used only in the sense of 'low-born,' 'common': Pr 22^{29} 'Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men' (לִפְנֵי חֲשֻׁכִּים, lit. 'before obscure persons' as AVm and RVm); Is 2^{9} 'And the mean man is bowed down, and the great man humbleth himself,' Heb. אָדָם opp. to אִישׁ, so 5^{15} 31^{8}; Ac 21^{39} 'a citizen of no mean city' (οὐκ ἀσήμου πόλεως). Cf. Pref. to AV 1611, 'If any man conceit, that this is the lot and portion of the meaner sort onely, and that Princes are priviledged by their high estate, he is deceived'; Elyot, Governour, i. 25, 'It is expedient and also nedefull that under the capitall governour be sondry meane authorities'; Knox, Hist. 392, 'When scarcely could be found ten in a Country that rightly knew God, it had been foolishnesse to have craved, either of the Nobilitie or of the mean Subjects, the suppressing of Idolatry.'

The adv. meanly is found in 2 Mac 15^{38} 'If I have done well and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto.' The meaning is 'moderately' (μετρίως). Cf. Spenser, Mother Hubberds Tale, 297—

> 'The Husbandman was meanly well content
> Triall to make of his endevourment';

and Shaks. Com. of Errors, I. i. 59—

> 'Thy wife, not meanly proud of two such boys,
> Made daily motions for our home return.'

MEARAH (מְעָרָה 'cave' [cf. AVm]; LXX seems to follow another reading).—Mentioned amongst the districts of Palestine that had yet to be possessed, Jos 13^{4}. The text is doubtful (see Dillm. ad loc., and Bennett in SBOT, the latter of whom emends מֵאַרְוָד 'from Arvad'); but if we accept the MT, then Mearah, 'which belongeth to the Zidonians,' may be Mogheirîyeh ('small cave'), a village near Zidon; cf. Aquila, καὶ σπήλαιον ὅ ἐστι τῶν Σιδωνίων.

MEASURES.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT (Anglo-Sax. mete, perhaps from mete to measure, but more probably connected with Lat. mandere to chew) is in AV food in general, not, as now, flesh food only. Thus 2 Es 12^{51} 'But I remained still in the field seven days, as the angel commanded me; and did eat only in those days of the flowers of the field, and had my meat (esca) of the herbs.' The 'meat-offering' contained no flesh, but was composed of meal and oil. Fuller, Holy State, 185, says, 'A rich man told a poore man that he walked to get a stomach for his meat: And I, said the poore man, walk to get meat for my stomach'; cf. Adams on 2 P 1^{4} 'He feeds the ravens, and the young lions seek their meat at him.' In their Preface the AV translators say of the Scripture, 'It is not a pot of manna, or a cruse of oyl, which were for memory onely, or for a meals meat or two, but as it were a shower of heavenly bread, sufficient for a whole host, be it never so great.' So Hall, Works, i. 806, 'There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, so deare bought as this broth of Jacob.' As the word signifies whatever is eaten, it may be applied to flesh, as in Fuller, Holy Warre, 212, 'Where he giveth away the meat he selleth the sauce'; so in Gn $27^{4.\,7.\,31}$ of the venison Esau prepared for Isaac, and $27^{9.\,14}$ of the goat's flesh which Rebekah prepared.

The plu. 'meats' for 'kinds or portions of food' occurs some ten times in the Apocr., also in Pr 23^{6} 'neither desire thou his dainty meats,' where the Heb. is simply 'his dainties,' as RV; Ac 15^{29} 'meats offered to idols,' where the Gr. is 'offerings to idols' (εἰδωλόθυτα, RV 'things sacrificed to idols'); and in Mk 7^{19}, 1 Co $6^{13\,bis}$, 1 Ti 4^{3}, He 9^{10} 13^{9}, where the Gr. is always βρώματα, things to eat. Cf. Rhem. N.T. Preface, 'When we are litle ones, let us not covet the meates of the elder sort,' and the Rhem. tr. of Lk 9^{12} 'Dimisse the multitudes, that going into townes and villages here about, they may have lodging, and finde meates,' Jn 4^{8} 'For his Disciples were gone into the citie to bie meates.'

MEBUNNAI (מְבֻנַּי, ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν (i.e. מִבְּנֵי), many MSS Σαβουχαί, Luc. Σαβενί).—According to 2 S 23^{27} a Hushathite (wh. see), one of David's thirty heroes. The name here given, however, is clearly a mistake for Sibbecai, the form which has been preserved in the parallel lists, 1 Ch 11^{29} 27^{11} (Σοβοχαί), and also 2 S 21^{18} (B 'Οεβοχά, A Σεβοχαεί) = 1 Ch 20^{4}.

MECHERATHITE.—See MAACAH.

MEDABA (Μηδαβά).—The form of the name MEDEBA, which appears in 1 Mac 9^{36}.

MEDAD.—See ELDAD.

MEDAN (מְדָן).—Name of a son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25^{2} (B Μαδαίμ, A Μαδάν) = 1 Ch 1^{32} (B Μαδιάμ, A Μαδάν). The word is probably to be identified with Madān, the god of some Arab tribe, best known through the proper name 'Abd-Al-Madān, 'worshipper of Al-Madān'; the tribe or family called Banū 'Abd-Al-Madān was proverbial for various sorts of excellence in the earliest Arabic known to us (Kāmil of Al-Mubarrad, i. 56, 72). Unlike most of the names of the Arabic deities, the word appears to have an appropriate etymology, and to mean simply 'object of worship'; and with this sense the employment of the article accords, as well as the alternative vocalization, Al-Mudān (Sakṭ Al-Zand of Abu 'l-'Alā, ed. Boulak, i. 47). The occurrence of the name of this god in a context in which we expect the name of a tribe, implies that the word was used as a national name also; and the word Kais is precisely parallel to Madān as being used for both a nation and a god, and as taking the article in the latter application. The seat of the worship of Al-Madān appears to have been Yemen (Tāj Al-'Arūs, s.v.), whereas the descendants of Keturah appear to be far away from S. Arabia; but this may be due to the migration of a tribe; and indeed the word occurs as a geographical name in N. Arabia (Yāḳūt and Al-Bekri).

MEDEBA (מֵידְבָא 'gently flowing waters,' Nu 21^{30}, Jos $13^{9.\,16}$, 1 Ch 19^{7}, Is 15^{2}).—A town in the Mishor,* east of Jordan, about 1½ hour S. of

---

* Mishor (מִישׁוֹר Dt 3^{10} 4^{43}, Jos $13^{9.\,16.\,17.\,21}$ 20^{8}, Jer $48^{8.\,21}$; translated by AV 'plain,' or 'plain country,' by RV 'plain,' m. 'tableland') is the name given to one of the divisions of Eastern Palestine, comprising the country between Heshbon and the Arnon, assigned to Reuben. It is a treeless plateau

Heshbon on the Roman road from that place to Kerak. It originally belonged to Moab, but was taken from them by Sihon, who was in his turn dispossessed by the children of Israel (Nu 21^{24-26}). It was assigned to Reuben (Jos 13^{9-16}, where v.^{9} should be translated 'all the tableland—Medeba to Dibon,' and v.^{16} 'all the tableland as far as Medeba'). The Syrians who came to assist the children of Ammon pitched at Medeba, and, from the account of Joab's battle with them, it would seem that the city was then in the hands of the children of Ammon (1 Ch 19^{6-15}). Since David's time (2 S 8^{2}) Moab must have regained possession of the city and territory around, for, according to the Moabite Stone (line 8), Omri took possession of [the land of] Mehedeba, and Israel dwelt therein during his days and half his son's days, forty years; but Mesha recovered the territory, and rebuilt the cities which had been held by Omri and his son Ahab. Medeba is (perhaps) named in line 30, but the stone is here defaced, and the reading not quite certain. Joram's attempt in company with Jehoshaphat to recover these cities (2 K 3) was but partially successful, and the Moabites remained in them unchallenged until the prosperous reign of Jeroboam II., when they were driven to the south of the Arnon. Medeba is mentioned as belonging to Moab in Is 15^{2}, but not in Jer 48—an omission which is the more remarkable, as the list of Moabite cities in Jer is more full than that in Isaiah. Where by comparison with Isaiah we might expect to find it, occurs Madmen (Jer 48^{2}), a name occurring only in that verse. See MADMEN. The LXX renderings are Jos 13^{9} Δαιδαβάν B*, Μαιδαβάν B$^{a\,?}$, Μαιδαβά A. The word is omitted in v.^{16}. 1 Ch 19^{7} Μαιδαβά B, Μηδαβά A, Βαιδαβά ℵ. The text of Nu 21^{30} is uncertain; for the last clause LXX has πῦρ ἐπὶ Μωάβ, Pesh. דמדבדא. The ר of אשר, which has been marked with a point by the Massoretes, is not regarded by the LXX, and neither they nor Pesh. read Medeba. In Is 15^{2} τῆς Μωαβείτιδος (B) represents the Medeba of MT.

In Maccabæan times John, the eldest son of Mattathias, was killed by a robber clan which lived at Medeba. The name of this clan was Jambri or Ambri. How Jonathan avenged the death of his brother is related in 1 Mac 9^{36-42} and Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2, 4. John Hyrcanus laid siege to Medeba, and took it with difficulty (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1). Alexander Jannæus afterwards took it along with others from the Arabians, and Hyrcanus II. promised to restore them to Aretas (ib. XIII. xv. 4, XIV. i. 4).

The city appears to have been a flourishing Christian centre during the Byzantine period. It was the seat of a bishopric, and was represented at the Council of Chalcedon. After remaining desolate for centuries it was occupied in 1880 by a colony of Christians from Kerak, and some Latin fathers have established a mission there. In digging for foundations of houses many ancient remains have been brought to light. Besides the large pool with solid walls mentioned by several travellers, the remains of gates, towers, and four churches, besides some beautiful mosaics, have been discovered. An interesting account of a visit to these ruins is contained in PEFSt for July 1895, and Père Séjourné has written a full article on Medeba in the Revue Biblique for Oct. 1892. A remarkable mosaic map of Christian Palestine and Egypt has also been discovered, a description of which appears in PEFSt for July 1897, being a translation from Clermont-Ganneau's Recueil d'Archéologie Orientale, tom. xi. p. 161, 1897. Further communications with reference to this mosaic are to be found on p. 239 of PEFSt for July 1897, p. 85 of April 1898, p. 177 of July 1898, p. 251 of Oct. 1898. A. T. CHAPMAN.

MEDES (מָדַי, Μῆδοι).—In Gn 10^{2} Madai is a son of Japheth, and is associated with Gomer and Javan. The Assyr. form of the name is Madâ, but when we first meet with it in the annals of Shalmaneser II. (c. B.C. 840) it is written Amadâ. Hadad-nirari III. (c. B.C. 800) overthrew Khanaziruka, king of the Matâ, who inhabited Matiênê, S.W. of the Caspian; W. of the Matâ was Parsuas (perhaps Parthia), with its 27 kings, on the shores of Lake Urumiyeh. It is doubtful whether we should identify Matâ and Madâ as variant forms of the same name, or regard the Matâ as a division of the Madâ; at all events, Hadad-nirari III. also employs the name Madâ, and it is the only form of the name henceforth found in the cuneiform inscriptions. Tiglath-pileser III. overran the Median states E. of Zagruti or the Zagros, sending one of his generals against 'the Medes at the rising of the sun' (B.C. 743); and Sargon in B.C. 713 subdued a number of Median chieftains, one of whom was the chief of Partakanu. Esarhaddon divides Partakanu into the two provinces of Partakka and Partukka, and describes it as 'remote.' In the early part of his reign Assyria was threatened by a combined attack on the part of the Medes, Kimmerians, Sapardâ (Sepharad), and 'Kaztarit, king of Karu-Kassi'; but the Assyr. king carried the war into the enemy's country, and the defeat of the Median 'city-lords' in the far east relieved him of all danger from the Median tribes. A portion of the Kimmerians, however, took possession of the old kingdom of Ellipi, north of Elam, where a new power arose, with its capital in Ecbatana (Pers. Hangmatâna). In the cuneiform inscriptions the Kimmerians are called Umman Manda or nomad 'Barbarians' (Goiim in OT), and the resemblance of Manda to Madâ caused the two words to be confused together by the classical writers.

The Medes, like the Kimmerians, belonged to the Iranian branch of the Aryan race, the Persians being a kindred tribe, which pushed farther south towards the Persian Gulf. According to Herodotus (vii. 62, i. 101), they were called Arians by their neighbours, and were divided into six tribes: the Busæ, Paretakêni (Assyr. Partakanu), Struchates, Arizanti, Budii, and Magi. The Magi, however, seem rather to have been a priestly caste. The Assyr. inscriptions show that the Medes obeyed no central authority, but were divided, like the Greeks, into a number of small states, each under the rule of its own 'city-lord.' Consequently the classical belief in a 'Median empire' was groundless, and was really due to the confusion between the names Madâ and Manda.

A recently discovered inscription of Nabonidos has informed us that the destruction of Nineveh (B.C. 606) was brought about by the Manda, not by the Madâ or Medes. We have also learned from the cuneiform texts that it was the Manda who devastated Mesopotamia, destroying Harran and its temple of the Moon-god; that Astyages (Istuvigu in cuneiform) was king of the Manda; and that the revolt of Cyrus was against the Manda, and not against the Medes. Medes may have been included among the Manda or 'Barbarians,' but the term was primarily applied to the northern hordes who had swarmed across the Caucasus into W. Asia, and were called Kimmerians (see GOMER) and Scythians by the Greeks. The kingdom of Ecbatana was founded by these affording pasture for flocks, and at one time suited for the culture of the vine (Is 16^{8}). The number and extent of the ruins in this district show that it was once thickly inhabited. The Bedawin in their black tents are now the chief inhabitants; see G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 535, 548.

Manda, who had conquered the ancient kingdom of Ellipi.

The 'Median' kings of Herodotus and Ctesias are alike artificial creations. Herodotus makes the Median monarchy begin with Dêiokes, B.C. 710, at a time when the Assyr. empire was at the height of its power, and Sargon was punishing the 'city-lords' of the Medes. Dêiokes is the Daiukku of the Assyr. inscriptions, a vassal-chief under the king of the Mannâ (Minni), who was carried captive to Hamath by Sargon in B.C. 715. Phraortes, who is said to have succeeded Dêiokes, is Frawartish, who carried on wars against the Persians and the Assyrians, and called himself Xathrites (Kaztarit). His successor Cyaxares may be Kaztarit, or he may have been a genuine king of Ecbatana, and the actual predecessor of Astyages. At all events Astyages was a king of the Manda, and his conquest by his rebel vassal Cyrus took place in B.C. 549. On Arphaxad king of the Medes (Jth 1^{1}), see ARPHAXAD.

The list of Median kings given by Ctesias probably comes from a Persian source, and the chronological arrangement of it is even more artificial than that of the list of Herodotus. Lenormant seems to have been right in suggesting that two of the kings in it, Artæus and Astibaras, are the kings of Ellipi, Rita (Dalta) and Ispabara, who were contemporaries of Sargon and Sennacherib.

After the capture of Samaria by Sargon in B.C. 722, some of the Israelites were transported to 'the cities of the Medes' (2 K 17^{6} 18^{11}). This probably took place after Sargon's campaign against the Medes (B.C. 713), when he penetrated as far as the distant land of Bikni. Isaiah (13^{17} 21^{2}) calls on the Medes and Elamites to overthrow Babylon (cf. Jer 25^{25}); and Jeremiah ($51^{11.\ 28}$) speaks of the 'kings' of the Medes combining with Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz to destroy the Bab. empire. At this time it would seem, therefore, that the Medes were still governed by a number of different chiefs. In Elam we must see Anzan, the ancestral kingdom of Cyrus, which an Assyr. tablet states was equivalent to 'Elam'; the invasion of Babylonia, referred to by Jeremiah, may have been one which took place in the reign of Nergal-sharezer, not that of Cyrus. Cyrus, however, united the Medes and Persians under his sway; Gobryas, the governor of Kurdistan, whom he made the first governor of Babylonia after its conquest, was a Mede, according to the classical writers; and Mazares and Harpagos, who conquered Ionia for Cyrus, were both of Medic descent. Hence the Ionian Greeks spoke of 'Medes' rather than of 'Persians.' Gomates, who pretended to be Bardes (Smerdis), the son of Cyrus, and usurped the throne of Cambyses, was a Magian, and therefore also of Median origin; and, in the troubles which followed his murder, Media endeavoured to secure her independence under Frawartish or Phraortes. Frawartish, however, was at length defeated in a pitched battle, and, after being taken prisoner near Rhages, was impaled at Ecbatana. After the destruction of the Persian empire, Media was divided into Media Atropatênê (so named from the satrap Atropates), which corresponded with the modern Azerbijan, and included the Parsuas of the Assyr. monuments, and Media Magna to the south and east of it. Here were Ecbatana (now Hamadan), and Bagistana (now Behistun) in the ancient territory of Ellipi. Bagistana is probably the place called Bit-ili or Bethel by Sargon. Media had thus come to extend widely beyond its limits in the Assyr. age, when the Medes inhabited little more than Matiênê and the district to the E. of it, and S. of the Caspian, in which Raga or Rhages (now Ra) was situated. They were, in fact, mountaineers, and hence had the reputation of being brave and warlike, delighting in arms, in brilliant clothing, and in carrying off booty from their more settled neighbours. From the Persian monuments we gather that they let the beard grow, and wore caps, long robes with full sleeves, and shoes. Their religion was a form of Zoroastrian fire-worship, and they left the bodies of the dead to be devoured by wild beasts or birds of prey. (See J. V. Prášek, Medien und das Haus des Kyaxares, 1890).

INTRODUCTION.—1. Meaning and use of the term 'Mediator.'—The word 'mediator' (Gr. μεσίτης) is found only in NT, namely at Gal $3^{19.\ 20}$, 1 Ti 2^{5}, He 8^{6} 9^{15} 12^{24}.* The verbal form (μεσιτεύω) occurs once, in He 6^{17}. The derivation from the adjective μέσος 'in the middle' merely suggests the idea of one who is found in the midst, or who enters into the middle. But usage gives a more specific meaning to the term. Thus we always find it standing for a person who in some way intervenes between two. This intervention is of two kinds: (1) in order to bring about a reconciliation where there has been division or enmity—the thought in Job, and in St. Paul's use of the word; (2) quite apart from any notion of a previous quarrel, with the idea of drawing two together into a compact or covenant—the meaning in Hebrews in each of the three cases where it occurs. Moses was regarded as a mediator in a general sense, as coming between God and Israel, both to shield the people from the Divine severity, and to introduce God's law to their notice and effect their union with Him as a covenant people. The first of these ideas appears in Dt 5^{5}, where, while the word 'mediator' is not used, the idea is suggested by a cognate adverbial form (ἀνὰ μέσον, Heb. בֵּין). Philo uses the word 'mediator' (μεσίτης) for Moses in the same connexion (Vit. Moys. iii. 19). Elsewhere Philo refers to speech as a 'mediator and intercessor' (de Somn. i. 22). Josephus writes of Agrippa being a mediator between the people of Ilium (Ant. XVI. ii. 2).

2. The idea of mediation in religion.—While the word 'mediator' is rarely met with, the idea contained in it is one of the most vital and influential thoughts in religion. Nearly every religion bears witness to it. Both priesthood and prophecy rest upon the conception of mediation—priesthood in the selection of certain men for approach to God and the reconciliation of the people with Him by means of sacrifice; prophecy in the sending of Divine messengers who are to deliver to the people the oracles they have received from heaven. idea emerges in the lowest grades of civilization under the form of the medicine man, the rain-maker, the sorcerer, whose function, however, is rather to coerce than to conciliate inimical powers. While the purification of religion eliminates degraded, distorted, and superstitious forms of mediation, it does not destroy the essential idea, which is found more clearly and forcibly expressed in Christianity than in any other type of religion. So prominent and characteristic is the idea that we might define Christianity in the abstract as Theism plus Mediation—understanding the latter term to include all that is taught concerning the person and mission of Christ, for it is this idea that most distinguishes the religion of the NT from pure Theism. But Butler pointed out that the specially Christian idea of 'the appointment of a Mediator, and the redemption of the world by him, was analogous to many things in the constitution and course of nature' (Analogy, pt. ii. ch. v.).

i. MEDIATION IN PAGANISM.—Space will not permit of more than the briefest notice of this branch of the subject; and yet it is impossible to do justice to the great biblical doctrine of mediation without giving at least some attention to its position in the light of comparative religion.
